TO HIS GRACE
THE DUKE of ORMOND,
Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, &c.

My LORD,

THE reasonable Hopes that the English History could not be unacceptable to a Person and Family, that must make so noble a Figure in it, have encourag'd me to be thus bold in my Approaches: And real Gratitude to your Grace, for putting me upon this Work, and giving Life and Being to it, has excited me to lay it at your Grace's Feet; as a glorious Patron of Learning, and a generous Patriot of your Country, whose very Name will give both Lustre, and Protection to it. And this I have presum'd to offer, not so much with the Prospect of celebrating your Heroick Virtues, as acknowledging this unmerited Favour.

For

The DEDICATION.

For to enter into so spacious a Field, and to describe all the great Actions of your Self, and your Renowned Ancestors, is more properly the Work of an History, than a Dedication. And it would require an Historian of the most exalted Genius to record the several Excellencies of a Family, so truly Nustrious, and so gloriously Conspicuous, as your own. Such a Writer ought to do Justice to your Character in Particular; to display your inherent Magnanimity and Gallantry, your intrepid Courage and Bravery, and, which give Beauty and Brightness to these, your condescending Affability, and your unbounded Beneficence to Others. These, with that Greatness of Mind that soars above all private Interest, and the Faction of all Parties, are proper Subjects to be transmitted to Posterity, by such as have sufficient Abilities. Therefore I shall only presume to glance upon such Particulars, as will easily show what Praises are due from the Gratitude of One Kingdom, and the Justice of Another.

When England labour'd under all the Difficulties of a threatening War abroad, and powerful Disturbers at home; when her active Monarch was struggling with perpetual Oppositions, and wanted the Aids of the best and bravest of his Nobility; in those discouraging Times your Grace was pleas'd generously to offer your Service, to hazard your Person, and expend your Fortune, both in Ireland, and in Flanders. In the Latter, in one Battel your ardent Courage transported you beyond the Assistance of your Friends, to the reaping of the most dangerous Laurels; where your Wounds added Lustre to your Actions, and your Captivity prov'd your Triumph, by giving you Opportunities of displaying your Generosity, as you had done your Valour, and of teaching Humanity and Civility to one of the most polite Nations in the World.

When afterwards the Monarch of France became more formidable than ever, by a new Accession of large Kingdoms and Dominions, your Grace then shew'd us that

He

He was not invulnerable; and by your glorious Expedition at Vigo, gave us a happy Omen of future Successes in those Parts. This was the first publick Triumph in this wonderful Reign; which gave Joy to the whole Nation, and rais'd an Emulation between the Affections of the People, and the Love of the Soldiers.

As all Men became sensible of your Grace's Merits, so none more justly than those of your Native Country; who, upon your Entrance into the Government there, receiv'd you with the utmost Transports of Zeal and Joy. The Nobility, and Representatives of that Kingdom, unanimously express'd their mighty Satisfaction: The Former could not but assure your Grace, That they admir'd Her Majesty's Wisdom, in appointing your Grace to represent Her Royal Person upon this Occasion, since only your Grace could in this Juncture of Difficulty and Distress compose the Minds of Her People, and raise their Hopes that some Relief was intended them: And I think I may say in the Words of the Latter, That your unshaken Fidelity to the Crown, Zeal for the Protestant Religion and Interest, Conduct and distinguishing Bravery on all Occasions in the Publick Service, are so many Honours done to your Native Country. To the same Effect they shortly after declar'd as much in their Address to Her Majesty, who had conferr'd this desir'd Honour upon them.

These were the grateful Marks of the Nation's Satisfaction, in the Beginning of the Parliament; in the Conclusion of which, their Experience excited a more large and particular Acknowledgment of your Grace's Noble Services, as your indefatigable Application, as well in the framing, as in obtaining, the Return of the many good Bills from Her Majesty, especially the Bill to prevent the Growth of Popery. And it was upon this happy Occasion, that the Commons thus express'd the Sense of their Nation: When we recollect the Honourable Part your most Noble Grandfather had in the Settlement of the Protestant Interest in this Kingdom, we cannot but Congratulate your Grace's greater Glory and Felicity, in being the Instru- ment, under Her Majesty, of giving a more lasting Security to the Protestant Religion, than ever it had since the Reformation.

I have mention'd these Particulars with the Plainness and Fidelity of an Historian, in Hopes to render them more agreeable to your Grace; and that such undeniable Truths will not only remove all Imputations of Flattery, but also procure a Pardon for that which would otherwise be an inexcusable Presumption in

Your Grace's most humble,

Most oblig'd, and

Devoted Servant,

THE PREFACE.

Notwithstanding the common Pretence among many Authors, That their Books were written at the Instance of Friends and others, I am oblig'd to do my self the Justice to declare, That several considerable Persons advis'd and urg'd me to undertake this Work, long before I had Time and Leisure to begin it. The chief Reasons alledg'd were, First, The great Benefit and general Usefulness of the English History to all the Nobility, Gentry, and great Numbers of others in the Nation. Next, The unpleasing Difficulties in attaining to that Knowledge, and the Length of Time requir'd to master the Subject; which had discourag'd many, and incapacitated more from arriving at any reasonable Perfection in it. So that as the Case then stood, an Englishman, who desir'd to know his own Country's Story, was oblig'd to read over a Library, rather than a single History, if he expected any answerable Success. Now the Perusal of all the Monkish Writers, with the Others necessary on this Occasion, is a Labour highly disagreeable to the Taste and Genius of this refin'd Age; which cannot bear with the Meannesses and Sterilities of some of them, no more than the Prolixities and Impertinencies of others. Even Hollingshed and Speed, the two best and most compleat Writers of their Times, have been condemn'd chiefly for their being so very tedious and voluminous; and for that Reason, are now much neglected, and almost laid aside.

These were sufficient Inducements to me to undertake this Work, which, as far as the Subject and Materials would afford, was design'd so as to partake of the Advantages both of an Original History and an Abridgement; so as to preserve the Essentials and Beauties of the Former, and the Easiness and Conveniences of the Latter. In order to surmount so great a Difficulty, I had a nice Consultation with several Friends; when the Examples of Milton and Daniel soon convinc'd us, that Abridgements might be useful and acceptable to the Nation; but upon a careful Examination of those two considerable Writers, we found them really too short and confin'd to answer our Ends and Designs; therefore it was determin'd to make this History in Proportion almost as long again as theirs. The Size and Method being thus fix'd and determin'd, I proceeded in the Work with all Care and Diligence, hoping in a reasonable Time to bring it into the World: But in the Performance, I was unhappily disturb'd with a thousand various Interruptions, and many real Indispositions; so that it was hinder'd and protracted at least one Year longer than was expected, and might have been presum'd; for which I am to beg the Excuse of several, who by that Means were deceiv'd as to the Time of the Publication.

The P R E F A C E.

Now it is finish'd and publish'd, perhaps the Reader will expect some further Account than I have already given of it; in which I shall very briefly endeavour to satisfy him, tho' I cannot pretend to obviate all the Objections that may be rais'd against it. As Truth and Fidelity were my principal Aims, as Qualifications most necessary; so were likewise Perspicuity and Elevation, Diversion and Instruction, as Properties no less useful. For the Business of an Historian is not barely to tell his Reader a true and faithful Story, which is the Office of a Gazetteer and Journalist; but he ought withal insensibly to instruct him, as also sensibly to divert him: He is not so much to fill his Head, as to enlarge his Mind; not so much to load his Memory, as to enrich his Understanding, to elevate his Thoughts, and even to captivate his Affections. In short, the Qualifications of a compleat Historian are so considerable, as well as numerous, that a perfect Work of that Nature has been justly rank'd with the greatest of all Human Undertakings; as may be seen from Rapin, Le Moyne, and others, who have given us excellent Rules for that Purpose, taken from the Nature of the Thing, as well as the Examples of the most celebrated Historians in all Ages. To enumerate and particularize those Rules and Qualifications, would too much discover my own Defects and Imperfections; therefore I shall only inform my Reader, that all along I had them in my View, and endeavour'd to follow them as much as a real Abridgement, broken Materials, and an unequal Subject would permit; all which were great Disadvantages.

I have all the Way consider'd my Reader as a Traveller through a vast Country, wherein he must have Occasion for many Resting-Places; some for greater Refreshments, and others for less. Accordingly, in every Reign I have prepar'd such a convenient Number of Stages, as I could judge best for that Purpose, by fixing the great Sections at such proper Periods of Time, and such natural Distinctions of Matter, as should be most advantageous for the Ease and Pleasure of the Reader, as well as for his apprehending and retaining the whole Subject. The Want of such periodical Distinctions, and such convenient Separations of the main Parts, have been a great Disadvantage to many of the best Historians. From hence oftentimes there appears a Cloudiness, when there is none in Reality, sometimes a Light too much confus'd, and for the most Part the Reader is reduc'd to an unnecessary Labour, by being oblig'd to digest and separate what the Author ought to have done for him. Perhaps I should offend, if I nam'd a late Writer, and one of the best in the English Tongue, who seems to have been too defective in this Case; and his excellent History has been thought by some to be too tedious and perplex'd, when a nice Method, a clear Division, and more Chronological Distinction of the Parts, would in a great measure have prevented that Objection.

As to the Materials, and the Authors from whence this Work was collected, for the most Part the Reader may see their Names in the inward Margin of the Book, which for above Half Way consists chiefly of the Roman, Saxon and English Monkish Historians, with some Foreigners. These are put in a small Print, and a little Compass, that they might not too much withdraw the Eyes of the Reader, who in History ought to meet with no Impediments nor Interruptions. Besides these Writers, I have made use of all those of a more modern Date, and more regular Design, such as Hall, Grafton, Polydore Virgil, Hollinghed, Stow, Speed, Baker, Daniel, Biondi, &c. But of the Moderns none more have been of greater use to me than the laborious Works of Dr. Howel, Dr. Brady and Mr. Tyrrell, besides the Celebrated History of the Reformation; by which I have been eas'd of much Trouble. I have also made use of Mr. Barns's Reign of King Edward III. Sir Robert Howard's Reign of Edward and Richard II. and Mr. Goodwin's Reign of Henry V. besides several other Writers of particular Lives and Reigns, such as Camden, Bacon, Herbert, Habington, Temple, &c. From all these several Writers, and many others, I have collected and formed this present History; always taking the Liberty either to copy or to imitate any Parts of them, if I found them really conducing to the Usefulness, or the Ornament of my Work. And from all these, I have compil'd an History as full, comprehensive and compleat, as I could bring into the Compass of the propos'd Size and Bigness. And that nothing might be wanting, I have all the way enrich'd it with the best and wisest Sayings of Great Men, that I could find in larger Volumes, and likewise with such short Moral Reflections, and such proper Characters of Men, as might give Life, as well as add Instruction to the History.

Notwithstanding all my Care and Caution, it cannot be expected, that a Work compos'd from such Variety of Materials, should be absolutely free from Errors, nor a History, so Comprehensive, from Omissions. As to this, I can only say, that I us'd my best Endeavours to follow the strict Rules of Sincerity and Judgment, the two superior Guides to an Historian. As to the Former, which includes or implies Impartiality, I may insist upon that without the Breach of Modesty, and declare that I am not conscious to my self of any Deviation from Truth, and real Fact; and if any such be found, I desire it may be charg'd upon the Latter, or upon Ignorance, or Inadvertency. I am sensible of the mighty Difficulties of discovering Truth in some Cases, and of knowing it when it is discover'd, therefore beg that some candid Allowances may be made: And a strict Impartiality is so rare a Quality in most Writers of History, that many are ready to think, that an impartial Historian is a Man not to be found in the World; and some carry it farther, and say, that considering Human Infirmities, it is impossible to be really impartial. I grant there are strong Propensities in all Mankind to join and adhere to one Side more than another, and that in the most trivial Cases; but while there are such things in the World, as Truth and Honesty, undoubtedly there may be an impartial Historian as well as an impartial Judge in a Court, who can certainly give Sentence according to his Conscience and Judgment, tho' contrary to his Desires and Inclinations. An Historian ought never to be of a Party but in one Respect; that is, he ought always to be of the same Side with Truth, and incline to the Cause that is most just and rightful, tho' it chance to be highly offensive to some, whose Thoughts are working a contrary way. Such a Writer I presume to declare my self; and I have carefully endeavour'd neither to exasperate, nor flatter any one Party of Men in the Nation, industriously avoiding all Expressions that had a Tendency either way. And if some Passages shall still displease, I must declare, that it was contrary to my Design and Intention. I have indeed taken more liberty as to Matters of unquestionable Morality and Justice, and have occasionally stigmatiz'd tix'd the flagrant Vices and Impieties of great Men; especially where I found a restless Ambition, treacherous and villanous Practices, and an insatiable Thirst after the Blood of others. Such Crimes as these ought not to be spar'd or palliated by an Historian of any Religion, and they seldom fail of signal Punishments in this World; which I have the more expos'd, by shewing the Hand of a just and retaliating Providence from above. And this, as well as other Histories, will afford us many Examples of the greatest Men, who have been arrested by the Vengeance of Heaven, after they have been able to break through all the Powers of Human Laws, and common Judicature.

As to any real Faults or Imperfections that may be found in this Book, while they are not contrary to the Fidelity of an Historian, I shall not shew much Concern, but leave them to the Judgment and Candour of the Reader. I shall only beg of him not to judge of the Work by a single Chapter or Reign, but consider the Nature and Series of the whole, before he passes Sentence. If it be found, that the Form of it is irregular and disproportionate; that the general Method is intricate and confus'd; that the Colourings are weak and unaffecting, and that the Stile is mean, flat and insipid; I must then submit with Patience and Silence. But if there be no great Failures as to these Essentials, I hope the rest of my Defects may more deserve a private Admonition, than a publick Animadversion.

Before I conclude this Preface, I am to inform the Reader, that this Volume was first design'd to have ended at the Death of Queen Elizabeth, as the most proper Period of Time: But afterwards the Importunities of several so far prevail'd upon me, that I added the Reign of King James I. to it: Of which, as I found the worst Writers, and met with the most Difficulties, so I am afraid I shall need the greatest Excuses. Notwithstanding which, I have a full Design of carrying this Work further, hoping I shall meet with due Assistance and Encouragement.

To come at last to the Errors of the Press, there are few but what the Reader may easily correct, and those are Names of Persons or Places, which I believe proceeded from the hasty writing of the Copy. But because there are two or three which may seem to be more the Fault of the Author, than the Printer, I shall just mention them.

INTRODUCTION.

Containing a short Account of Ancient BRITAIN, and its First INHABITANTS.

THE principal Design in this following History, is to give a full and regular Account of the Transactions of that Part of Britain, now call'd England and Wales, for the Space of about sixteen Centuries; that is from the first Entrance of Julius Caesar and the Romans, 'till the Kingdom of Scotland was added to the Crown of England. And tho' there is frequent occasion to treat of the Affairs of Scotland, Ireland, and other Countries, yet the Reader is not to expect any more than what have a necessary, or natural Dependence upon those of England. For nine or ten Centuries, which include the greatest Variety of Matters, our Accounts are very imperfect and defective, sometimes disjointed, broken and full of Chasmes, and other times confus'd, obscure and uncertain. So that the Reading of this History will, in a great measure, be like a Man's travelling first by Twi-light, and then in the Night, 'till the Morning Sun at length gives him a new and clear Light. But that the Account may be as perspicuous and as regular as the Materials will permit, we shall take some short Notice of Britain and its Inhabitants, as they were before the Arrival of Caesar; first the Country, and next the People.

The Country, before the Entrance of the Romans, had two different Names, Albion, and Britain, concerning which there have been more Variety of Opinions. It was call'd Albion, either from a suppos'd Giant of that Name, the Son of Neptune, mention'd by many ancient Writers, it being proper that the greatest Island in the Ocean should receive its Name from a Son of the greatest Sea-God; or else from the old Word Ἀλβόν, which among the Greeks signifies White, by reason of the white chalky Cliffs, seen by the Mariners afar off, as they sail'd these Seas. Some think it comes from the Hebrew Word Alben, which also signifies White, and others from the Phœnician Word Alp, which signifies signifies High; but of these there is but little Certainty. Nor is there much greater concerning the Name of Britain, which some former Writers confidently derive from Brutus, the third by Descent from the Trojan Aeneas; and others from the British Word Pryd Cain, that is Forma Candida, a white Form. Mr. Camden more probably derives it from Brith, which in the English Tongue signifies Painted, and the Greek Word Ταυία, signifying a Nation; agreeable to the Custom of the ancient Britains, who were wont to discolour and paint their naked Bodies; so that according to him, Britain is a Nation of painted Men, such as the Romans call'd Picts in succeeding Times. Mr. Somner, another great Antiquary, dislikes this Etymology, and proposes another plausible Conjecture, namely, that it comes from the Word Brydio, which in the British Tongue implies Heat and Fury; pointing out the hot and violent Motion of the Seas that surround this Isle, which have been particularly observ'd by many ancient Authors. Others think the Opinion of Mon. Bochart most probable, who derives it from the Phœnicians, who in their Language call'd this Island, and some others near it, Barat-Anac, or more contractedly Bratanac, that is a Land of Tin; which in Time might be mollify'd by the Greeks into Βρετανία. And they conclude it to be the more satisfactory, because the Greeks gave these Islands the Name of Cassiterides, which signifies the same with Barat-Anac, the Land or Country of Tin. Of these several Opinions, we must leave the Reader to chuse for himself; and therefore not to dwell upon these uncertain Subjects, we immediately proceed to some more material Account of the Country.

A general Description of the Country.

This Country, in its utmost Extent, was by the Ancients accounted the largest Island in the World; and notwithstanding the later Discoveries of Madagascar and Japan, which are brought in competition with it, we are not yet certain of the contrary. However all agree that it is far the most considerable of all others; especially if the sole Regard be had to that Part to which we are principally confin'd in this History. That Part has been celebrated by Writers in all Ages for the profuse Bounties of Nature, both in the excellent Temperature of the Air, and the valuable Products of the Soil. The Air, tho' thick and moist, is far more mild and temperate than any Part of the Continent under the same Climate, so that there is no need of Stoves in Winter, nor Grotto's in Summer; nor is it so frequently disturb'd with Tempests and Hurricanes, nor so infected with pestilential Distempers; nor is the Land so generally punish'd with Earthquakes and Famines, as many other Countries are. Tho' in its Products it may be said to be defective in some few Blessings, as Wine and Oil, yet in general it abounds and triumphs; and no Country exceeds it in the three main Necessaries of Human Life, Flesh and Corn for Food, Wool and other Conveniencies for Raiment, and Timber and Stone for Building; to which we may add Wood and Coals for Firing, and the most useful Metals for all Occasions. For Profit it has a double Advantage from its Situation in the Ocean, the Conveniency of a foreign Trade, and the Security from foreign Invasion; and for Pleasure and Beauty all Strangers take particular Notice of its excellent Verdure, in which it generally exceeds the most fruitful Parts of Europe. The happy Fertility and Pleasantness of Britain, gave occasion to some of the Ancients to imagine that these were the Fortunate Islands, and those Seats of the Blessed, where the Poets tell us, That the whole Face of Nature always smil'd with one perpetual Spring. For Plenty Britain was the Granary and Magazine of the Western Empire, from whence the Romans were wont every Year in eight hundred Vessels to transport vast Quantities of Corn, for their Armies upon the Frontiers of Germany. In short the Excellency of this Country is apparent from those transcendent Eulogies bestow'd both by ancient and modern Writers, who pronounce her 'happy above all other Countries, whom Nature 'has enrich'd with all the Blessings of Heaven and Earth, in whom nothing is 'hurtful, nor nothing desirable is wanting; a Master-Piece of Nature, per-

‘ form’d when she was in the best and gayest Humour, which she plac’d as a little World by it self, upon the Side of the greater, merely for the Delight of Mankind; the most accurate Model which she propos’d to her self to beautify the other Parts of the Universe; whose Vallies are like Eden, whose Hills are as Lebanon, whose Springs are as Pisga, whose Rivers are as Jordan, whose Walls is the Ocean, and whose Defence is the Lord Jehovah.

II. A Country so enrich’d and beautify’d by Nature, could not long want Inhabitants, after the Dispersion of the Sons of Noah. The first of which are most probably believ’d to have proceeded from Gomer, the eldest Son of Japhet, whose immediate Posterity settl’d in Gaul, and other neighbouring Countries. So that Britain seems to have been inhabited Two Thousand Years before the Romans made any Conquest in it. But as to the Actions of the Inhabitants during that Space of Time, we have no other certain Knowledge, than that they had some Commerce and Intercourse both with the Phœnicians and Greeks, before they were known to the Romans. What these Britains were at the Time of the Romans Arrival, and for some considerable time after, we have some Account from several ancient Writers, as Cæsar, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Mela, Tacitus, Dion, Herodian, Solinus, and some others; from all whom we shall describe their Persons, Manners, Customs, Government and Divisions.

The ancient Inhabitants of it.

The ancient Britains were a numerous and powerful People, and like the greatest Part of the World at that Time, barbarous and idolatrous: Yet they wanted not natural Generosity and Bravery, being fierce and courageous, courting all dangerous Enterprizes, passionate Opposers of Slavery, and exquisitely sensible of the Charms of Liberty. They in most Things resembled their Neighbours the Gauls, but were generally more rude and plain, as well as more warm and vigorous; yet Tacitus preferr’d their Wits and Ingenuities before them, and Diodorus their Honesty and Integrity much before those of the Romans. As to their Bodies, they were generally very tall, and their Constitution so strong, that several of them, according to Plutarch, would live a Hundred and twenty Years; the natural Heat of the Body, as he conceives, being preserv’d by the Coolness of the Country. They were frequently yellow-hair’d, and the Women fair and beautiful, and remarkable for their excellent Features. All the Britains, says Cæsar, dy’d their Bodies with Woad, which render’d them of a Sky Colour, and thereupon the more terrible in Battel; and they wore their Hair long upon their Head and upper Lip, but close and bare in all other Parts of the Body. Herodian tells us that they knew not the Use of Cloaths; but about their Necks and Wastes they wore Iron, accounting it an Ornament and a Sign of Riches, as other Nations did Gold: That they painted their Bodies with divers Colours, and with all Kinds of Animals there represented, wherefore they wore no Cloaths lest those beautiful Figures should be hid. In which Painting Pliny agrees, and describes the Herb Woad to be like the Plantain in Gaul, naming it Glastum, with the Juice of which, adds he, the Women of Britain, as well Wives as Virgins, anointed and dy’d their Bodies, resembling the Æthiopians by that Tincture, in which Manner they us’d at solemn Feasts and Sacrifices to go all naked. Dion says that it was the Custom of the Nation to abide in Tents, all naked, and without Shoes; tho’ Cæsar in another Place says, that they were clad with Skins, which probably is meant of the civiler Sort of them, and in Time of Battel. Solinus tells us that they painted themselves with the Shapes of several Beasts, artificially cut out in their Bodies in their Youth, so that these Prints in their Flesh might increase according to the Growth of their Bodies. Nor was any Thing reckon’d a greater Sign of Patience among these barbarous Nations, than to make such deep Scars in their Limbs, as might drink in great Quantities of Paint and Colour. These Scars are by Tertullian term’d Britannorum Stigmata, the Britains Marks.

The usual Diet. To proceed to their Diet and domestick Concerns, it was accounted a Crime to eat either Hen, Hare or Goose, which notwithstanding, as Cæsar observes, they bred for their Pleasures; nor did they live sumptuously at full and rich Tables, as Diodorus affirms, but rather in Necessity could feed upon Barks and Roots of Trees, and upon a Quantity of Meat no larger than a Bean, after which for a considerable Time they were neither hungry nor thirsty, as Dion assures us. He likewise tells us, that they till'd no Ground, nor eat any Fish, tho' their Rivers were plentifully stored with them, but liv'd upon Prey, Venison and Fruits, to which Cæsar adds Milk, of which, says Strabo, they had not then Skill to make Cheese. According to Solinus their usual Drink was made of Barley; and for Tillage Pliny seems to contradict Dion, affirming that they manur'd their Ground with Marl instead of Dung, which argu'd no such Simplicity in Gardning and Husbandry as Strabo charg'd upon them. Their Buildings and Houses were as mean as their Diet and Cloaths, for they gave the Name of Towns to certain cumbersome Woods, which having fortify'd with Rampiers and Ditches, they usually retreated to them, to avoid the Incursions of their Enemies, as Cæsar informs us. Strabo adds, that Woods among them were instead of Cities; for having cut down Trees, and enclos'd a large round Plat of Ground with them, they there built Huts to live in, and made Folds for their Cattle, which were not of any long Continuance. Their Houses were often thatch'd with Reed, poorly built, and dispers'd all over the Country without Observance of Order or Distance, by which Villages were compos'd: For the Britains were plac'd as every Man lik'd, at smaller or greater Distances, as they were invited by the Fertility of the Soil, or the Convenience of Wood or Water.

*The Buildings

Marriages.*

Their best Towns were most upon their Coasts, and founded for the Advantage of Havens, and Recourse of Strangers from the Continent, to buy and sell, or exchange Wares with those of the Island. These Inhabitants were much more civiliz'd than those of the Inland Country, by the Commerce and Intercourse of other Nations, especially the Gauls, who long before had been civiliz'd by the Roman Colonies. The Commodities exported out of this Isle were chiefly Hides and Tin, with many inferior Things, such as Ivory Boxes, Sheers, Bits and Bridles, Wreathes and Chains, with some Trifles made of Amber and Glafs. They had some Metals, and also Pearl, tho' of no great Value; and as their Traffick was mean and inconsiderable, so was their Mony and their Shipping. The former was only Brass and Iron Rings, which being made to a certain Weight, serv'd for their current Coin: The latter were small Vessels, where Keels and Ribs were made of light Wood, and were cover'd over with Skins and Leather; and as long as they were sailing, so long they abstain'd from Meat; which shews that they were never us'd to long and dangerous Voyages. As they had a frequent Correspondence with the Gauls, so their Language, Customs and Religion were generally the same with theirs. Yet there was one Custom among the Britains which seems peculiar to themselves, and not found in the Histories of any other Nation, which was a Society of Wives among certain Numbers, and by common Consent. Cæsar tells us that they had ten or twelve of them Wives together in common, especially Brothers with each other, and Parents with their Children; but then if any of the Women brought forth, the Child was accounted only his, who first marry'd her. Dion confirms it, and adds, that the Children thus begotten were brought up in common amongst them; and Eusebius afterwards says that many Britains together kept one Wife in common to them all. This unusual Custom was much taken notice of at Rome, and Severus's Empress Julia greatly reproach'd a British Lady with it at Court, as a Custom infamous in the Women, as well as barbarous in the Men. To whom the Lady, having accidentally made some Discoveries among the Romans, briskly reply'd, We do that openly with the best of our Men, which you do privately with the worst of yours.

As to the Religion of the Britains, it was as black and superstitious as any Their Religion. in those Times, and they proceeded so far as to the inhuman Offering of Mens Flesh in their Sacrifices. And besides their ancient Idols, such as Dis, Jupiter, Apollo, Diana, and the like, they worshipp'd Andates for their Goddess of Victory, unto whom they perform'd no small Adorations and Honours, erecting Temples whose Walls continu'd a considerable Space; upon which several of their prophane Portraits with deform'd Lineaments were seen by the mournful Gildas, who describes their grim and stern Visages, pronouncing them infernal in their Nature, and in Number almost exceeding those of Aegypt. Tacitus notes them for being extreamly addicted to inspecting the Entrails of Beasts, and of Men also; and that they honour'd the Altars of their Gods with the Sacrifice and Blood of such as they took Captive in Wars. And Pliny writing of Magick, declar'd that Britain honour'd it with so much Pomp and Ceremony, that a Man would imagine the Persians themselves had been taught it by them. In all Religious Matters they had their Priests and Instructors, the chief of which were call'd Druids, a sort of Men much celebrated in those Times, The Druids who, as Cæsar informs us, had the Management of all Sacrifices, were Interpreters of all Mysteries, and had the Education of the better Sort. By means of their seeming Learning, the Innocence and Simplicity of their Living, and long Custom, the People had them in such Veneration, that they were not only Priests, but the Judges too throughout the Nation. For generally they approv'd of all Laws, determin'd all Controversies, and appointed Rewards and Punishments at Discretion; the People believing that none were oblig'd to submit to any Punishment, unless inflict'd by a Divine Authority. If any refus'd to obey their Decree, they were forbidden the Sacrifices, which was accounted the most grievous Punishment; and those thus Excommunicated were reckon'd the most profligate of Mankind, all Persons avoided their Conversation as the Pest of the Nation, they were excluded the Benefit of the Law, and were render'd incapable of all Honours and Dignities. Among these Druids there was one Primate, who had supream Authority over the rest; upon whose Death, the most celebrated Person succeeded; but if several of equal Merit appear'd, the whole Body proceeded to an Election, tho' sometimes the Sword it self decided the Matter. These Druids once a Year had a general Assembly in the midst of all Gaul, at a certain Place consecrated to that purpose; to which Persons who had any Controversies depending resorted from all Parts. This sort of Religious Profession is thought to have been first in Britain, and from thence carry'd over into Gaul; and in Cæsar's Time those who desir'd to be thoroughly instructed in their Mysteries, for the most part travell'd into Britain. The same Author adds, That the Druids were exempted from all sorts of Military Duties, Taxes and Imposts; which great Privileges caus'd many to become their Disciples, and others to send their Sons and Relations to be admitted into their Order. These Disciples were taught a great Number of Verses by heart, continuing under this Discipline for several Years, not being allow'd to commit their Learning to Writing; both because they would not have the Vulgar acquainted with their mysterious Learning, and because their Scholars might the better exercise their Memories and other Faculties. One of the Principal Doctrines they taught was the Immortality and Transmigration of Souls; which removing the Fear of Death, they look'd upon as proper to excite their Courages. They also made Discourses to their Scholars concerning the Stars and their Motions, the Magnitude of the Heaven and Earth, the Nature of Things, and the Power and Majesty of the Immortal Gods. Among the Religious of the Britains, besides and Bards. these Druids, they had also a sort of People call'd Bards, whose Office it was to sing to the Harp those Songs they had made upon the great Exploits of famous Men; which sort of Men were known many Ages in this Island.

As the Britains were a fierce and warlike People, so they had frequent Encounters among themselves; and, as Tacitus observes, nothing contributed The Wars of the Britains, and their Manner of Fighting. much much to the Romans Advantage over them as their want of Union, and concerting their common Interest. Cæsar and others describe their Manner of Fighting, which was very much in Chariots, as the ancient Heroes of Greece are said to have done in the Trojan Wars; which with short Scythes fasten'd to the ends of the Axle-trees, gave cruel Wounds, great Terror, and made fierce Charges upon the Ranks of their Enemies. In the Beginning of a Battel, they generally scour'd the Plains with their Chariots, flung their Darts, and frequently disorder'd their Enemy's Ranks by the Terror of their Horses, and the furious Ratlings of their Chariot Wheels. Having wound themselves in among the Horse, they left their Chariots, and fought on Foot; their Charioteers in the mean time retiring, and placing themselves so that their Masters might readily find them, to mount again, if they were overpower'd by Numbers. Thus they maintain'd both the Speed of the Horse, and the Steadiness of the Foot in Battel; and by continual Practice were so expert, that upon the Side of a steep Hill, they could stop their Horse at full Speed, turn them in a short Compass, run along upon the Beam, rest upon the Yoke, and from thence in an Instant recover themselves in their Chariots. They often purposely gave ground and retreated, and being at a little Distance from their Enemies, dismounted from their Chariots, to fight them at Disadvantage. The Method of their Cavalry was such, that it prov'd equally dangerous to pursue, or to be pursu'd by them; and they never came to close Fights, but kept at considerable Distances, having others posted in such Order as they might succour one another, and the wearied be reliev'd by fresh Supplies; which argu'd no small Experience in Arms. Dion says, that their Horses were small and swift, and that they themselves ran at an extraordinary rate; and further, that when they stood an Ingagement, they were firm and immoveable. Their common Arms were small Shields, without Helmets, but very large Swords; which express'd a more eager Desire of wounding their Enemies, than defending themselves. They had also short Daggers, and their Spears were short, having at the lower end of each a Piece of Brass like an Apple, by shaking of which they endeavour'd to terrifie their Enemies. They could endure Hunger, Cold and all kinds of Labour, with admirable Patience; for in Bogs up to their Chins they would continue many Days without Food; and in Woods liv'd upon Barks of Trees and Roots. In short, they were a hardy, bold and strong People, till their Bodies came to be soften'd, and their Courage debas'd by the Luxury as well as Servitude which the Romans afterwards introduc'd among them.

Their civil Government.

To come at last to the civil Government of the Britains, we find that it was like that of the ancient Gauls, of several small Nations under as many petty Princes; of which Cæsar mentions Four in the small Compass of Kent. Whether these small British Principalities descended by Succession, or were elected by the Advantages of Age, Wisdom, or Valour in the Families of the Prince, is not recorded. But upon all great and imminent Dangers, the chief Commander of all their Forces was usually chosen by common Consent in general Assemblies; as Casibelanus was against Cæsar's Invasion. The same was done upon the Britains Revolt against the Roman Colonies under Caractacus and Boadicea; for among them Women were admitted to their Principalities and general Commands, either by the Right of Succession, Nobility of Birth, or eminent Qualifications. In common Cases every Province or Principality, only ow'd Service and Allegiance to their own particular Prince. And as their Governments were confin'd to certain Bounds and Limits, so were the Inhabitants divided and distinguish'd by several Denominations; of which we find the Names of Seventeen in that Part of Britain which now goes by the Name of England and Wales, which are as follows. 1. The Cantii, Inhabitants of the present County of Kent. 2. The Regni, Inhabitants of Sussex and Surrey. 3. The Durotriges, Inhabitants of Dorsetshire. 4. The Danmonii, Inhabitants of Devonshire and Cornwall. 5. The Belgæ, Inhabitants of Somersetshire, Wilt-

The Cattiuechlani, Inhabitants of Warwickshire, Buckinghamshire and Bedfordshire. 9. The Trinobantes, Inhabitants of Hertfordshire, Essex and Middlesex. 10. The Iceni, Inhabitants of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire and Huntingtonshire. 11. The Coritani, Inhabitants of Lincolnshire, Leicestershire, Rutland, Darbyshire, Nottinghamshire and Northamptonshire. 12. The Cornavii, Inhabitants of Worcestershire, Staffordshire, Shropshire and Cheshire. 13. The Brigantes, Inhabitants of Yorkshire, Lancashire, Durham, Westmorland and Cumberland. 14. The Ottadini, Inhabitants of Northumberland, with Four other Counties in Scotland. 15. The Silures, Inhabitants of Herefordshire with Four Counties in Wales, viz. Radnorshire, Brecknockshire, Monmouthshire and Glamorganshire. 16. The Ordovices, Inhabitants of Five Counties in Wales, viz. Montgomeryshire, Merionethshire, Caernarvonshire, Flintshire and Denbighshire. 17. The Dimetæ, Inhabitants of the rest of Wales, viz. Caermarthenshire, Pembrookshire and Cardiganshire.

This was the State of Britain, at the Time when the Romans first invaded it; and this is the real Substance of what we certainly know of the ancient Britains before Cæsar's Arrival. As to the formal History of Brute, and his long Race of succeeding Kings down to Casibelanus, it is too gross and improbable to be credited; and it has been of late so fairly detected, that we need not insist any longer upon it. Therefore, as the learned Mr. Camden well observes, here it is that the English Historian ought to begin his History, and no higher; that is, at the first Entrance of Julius Cæsar and the Romans. And at this Period of Time we shall begin ours, and shall endeavour to carry it on in a continu'd Series, with as much Regularity and Perspicuity as the Story it self, and the Materials will permit.

I. WHEN Valour and Fortune had so conspir'd, or rather Providence had decreed, that the Romans should be Sovereigns of the Western World, the renown'd Julius Cæsar, having conquer'd the powerful Gauls, cast his Eyes towards the Ocean, as if the Roman Empire was not yet wide enough for his Ambition; so that subduing all, both by Sea and Land, he might join those Countries by Conquest, which had been separated by Nature. Accordingly being fir'd with a Prospect of new Glories, or provok'd by the Supplies sent from Britain into Gaul during his late Wars, in the 54th Year before Christ, he resolv'd upon an Expedition into this Isle; tho' Suetonius writes, that he was excited by the Hopes of the British Pearls, the Weight and Largeness of which he often try'd in his Hands; an improbable Inducement, and more proper for common Soldiers than an Hero. The Places, Ports and Havens of Britain being not ^{Cæsar,} well known to Cæsar, he first sent C. Volusenus, a Tribune of his Army, with a Gally to make all convenient Discoveries upon the Coasts, who after five Days careful Search, return'd to him into Gaul. During which Time the Britains by the Merchants receiv'd secret Intelligence of Cæsar's design'd Expedition, and many of the private States sent Ambassadors into Gaul, offering Hostages, and promising Obedience to the Romans. Cæsar having exhorted them to persist in that Resolution, civilly dismiss'd them, together with Comius Atrebatensis, who had great Authority in those Parts, that he might persuade them to continue firm and faithful to the Romans, and to let them understand that he was coming over in Person: But Comius upon his first landing, was chcerously imprison'd by the Britains.

In the mean Time the victorious Cæsar, having drawn together about ^{Cæsar, &c.} eighty Transport Ships for two Legions of Soldiers, and about eighteen more for his Horse, set Sail from the Country of the Morini, now the Province of Picardy, in France, at three in the Morning, and about four the Day following arriv'd on the Coasts of Britain, at a Place inconvenient for Landing, which was near Dover; for the Bay was narrow, and so pent in by the Mountains, that the Enemy could easily cast their Darts from thence to the Shore. Having therefore got a favourable Wind and Tide, he sail'd about eight Miles Northwards, where in a plain and open Shore, near Deal, he rod at Anchor. The Britains perceiving his Design, immediately dispatch'd their Horse and Chariots, to prevent his Landing. And here the Romans sustain'd great Difficulties, for their large Vessels could not ride close enough to the Shore in this shallow Sea, so that the Soldiers were oblig'd to leap down from their high Ships in unknown Places, under heavy Armour, and at once contend both with the Waves and Enemy. On the other side, the Britains, who knew the Nature of the Ground, were free and uncumber'd; and fought either on dry Land, or upon the Edges of the Water; so that the Romans were much dishearten'd, and exerted not their usual Spirit and Bravery. Whereupon Cæsar commanded the Transport Ships to be remov'd, and the Gallies to be row'd up just over against the Britains, and from thence to employ their Slings, Engines, and Arrows against them; which Vessels and Engines being strange and unusual to them, they soon gave Ground. But the Romans still delaying, the Standard-Bearer of the tenth Legion, first invoking the Gods, That this Action might prove successful and glorious, cry'd out, Leap down, my brave Soldiers! unless you would betray the Roman Eagle to the Enemy; for I am resolv'd to perform my Duty to the Publick, and to the General. Upon these Words he courageously threw himself into the Sea, and boldly advancing with his Eagle towards the Enemy, he was follow'd by the rest of the Soldiers to the Shore. Eutropius from Suetonius tells us, that Scæva, a valiant Soldier with four others were the first that landed, who being deserted by his Companions, defended himself to a Miracle against a whole Multitude, till being wearied and wounded, he swam back to the Fleet, begg'd pardon of Cæsar for his Rashness, and was rewarded with the Honour of a Centurion. The Landing of the Soldiers occasion'd an obstinate Fight on both Sides; but the Romans being cumber'd with Arms, toss'd with the Waves, and wanting sure footing, were put into Disorder and Confusion; till Cæsar with great Dexterity caus'd the Pinnaces and Ship-Boats to ply about with Recruits to succour them. At length they gradually got on dry Land, and so vigorously charg'd the Britains, that they soon put them to Flight; but could not pursue them, for want of their Horse, which were not yet arriv'd. The Britains, upon this Defeat, immediately sent Ambassadors, and with them Comius, whom they had imprison'd, to beg a Peace, charging all Misbehaviour upon the Multitude titude, and their own Imprudence. Cæsar, whose Mercy was equal to his Valour, soon pardon'd them, receiv'd some Hostages at present, with a Promise of more; so a Peace was concluded on the fourth Day after his landing in Britain.

Shortly after the Roman Affairs began to be in a declining Condition; for their eighteen Ships, which transported the Horse, being come within View of Britain, were by a sudden Storm driven to the Westward, and found great Difficulty in recovering the Continent of Gaul. And what added to this Misfortune, the same Night, at the Full of the Moon, the Gallies which were drawn a-shore, were fill'd with Water by the Tide, and the Ships of Burden, which lay at Anchor, were so shatter'd by the Tempests, that they were render'd wholly unfit for Service. This Loss was so considerable, that Suetonius accounted it the first of the three great Misfortunes that ever befel Cæsar in all his Proceedings: And the Britains were so sensible of the Romans want of Horse, Ships and Provisions, that they immediately resolv'd upon a Revolt, and in a publick Council condemn'd all such as Impious as refus'd to join with the Heavens, whose Elements had thus far declar'd for their Liberties, assuring themselves, that if they succeeded this Time, they should be freed from all future Invasions. But Cæsar soon perceiv'd their Intentions, by their Carriage and slow Performance of Covenants; therefore took particular Care to bring in Corn daily, and with uncommon Diligence repair'd his Fleet with the Timber of those twelve which were most shatter'd. While Affairs stood in this Posture, the Seventh Legion, being sent out to Forage, and suspecting no Resistance, were suddenly set upon by the Britains Forces, and surrounded by their Horse and Chariots. Their Way of Fighting and their Numbers soon brought the Romans to the extreamest Difficulties, and almost to Despair; 'till Cæsar himself coming fortunately into their Relief, they reasum'd their Courage, and the Britains being astonish'd desisted, without any further Ingagement. But being still in hopes of freeing themselves for ever, by reason of the small Numbers of the Romans, and the Scarcity of Provisions amongst them, they afterwards assembled in greater Numbers, and march'd up to the Roman Camp; where Cæsar engag'd them, put them to flight with a great Slaughter, and burnt all their Country for many Miles together. Being thus vanquish'd, the Britains sent a third Embassy to Cæsar, begging Peace, and promising Subjection; to which Cæsar consented, after he had severely reprov'd their Behaviour, and impos'd double Hostages upon them. And shortly after, the Season being far advanc'd, he set Sail from Britain, and safely arriv'd with his whole Fleet on the Continent of Gaul; whither only two Cities in Britain sent their Hostages, the rest neglecting it. Upon Cæsar's Letters and Account to the Senate of this Action, a famous Procession of twenty Days was decreed him, accompany'd with great Pomp and Ceremony; tho' he had gain'd nothing of Consequence, either to himself or Rome, besides the Glory of having made an uncommon Expedition.

Cæsar.

The Winter following, Cæsar according to his Custom went into Italy; but upon his Return, finding that the Britains had neglected to send their promis'd Hostages, he resolv'd to make a new Descent upon them, and with a much more powerful Fleet and Army than before. Accordingly with extraordinary Diligence he got together 800 Vessels, most of them new built, low and broad, both for the Conveniency of Landing, and of transporting Horses and Baggage. With these, and an Army consisting of Five Legions, and 2000 Horse, he set sail about Sun-set from Portus Itius, at or near Buloign in France, and landed his Army the next Day in the same Part of the Island as he had done the foregoing Summer; in which Action the Diligence of the Soldiers was particularly applauded, who by an unwearied Labour in Rowing, caus'd the heavier Ships to keep way with the long Boats and Gallies. At their Landing, no Enemy appear'd; for tho' the Britains had been there in great Numbers, bers, yet being terrify'd with these mighty Preparations, and the Approach of so powerful a Navy, they were retir'd into the Midland Country. Here Cæsar encamp'd his Army as conveniently as he could, leaving ten Cohorts, and 300 Horse under the Command of Q. Atrius, to guard the Ships: And in the Night, he march'd himself twelve Miles up into the Country, discover'd the Britains, who had retreated as far as the River Stoner in Kent; and giving them Battel there, they were soon repuls'd by the Roman Cavalry, which oblig'd them to betake themselves to the Woods, which were strongly fortify'd both by Art and Nature. But the Romans resolving to pursue their Advantage, some lock'd their Shields together like a Roof over their Heads, and others raising a Mount, soon took the Place, and drove them from the Woods; but Cæsar forbade any long Pursuit, not well knowing the Country, and having his Camp to fortifie that Night.

The following Day, Cæsar, having divided his Army into three Parts in order to pursue the Britains, was hinder'd by the melancholy News he receiv'd from his Fleet, which being driven a-shore by a violent Storm, most of the Vessels were shattered'd, the Cables broken, and the Anchors lost. Upon which he hasten'd back with his Troops to the Sea side, where he was entertain'd with a sad and ruinous Prospect; forty of his Ships were destroy'd, and the rest so damag'd, as not to be refitted without extraordinary Labour. But being indefatigable in his Attempts, he immediately found Means to repair the greatest Part of his Navy by the Ruins of the rest, and wrot to his Lieutenant in Gaul for further Supplies; and having twice felt the Dangers of these Seas, he resolv'd upon a Prodigious Undertaking, which was to draw his whole Fleet to the Land, into the midst of the Fortifications of his Camp. This stupendious Work was compleated in ten Days, by the admirable Toil of his Soldiers, working Night and Day. Which Being finish'd, Cæsar return'd with his Army to the Wood where he had last defeated the Britains; where he found their Numbers encreas'd by a Confluence from many Parts, and that they had now by common Consent chosen Casibelanus for their General, who by Usurpation had made himself Head of the Trinobantes, and had made frequent Wars with his Neighbours; but being a Time of common Danger, they all made him a Commander in Chief. Casibelanus, with his Horse and Chariots, briskly encounter'd the Romans in their March, which occasion'd great Bloodshed on both Sides; and after some Cessation, as the Romans were fortifying their Camp, the Britains set upon the Centries with great Fierceness, and charg'd back again through two of Cæsar's best Cohorts, which he had sent to their Assistance, and retreated without the Loss of a Man. Cæsar himself could not but acknowledge that they had great Advantage over the Romans, by their swift Way of Fighting without Armour, and accordingly provided against them; so that the next Day, when they set upon three Legions that were foraging, they were repuls'd and pursu'd with great Slaughter. Upon which Overthrow most of the Auxiliaries fell off, and return'd to their own Countries; so that the Britains never after encounter'd the Romans with their full Power.

Upon these Misfortunes, Casibelanus withdrew into his own Territories, retaining to himself not above 4000 Chariots; and fearing the Romans farther Progress, fortify'd that Part of the River Thames which was fordable with sharp Stakes bound about with Lead, and driven so deep into the Bottom, that Beda and Affer report them to have remain'd in their Times; which was near Coway-Stakes in Middlesex. Notwithstanding this the Romans boldly press'd forwards, pass'd the River up to the Chin in Water, repuls'd the Britains, and march'd further up the Country. In their Progress, they were met with Ambassadors from the chiefest City of the Trinobantes, who dishonourably join'd with the Conqueror, and offer'd Subjection; at the same time petitioning, that Mandubrace, one of Cæsar's Followers, whose Father Casibelanus had depos'd and slain, might be Governor of their City. Cæsar readily agreed to their Petition, and demanded Forty Hostages of them, and sufficient Provision for his Army, which they perform'd with all Expedition; preferring the poor Satisfaction of indulging their own Discontents, before the common Cause of their Native Country. From their Example many other inferior States yielded to Cæsar's Arms; and likewise treacherously discover'd to him the Power and Place of Casibelanus's Abode, who by this time was retreated to his own City Verulam, now St. Albans; a Place then well fortify'd with Woods and Morasses. Cæsar with all Expedition sat down before the City, and storming it on two sides, soon became Master of it, with the Slaughter of many of the miserable Defendents, and the taking of a rich Booty of Cattle. Upon this Loss, Casibelanus, as his last Refuge, procur'd four petty Kings of Kent, Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, with their utmost Forces to set upon the Roman Camp that guarded their Ships; which Enterprize was accordingly attempted, but with such bad Success, that the Britains were on each side repuls'd, and Cingetorix taken Prisoner. Casibelanus, at length, seeing his Country wasted, his chief Designs blasted, and himself abandon'd by the traiterous Revolt of many Cities and States, sent Comius of Arras to mediate a Peace; which, upon the account of his own Valour, and the Lateness of the Season, was readily granted him. In the Conditions of the Treaty Cæsar impos'd a certain yearly Tribute upon the Britains, which some say amounted to three thousand Pounds, and moreover included the Security of Mandubrace with his Trinobantes, who were taken into Friendship with the Romans; and that these Conditions should be faithfully observ'd, he commanded a sufficient Number of Hostages to be immediately deliver'd. And here began the Fate of Britain, to make Way for foreign Conquests by their unhappy Divisions at home. These Things being adjusted, and the Season far advanc'd, Cæsar embark'd with his whole Army, and soon arriv'd in Gaul; having rather shewn Britain to the Romans, than given them Possession of it, as Tacitus observes, supposing it Glory sufficient to have attempted a thing so rare and difficult; and at his Return to Rome to have presented the British Captives, whose uncommon Attire and Behaviour fill'd the Peoples Eyes with Delight and Admiration. At the same Time he offer'd to Venus, the Patroness of his Family, a Breast-Plate embroider'd with British Pearls, as a Trophy and Spoil of the Ocean.

He leaves the Isle.

This Account we have from Cæsar's own Writings of his two famous Expeditions into Britain, which rather encreas'd the Glory, than the Dominion of Rome, and gave this Country the Honour of being the last Triumph of that mighty Republick, which had before subdu'd so many Kingdoms and Commonwealths in Europe, Asia, and Africa. Tho' Cæsar's Writings are as much to be admir'd, as his Valour and Conduct, yet it is very observable from others, that his Conquests in this Country were not so uninterrupted, nor the Britains Liberties so easily given up, as they seem from his own Account. For several ancient Writers have spoken more doubtfully of his Victories in Britain, and that in plain Terms he was driven away, as it appears from a noted Verse in Lucan, and divers Passages in Tacitus. Orosius, who took his Account as high as Suetonius, tells us, that Cæsar in his first Expedition, being entertain'd by a sharp Fight, lost no small Number of his Foot, and by a Tempest near all his Horse. Dion affirms that once in his second Expedition all his Foot were routed, and another time all his Horse; and further, that his Conquest was so inconsiderable, that for twenty Years after Cæsar's Departure, the Britains retain'd their own Kings, and their own Laws.

II. After the Departure of Julius Cæsar, we have but a very small Account of the Affairs of Britain, for near a Hundred Years together; only that the Inhabitants, tho' they became more and more known to the Romans, yet they continu'd in a great measure free from their Power. For Julius's Successor, Augustus, seems out of Wisdom to have neglected this Island, as a Country where Amity or Enmity was of no Moment to the Romans; or out of a State Maxim was resolv'd to fet Bounds to the Empire in his Reign, to keep it from being too vast and unweildy. Yet, about twenty Years after his Uncle Julius's Departure, Augustus advanc'd as far as Gaul in order to reduce Britain to his Obedience; but was diverted by a Revolt in Pannonia. About seven Years after that he enter'd Gaul with the same Resolution; but was then stopp'd in his Progress by the unsettled State of that Province, and the Arrival of some Ambassadors from Britain to beg a Peace. The following Year he reassum'd the same Design, but still was prevented by Commotions in other Parts; so that of three design'd Expeditions none came to any Effect. Nevertheless some of the British Potentates omitted not to seek his Friendship by Presents offer'd in the Capitol, and other obsequious Addresses; insomuch that the Island in that Reign became well known to the Romans, tho' it paid no Tribute to them, except what easie Customs were levv'd on the slight Commodities with which they traded into TIBERIUS. Gaul. His Successor Tiberius seems to have follow'd his Example, and being no ways ambitious of extending the Bounds of the Empire, never fought the Britains; and they as careful not to provoke him, courteously sent home the Soldiers of Germanicus, who by Shipwreck had been cast upon the British Shores.

CALIGULA. But Caligula, his Successor, a wild and dissolute Tyrant, having pass'd the Alps to rob and pillage the Empire, and being excited by Adminius the Son of Cynobelinus a British King, who being banish'd by his Father fled to him with a finall Party, he made a Shew of invading Britain; but being come to the Ocean, and shewing the utmost Marks of Extravagancy and Folly, he return'd the same Way: Yet he sent before him such boasting Letters to the Senate, as if he had made an entire Conquest of the whole Island.

A. D. 43. Thus, for about ninety five Years, under the Reigns of four Emperors, the Britains continu'd free from the Roman Yoke; but from the Reign of Claudius,^{Diem. Sec.} and thence forwards, the inner Parts of the Isle, broken by Civil Wars and Factions, more than the Power of the Romans, by many Steps fell under the Subjection of that Empire. For while particular States singly oppos'd the common Enemy, they were soon conquer'd; the rest being so violently set upon each others Destruction, that 'till all were subdu'd, they were insensible of an universal Danger. Nay so powerful was the Ambition and Resentments of some, that they were thereby corrupted and drawn over to the Enemy's side, and made solicitous for the Roman Interest to the Ruin of their own Country. The principal of these was Bericus, who by many Arguments engag'd the Emperor Claudius to make a Descent upon Britain, which none had really attempted since Julius Caesar. Claudius was easily persuaded, and in the Second Year of his Reign order'd A. Plautius the Prator to pass over from Gaul; who making Preparation for this great Expedition, his mutinous Soldiers refus'd to march, declaring, That they would not make War out of the Compass of the World; for so they judg'd Britain to lye. But by means of Narcissus, the Emperor's Favourite, he prevail'd with them; and set Sail from three Ports, lest their Landing in one Place should prove inconvenient; but meeting with contrary Winds, they were driven back and dishearten'd; 'till in the Night a strange Meteor shooting Flames from the East, and as they imagin'd, directing their Course, they renew'd their Courage, put to Sea again, and landed in Britain without Opposition. For the Inhabitants having heard of their Backwardness, had been negligent in providing against them; and therefore retir'd to the Woods and Morasses, designing rather to weary out the Romans by Delays, than to encounter them in the Field. Plautius after much Difficulty discover'd them, and engaging first with Caractacus, then with Togodumnus, overthrew them, and reduc'd Part of the Dobuni to his Power, who were subject to the Catiuchlani. Leaving a Garrison, he march'd towards a River, where the Britains thought themselves secure, imagining the Romans could not pass without a Bridge; but Plautius sending over the German Soldiers, who could swim the strongest strongest Current in their Arms, he commanded them to strike directly at the Horses, by which means the Chariots, wherein consisted their chief Excellency, became unserviceable. To support them, he sent the famous Vespasian with his Brother Sabinus, who did great Service and Execution; but the Britains, not yet discourag'd, engag'd them so resolutely the next Day, that it continu'd doubtful which way the Victory inclin'd; 'till Sidius Geta, after he had been near taken Prisoner, gave them such an Overthrow, that the Honour of a Triumph was granted him at Rome, tho' he had never been Consul. Upon this the Britains retir'd to the Mouth of the Thames, and being acquainted with those Places, cross'd over, where the Romans following them through Bogs and dangerous Flats, were in perpetual Hazard. Yet the Germans by swimming, and others by a Bridge above got over, and falling in with the Britains, kill'd great Numbers; but in the Heat of their Pursuit they fell among new Bogs and Meres, and lost many of their own Men.

This Success not answering Expectation, Plautius began to consider his own Security; and finding the Britains so far from being discourag'd at the Death of Togodumnus, that they were making new Preparations to revenge it, he according to Order sent to the Emperor for Assistance. Claudius, ambitious of the Occasion, made extraordinary Preparations, and besides the Flower of the Nobility, like an Eastern Monarch with armed Elephants, march'd through Gaul, and in a short Time cross'd the Seas, and join'd Plautius. The Britains, who had the Courage, but not the Conduct of old Casibelanus, laying aside all Stratagem, in open Field ventur'd to meet almost the whole Power of the Roman Empire; but they were soon overthrown, with the Loss of Camalodunum, now Maldon in Essex, the Royal Seat of Cynobelinus, and many Prisoners were taken. Upon this Claudius, contrary to the Roman Custom, was several times saluted Imperator; Camalodunum was made a Military Colony, and Part of the Isle reduc'd to the Form of a Province; tho' Suetonius tells us, that what he obtain'd was without Battel or Bloodshed, which seems not very probable. His Stay in Britain was not above Sixteen Days; and in that Time he remitted to the British Nobility the Confiscation of their Goods, for which Favour they frequented his Temple, and ador'd him as a God. Having disarm'd the Britains, and committed the Government of these, as likewise the War with the others not subdu'd to Plautius, he hasten'd to Rome in the Sixth Month, sending his Sons-in-Law Pompey and Silanus before him, with the News of his Victories. At Rome it was esteem'd so great an Action to conquer but a small Part of Britain, that Anniversary Games, Triumphal Arches both at Rome and Gessoriacum in Gaul, and lastly a Glorious Triumph, was decreed by the Senate in Honour of Claudius. And that the Spectacle might be more Magnificent by the Confluence of People, he not only gave Leave to the Governors of Provinces to be present, but permitted several Exiles to return home, on purpose to behold it. The Chief Officers were munificently rewarded, the Provinces contributed Golden Crowns, and upon the Top of the Emperor's Palace was fix'd a Naval Crown, to imply the Emperor's Conquest and Sovereignty of the British Sea; and for the same Reason, he order'd that his Son Germanicus, should hereafter be call'd Britannicus, which Name he had obtain'd himself not long before. In the mean time Plautius carry'd on the War in Britain, with that Success, that Claudius decreed him an Ovation, and when he enter'd Rome he himself met him, honouring him with the Ceremony of the Right Hand. And now Vespasian began to appear in the World, who partly under Claudius, and partly under Plautius, fought thirty Battels with the Britains, according to Suetonius; he also subdu'd two mighty Nations, and above twenty Towns, together with the Isle of Veſtis or Wight. For which Exploits he obtain'd Triumphal Ornaments, two Sacerdotal Dignities, with the Consulship. Under him serv'd his Son Titus in quality of a Tribune, whose extraordinary Valour and Modesty, gain'd him great Reputation, as appears from the

A. D. 50. Some few Years after, Plautius was succeeded in Britain by P. Ostorius, in Quality of Proprætor, who found Affairs in great Disorder by the Inroads of the Britains; and the more, because they did not expect that a new General would take the Field in Winter to oppose them. But Ostorius well knowing that the first Action would either encourage or intimidate, vigorously attack'd such as were in Arms, and dispers'd them, proceeding to disarm all whom he had reason to suspect. And to prevent further Incursions, he plac'd several Garrisons upon the two Rivers Severn and Avon; which reduc'd all the Southern Parts of the Isle into the Form of a Province. For a farther Security and Convenience, Camalodunum or Maldon was made a Military Colony; and London, according to the Opinion of B. Stillingfleet and some others, was about that time founded by the Romans, and made a trading Colony. Several Cities were given to Cogidunus, a British King, to engage him to the Roman Interest; an ancient Policy which they us'd, to make Kings the Servile Agents to enslave others. These Proceedings were highly resented by the Iceni, the Inhabitants of Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridge and Huntington, a powerful People, not yet weaken'd by War, who refusing all Submission, gain'd many others over to their Party, and encamping upon commodious Ground, engag'd with the Romans. After a brave Dispute, they were overthrown, but with the greater Bloodshed, by Reason of their Despair of Pardon. By the Overthrow of the Iceni, many others before undetermin'd, were reduc'd to Obedience, and Ostorius led his Army against the Cangi, a People about the Irish Sea; and waiting their Territories, he had pass'd almost to the Ocean, when he was recall'd by the Insurrections of the Brigantes, a People on the North of England; who would not be reduc'd, 'till they had lost their principal Revolver, and then the Commotion was soon extinguish'd. But the Silures, the Inhabitants of South-Wales, would by no Method be allur'd or discourag'd from prosecuting the War against the Romans, relying upon their own Courages, and the Valour and Bravery of their Commander Caractacus, who having waded through innumerable Deaths and Difficulties, had gain'd such a Reputation, that he was justly preferr'd before all the British Generals. This Man by his Policy and Conduct soon remov'd the Seat of the War into the Territories of the Ordovices, the Inhabitants of North-Wales, as more convenient for his Designs, by reason of the craggy Rocks, and high Mountains. Here being strongly intrench'd, at the near Approach of the Romans, Caractacus in a Speech to his Soldiers declar'd, That that Battel should either establish their glorious Liberty, or confirm their perpetual Servitude; and that they ought to remember the Honour of their Ancestors, who had driven Julius Caesar from the Isle; by whose Valour they were happily deliver'd from Axes and Tributes, and to whom they ow'd the Enjoyment of their unviolated Wives and Children. The Soldiers fir'd by this Speech, bound themselves by the most religious Vows, crying out, That neither Wounds nor Weapons should make them yield. Their resolute Behaviour, and the Difficulties that the Romans were to conquer, by means of Mountains, Rocks and Rampiers, at first was a great Discouragement to Ostorius. But as nothing could withstand the Power of the Roman Legions, the Britains, tho' they had great Advantages in the Beginning of the Battel, by Reason of their Encampment, were after an obstinate Fight intirely routed, and the Wife and Daughter of Caractacus taken Prisoners, his Brothers surrendering themselves shortly after. Caractacus himself flying to Cartismandua, Queen of the Brigantes, was treacherously bound and deliver'd up to the Conqueror, after nine Years brave Resistance of the Romans, by which he had gain'd great Fame and Renown.

Caractacus defeated and taken.

Notwithstanding the Misfortune of Caractacus, his Fame spread throughout the Island, and reaching the adjacent Provinces, was celebrated in Italy it self. All coveted the Sight of that Man, who for so many Years had contemn'd the Roman Roman Forces; infomuch that even in Rome, his Name was held in Veneration; and the Emperor while he extoll'd his own, made the Captive's Glory there the brighter. The People of Rome were summon'd as to the sight of some publick Games and Spectacles; the Emperor's Guards were plac'd in Order, and he himself seated on his Tribunal; the Captive Prince's Vassals and Retinue going first, the Caparisons and other Spoils of War follow'd after; then his Brothers, his Wife and Daughter; and last of all he himself was brought before the People in a very peculiar Habit. The Prayers which the rest made to the Emperor were mean and servile; but Caractacus, neither craving Mercy, nor casting down his Eyes, with a noble Bravery spoke thus before the Tribunal. If my Moderation in Prosperity had been answerable to my Nobility and Fortune, I had come rather as a Friend into this City, than a Captive; nor would you have disdain'd to have receiv'd me with Articles of Alliance, being a Prince descended from illustrious Progenitors, and a Sovereign of many Nations. My present Fortune is to me low and dishonourable, but to you glorious and triumphant. I once had Horses, Men, Arms and Riches at my Command; what wonder is it that I should struggle hard before I lost them? But if Fate has allotted universal Empire to your Part, Subjection must be ours. If I had yielded without Opposition, neither my Fortune would have been remarkable, nor your Glory memorable; and Oblivion would have follow'd my Punishment. But if you spare my Life now, I shall be a perpetual Example of your Clemency. Claudius mov'd at so sad a Spectacle of Fortune, and his generous Behaviour, freely pardon'd him, his Wife and Relations; and being all unbound, they made their Addresses both to him, and his Empress Agrippina. After this the Senate was assembled, where the Fathers made many pious Speeches concerning their Prisoner Caractacus; declaring, That it was no less honourable than when the great Scipio expos'd Syphax, and Paulus brought Persius in Triumph.

He is brought to Rome, and pardon'd.

Ostorius, tho' in Britain, was decreed the Honour of a Triumph; but now his Fortune began to change, either because Caractacus, the Object of his Valour was remov'd, or because the Enemy in Compassion to so great a Prince were more animated with Revenge. For they fell furiously upon the Legionary Cohorts, left to settle Garrisons among the Silures, cut off the Commander, eight Captains, with many brave Soldiers; and had not speedy Relief come from the neighbouring Forts, they had put all to the Sword. Shortly after they defeated the Roman Foragers, and the Troops sent to their Assistance; and Ostorius by his fresh Supplies could not stop their Flight, 'till the Legionary Soldiers came in, who restor'd the Battel, and brought the Advantage on their Side; but the Britains escap'd with little Loss, because the Day was spent. Next they proceeded to Skirmishes and smaller Actions, 'till the Silures, being exasperated with the General's Threatning to extinguish their Name and Nation, found means to intercept his Auxiliary Cohorts, who were sent out rashly by some greedy Officers to pillage; and they by distributing the Spoil and Prisoners drew other Nations to revolt. In this Posture of Affairs, Ostorius wasted with Fatigue and Trouble dy'd; the Britains rejoicing, that tho' no Battel had remov'd him, yet an adverse War had worn out so great a Commander. He was succeeded in his Place by A. Didius, who found all things in great Disorder, partly by the Inrodes of the Silures, and partly by Valens's encountering the Britains with ill Success. But civil Contests in a short Time gave the Romans new Advantages, which were occasion'd by Cartismandua, Queen of the Brigantes, who after she had agrandiz'd her self by delivering Caractacus, rejected her Husband Venutius, marry'd his Servant Vellocatus, and made him King. This caus'd a War, which at first seem'd private among themselves, 'till Cartismandua had by a Stratagem taken Venutius's Brother, and some other of his Relations; who by the Assistance of his Neighbours, and the Defection of the Brigantes, now abhorring the Queen's Actions, soon reduc'd her to great Extremities. But imploring Aid of the Romans, with much Difficulty, and a severe Conflict, she escap'd the Punishment she expected. Venutius thus debarr'd of his Rights, justly turn'd his Anger against the Romans themselves, retain'd his Kingdom against their utmost Opposition, and made them perceive that he was no despicable Soldier, first in a sharp Bartel of uncertain Event, and then against the Legion of Cæsius Nasica. Infomuch that Didius growing old, and fitter to direct than execute, us'd the Ministry of other Men, thinking it sufficient to keep what his Predecessors had gain'd, and only built some Castles and Places of Strength within the Land.

Suetonius
made Governor

This was the State of Affairs in Britain when the Emperor Claudius dy'd, ^{Tacit} being succeeded by his adopted Son Nero, who had so little Hopes and Inclinations to proceed, that, had not Shame restrain'd him, he would have recall'd all his Forces from the Isle. Therefore, by the Advice of his Governors, he sent Verannius to succeed Didius, a Person ambitious and severe, but not able to perform any great Action before his Death. Under this Man's Government, or shortly after, it seems most probable that the Christian Religion was first planted in Britain; but by whom it was effected, and with what Success, is uncertain. The next Governor was P. Suetonius, a Person of celebrated Valour, who after two Years successful Establishment of what was gain'd by the Romans, proceeded to new Conquests, particularly the Isle of Mona, now Anglesey, which was peopled with stout Inhabitants, and was the usual Receptacle of all Fugitives. Upon his Landing there with flat-bottom'd Vessels, he was receiv'd by numerous Multitudes on the Shore, the Women running in dismal Habits, with their Hair dishevell'd, and Fire-Brands in their Hands like Infernal Furies; whilst the Druids, whose ancient Seats were in this Isle, lifted their Hands up to Heav'n, rending the Air with the most dreadful Execrations. The Horror of this Spectacle astonish'd the Romans, and made them stand like Men helpless and enchanted; but being animated by their General, and assur'd to fear a confus'd Herd of Women and Franticks, they soon broke through this furious Company, kill'd many, and beat others down, scorch'd and rowling in their own Fires. After this they cut down all their superstitious and magical Woods and Groves, plac'd Garrisons, and made an easie Conquest of the Island.

The Britains
oppress'd.

Their Consultations.

While Suetonius was thus successful in outward Parts of the Nation, almost ^{the} the whole Body of the Britains made a violent and famous Struggle to regain their Liberties, and expel the Romans, being excited by many Provocations at once, which are enumerated by Tacitus and Dion. Prasutagus, King of the Iceni, famous for his Treachery, had made Nero Coheir with his two Daughters, hoping thereby to preserve his Kingdom and Family from Injury; instead of which, his Kingdom was seiz'd by the Roman Captains, his House pillag'd by Under-Officers, his Wife Boadicea was scourg'd, and his Daughters ravish'd, the chief of the Iceni depriv'd of their Estates, and the Blood-Royal treated as Slaves: Seneca, one of Nero's Counsellors, having oblig'd many of the Britains to take large Sums of Money at Interest, did now suddenly recall the Payment of it with horrible Extortion: Calus, the Procurator, renew'd the Confiscation of those Goods which Claudius had before remitted: The Colony at Camalodunum thrust the ancient Inhabitants out of their Possessions, terming them Vassals and Slaves: The Temple also erected to Claudius was a great Burden to them, while the Priests that attended there, under pretence of Religious Dues, seiz'd each Man's Goods. Upon these Insults, and to prevent more, the People began more to consider the Miteries of Slavery, to confer Injuries with one another, and to make such Declarations as these: That their Patience had no other Effect than to cause one Injury to produce another: That formerly every State had its own King, but now they were subject both to a Lieutenant and a Procurator; the one preying upon their Blood, and the other upon their Estates. That the Enmity or the Friendship of their Governors prov'd equally pernicious; the first tormented them with Soldiers and Officers, the latter with Extortions and Affronts;

Affronts; so that they could be secure of nothing, that either Lust or Covetousness could recommend to the Romans. That tho' in War the Spoil ought to fall to the most Courageous, yet they were depriv'd of their Houses, and of their Children, by ignoble Cowards, and press'd for Foreign Service; as if the Britains were allow'd to fight for any Country but their own. The Germans shook off their Yoke, who had only a River, not an Ocean for their Defence; and the Britains were animated by as noble a Cause; their Country and Relations, while the Enemy were abandon'd to Luxury and Avarice. That Misfortunes often produce the bravest Actions; therefore if they would emulate the Glory of their Ancestors, and not be discourag'd at the Event of one or two Battels, they might as soon drive out their Enemies, as they did their first Invader Julius Cæsar. That now Heav'n seem'd to compassionate their Distress, in absenting the Roman General, and confining him to another Island; that they had conquer'd the greatest Difficulty, which was to Consult, since it was more dangerous to be found in the Contriving of a Plot, than in the Execution.

Tacitus.
Dion.

Being animated with these Motives, the Iceni unanimously took Arms, under the Conduct of injur'd Boadicea; drawing the Trinobantes to revolt with them, and such others as were not yet broken by the Weight of the Roman Yoke; who had all secretly conspir'd to free themselves, with the utmost Revenge against the Veterans. About the same Time divers Prodigies were observ'd to portend the Subversion of the Roman Colony, namely, the Image of Victory falling down revers'd at Camalodunum; unusual Noises heard in the Air; strange Apparitions seen on the Sea; the Ocean in shew bloody, and the Print of Mens Bodies upon the Sands, and certain Women in Extacy foretold a Destruction. These Things as they terrify'd the Romans, so they added Courage to the Britains; and because Suetonius was far absent, the Colony requir'd Aid of Decianus the Procurator, but he sent them no more than two hundred Men, and those ill armed. So that the Soldiers, who before had rely'd upon the Protection of their Temple, and had made no Preparations against a Siege, were soon defeated, and the whole Colony was destroy'd by Fire and Sword. The Britains being Conquerors, from hence march'd with great Fury against the ninth Legion, under the Command of Petilius Cerealis, and cut all the Infantry in Pieces, so that only the Horse escap'd with their Commander; which Misfortune caus'd Catus, the Intendant, whose Rapines had partly occasion'd this Insurrection, to fly into Gaul. The News of these Revolts rous'd Suetonius in the West; and he with admirable Constancy and Resolution march'd through the Midst of the Enemy's Country to London, which tho' not honour'd with the Title of a Colony, was then famous for Concourse of Merchants and Provisions. He debated for some time whether he shou'd expect the Enemy here; but reflecting upon the Weakness of his Forces, and the Rashness of Petilius, he resolv'd to quit the Place, without regarding the Cries of the Inhabitants who implor'd his Protection, preferring the Loss of one Town to save a Province. Those who wou'd follow him were receiv'd into his Troops; but the rest, whom Age or the Pleasantry of the Place had detain'd behind, were miserably destroy'd by the Britains. The Town of Verulum met with the same severe Fate, for passing by the Forts and Garrisons, they attack'd the most opulent and defenceless Places, loading themselves with the Spoils of their Enemies, whom they hang'd, burnt and crucify'd, with all the Cruelty and inhuman Outrage, that a barbarous Multitude, elevated with Success, cou'd imagine. They took no Prisoners, either to preserve them for Exchange or Ransom, according to the Law of Arms, but cut in pieces both Romans, and their Allies, to the Number of eighty thousand, as Dion assures us. The Roman Wives and Virgins were hung up naked, and had their Breasts cut off and sewn to their Mouths, that even dead they might seem to eat their own Flesh; whilst the Britains feasted in the Temple of Andate, their Goddess of Victory.

Suetonius
marches against them,

Suetonius having gather'd together a small Army of ten thousand well Disciplin'd Men, resolv'd to hazard a Battel with all Expedition; and for that End he chose an advantageous Post, a Place with a narrow Entrance, and a thick Wood for Defence behind him, and before him a large Plain. Here the Britains came down in a confus'd Manner, shouting and swarming in such vast Numbers as never were before seen, so fierce and confident of Victory, that their Wives were brought along with them, and plac'd in Carts in the utmost Part of the Plain, to see the Battel. Queen Boadicea, commanding in chief, mounted her Chariot with her two Daughters, and riding about us'd many Arguments to raise the Courage of her Army, which consisted of no less than two hundred and thirty thousand rude and undisciplin'd People. She told them, That it had been usual before for the Britains to fight under the Conduct of Women, but she was now in different Capacity than her Ancestors, being not to fight for a Kingdom, but as one of the inferior Sort to revenge her lost Liberty, her own dishonourable Stripes, and the violated Chastity of her Daughters. That the Lusts of the Romans were now become so exorbitant, that they left no Virgin undefil'd. Therefore she her self was resolv'd to obtain Victory or Death, as she was a Woman; but the Men, if they pleas'd, might chuse Life and Slavery. Dion places her upon a Heap of Turf, with a Spear in her Hand, and a Hare in her Bosom, which after a long Oration she let loose, as a Signification of a good Omen to her Army. On the other side Suetonius was not silent in so great a Danger, exhorting his Soldiers not to be terrify'd at the Enemy's Numbers, but to march on boldly, and continue a close Fight, which he judg'd could not be long after they had broken their Front, the rest being only a confus'd Multitude. The Legions kept the narrow Passage, as a Place of Defence, 'till the Britains had spent their Darts, and then advanc'd into the Plain, where the Auxiliaries and Cavalry making way, they as an irresistible Wedge, broke and dispers'd whatever oppos'd them; the rest fled, but could not easily escape, by reason of their own Carriages, which were plac'd round the Plain. The Soldiers gave no Quarter, not so much as to the Women, which with the Horses that were slain, increas'd the Heaps of Carcasses along the Field. This Victory was very signal, and was obtain'd with the Destruction of eighty Thousand Britains, and only the Loss of four hundred Romans, and not many more wounded. Boadicea resolving not to survive this fatal Defeat, poison'd her self, according to Tacitus, tho' others say she dy'd of Grief and Sickness.

Suetonius drawing together his Army, kept the Field in order to finish the War, and was shortly after reinforc'd with two thousand Legionary Soldiers from Germany, eight Cohorts of Auxiliaries, and a thousand Horse, who being dispos'd into new Winter Quarters, they wasted with Fire and Sword all those Countries that were either Enemies or Neuters. But Famine was still the greatest Affliction to the Britains, who in Hopes of the Enemy's Provisions, had neglected all their Tillage. Nevertheless the unconquer'd Nations were averse to a Treaty, upon Notice of a Difference between Suetonius and the new Procurator Classicianus, who had spread a Report, That a new Lieutenant was expected, who without the Severity and Haughtiness of a Conqueror, like Suetonius, would treat such as yielded with Favour and Clemency. He wrote also to Rome, That there could be no End of the War while Suetonius continu'd Governor, whose bad Success was owing to his ill Conduct, and his good only to the Fortune of the Common-wealth. To compose this Difference, the Emperor sent his Freed-man Polycletus, in hopes of appeasing the Minds of the exasperated Britains. He appear'd in Britain with great State and Grandure, and was receiv'd by the Soldiers with Fear and Reverence; but it appear'd ridiculous in the Eyes of the Britains, That such a General and a victorious Army should be accountable to a Slave. All Things were represented favourably to the Emperor, and Suetonius kept his Command; but not long after he was oblig'd to resign all into the Hands of Petronius Turpilianus; which Governor without molesting molesting the Enemy, or being molested by them, gave the specious Name of Peace to his slothful unactive Life. And without performing any Thing memorable, he deliver'd his Province to Trebellius Maximus, a Person more lazy and negligent than himself; and as he wanted both Experience and Valour, so he was contemn'd and hated by his Army for his Avarice and Sordidness. This Dissatisfaction was continually fomented by Cælius, Commander of the twentieth Legion, who charg'd him with defrauding and impoverishing the Legions, as he did him with Sedition and Want of Discipline. At length the Disorder grew so great, that Trebellius being deserted by the Wings of his Army, who went over to Cælius, and lastly affronted by the Auxiliaries, he was forc'd to fly to Vitellius in Germany.

Trebellius Governor.

In the mean Time the Emperor Nero put an End to his own Life, and during the short Reigns of Galba and Otho, Britain continu'd quiet and peaceable, tho' without a Consular Lieutenant; being govern'd by the Commanders of the particular Legions, all of equal Authority; only Cælius by his daring Boldness seem'd to have gain'd the greatest Command. When shortly after Vitellius came to the Empire, he sent Vectius Bolanus to succeed Trebellius, a Person as little troublesome to the Enemy as his Predecessor, and as careless of his Army; yet being of an innocent and obliging Temper, he gain'd the Affection of his Soldiers, tho' he wanted the Authority of a General. But when Vespasian had succeeded Vitellius, and with the rest of the World had gain'd Britain also, he sent thither brave Commanders and great Armies, which quite defeated the Hopes of their Enemies. He first sent Petilius Cerealis to be Governor, who boldly enter'd the Country of the Brigantes, the most northern and numerous People of the Roman Province; to whom he gave many and singular Overthrows, and either ravag'd or conquer'd the greatest Part of their Territories. So that Cerealis seem'd to have eclips'd the Fame and Conduct of any that could come after him; when Julius Frontinus, a great Man, and as eminent as cou'd be expected after such a Predecessor, succeeded by Vespasian's Order in the same Charge, with no less Glory. For he subdu'd the strong and warlike Nation of the Silures; where he had not only a potent Enemy to encounter, but likewise almost insuperable Difficulties from the Nature and Situation of the Country. In the latter End of Vespasian's Reign, Frontinus was succeeded by Julius Agricola, a Commander of the greatest Fame both for Valour and Conduct, who enter'd upon the most memorable Expedition that had ever been known in Britain, continuing seven or eight Years with great Reputation and Renown. Of this great Man's Actions in this Country, we have an excellent Account from his Son-in-Law Tacitus.

Not long before the Arrival of Agricola, the Ordovices, the Inhabitants of North-Wales, had almost entirely destroy'd a Wing of the Roman Legions; by which means the rest of the conquer'd Nations were all ready for a Revolt, either out of Desire of Liberty, or to discover the Ability of the new Lieutenant. Agricola, tho' the Season was far advanc'd, with great Expedition gather'd together his dispers'd Troops and Auxiliaries, and march'd towards these formidable People, who kept themselves in Places of Advantage, and durst not descend into indifferent Ground. He therefore with uncommon Bravery, placing himself foremost, advanc'd towards them with his Army, and being seconded with the Skill and Courage of his Veteran Soldiers, put them all to Flight and Sword, so that the whole Nation was almost extirpated. Finding that all Things were like to succeed according to the Event of his first Actions, he immediately determin'd to make himself Master of the Isle of Anglesey, from whence Suetonius had been formerly recall'd; but this Design being suddenly laid, Ships were wanting for the Expedition, which Defect was notwithstanding supply'd by the great Policy and Resolution of the General. He commanded a choice Body of Auxiliaries, who were well acquainted with the Shallows of the Water, suddenly to pass over, and invade the Island; and these, by the Custom of their native native Country, being able in swimming to govern themselves, their Horses and Arms, perform'd it so effectually, that the Enemy, who at first expected a Fleet, were extremely surpriz'd and confounded, as supposing that nothing could be invincible to Men that begun a War with such Resolution. Whereupon they immediately desir'd Peace, and surrender'd the Isle to the Command of Agricola, who now became great and famous, as having upon his Entrance, a Time usually spent in Ceremony and Ostentation, encounter'd so much Toil and Hazard. In these prosperous Proceedings of his Fortunes, he sought not with any glorious Relations or Letters to magnifie his Honour; but rather in seeking to suppress the Fame of his Actions, he render'd them more conspicuous and splendid. And now knowing the Disposition of his Province, and being taught by others Experience, that Affairs would never be settled by Fighting, while Wrongs continu'd unredress'd, he resolv'd in the next Place to cut off all just Occasions of War and Revolts. Thereupon he began to regulate many Abuses, and reform many Corruptions, in his Family, in his Camp, and in the whole Province; especially such as afflicted the poorer sort, as Exactions, Encrease of Tributes, and Payments of Corn, which had been very burdensome to the Britains, all which he under-rated and levy'd in such Manner, as they became easie to the Inhabitants. By which Means Agricola brought the Nation to a more general Inclination to Peace, which partly by the Negligence, and partly by the Avarice of former Governors, had been no less odious than War it self.

About this Time the Emperor Vespasian dy'd, and was succeeded by his Son Titus, who continu'd Agricola in his Government; who drawing his Army together the next Summer, observ'd excellent Methods, and exact Discipline. He chose the Places for Encamping, and in Person try'd the Bogs and Woods; he gave the Enemy no Rest, and when he had sufficiently terrify'd them, he usually with-held his Hand, and forbore Acts of Hostility, to allure them to the Pleasures of Peace. These Methods of Proceeding so wrought upon many Cities, that laying aside Animosities, they voluntarily submitted, gave Hostages, and permitted Forts and Garrisons amongst them; all which were effected with that Care and Prudence, that they were the only new Forts in Britain that never were attack'd afterwards. All Persons began now to entertain an honourable Opinion of their new Governor; and as he was sufficiently careful in Summer, so he spent the next Winter in a wise Project. Whereas the Britains, hitherto harra's'd with Oppressions and Wars, had small Leisure or Inclination to apply themselves to the Ornaments of Peace and settled Societies; therefore they were ready for Revolts and Insurrections upon every slight Occasion. The better to induce them by Pleasures to Rest and Quietness, he exhorted them in private, and assisted them in publick to build Temples, Places of Resort, and stately Houses; and likewise provided, that the Sons of the Nobility should be carefully instructed in the liberal Arts and Sciences, applauding their Pains and Industry, and preferring their Parts and Ingenuities before those of the Gauls; so that they who but lately despis'd the Roman Language, did now affect and study the Graces of it. From that Time also the Roman Modes and Dresses became in request, and the Gown was commonly worn; and from thence they gradually proceeded to all their Softness and Incentives to Luxury, as beautiful Portico's, pleasant Baths, and exquisite Banquets, which by the Ignorant were term'd Civility and Politeness, when in Reality, as Tacitus tells us, they were but the Trappings of their Yoke and Bondage. In the third Summer Agricola discover'd new Countries and Parts of Britain yet untouch'd, or at least not fully subdu'd; and being ambitious of extending the Bounds of the Roman Empire, he march'd Northwards up to the very Frith of Tans or Tweed, wasting all as he pass'd, and without Resistance fortify'd the Passages with Castles and Fortresses, which he stor'd with sufficient Provisions. By which Means every wintering Garrison secur'd and guarded it self, and with the Summer Service ever repair'd the Winter's Miscarriages; which continually disappointed the Enemy,

Enemy, so that Agricola had all the Success he could desire. The fourth Summer was spent in ordering and settling what he had over-ran; and with such Success, that if his Armies, and the Glory of the Roman Empire would have permitted it, they needed not to have fought any other Boundary in Britain. For the Friths of Glota and Bodotria, Dunbrittaen and Edenburgh, two Arms of two opposite Seas, shooting far into the Land, were only parted by a narrow Neck of Land, which Agricola had secur'd by Forts and Garrisons; so that the Romans were entire Masters of all the South Side, and had pent up the Country as it were within another Island.

*His fourth

For these great Successes and Exploits in Britain, Agricola not only purchas'd much Fame, but the Emperor Titus also receiv'd great Honours upon his Account, particularly to be saluted Imperator the fifteenth Time. But dying shortly after, he was succeeded by his Brother Domitian, who still kept Agricola in this Country, and still with new Success. For in the fifth Year of his Lieutenancy, he took Shipping, and sail'd over to certain Nations unknown to the Romans, probably the Orcades and other Northern Isles, which after many prosperous Encounters he subdu'd; and then plac'd Garrisons in those Parts of Britain which lye towards Ireland, having some Thoughts of attempting that Island. After this, suspecting a general Insurrection of the Caledonians, those fierce Northern Nations beyond Bodotria, in the following Year he mann'd out a Fleet to discover the Creeks and Harbours of that ample Region, and with his Army march'd for the North. Thus Agricola was the first who seconded his Land-Forces by a Navy, and brought War upon the Britains by Sea and Land at once. The Britains were extreamly amaz'd and confounded at this Sight, considering that if once their Seas were discover'd, all Hopes of retreating wou'd be lost. Nevertheless the Caledonians arming with great Power, hop'd to discourage the Romans by being Aggressors; which had so much Effect, that several advis'd Agricola not to proceed, but to retreat with Honour, rather than be repell'd with Shame. But he harken'd not to these Persuasions, and understanding that the Enemy would make their Irruptions in several Bodies, to prevent being surrounded by their Numbers, he march'd in three Divisions; which being known to the Caledonians, they chang'd their Resolution, and with united Forces set upon the ninth Legion in the Night, and broke into the Camp with great Slaughter; but Agricola having Intelligence of their March, follow'd them, and commanded his lightest Horse and Foot to charge them in the Rear, and the rest to make a loud Shout. The Day dawning, the Glittering of the Roman Ensigns dazled the Eyes of the Britains, who after a sharp Fight at the Gates of the Camp, drew off to the Woods and Bogs, which secur'd them; otherwise the War had then been finish'd by a compleat Victory. Upon this Success the Roman Soldiers, presuming there was nothing able to withstand their Arms, cry'd out to be led into Caledonia, that with a continual Course of Conquest they might find out the utmost Bounds of Britain. They were further encourag'd by this remarkable Accident, which happen'd the same Summer: A Cohort of Germans having slain their Centurion, and other Roman Officers in a Mutiny, and to avoid Punishment fled on Shipboard, set sail in three light Gallies without a Pilot; and by Tide and Weather were carry'd round the Coasts, exercising Piracy wherever they landed, and after various Fortunes, were the first Discoverers to the Romans that Britain was an Island.

Notwithstanding these Successes, the Britains, attributing all to the good Fortune and Conduct of the General, and not to any Valour in his Soldiers, were not dejected, but proceeded to arm their Youth, to convey their Wives and Children into safe Places, and by Assemblies and Religious Rites to establish a Confederacy among themselves. And being intent upon nothing but Revenge or Slavery, the following Year by Leagues and Treaties they muster'd up their whole Power; being now sensible, tho' too late, that a common Danger must be repuls'd by Confederacy and Union. These, as their last Effort, had gather'd together together about thirty thousand armed Men, besides great Numbers of Youth, and vigorous old Men, who formerly had been excellent Soldiers, and still retain'd the Scars and Badges of their Bravery. On the other side, Agricola having sent his Fleet before, follow'd in Person shortly after with his whole Army, to which he had added some of the most valiant Britains, such as after the Test of a long Peace he had found faithful, and march'd to the Hill Grampius, now Grantz-bain in Scotland, where the Enemy had posted themselves. Upon the Approaches of both Armies, all Persons with great Eagerness and Impatience attended the Success of this deciding Battel; and Galgacus, both by Birth and Merit Commander of the Britains, with a furious Warmth and elevated Courage is said to have spoken after this Manner to his Soldiers. When I consider the Cause of this War, and our present Urgency, I have reason to presume, that the future Happiness and Freedom of the whole Island will date their Birth from this important Day. For we are the most valiant Remains of the Britains, seated in the remotest Regions, beyond the Ken of those Nations enslav'd by the Enemy; so that our Eyes are yet unpolluted, and free from the Contagion of Foreign Tyranny; and this secret Recess, unknown to Fame, has hitherto preserv'd us in all the Blessings of Liberty. Beyond us is no Nation, nothing but Waves and Rocks; on that Side nothing but Bondage and Slavery, which is to be expected from the Romans; a People unsatiable in their Lusts, and unbounded in their Ambition. Those Robbers of the World, and Ravagers of the Universe, now the exhausted Land can no more furnish their Rapines, endeavour to rifle the wide Seas and Ocean. When they meet with opulent Enemies, their Cruelty proceeds from Avarice; when with Poor, it arises from Ambition. The East and West, vast as they are, cannot satiate their voracious Minds; they, and they alone, with equal Greediness grasp at the Riches and Poverty of all Nations. Devastations, Murders and Extirpations, pass with them under the false Names of Empire and Government; and they boast of establishing Peace in those Provinces they have render'd desolate. Our Goods are their Tribute, our Corn their Provisions, our Bodies their Tools for all Kinds of Drudgery; and if the Modesty of our Wives and Daughters has preserv'd them from open Violence, when they were Enemies, it cannot secure them from their lascivious Friendship, now they are Guests. Other Slaves, whom Nature and Fortune have destin'd to Servitude, are nourish'd by their Masters; but the Britains alone purchase their own Bondage, and maintain and support their Oppressors. Were our Enemies Courage in War, equal to their Debaucheries in Peace, we might justly dread their Arms; but their Glory is all owing to our Dissentions: Our Union will dissipate their Forces which are gather'd out of many Nations; so that one Miscarriage of theirs will dissolve their whole Power. In summ, there you see Tributes and Slavery, here Death or Liberty; therefore let us consider the Glory of our Ancestors, and the Fate of our Posterity.

This Speech being deliver'd with the Fierceness of Lions and Tigers, and darting upon the Soldiers like Flashes of Lightning, was immediately seconded with the barbarous, and confus'd Acclamations of the whole Army. Agricola on the other side encourag'd his Men with all the Force and Charms of the Roman Eloquence; and fearing to be flank'd by reason of the Enemy's Numbers, he drew out his Front to the utmost Length, and advanc'd himself at the Head of his Foot. The Battel began at some Distance from the main Body, wherein the Britains show'd great Art and Courage, by means of their broad Swords, and short Bucklers, with which they bore off the Darts of their Enemies, and pour'd in upon them with Showers of their own. To prevent which Inconveniency, Agricola order'd the Batavian and Tungrian Cohorts to advance against them with their sharp-pointed Bucklers, which render'd their pointless Swords unserviceable, and so mangled their Faces, that they were oblig'd to retire with the greatest Precipitation. This Advantage being seconded by the Emulation of the other Cohorts, who furiously bore down all before them; and being many Ways back'd and supported by the great Skill of their General, the Britains were at last dispers'd: Whilst many unarm'd ran desperately upon their Enemies Swords, others tho' arm'd betook themselves to Flight, leaving a Field dismally strew'd with Heaps of Arms, Carcasses, mangled Limbs and Blood, and many expiring Persons, who still retain'd their Courage and Fierceness. Night and Weariness put an end to the Chace, and Victory made it pleasant to the Conquerors; but the unfortunate Britains, both Men and Women, wandering in a deplorable Manner, spent the Night in calling their lost Friends, carrying off the Wounded, in burning their Houses out of Despair, and shifting from one Corner to another. Sometimes they consulted with each other, and conceiv'd some Hopes; then again they were broken with Pity and Compassion, and oftner with Rage and Madness at the Sight of their Wives and Children, several of whom they dispatch'd with their own, rather than they should suffer by their Enemies Swords. This signal Victory put a Stop to all future Resistance, and Agricola sending out his Fleet along the Coasts, they also discover'd Britain to be an Island, and subdu'd the Orcades, which had not been heard of 'till that Time. Thus after forty two Years Struggle of an unciviliz'd and disunited People, against the most powerful Nation in the Universe, the greatest Part of Britain was conquer'd and reduc'd into an intire and civiliz'd Province of the Roman Empire, the further Part being left to the Barbarians, as neither pleasant nor fruitful; the Government of which was ever annex'd and appropriated to the Emperors themselves, and no ways at the Disposal of the Senate, as several other Provinces were. This was compleated in the fourth Year of Domitian's Reign, about 138 Years after the first Entrance of Julius Cæsar, in the latter End of the Year 84, or the Beginning of 85, when Agricola was recall'd out of Britain.

*and Britain re-

III. From this Time forwards, for above 320 Years, the greatest and richest Part of Britain became subject to the Romans, who made great Advantages of the Country, and laid heavy Tributes upon the Inhabitants. Yet with their grievous Yoke they bore down Barbarism, and introduc'd Humanity and Civility, which daily made way and fitted Men for Christianity; and they wanted not the Arts of obliging a conquer'd People, allowing some Kings amongst them of their own Nation, which were commonly us'd for Instruments of enslaving their Neighbours, and bearing off the Odium from the Conquerors. Partly by such Arts, and partly through Necessity, the Britains began to love as well as fear their Masters the Romans, and follow'd their Modes, Dresses and Customs to as great an Excess as any Nation; and their Buildings and other Works were so very stately, that we cannot now look upon their Remains without Admiration, and the ordinary People think them to be of more than human Structure. But of the Transactions of Britain after Agricola's Departure, we have only short and broken Accounts, which are gather'd from several Parts of the Roman Historians. We are not certain who was Agricola's Successor, unless it be Salustius Lucullus, whom Domitian in a short time sacrific'd to his own suspicious Humour. At which Time flourish'd King Arviragus in this Island, according to Juvenal; and also at Rome a British Lady nam'd Claudia Rufina, celebrated by Martial for her extraordinary Beauty and Learning, whom many believe to have been a Christian, and the same mention'd by St. Paul in his second Epistle to Timothy, c. 4. v. 21. Domitian was succeeded by Nerva, in whose Time we have little concerning Britain, only that in his Reign, as also in that of Trajan his Successor, there were great Commotions in this Island, but they were soon suppress'd and ended. But Hadrian the next Emperor being proclaim'd, he receiv'd Intelligence, that the Northern Britains made Incursions into the Roman Part; whereupon he sent Julius Severus, who being suddenly recall'd upon the Account of other Insurrections, the Emperor himself

- himself came over with an Army, encounter'd the barbarous People of the North, recover'd such Forts as they had taken, and drove them into the Woods and Mountains. And for the better Establishment of future Peace, in the Year 121, he caus'd a mighty Wall to be made of Wood and Earth, extending from the River Eden in Cumberland, to the Tine in Northumberland, eighty Miles in Length; after which he return'd triumphantly to Rome, where he gain'd the Title of RESTORE OF BRITAIN, which as a Motto was stamp'd upon his Coin. And now the Provincial Britains, fearing as much the Cruelty of their Northern Countrymen, as formerly the Invasion of Strangers, readily conform'd themselves to the Roman Laws, as well Civil as Martial, under the Direction of Priscus Licinius, then Pro-prætor.
- ANT. PIUS. The Emperor Hadrian was succeeded by Antoninus Pius, whose Lieutenant Lollius Urbicus defeated the Brigantes; and having driven back, and remov'd the barbarous Northern People, he built another Wall of Earth and Piles beyond the former, between Edinburgh and Dunbritton Friths. For these two Expeditions, Antoninus obtain'd the Title of Britannicus, tho' he never saw Britain himself. After him Antoninus Philosophus possess'd the Empire, who sent Calphurnius Agricola to be his Lieutenant in Britain, a Person who partly by his Prudence, and partly by Force, appeas'd the Northern Tumults, and settled the Minds of those People who were most uneasie under the Roman Authority. In the latter End of this Emperor's Reign, we are inform'd by Beda, That Lucius, one of the Kings allow'd by the Romans in Britain, having an Inclination for Christianity, which had been formerly planted, but not well water'd in this Nation, sent to Eleutherus Bishop of Rome, to signify his pious Intentions, and to desire his Assistance. Eleutherus sent Fugatius and Damianus, two eminent Men, to this Island; at which Time, not only Lucius himself receiv'd the Faith, but by his Example, and the Diligence of the first Preachers, it spread in a short Time through a great Part of the Nation, and Christianity continu'd unmolested 'till the Reign of Diocletian. So that Lucius is suppos'd to be the first Christian King in the World, and Britain the first Province that embrac'd the Gospel by publick Authority. This Story has receiv'd so many Additions and Corruptions by later Writers, that it has occasion'd many to disbelieve the whole, and to doubt whether there ever was such a King as Lucius in Britain; for which the Reader may please to consult B. Stillingfleet's elaborate Work, The Antiquities of the British Churches.
- COMMODUS. In the Reign of Commodus, the next Emperor, the Northern Britains became more troublesome than ever; for having pass'd the great Wall, they cut off the Roman General, and most of his Army, and then made terrible Devastations in the Country. The Emperor affrighted at their Progress, immediately sent Ulpius Marcellus against them, a wise and magnanimous Governor, who soon put an end to this War that appear'd so formidable, severely chastis'd the Britains for their Revolt, and reviv'd the lost Discipline among the Roman Soldiers; for which Services, and his Virtues, the wicked Emperor design'd to have taken his Life, but upon second Reflexions only discharg'd him of his Office. After his Departure, the Roman Army began to mutiny, and to disown Commodus for their Emperor; which Disorders, Pereunes his great Favourite undertook to redress, by Threats, Removing of Officers, and placing inferior Persons in their Room; which had no better Effect than to bring the whole Storm upon himself. For the Soldiers, accusing him of Treason against his Sovereign, gain'd so much Credit, as to cause him to be executed. Upon his Death Pertinax, afterwards Emperor, undertook the Charge of Britain; and he, after he had suppress'd the Seditions with the utmost Hazard of his Life, got leave to be dismiss'd. After him, by the Command of Commodus, Albinus had the Government of this Province assign'd to him, and might have been honour'd with the Title of Cæsar, but he declin'd it: But afterwards, in a Speech to his Soldiers, upon a false Report of the Emperor's Death, declaring for the Senatorian against the the Imperial Power, he was discharg'd, and Junius Severus was sent in his Place. Commodus not long after being slain, and the Reigns of Pertinax and Julian being short, Albinus was found again at the Head of his Army in Britain, in the Beginning of the Reign of Severus, which he afterwards transported against him into Gaul; where, near Lyons, he was encounter'd by Severus, his Forces defeated, and himself slain. Severus being settled in the Empire, divided Britain into two Governments or Prefectures; the South Part was committed to Heracitus, and the North, which was the most difficult to manage, to Virius Lupus, in Quality of Pro-prætor, where the Caledonians and others so infested him, that he was oblig'd to purchase a Truce with Money. This new Division was made in the fourth Year of Severus's Reign, A. D. 197.

In the fifteenth Year of this Prince's Reign, he receiv'd Advice that the Northern Britains were up in Arms, and had been so successful, that the standing Legions and the Province were in great Danger; which gave much Uneasiness to an Emperor who before had conquer'd the most powerful Enemies. But that the Empire should not be diminish'd in his Reign by the Loss of an Island of such great Importance, he resolv'd to come in Person, tho' very gouty and above sixty Years of Age; taking with him his two Sons Caracalla and Geta. The Britains understanding the Emperor's Approach, offer'd him an honourable Peace; but he had such an insatiable Desire to add the glorious Name of Britannicus to his former Titles, that he refus'd their Proposals. Upon his Entrance, he left his Son Geta in the Southern Parts of the Province, which had continu'd in Obedience; and march'd with his Son Caracalla against the Northern Britains and Caledonians; where with the cutting down of Woods, making of Bridges, draining of Bogs and Meers, the Enemies Ambuscades, and Sickness, he lost no less than fifty thousand Men, according to Dion. The aged Emperor encounter'd these Miseries and Difficulties with a noble Bravery, and prosecuted his Attempts with such a vigorous Resolution, that he forc'd them to a Submission, with the Delivery of a considerable Part of their Country, and all their Arms. And for the better Security of the Province of Britain, he built, or rather repair'd that famous Wall begun by the Emperor Hadrian; which he made answerable to the Power and Grandure of the Roman Empire. For this, and his several Victories, he took upon him the Title of Britannicus Maximus, causing that Inscription to be stamp'd upon his own, and his Sons Coins. The Emperor after this retir'd to Eboricum or York, leaving the Work to be finish'd by his Son Caracalla, who by his Popularity to the Soldiers, and his excessive Loosness, gave an Occasion to the Caledonians to break their Articles, and revolt; which so irrag'd this old distemper'd Prince, that he gave Commands to make a general Massacre without Distinction, which was executed with great Severity. Having been nigh two Years in Britain, at Eboricum he grew weak, partly with Age and Travel, and partly with Grief for the ill Life of his eldest Son; and finding himself declining, he cry'd out, I have been all that a Man can be, but it is of no Service to me now. But at his Death shortly after, he seem'd to comfort himself by declaring, That he had found the Empire disorder'd in all its Parts, but now had left it in Peace, even among the Britains. His Son Caracalla having made Peace with the Britains, and receiv'd Hostages from them, return'd to Rome with his Brother Geta.

For about sixty Years, and the Reigns of twelve succeeding Emperors after Caracalla, namely Macrinus, Elagabalus, Alexander, Maximinus, Pupienus, Gordian, Philip, Decius, Gallus, Valerian, Gallienus and Claudius, we have no Account of the Affairs of Britain; only in the Reign of Gallienus, some of the thirty Tyrants, as Lollianus, Victorinus, Posthumus, the Tetrici, and Maximian, are suppos'd to have usurp'd the Government here, since their Coins are found in such great Quantities in this Nation. Under Claudius's Successor Aurelian, Bonofus, an insatiable Vassal to Bacchus, and by Birth a British, together gether with Proculus, endeavour'd to make himself Emperor, claiming all Britain, Spain and Part of Gaul, in the Time both of Aurelian and his Successor Tacitus; but being at last defeated by the next Emperor Probus, after a sharp Engagement, he hang'd himself, and gave the Occasion of the Jest, That there hung a Bottle, not a Man. After that, Probus prevented a new Rebellion in Britain, by the severe Loyalty of Victorinus, at whose Recommendation he had plac'd a Lieutenant here, who had set up for Emperor; for upbraiding Victorinus with the Disloyalty of the Person he had recommended, he undertook to rectifie the Mistake, by passing suddenly over into Britain, where by a Stratagem he found means to slay the Traitor, and save the Province. Eutropius also relates, that Probus was the first Emperor who gave leave to the Spaniards, Gauls and Britains to plant Vines, and to make Wine. This Emperor also having subdu'd the Vandals and Burgundians in a great Battel, he sent great Numbers of them to inhabit Britain, where being well settled, they prov'd very serviceable to the Empire upon any Commotions or Insurrections. Most suppose them to have had their Camp upon those Hills near Cambridge, commonly call'd Gogmagog-Hills, where on the Top of one of them may be seen to this Day a Plain, surrounded with large double Trenches of a great Circumference. After Probus, Carus succeeded in the Empire, who put this Island with the Western Provinces into the Hands of his Son Carenus; but he in two Years Time was slain by Diocletian, who succeeded in the Empire, A.D. 284. In the Reign of this noted Emperor, Carausius, a Man of mean Extract but great Courage, was employ'd to secure the Belgick and Armorican Coasts, then infested by the Franks and Saxons; and daily enriching himself with the Spoils of others, he became justly suspected by the Emperor, who order'd his Partner Maximian to procure his Death. Carausius finding his Crimes too great to hope for Safety, assum'd the Title of Emperor, and took Possession of Britain; whither he brought his Fleet, built more Ships after the Roman Manner, was join'd by the Roman Legions, kept out foreign Forces, press'd the Gallick Merchants to his Service, garrison'd Bononia in Gaul, and converted the Revenues of Britain and Batavia to his own Use. Moreover, by the Hopes of Booty in the Provinces, he drew no small Forces of the Barbarians to his Alliance, particularly the Franks, whom he had train'd to Sea-Service, and infested all the Sea-Coasts about him. Maximian with a brave Army march'd against him; being advanc'd to the Sea-Coast, the Want of Sea-Men, and the Danger of the British Seas, occasion'd him to make an Hault, and to come to a Treaty, in which it was concluded, That Carausius shou'd enjoy the Government of Britain, as the properest Person to defend the Inhabitants against all Invasions; and this he held with great Authority and in perfect Peace for seven Years together. But when Constantius was made Cesar by Maximian, and took the Town of Bononia, Carausius was treacherously slain by Allectus, his bosom Friend and prime Minister; who thereupon usurp'd the Government to himself, and retain'd it three Years longer. At length Constantius mann'd several distinct Fleets, so that Allectus not knowing what Course to take, or where to expect him, grew sensible that the Ocean was not so much his Defence, as his Prison. The Roman Fleet setting out in bad Weather, had the Fortune by reason of a Mist to escape the British Navy, which lay out by the Isle of Wight to observe its Motions; and as soon as the Soldiers were landed, Constantius set fire to all the Ships, that they might confide in nothing but their own Valour. Allectus perceiving this retir'd, and in his Flight was accidentally met and attack'd by Asclepiadotus, Captain of his Life-Guard; but his Confusion was such, that he ran desperately to his own Ruin; for without drawing up his Army, after he had thrown off his Robes, he with his barbarous Mercenaries rush'd on upon the Enemy, and in a tumultuary Skirmish was kill'd without Distinction. The Franks and other surviving Barbarians, upon this determin'd to plunder the City of London, and escape by Sea with the Booty; but a Party of the Romans, that that were separated from the Fleet in foggy Weather, came fortunately into the Assistance of the City, set upon them, and pursu'd them through the Streets with great Slaughter, not only to the Safety, but also to the Pleasure of the Citizens, who were Eye-witnesses of their Deliverance. By this Victory the Province of Britain was recover'd to the Romans, after it had been ten Years under the Governments of Carausius and Allectus. Not long after, a dreadful Persecution breaking out under Diocletian, several are believ'd to have suffer'd in Britain, as St. Alba, Julius, Aaron, &c. but the Narratives of their Christian Zeal and Courage, are so obscur'd by the fictitious Fancies of after Ages, that we can scarce discover what Persons suffer'd, nor the Time, Place or Manner of their Martyrdoms.

A Persecution
in Britain.

Diocletian having resign'd the Empire, the Western Provinces with Britain fell to the Share of Constantius, who gave Liberty to the Christians, and came over into this Isle himself; where reinforcing the Garrisons towards the Borders, and establishing a general Peace, at York he fell sick of a languishing Disease, and dy'd. He was succeeded by his renowned Son Constantine, who was proclaim'd Emperor in Britain, and is by most Authors believ'd to have been a Native of this Country, tho' it is doubted by some others. This great Prince was the first who by Law establish'd Christianity in the Roman Empire; and in a few Years with great Fame he became Master of the whole, against the Power of all Usurpers and Opposers. But afterwards removing his Imperial Seat from Rome to Constantinople, and drawing many Forces from Gaul, Germany and Britain, towards the Eastern Parts, he open'd a Way for Invasions and Incursions into the Western Provinces, and laid the Foundation not only of the Loss of Britain, but also of the Ruin of the Empire. Yet for the better Security and Government of the Empire, he new modell'd the whole, dividing it into fourteen distinct Provinces call'd Dioceses, and those subject to four Prætorian Præfects. Britain was one of the fourteen, which was made subject to the Prætorian Præfect of Gaul, and instead of the two Divisions made by the Emperor Severus, he divided it into three Provinces, namely Britannia Prima, containing all the Southern Parts of Britain, the Metropolis of which was London; Britannia Secunda, containing that Part now call'd Wales, the Metropolis of which was Isca, now Caer-leon; and Maxima Cæsariensis, containing all the Northern Parts of Britain, the Metropolis of which was Eboricum, now York, which some say was the chief of the whole. This last Province was afterwards divided into two, viz. Maxima Cæsariensis, and Flavia Cæsariensis; but whether by Constantine, or some succeeding Emperor, is uncertain. In the Reign of Constantine, or not long after, there were twenty eight Cities in Britain, as we are assur'd from Gildas and Beda; all which are reasonably believ'd to have been Bishopricks. But tho' we are not certain of the Number of the Bishopricks, yet we find the British Church was become so considerable in the Time of Constantine, that in the ninth Year of his Reign, A. D. 314, it sent three Bishops of the thirty three that compos'd the Council of Arles, namely Eborius Bishop of York, Restitutus Bishop of London, and Adelphius Bishop of Colchester, or perhaps Caer-Leon. And tho' in the famous Council of Nice, eleven Years after, we have not the Names of the British Bishops there, because the Subscriptions to that Council are lost; yet there are many convincing Circumstances to prove that they were there, and join'd in the Decrees of the Council.

IV. After the Reign of Constantine the Great, the West being more naked and expos'd than formerly, the Affairs of Britain were in a declining Posture; yet the Romans held Possession of the Isle for near a hundred Years after, and took as great Care of it as their Circumstances would permit. Constantine dying, divided the Empire among his three Sons, Constantinus, Constans and Constantius; and to the Eldest he gave Britain and the West, who not satisfy'd with his Division, invaded that of his Brother Constans, and was slain after three Years Reign. Constans, seizing on the West, after eight or nine Years Possession, was slain by the Treason of Magnentius, born of British Parents, who held those Parts three Years against all the Power of the surviving Brother Constantius, and then slaying himself, left the whole to his Government. Constantius being possess'd of Britain, sent over a Notary call'd Paulus, who coming into the Isle, under a Pretence of searching for the Friends and Assistants of Magnentius, committed horrible Extortions and Cruelties, and like a Torrent bore away the Estates and Fortunes of many innocent Persons, to the perpetual Infamy of his Master Constantius, who supported him in all his Outrages. Martinus was then Governor of the Province, who commiserating the Fates of such as he knew guiltless, interceded with Paulus, persuading him to withdraw his Hand, or otherwise he would depart the Isle; but he dreading the Effects of such a Resolution, accus'd the Governor himself as a Person guilty, and urg'd that he might be seiz'd, and carry'd bound to the Emperor. Martinus, provok'd at such an Injury, drew out his Sword, and struck at his Accuser; but failing in his Aim, he turn'd the Point against his own Breast, and slew himself; which still added to the Miseries and Punishments of those whom Paulus thought fit to pronounce guilty. Constantius in the latter End of his Reign committed the Government of Britain and the West to Julian, afterwards call'd The Apostate; who, residing then at Paris, upon the News of the Incursions and Ravages of the Scots from Ireland, and the Picts from Caledonia into the Roman Part of Britain, sent Lupicinus to repel them, and establish the Peace of the Island. Lupicinus pass'd over with a considerable Army into Kent; and marching to London in order to manage the War, he was shortly after recall'd by the same Commander. About the same Time, the Arian Heresie, which had infected Christendom, gave this Island no small Disturbance; a Land, says Gildas, greedy of every Thing new, stedfast in nothing. In favour of which Doctrine, the Emperor Constantius conven'd a Council of four hundred Bishops at Ariminum, allowing them all necessary Provisions. But all chose to live at their own Charges; only three out of Britain, by reason of their Poverty, accepted of the Emperor's Allowance, rather than be burdensom to their Brethren.

In the short Reigns of Julian the Apostate, and Jovian, we find nothing concerning Britain; after whom Valentinian succeeded in the Western Empire, who in his Passage through Gaul, receiv'd a sad and astonishing Account, That the Scots from Ireland, and the Picts and Attacots from the North, together with the Saxons and Franks from the East and South, had harra's'd and ruin'd almost all Britain; That they had kill'd Nectaridius Governor of the Sea-Coasts, and surpriz'd Buchobaudes General of the Land Forces by a Stratagem. After Valentinian had with small Success sent Severus, and then Jovinus, to suppress their Fury, he at length deputed Theodosius, Father to the first Emperor of that Name, a Person of celebrated Valour and Conduct, who gathering together an Army of select young Men, with the Herulian, Batavian and other Troops, march'd directly to London. There dividing his Forces into several Parties, he successfully encounter'd the roving pillaging Enemy, laden with Spoils; from whom he recover'd the Prisoners and Plunder they had carry'd away; and having restor'd all to their respective Owners, except some small Portion bestow'd on the weary Soldiers, he enter'd London in a triumphant Manner, and restor'd it to its former Splendor. Having dispers'd the whole Force, he proclaim'd Impunity to such as wou'd immediately return to Obedience; but the Enemy being numerous, of many Nations, and in divers Parties, to finish all, he found it necessary to call in the Assistance of Civiles and Dulcitius, the former eminent for his Wisdom and Honesty, and the latter for his Military Abilities.

Theodosius having thus conquer'd and subdu'd these different Sorts of People, and being employ'd in repairing the ruin'd Cities and Castles, and in laying the the Foundations of a lasting Peace, one Valentinus a Pannonian, a Person of a haughty Spirit, who for some notorious Crime was banish'd into Britain, with other Exiles and Soldiers, conspir'd against him, as the only Obstacle to his Design of gaining the Government of the Isle. This Man being discover'd, he with some of his principal Accomplices were deliver'd over to Dulcitius, and receiv'd their just Rewards; but Theodosius permitted others to escape, not making too severe an Inquisition into a Conspiracy where many were engag'd, lest such Methods of Proceeding might encrease the Danger. After which he proceeded to reform many Irregularities and Disorders with great Success, recover'd many Cities and Garrisons, and fortify'd the Borders with constant Watches and Guards, which had been formerly given up to the Enemy; so that the Northern Province being restor'd to its former Condition, he appointed a new Governor over it, and order'd it to be call'd Valentia for the future, in Honour of his Master Valentinian, and the City of London to be call'd Augusta. And now the Roman Part of Britain consisted of five distinct Provinces, viz. Britannia Prima in the South, Britannia Secunda in the West, Flavia Cesariensis in the East and middle Parts, Maxima Cesariensis towards the North, and Valentia beyond Severus's Wall to Edenburgh and Dunbritton Friths. All Things being happily executed, when Theodosius was recall'd, he left the Island in Peace, and being attended with the general Applause of all Men to the Sea Side, he pass'd over to wait upon the Emperor, who receiv'd him with the highest Commendations.

He restores Britain, and divides it into five Provinces.

But the Quiet and good Fortune of the Britains did not last long; for not many Years after, when Valentinian was succeeded in the Empire by his two Sons Gratian and Valentinian, and the latter had made Theodosius the Younger his Partner, one Maximus a British Commander, out of Hatred to Gratian, and Envy to Theodosius, assum'd the Purple, and was saluted Emperor; which prov'd the first great Step to the Ruin of Britain. The first Essays of his usurped Power were indeed employ'd to the Good and Preservation of this Island, driving back the Scots into Ireland, and the Picts beyond the Walls: But proceeding in his Ambition against the legal Emperors, he not only quit- ted the Isle, but drew over most of the Roman Forces from thence, and the best of the British Youth to his Assistance. These never return'd to Britain again, for most of them perish'd with their Commander not long after, or else settled themselves in that Part of Gaul call'd Armorica, which afterwards from them and other Britains had the Name of Britain, now Bretaigne. The Departure of so many Soldiers so extreamly weaken'd the Nation, that the Scots and Picts now found it an easie Prey, and made fresh Ravages and Devastations. For the Reduction of these, Chrysanthus, the Son of Marcian Bishop of Constantinople, was made Governor, who discharg'd his Office with great Reputation; but whether he fully subdu'd these Northern Enemies, or whether Stilico, Governor to the young Emperor Honorius, or some other sent by him, as Claudian seems to affirm, reduc'd them, it no where appears. Not long after, the Empire being in great Distress, the Legion sent for this purpose into Britain was recall'd, and the Vandals, Sweves and Alans having over-run many Countries, became formidable to the Forces in Britain, who fearing to be imaced, in a Sedition elected one Marcus to be their Emperor, a Man of great Power in this Island; but not answering their Expectations, they soon dispatch'd him, and set up one Gratian, who after four Months Reign, was also depriv'd of his Life and Empire. After this they proceeded to chuse Constantine, a Common Soldier, thinking his Name fortunate, and sufficient to preserve the Empire; who taking with him the Remainder of the British Forces and Strength that Maximus had left, pass'd over into Gaul, and never return'd again, but lost his Life and his Army four Years after.

ons and Devastations into Spain, the Alans into Portugal, and the Goths into Italy and Rome it self. At the same Time the miserable Britains, now destitute of the Roman Legions, and their best and noblest Inhabitants, became more expos'd than ever to the merciless Rage of the barbarous Picts and Scots, and other Northern People. And now they began to implore the Assistance of their old Masters the Romans, suing to those People as Patrons and Protectors, whom they anciently look'd upon as Tyrants and Usurpers. Accordingly they sent several Messages and Petitions to the Emperor Honorius, but he being in great Distress himself, and not able to defend Rome against Alarick, advis'd them by Letters to use their own Ways and Methods for their Safety, and freely acquitted them of all the Roman Jurisdiction. They being thus discharg'd and abandon'd, and having all the Right of Government in their own Hands, thence forward betook themselves to live after their own Laws and Institutions, and the Armoricans, who now obtain'd the Name of the Britains in Gaul, follow'd their Example. Thus fell the vast Empire of the Romans, first in Britain, and soon after in Italy; and with it all that was Roman, as Learning, Valour, Eloquence, History, Civility, and even Language it self, all equally diminishing and decaying. The first Discharge of the Britains from their Allegiance was about the Year 410, which was 463 Years after the first Entrance of Julius Caesar into this Island, 367 after the Romans first got Possession under the Emperor Claudius, and 326 after the full Conquest of it by Agricola, under Domitian.

The Roman
State of Britain

And here it will not be improper, before we finish this Chapter, to give some little Account of the Roman Government and Establishment in Britain, whether Civil or Military; which we have from the Notitia of the Empire, suppos'd to have been publish'd about the Year 410. Britain being one of the Dioceses belonging to the District of the Præfectus Prætorio of Gaul, it had a Governor of its own call'd a Vicar; whose Ensigns were a Book of Mandates, shut, cover'd with green, and mark'd on the Back, together with five Castles representing so many Provinces, with their several Names inscrib'd. According to the five Provinces, he had so many Magistrates under his Command, namely two Consulars, and three Presidents, the former of Valentia, and Maxima Cæsariensis, and the other of Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, and Flavia Cæsariensis, who were to determine all Causes whether Criminal or Civil. By the Vicar, and these five Magistrates, with a great Number of inferior Officers, was the whole Civil Government of Britain administer'd. The Military Government was executed by three great Officers under the Magistri Militum of the West, namely the Comes Britanniarum, the Comes Littoris Saxonici, and the Dux Britanniarum; the first of these having his Command in the inward and middle Parts of the Isle, and the two latter in the Eastern and Northern Coasts. The Comes or Count of Britain, was the Chief of the three, who had many Officers under him; but governing in the middle Parts of the Isle, we do not find any particular Garrisons belonging to him, only that the Forces which serv'd immediately under him were 3000 Foot, and 600 Horse. The Comes or Count of the Saxon Shore, is suppos'd to be an Admiral to prevent the Ravages of the Saxons, then very powerful, who had also nine maritime Garrisons under his Command, and in these 2200 Foot, and 200 Horse. The Dux or Duke of Britain commanded in the North, and had fourteen Garrisons under him, consisting of 6000 Foot and 300 Horse, besides twenty three Stations for Soldiers upon and about the Northern Walls, in which were 8000 Foot and 600 Horse. So that according to Panicrolls Account the whole Roman Force in Britain, after the Time of Constantine the Great, consisted of 19200 Foot, and 1700 Horse. But as for the Number of the Romans who were fixt in the Colonies, and in other Parts of the Nation, who mixt with the Britains in Marriage, and became in a manner Natives of the Land, we can make no Computation.

It was an usual Custom among the Romans to place their Garrisons and their Soldiers Quarters towards the outward Bounds of their Provinces, and fix their Colonies in the more inward Parts of their Conquests, as well to cultivate the People, as to keep them in Subjection, for they were all Places of Strength, tho' less exercis'd in War than those on the Frontiers; so we find it in Britain, where the Guards and Garrisons were chiefly on the Borders of Caledonia, and Sea-Coasts; not but that they had also their fix'd and standing Camps in the Fields and middle Parts of the Nation, such as Gogmagog Hills in Cambridgeshire, and several others. The Romans also, for the greater Conveniency of Passage from Garrison to Garrison, Station to Station, Colony to Colony, and from one Municipium or Corporation to another, had their publick High-ways, call'd the Consulary, Prætorian, Regal and Military Ways, &c. by Beda, and by the Moderns Strates, or Streets. In Britain there were many, but four were of principal Note, namely, Via Vetelingiana, since call'd Watling-Street, Via Icenorum, or Ikenild-Street, Erming-Street, and the Foss-Way; two whereof extended cross the Breadth of the Nation, and the other through the Length of it. These and other magnificent Works were perform'd by the Soldiers and People, as well to prevent the Mischiefs arising from Idleness, as for the Conveniency of the Romans, but not without the hard Labour of the Provincials, as the Britains grievously complain'd, That their Bodies were worn out and consum'd in clearing of Woods, and making Ways over Fens and Bogs; the Labour and Charge of which Ways may be conceiv'd from the Carriage of Gravel, Sand and Stones many Miles, where the Soil it self afforded no such Materials. And that there were more than these four fam'd High-Ways, that Part of the Itinerary which relates to Britain, is a sufficient Proof, where there are describ'd sixteen several Journeys in several Traverses and Windings in the Country, out of these Ways; yet it is not improbable, that wheresoever these Ways have appear'd, or however they have been described, they might be Branches, and terminate in the great Ways. These Ways had several Immunities and Privileges, where Strangers were protected from Arrests and other Troubles; and they had many Mansions where Travellers might rest themselves, Inns for Reception and Entertainment, and Mutations where they chang'd their Post-Horses, Waggons, and Chariots. These and other Works of the Romans were so stupendious, that in these latter Ages, they almost exceed the Belief of Human Performance, and have been thought impossible to have been done by Men. As for Edinces and Fortifications, Beda from Gildas tells us that there were in these Times twenty eight most noble Cities in Britain, besides innumerable Castles furnish'd and fortify'd with mighty Wall, Towers, Gates and Locks. But the Nation being now abandon'd by the Romans, enervated with Luxury, and exhausted of its bravest Youth, soon became a Prey to its Barbarian Neighbours, as shall be shewn in the following History.

I. THE Britains for three or four hundred Years had been in a State of Subjection, but with a Mixture of many Conveniencies and Advantages; but being now acquitted of their Allegiance, and left to their own Laws and Government, they soon fell into greater Inconveniencies and Miseries than ever they found from the Romans. At first they proceeded in their Administration with some Vigour and Resolution; but as People more fond of the Name of Liberty, than apprehensive of the Difficulties of well governing, they grew heady and violent in what they understood not; none were more brave and daring in Council, and none so fearful and relenting in Action; all understanding the Scheme, yet all declining the Performance. Thus in a short time, when the Heat of Liberty was spent, and the Enemy daily increas'd, they soon found their own Temper returning upon them, a Slothfulness of Body, and a Slavishness of Mind; and then they perceiv'd that it was not a vehement Love of Freedom could protect them, but such Diligence, Wisdom and Bravery as they wanted, so that they shrunk more wretchedly under the Burden of their own Liberty, than before under a Foreign Yoak. For being no longer able to support themselves against the Incursions of the barbarous Picts and Scots, they a second Time sent mournful Letters to the Emperor Honorius, humbly imploring his Protection, and vowing perpetual Obedience to Rome, if their Enemies were once remov'd. Honorius being now more at Liberty than before, out of Compassion rather than Ambition, sent them a Legion, who coming suddenly over made great Slaughter of the Picts, soon drove them beyond the Borders, and having clear'd the Frontiers, caus'd a Wall or Rampier to be built cross the Island, from Sea to Sea, where Agricola and Antoninus Pius had formerly made theirs, namely between the Friths of Edenborough and Dunbritton, which might be a Terror to the Enemies, and a Defence to the Natives. But this Wall being cast up with Turf only, and not very strong, as soon as the Romans were departed in Triumph, the barbarous People broke it down and over-ran it, and pouring in upon the Province like a Torrent, made terrible Devastations, killing, burning and destroying wheresoever they came. The Scots, on the other side, out of their Carroughs, or Leather Vessels, wherein they us'd to pass the Irish Seas, landed in prodigious Swarms, and with no less Fury, Outrage and Cruelty, wasted all before them. So that the poor Britains were miserably bandied between two insolent and merciless Enemies, striving which should exceed the other in Spoil and Rapine.

*The Romans

increase.*

After many Miseries and Calamities, the Britains a third Time sent Ambassadors to Rome, after the humblest Manner, with their Garments rent, and Dust on their Heads, begging, That the Emperor would not permit so ancient a Province, and serviceable to the Roman State, to become a Prey and Scorn to Barbarians. Valentinian the Third then reigning, pity'd their Misfortunes,

and sent new Forces to their Relief, which coming unexpectedly upon these greedy Ravagers, whose Minds were intent upon Spoil and Plunder, made a vast Slaughter among them, rescu'd the distressed Britains, and clear'd the whole Province. Then partly at the publick Charges of the State, and partly by the Contributions of private Men, they built another Wall, not of Turf as the former, but of solid Stone, twelve Foot high, and eight in Breadth, with many Towers, crossing the Isle in a direct Line from East to West, where Adrian and Severus had built theirs, from Eden to Tine, eighty Miles in Length, of which there are famous Remains to this Day, vulgarly call'd by the Name of the Picts Wall. That Part of Britain call'd Valentia was left wholly to the Enemy, and in several Parts of the Sea Coasts were built Towers, Forts and Block-Houses at convenient Distances, to prevent all future Incurfions. Having thus secur'd the Nation, the Romans who came not to govern, but charitably to assist, let them understand, That they were not to expect that they should weary themselves with any more of such laborious Expeditions for their Security; exhorting them, for the future to stand up in their own Defence, and courageously to maintain their Country and Liberties against rude and barbarous People, not more powerful than themselves, if their own Fears had not made them so. To which purpose they instructed them in the Arts of War, and left Patterns of their Arms and Weapons behind them, and after many encouraging Exhortations, and Lectures of Valour, to a dispirited Auditory, gave them a final Farewel, with Intention never to return again. This last friendly Expedition of the Romans, which was different from those in ancient Times, was under the Conduct of Gallio of Ravenna; not long before which, the Romans in the Isle, finding all Things declining, bury'd a great Part of their Treasure in the Earth, whereof much has been found, and more sought for. They took their last leave of Britain about the Year 435, which was 422 after the first Entrance of Julius Caesar; leaving a Province which was accounted the fairest Flower in their Triumphant Garlands, and which some of the Emperors thought worthy of the Residence of the Imperial Throne.

The Romans again assist them and build the last Wall.

The Romans never return don the Island

II. The Romans having utterly abandon'd the Isle, the Scots and Picts with greater Confidence than ever, like Flies and Vermin in the Heat of Summer, in prodigious Swarms issu'd out of their narrow Holes and Caves, and immediately seiz'd on all the Country as far as the Wall, and without Resistance took Possession of it. In the mean Time, the Guards on the Wall like idle Spectators with cowardly Hearts stood trembling upon the Battlements, as tho' they were plac'd there rather to view their Loiles than repulse them. That standing Day and Night with Weapons in their Hands, they tamely suffer'd the half-naked Picts from below with their Engines and long Hooks to pluck them down headlong, and dash them against the Ground. So that in a short Time, the Wall and Frontier Towns being deserted, the Inhabitants betook themselves to Flight, which yet could not long secure them, for the Barbarians pursuing them, a fresh Slaughter immediately follow'd more bloody than the former, and what still added to their Misfortunes, being tormented with Famine, to get Substance they were constrain'd to rob and pillage each other; for those who had fled from the Enemy in the North, being unable to pay for their Quarters in the Southern Parts, seiz'd on what they could find. From whence arose new Mischiefs and Discords among themselves, and thence Civil Wars; for this Nation, as Gildas observes, tho' feeble in repelling foreign Enemies, yet in Domestick Contentts were very hardy and obdurate. And now when they wore themselves out with continual Acts of Hostility, the Famine became general, and rag'd to that degree, that those half-starv'd People that remain'd were forc'd to maintain their Lives by Hunting, and such like prey as the wild forests would afford. In the Time of these great Troubles and calamities in the State, there happen'd new Divisions in the Church, by means of Agricola, Bishop to

The Nation is great Distress.

The Church disturbed with Pelagianism.

Pelagius a Monk, sometime of Bangor in Flintshire, who propagated his Heresie here to the great Disturbance of the weak Christians, who not being able to withstand his Errors, call'd in to their Assistance Germanus Bishop of Auxerre, and Lupus Bishop of Tryes in Gaul. These two coming into Britain, by assiduous Preaching in Churches, Fields and Streets, and as some write by working of Miracles, confirm'd many in the Faith, regain'd many more, and lastly in publick Disputation at Verulam confuted the Chief of the Hereticks.

The Britains write doleful Letters to Ætius, in vain.

And now the miserable Remains of the Britains being harrafs'd by their Enemies, and afflicted with all sorts of Calamities, address'd themselves by doleful Letters to the renown'd Ætius, the Roman Lieutenant in Gaul, who had by several famous Successes, for a Time, repell'd the Violence of the Gothick Arms. They began in these Words, To Ætius, thrice Consul; The Groans of the Britains. After which, they thus complain'd: The Barbarians drive us to the Sea, and the Sea drives us back to the Barbarians; between which we have only the Choice of these two Deaths, either to be slaughter'd by one, or drown'd by the other. And the more to move Compassion they further urg'd, We the poor Remnant of the Britains, and your Vassals, besides the Enemy, are punish'd by Famine and Mortality, which at this time violently rage in our Land. Withal they us'd several Arguments to engage him to come over, particularly, That it was the Romans Occasions, not their own, that had reduc'd them to these Extremities; since the Strength of the British Youth had been exhausted in their Service, and the Land left defenceless to support the Grandure of the Empire. And besides the Loss of their Men, their Wealth had been consum'd in maintaining so many Legions in foreign Service, and their Corn spent in supplying the Roman Provinces abroad. They receiv'd no Answer to these urgent Petitions, for the Empire being grievously infested with Huns, Goths and Vandals, was not in any Condition to afford them Relief; insomuch that weary'd out with continual Complaints, and the Famine daily encreasing amongst them, like Men in a desperate Condition, to get Sustenance, some yielded themselves to the Disposal of the Enemy, whilst others more hardy and resolute, supported themselves with what the Woods and Forests would afford, and oftentimes as their Necessities urg'd, or Advantage united them, would make Sallies upon their Enemies, and that with good Success; led on, as may be conceiv'd, by some worthy Commander, who advis'd them not to confide in their own Power, but in the Divine Assistance.

Their Miseries encrease.

Their Enemies give them some Ease.

They become shamefully immoral.

The Scots and Picts finding such stout Resistance where they least expected it, for a while retir'd home, the former into Ireland, and the latter to their new Habitations about the Wall, and excepting a few Inroads about the Borders, were not very burdensom; so that the Britains, eas'd from their cruel Enemies, began again to cultivate the Land, which after a long Discontinuance, yielded such a vast Increase, as in no Age had been remember'd. But the Mischiefs of Famine being cured, others more virulent broke out, as Riot, Luxury and Wantonness, the usual Attendants of Plenty and Opulence, and with them all the Vices incident to human Nature. But what Gildas says principally conduc'd to the Corrupting of Affairs, and the Subversion of all Piety in the Land, was the Hatred of Truth, and the Maintainers of it, the Love of Lies, and the Forgers of them. Evil was call'd good, and Good evil; to be lewd was honourable, to be virtuous disgraceful; being blind themselves, they became Haters of the Light; and the Measures of their Actions were what was most pleasing to themselves. All Things were transacted directly contrary to the publick Welfare and Safety, not only of the Laity, but also the Clergy; and those who should have been Examples of Virtue, often prov'd the Ring-leaders of Vice. Many of them were Lovers of Wine and Drunkenness, wallowing in which Sea they became stupid and insensible; others swell'd with Pride became envious and litigious, indiscreet and incompetent Judges of what in the common Practice of Life was good or evil, lawful or unlawful. Thus wretchedly qualify'd lisy'd both Priests and People, they resolv'd to chuse several Kings of their own; but, as Gildas proceeds in his mournful Story, Kings were anointed not according to Divine Approbation, but by the Voices and Suffrages of such as were more cruel than others, and again as suddenly depos'd and murder'd by their Electors, in order to set up others more fierce and tyrannical: But if any of their Princes appear'd milder, and more inclinable to good Counsel, the Hatred of all Men was levell'd against him, as the Subverter of his Country.

They chuse several Kings.

Thus Affairs proceeded in the State, and no less Commotions ensu'd in the Church; for Pelagianism spreading again in the Country, the British Clergy, unable to withstand it, a second Time begg'd the Assistance of Germanus out of Gaul. He with Severus, a Disciple of his former Associate Lupus, coming into the Island, and finding that the Generality was not infected with the Herefie, would not stand to dispute as formerly, but finding the Heads and Teachers of this new Doctrine, adjudg'd them to Exile; who being by the secular Power deliver'd over to him, were convey'd beyond Sea, where he dispos'd of them in such Places as they could neither infect others, nor consult with their Teachers to confirm themselves. This Germanus is said to have successfully assisted the Britains against their Enemies, and to have obtain'd an extraordinary Victory. But however, soon after his Departure, the Britains receiv'd News that the Scots and Picts were returning with greater Preparations than ever, that they threaten'd the Destruction of the whole Land, designing to plant themselves from one End to the other. But before their Arrival, as if the Instruments of Divine Vengeance were contending which should first destroy a wicked Nation, the Residue that had been left by the Sword and Famine, were now almost swept away by a dreadful Pestilence, insomuch that the Living were scarce sufficient to bury the Dead. But for the present, as one Evil drives off another, the destroying Plague preserv'd the Land from the more barbarous Invaders, who dreading the Contagion durst not engage too far in the Inland Countries; but as soon as the Infection ceas'd, the Enemy soon advanc'd with merciless Fury, and enter'd as far as Stamford in Lincolnshire.

Pelagianism extirpated from the Island

The Picts and Scots afresh invade the Land.

Vortigern was then chief King of the Britains, a haughty and insolent Prince, neither wise in Counsel, nor experienc'd in War, yet doted on by the People, for his Vices so agreeable to their own; heedless of the common Danger, and esteeming the publick Treasury as a Fund only to satisfy his Lusts and Extravagancies. But being awaken'd with the Clamours of the People, he summon'd a grand Council, to provide against the frequent Incursions of the Enemy; where all being in a manner infatuated, they agreed upon such a Defence as afterwards prov'd the Destruction of their Country, which was that the Heathen Saxons, then hateful to God and Man, whom absent they dreaded like Death it self, should be sent for to repel the Northern Nations; which seems to have been ordain'd by Divine Providence, to take a full Vengeance on an impious Nation. At present the Expedient seem'd specious, to most Men, because the Saxons were then a powerful Nation, and terrible to all others; and Ambassadors were immediately dispatcht into Germany, representing the Britains Requests to the Saxons, and promising them very advantageous Conditions, if they would come over to their Assistance. The Saxons were highly pleas'd with the Proposal, and their Country being then over-charg'd with People, they immediately yielded to their Request; and being as is said chosen out by Lot, were put on board three long Ships or Vessels, call'd in their Language Chiules, under the Conduct of Hengist and Horfa, two Brothers, descended from that ancient Woden, from whom all the Royal Family of the Saxons derive their Pedigree. These Leaders, with about fifteen hundred Followers, arriving in Britain, were welcom'd with great Applauses both from the Prince and People, and had the Isle of Thanet, where they landed, allow'd them for their Habitation; and a League was immediately made with them, where the one Part stipulated to defend the Britains Country, the other that besides their

By this means a new and great Change happen'd in Britain, which now began in the Year 449, and twenty fourth of Pharamond the first King of France, which was 39 Years after the Romans first quitted the Britains, and 14 after they had totally abandon'd the Isle.

III. And now a new Race of People began to inhabit this Island, call'd Saxons, a fierce and barbarous Nation, one Branch of those Gothick Multitudes, which swarming from the Northern Hive, had under the Conduct of Woden possess'd themselves of all those vast Tracts that surround the Baltick Sea. These inhabit'd, or rather committed Piracies from all the Sea-Coasts of Germany, between the Rivers Rhine and Elbe, and also upon the Coasts of the Cimbrian Chersonese since call'd Denmark, and had the Name of Saxons from the Gothick or Punick Word Seax, which signifies a Falchion, or short hook'd Sword, or long Knife, which they wore as their usual Weapons. At first they came over in small Numbers under Hengist and Horfa, and joining with the Britains, prov'd very serviceable to them, in overthrowing the Forces of the Picts and Scots, that had made an Irruption into the Nation as far as Stamford. But in a short Time, finding the Island to be rich and fruitful, and the Inhabitants enervated with Vice and Luxury, they sent home to invite greater Numbers to be Sharers of their future Success and Expectations. Those glad of the Opportunity, readily comply'd with the Invitation, and in seventeen fresh Vessels, there came great Numbers of People of three Nations in Germany, namely Saxons, Jutes and Angles, which with those who were here before, made up a compleat Army. These two latter People are suppos'd to be Branches of the Saxons, both inhabiting the Cimbrian Chersonese, from whom we have still the Names of Juteland and Anglen; the former being call'd Jutes from the Word Goth, and the latter Angles from the Word Angulus a Corner, as some conjecture, tho' of the last there is not much Probability.

These last Supplies, according to Nennius, brought over with them Rowena, Daughter of Hengist, a Lady of admirable Beauty, who serving Vortigern with Wine at a splendid Entertainment Hengist had made for him, the British King was so captivated by her Charms, that he immediately offer'd to make her his Wife. Hengist with a subtle Modesty declin'd what he most desir'd, alledging it was too great an Honour; but finding the King urgent, and that he was willing to reward him with a considerable Share of his Dominions, after a private Consultation, he gave him his Daughter, and receiv'd all Kent for a Gratitude, which before had been well govern'd by one Gorvagus. Vortigern was so enamour'd with his new Bride, that he not only divorc'd his former Wife, by whom he had several worthy Sons, but also suffer'd himself to be so prevail'd upon by his Father-in-Law, as to send for more Saxons into the Northern Parts, under Oëta and Ebusa, Son and Nephew to Hengist, upon the specious Notion of securing those Parts, as Hengist did the Southern. Accordingly with forty Vessels they coasted about Britain, and arriving at the Orcades, suppress'd both the Picts and Scots, and in that Part of the Island afterwards call'd Northumberland, seated themselves, tho' without any Title or Name of Regality 'till near a hundred Years after, when Ida erected the Kingdom of Northumberland. Hengist still made the best use of the King's Imprudence, and by degrees sent for more Men and Ships, 'till at length the Countries from whence they came were almost left without Inhabitants; and now being sufficiently encreas'd in Number and Power, they wholly planted the Country of Kent with Jutes, as also they did some others with Saxons and Angles.

The Confluence of such numerous Troops into the Isle soon became a Terror to those who invited them over, and now began to find Occasions of Quarrels with their Entertainers; and first they demanded larger Allowances of Corn and Provisions, declaring, if they were not supply'd, they would break the League, League, and waste the whole Country. The Britains civilly refusing their Demands, desir'd them to return home, since their Numbers were encreas'd beyond what they were able to maintain. Whereupon the Saxon Commanders, resolving to proceed to the Extremity, secretly made a Peace with the Picts, and suddenly turn'd their Arms against their Allies, wasting the Country with Fire and Sword, from the Eastern to the Western Sea, after a barbarous and unheard of Manner: The Stately Buildings, as well publick as private, were demolished; the Christian Priests were commonly slain at the very Altars, and the Bishops massacred without Respect, together with great Numbers of People, so that the Living were scarce sufficient to bury the Dead. Whilst some of the miserable Remains of the Britains, being taken among the Mountains, were slain in Heaps; others pinch'd by the Extremity of Famine, yielded themselves to their Enemies, exchanging their Liberties for their Subsistence; others were constrain'd to seek for Refuge among foreign Nations, particularly among their Country-men in Armorica; but such as remain'd at home, living in perpetual Fears, led a most hard and miserable Life among the Woods and Mountains.

The Saxons turn against the Britains, and make a miserable Destruction of them.

In the midst of these Times of Confusion and Desolation, the British Writers tell us that Vortimer, the Son of Vortigern, a brave and valiant Youth, undertook to fight for his distressed Country, and that with great Success. He thrice straiten'd and besieg'd the Saxons in the Isle of Thanet; and when by reason of fresh Supplies from Saxony, they broke through and escap'd the Danger, he fought with them four other Battels, whereof three are specify'd by Place and Circumstance: The first on the River Darwent in Kent, the second at Episford, wherein Horsa the Brother of Hengist, fell together with Katigern, the other Son of Vortigern. The third was in a Field by Stonar, now Folkstone in Kent; where the Britains beat the Saxons into their Ships with such Execution and Consternation, that they ventur'd no more to land for the full space of five Years. This might seem wholly incredible, but that Gildas tells us how, after such vast Mischiefs and Devastations, the Saxons retir'd, and as some suppose return'd home, notwithstanding the seeming Easiness of the Conquest. After five Years Absence, they will have Vortimer to have dy'd, who desir'd the People, that he might be bury'd in the Port of Stonar, being persuaded that the secret Virtue of his Bones would keep off the Saxons from Landing near that Place; but they neglecting his Commands, bury'd him at Lincoln. The Transactions of these dark Times are uncertainly and variously related; but most agree that after the Death of Vortimer, in the Year 457, Hengist and his Son Esk fought against the Britains in a Place call'd Crecaanford; and overthrowing them with the Loss of four thousand Men, the Britains deserted Kent, and fled to London in a great Consternation. From which Victory, they generally date the Beginning of the Kingdom of Kent under Hengist, who began it about eight Years after his first Arrival in the Isle, and reign'd thirty one Years after. But Vortigern still maintaining the War against the Saxons, they took Counsel how they might intrap him and his Army, and accordingly sent Ambassadors to him to offer a Peace, and to desire that their former Amity might be renew'd. Vortigern too rashly consented to have an Enterview without Arms, and to meet us at an Entertainment. But the treacherous Hengist commanded all his Followers to have their Daggers or Seaxes in readiness under their Garments, and that when he gave the Word Pull out your Seaxes, they should then set upon the Britains and kill them, only they should spare the King, and make him a Prisoner. And thus having met according to Agreement at a publick Feast, at first they convers'd after a friendly manner, till being heated with Wine, they proceeded to harder Expressions; when Hengist suddenly giving the Word, the Saxons rose up and immediately dispatch'd three hundred of the British Nobility. Vortigern alone being taken alive, and put in Chains, was constrain'd for his Ransom to surrender to the Saxons all those Countries which afterwards were call'd Essex, Middlesex and Sussex; which strengthen'd Hengist

Aurelius Ambrosius relieves the Britains.

IV. From this Time forwards, there never wanted a Saxon Monarch in this Isle for many succeeding Centuries; yet the Britains, tho' weaken'd by all Kinds of Calamities, had several noble Struggles, and memorable Contests, before they were utterly driven from their Habitations. Having lost the Flower of their Nation by this last and other Misfortunes, they began to reflect upon their vicious Courses, and to betake themselves to the Divine Assistance. And they were further encourag'd by some Retreat of the Saxons, and by the great Hopes conceiv'd of Aurelius Ambrosius, who being descended of Roman Ancestors, and such as had born Regal Dignity in the Island, had with great Applause succeeded Vortigern; first as General, and afterwards as King. Under the Conduct of this eminent Man, the Britains in a short Time obtain'd a great Victory over the Saxons, as Gildas assures us, tho' he names not the Place. After this Victory, as others report, Ambrosius call'd the Princes and Nobility together at York, and gave Order for the repairing the Churches, which the Saxons had destroy'd; and that after due Care taken in other Places, he march'd to London, and then to Winchester and Salisbury, in all Places endeavouring to restore the declining State of the Church and Kingdom. He fill'd up the vacant Metropolitan Sees of York and Caer-leon, with two worthy Bishops call'd Samptson and Dubricius; and is suppos'd by some to have erected those famous Piles of Stones in Salisbury Plain call'd Stonehenge, in honour of those three hundred Noblemen massacred by Hengist. But of this, and many other Actions of Ambrosius, there is great Difference and Uncertainty.

More Saxons arrive in the South under the Conduct of Ella.

After the Britains had some little Respite from their Enemies, they fell into Civil Dissentions among themselves; and we are told that one of Vortigern's Sons nam'd Pascentius, rais'd a Rebellion in the North against Ambrosius, but was overcome by him, and put to flight; but what happen'd to the Father is uncertain, nor can the British Writers agree either about the Time or the Manner of his Death. After eight Years Intermission, we find that Hengist and his Son Esk again engag'd the Britains in Battel, worsted them, and took a great Booty; which Success gave Occasion to new Bodies of Saxons to come over under the Conduct of Ella and his three Sons, Cymen, Wlencing and Cissa. These arriving in three Ships, landed at a Place call'd Cymen-shore in Sussex, whereupon the Inhabitants in a great Consternation, gather'd together in vast Multitudes to oppose them. The Saxons being tall of Stature, strong and vigorous, receiv'd them sharply who came tumultuously upon them; and notwithstanding their great Numbers, put them to flight with such a Slaughter as might be expected from so unequal an Engagement, and drove them into a Wood, which the Saxon Chronicle calls Andredes Leage. They seiz'd upon all the Maritime Parts of Sussex, and still enlarg'd their Territories 'till the ninth Year after their Arrival, when the Britains found themselves so nearly concern'd, that they united their Forces and bravely engag'd them near a Place call'd Mearcresdes or Burnamstede. This Victory remain'd doubtful, both Parties drawing off with great Loss, which caus'd Ella to send for fresh Supplies out of his own Country, according to H. of Huntington. Not long after, Hengist King of Kent dy'd, in the Year 488, and was succeeded by his Son Esk, who reign'd twenty four Years, without endeavouring to enlarge his Dominions. In the mean Time Ella having increas'd his Forces, proceeded with Success against the Britains, and at length having laid Siege to a little City call'd Andredes Caster, he took it, and us'd his Conquest with such Severity that not one Person escap'd the Sword. Thus Ella, three Years after the Death of Hengist, began the second Kingdom in the Isle, call'd the Kingdom of the South-Saxons; peopling it with new Inhabitants, from the Country which was then old Saxony, now Holstein in Denmark, and besides had at his Command all those Provinces, which which the Saxons had won on this side the River Humber. This Kingdom consisted of those Parts of the Isle afterwards call'd Sussex and Surrey, and was began in the Year 491, about 34 Years after the Beginning of the Kingdom of Kent.

Britain being now the Field of Fortune, new Adventurers came daily from Germany; particularly Count Cerdick, the tenth in Lineage from Woden, an experienc'd Soldier, who with his Son Cenrick, and so many Men as he could transport in five Vessels, landed at a Place which from him was call'd Cerdick's Shore. Upon the first Appearance of their Vessels, the Inhabitants stood upon their Guard, and vigorously oppos'd their Landing; but the Saxons still advanced, and maintain'd their Ground, 'till at length, the Britains in vain resisting, Cerdick and his Son got Possession of all those Countries upon the Sea-Coasts, tho' not without divers Battels. About six Years after, one Porta, with his two Sons Bleda and Magla, with two Vessels arriv'd at a Place which from him is still call'd Portsmouth; and without much Difficulty repelling such as unadvisedly oppos'd them, and having slain a young British Prince, carved for himself and his Followers another Share out of the Country. Yet still the Successes of Cerdick made the Britains most apprehensive, therefore seven Years after the Arrival of Porta, they united their Forces under the Conduct of Nazaleod, one of the greatest of the British Kings, who is suppos'd to have succeeded Ambrosius, and to be the same with Uther Pendragon. Cerdick being sensible of his great Power, was oblig'd to send for Assistance to Esk King of Kent, Ella King of the South-Saxons, and to Porta and his Sons; which done, he divided his Army into two Bodies or Wings, whereof he led the Right himself, and committed the Left to the Conduct of his Son Cenrick. King Nazaleod, perceiving the Right to be the stronger of the two, turn'd his whole Strength against it with so much Fury and Execution, that after a great Slaughter he put Cerdick to flight; but pursuing with more Heat than Caution, the Left Wing commanded by Cenrick took the Advantage, and falling on his Rear renew'd the Battel with so much Vigour, that he recover'd all, slew Nazaleod on the Spot, with five thousand of his Soldiers. From which Time, the Saxons remain'd unmolested for a considerable Space.

After an Interregnum of about six Years Nazaleod or Uther was succeeded by the famous Arthur, suppos'd to be his Son, and reported to have been the most renowned Champion of the British Nation. So many fabulous and Romantick Things have been related of this Prince, that several have doubted whether there ever was such a Person. But yet the Generality of Writers agree that there was such a Man, and that he made a powerful Resistance against the Pagan Saxons; but whether he was King of the Britains in General, or only King of Cornwall, is uncertain. Nennius, who liv'd about three hundred Years after him, assures us that he overthrew the Saxons in no less than twelve Battels: The first was fought near the Mouth of a certain River call'd Glenn; the second, third, fourth and fifth, near another River call'd Dug or Duc; the sixth at a River's side call'd Bassus; the seventh in the Wood of Chelidon, which in British had the Name of Cattoit Celidon; the eighth near the Castle of Suinnion; the ninth in the City of Lergis, in British call'd Caer-leon; the tenth near a River call'd Arderick; the eleventh upon the Hill Brenoin; and the twelfth on the Hill of Baden, near Bath. The rest of the Acts of King Arthur are so improbable, that they are not worth the mentioning; nor are we certain how far the others are true. However we are told from Higden with great Probability, That King Cerdick fighting often with Arthur, tho' he was overcome, yet still he came on again with new Forces; 'till Arthur being weary'd out, at length gave him up Hampshire and Somersetshire, which Countries he then call'd West-Sexa. Whatever Opposition was made by Arthur, Cerdick at length prevail'd, and having got the Assistance of his Nephews Stufe and Withgar, who came over with three Ships, he gain'd several Advantages over the Britains, and after he had been twenty four Years in the Isle, he took upon him the Title of King, and founded the third Kingdom in the Nation, call'd the Kingdom of the West-Saxons. This Kingdom contain'd all the Countries of Devonshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, Hampshire and Barkshire, to which afterwards was added Cornwall. It was founded in the Year 519, about sixty one Years after the Saxons first Arrival in the Nation; and the Time of this Kingdom's Beginning is more observable, because at last it conquer'd all the other Saxon Kingdoms, and so obtain'd the sole Command of all England.

V. The Britains were now reduc'd to a smaller Compass of Land, yet still they wanted not Courage to oppose the common Enemy; and in the Year after Cerdick was made King, they fought a memorable Battel at Badon Hill, or Banesdown near Bath, where the Saxons were hemm'd in and entirely routed. This Battel is mention'd by Gildas, and is suppos'd to be the last of the twelve fought by King Arthur; which gave the Saxons such a Blow, that the Britains enjoy'd a long Peace after it. Yet still the Saxons daily encreasing in Numbers, continu'd to make new Incroachments, and in seven Years time founded a fourth Kingdom in Britain, call'd the Kingdom of the East-Saxons, consisting of the two Counties of Essex and Middlesex, with Part of Hartfordshire. It was begun in the Year 527, by Erchenwin the Son of Osfa, who seems to have been the only Prince who is deriv'd from one Saxnat, and not from Woden; tho' of this Prince they tell us nothing, except his Name and Pedigree, relating neither the Number of his Forces, the Place of his Landing, nor so much as the least Encounter he had with the Britains. This Kingdom being at first tributary to that of Kent, and afterwards to that of the Mercians, never came to be very considerable, tho' it had London, the Metropolis of England, under its Dominions. Nor did the Kingdom of the South-Saxons bear any great Sway after the Death of its first King Ella; but grew weaker and weaker 'till it became subject to other Kingdoms.

The Britains had now Peace with their incroaching Neighbours; and we hear but little concerning them, but only about fifteen Years after the founding of the East-Saxon Kingdom, in the Year 542, the great King Arthur dy'd, and is suppos'd to have been succeeded by Constantine. About five Years after which, Ida the Saxon, sprung also from Woden in the tenth Descent, founded the fifth Kingdom in this Isle, call'd the Kingdom of Northumberland, as consisting of that Part of the British Province that was North of the River Humber. The Saxons had been fix'd in those Parts about ninety Years before, under Oeta and Ebusa, upon a Pretence of warring against the Picts; and tho' they were so far distant from Kent, and not without sufficient Power, yet they kept themselves within Moderation, and as inferior Governors, they and their Progeny paid Obedience to the Kings of Kent, as to the elder Family: 'Till at length, following the Example of the Age, when no less than Kingdoms were the Prize of every fortunate Commander, they resolv'd to assume the Regal Title. Of whom Ida was the first, a Man who had a numerous Issue, and whose Virtues render'd him no less noble than his Birth; in War invincible, and in Peace continually tempering the Awe of Majesty, with his natural Affability. This prov'd a powerful Kingdom, and consisted of all Yorkshire, Lancashire, Durham, Cumberland, Westmorland, and Northumberland, with Part of Scotland as far as Edinburgh Frith. Within twelve Years Time, this Kingdom was divided into two Parts, one call'd Bernicia, and the other Deira.

The first Civil Wars among the Saxons.

Shortly after this Division, Ethelbert began to reign in Kent, who was the fifth King of that Country, and the first who rais'd Civil Wars and Disturbances among the Saxons themselves. At his first Entrance he was young and ambitious, and claim'd from the Priority of Time in which Hengist erected his Kingdom, a Kind of a Right over the later Kingdoms; and thereupon gave great Disturbances sturbances to his neighbouring Princes. But he was twice defeated by them, so that he who at first was formidable, in a short time became in a manner despicable; and Keaulin King of the West-Saxons pursu'd him into his own Territories, and at Wibbandum flew Oslac and Cnebba, two of his chief Commanders.

By means of these Civil Contests, but chiefly by the last Victory at Badon-Hill, the Britains for the Space of fifty Years receiv'd no considerable Annoyance from the Saxons; but this long Peace they enjoy'd, by the Abuse of Heaven's Favours, prov'd more destructive to them than War. For being suddenly rais'd from a miserable State of Slavery, by two signal Successes under Ambrosius and Arthur, they were taught by the Experience of either Fortune, to live in a reasonable Decency and Order: But when the next Age, forgetting past Misfortunes, and only sensible of present Ease, succeeded, immediately there follow'd an apparent Subversion of all Truth and Justice in the Minds of most Men; which in a short Space became not only manifest, but odious to all the neighbouring Nations. Scarce the least Footstep or Impression of Goodness was left remaining among all the Ranks and Degrees in the Land; except in so small a Number, as to be hardly visible in a general Corruption. Their Kings and Magistrates were guilty of all Kinds of tyrannous and oppressive Actions, and the Clergy had stain'd themselves by all manner of Vices and Corruptions, being rather more scandalous than when first the Saxons enter'd. This in a Word was the State of Government and Religion among the Britains, in that long Calm of Peace which Badon-Hill had produc'd; by which means the Fruits of that Victory were of no Advantage; Cities and Towns were not inhabited as formerly, but lay in a State of Ruin and Desolation; nor was it long before Civil Wars breaking out, brought all Things into the most miserable Condition. For Britain, as at other Times, had then several Kings; five of whom, Gildas then in Armorica, boldly reproves by Name. First Constantine, who reign'd in Cornwall and Devonshire, a tyrannical and bloody Prince, polluted also with many Adulteries. In another Part, but not mention'd where, Aurelius Conanus was King, whom he charges with Adulteries and Parricide, and Cruelties worse than the former. The third reigning in Demetia or South-Wales, was Vortipore, a Man old not only in Years, but in Adulteries, and in Governing full of Falshood and barbarous Actions. The fourth was Cuneglas, suppos'd to be King of the Northern or Cimbrian Britains, a great Enemy to the Clergy, high minded, and trusting wholly to his Riches. The last but greatest of all in Power was Maglocune, and greatest also in Impiety, who had expell'd or slain many other Kings or Tyrants, and was call'd the Island Dragon, perhaps having his Seat in Anglesey; a profuse Giver, a great Warrior, and of a remarkable Stature. This is the Substance of what we can learn of all that pass'd among the Britains from the Time of their useless Victory at Badon, to the Time that Gildas wrot his Account, namely from the Year 520, to 571.

The horrid Corruptions of the Britains, and of their Kings.

Sax. An. &c.

Not long after began the sixth Kingdom in this Isle, call'd the Kingdom of the East-Angles, consisting of those Parts, since call'd Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, with the Isle of Ely. It was founded by Usfa, the eighth from Woden, tho' it seems there were before him divers other petty Princes in Norfolk and Suffolk; but Usfa in Strength and Policy over-pow'ring those Princes, made himself sole King, and govern'd with that Reputation, that H. Huntington tells us, the Kings descended from him were call'd Usfings; and the Subjects of this Kingdom are the more remarkable, because they afterwards gave Name to the whole Kingdom of England. And now the Saxons, who for a long Space had been out of Action, unless among themselves, began afresh to assault the Britains, and in a few Years Time drove them out of all they yet held on this Side of Wales. For Cuthwulf, the Brother of Keaulin, King of the West-Saxons, by a Victory obtain'd at Bedanford or Bedford, took from them them four good Towns, Liganburgh, now Leighton in Bedfordshire, Eglef-burgh, now Ailesbury in Bucks, with Bennington and Ignesham, now Benson and Evesham in Oxfordshire. And after six Years more, Keaulin and his Son Cuthwin gave them a great Overthrow at Deorham in Glocestershire, flew three of their Kings, Comail, Condidan and Farinmaile, and took three of their chief Cities, Glocester, Cirencester and Badencester, or Bath. The Britains notwithstanding, after some Space of Time, thinking to have outgrown their Losses, gather'd together and engag'd Keaulin and his Son Cutha, at Fethamleage, in which Battel Cutha was slain, and the Saxons oblig'd to retire; but Keaulin renewing the Fight, at length routed the Britains, and pursuing his Advantage, took many Towns, and return'd richly laden with Booty.

A. D. 585. The last of those Saxons who rais'd their own Atchievements to a Monarchy was Crida, who about this Time founded the seventh Kingdom in this Isle, call'd the Kingdom of Mercia; which tho' it was last erected, yet was one of the largest of the English-Saxon Kingdoms, and also one of the last that was conquer'd by the West-Saxons. It consisted of all the middle Parts of the Nation, which now compose seventeen Counties, namely, Glocestershire, Herefordshire, Worcestershire, Warwickshire, Leicestershire, Rutland, Northamptonshire, Lincolnshire, Huntingtonshire, Bedfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Oxfordshire, Staffordshire, Shropshire, Nottinghamshire, Darbyshire and Cheshire, besides Part of Hartfordshire. And now the Britains were more press'd and confin'd than ever; yet before they quitted all on this Side of the Mountains, they shew'd some Remainers of their ancient Valour: For meeting with Keaulin at a Place call'd Woden's Mount in Wiltshire, whether it were by their own Forces, or assisted by some of the Angles, whose Hatred Keaulin had incurr'd, they destroy'd his Army, and chas'd him out of his Kingdom, who flying from thence, dy'd the next Year in great Poverty, tho' but lately he had been most potent and indeed sole Monarch of all the Saxons on this side the River Humber. This Victory prov'd of little Advantage to the Britains; for in a very few Years, the miserable Inhabitants, partly by the Picts and Scots, but principally by the Saxons, were gradually forc'd out of their ancient Seats, and such as fled not beyond the Seas were driven to the craggy and mountainous Places in the West of the Island, now call'd Wales, naturally fenc'd with Hills, and the Inlets of the Sea, whither their ravenous Enemies could not easily follow them. Some were driven into that Part call'd Cornwall, and others fled to their Countrymen in Armorica; the poor Remains that were scatter'd among the Saxons, were in effect made Slaves by them, and kept to the most servile Offices; from whom began Villenage in England, which lasted to the Reign of Henry the Seventh.

Thus, omitting fabulous and improbable Relations, we have represented the main View of what was transacted in Britain, since the Romans abandon'd it. Wherein may be observ'd the Miseries and Desolations brought by Divine Providence on a vile and degenerate Nation; driven, when nothing else could reform them, out of a fair and rich Country, into a mountainous and barren Corner, by Strangers and Pagans. So much more tollerable is downright Infidelity in the Eye of Heav'n, than the dishonouring the Christian Faith by such Unchristian Works.

C H A P. III.

From the Destruction of Britain by the Saxons and other Nations, to the new Establishment made by King Egbert, who became the first supreme Monarch of England.

Containing the Space of about 232 Years.

I. THE unfortunate Britains being driven out of their best and fairest Habitations, Foreigners gain'd a full and entire Possession of them, under the Names of Saxons, Jutes and Angles; tho' the most general Name was that of Saxons, which occasion'd the whole Nation to be call'd by some New-Saxony. The proper Saxons had for their Share most of the Southern Parts of the Nation, with a little of the Eastern, after this distinguished by the Names of West-Sex, South-Sex, and East-Sex; the Jutes had the South-Eastern Parts, namely Kent, the Isle of Wight, and Part of Hampshire; and the Angles had the greatest Share, viz. all the Midland and Northern Parts, with Part of the Eastern, distinguish'd by the Names of East-Angles, Mercian-Angles and Northumbrian-Angles. These were not only sufficient to conquer and waste the whole Province, but even to plant and people it in a short Time with numerous and new Inhabitants. So that we are now to begin with a new Body of People, and with a new State and Government of the Land; which introduc'd a general Change of Names, of Language, of Customs, of Laws, of Arms, of Discipline, of Possessions, of Titles, of Religion, and even of the whole Face of Nature, throughout the Nation. Upon which account we may justly date the Original of all these among us, as well as our Nation it self, from these our Saxon Ancestors: Britain, which was before a Roman Province, was now a Saxon Nation: The Language, which was either Latin or British, was now grown wholly Saxon or English: The Habits in Peace, and Arms in War, the Titles of Officers, and Proprietors of Lands, came to be all according to the Saxon Forms and Usage: The Laws of this Country, which before were Roman, were chang'd now into old Saxon Customs or Constitutions: The Religion, which before was Christian, became now Pagan, introducing the Worship of several Gods, particularly Woden, Thor, and Frea, whose Memory are still preserv'd by the common Names of three Days in the Week: And lastly the Land it self, which before had been divided into Roman Provinces, was now divided into seven Saxon Kingdoms, govern'd by their own proper Kings. The Foundation of these Kingdoms have been already mention'd; but for the Reader's Ease, and the better clearing of the Story, it will be convenient to say something of all in one Place, and to give a general Account of each 'till the Time of Egbert, the first supreme Monarch of this Nation.

The Distribution of the Saxons.

The first of the seven Kingdoms was that of KENT, which consisted of Jutes of the County of Kent, and probably some of Hampshire, and had a Succession of seventeen Kings, four Pagans, and thirteen Christians, viz. Hengist, Esk, Octa, Ermiric, Ethelbert, Eadbald, Ercombert, Egbert, Lothair, E-dric, Witbred, Edbert, Edilbert, Alric, Edilbert, Cuthred, and Baldred. This Kingdom was founded in the Year 457, and ended in 823, continuing 366 Years; its Royal Seat being Canterbury, and sometimes Reculver, near the Sea-

2. SOUTH-SAX-
ONY. Sea-Shore. The second Kingdom was that of the SOUTH-SAXONS, which consisted of the two Counties of Sussex and Surry; and this being mostly under the Power of the Kings of Kent and the West-Saxons, we find but five Kings, two Pagans, and three Christians, viz. Ella, Cissa, Ethelwolf, Berthrum and Authum. This Kingdom was founded in the Year 491, and ended in 600, continuing 109 Years; its Royal Seat being Cissancester, now Chichester.
3. WEST-SAX-
ONY. The third Kingdom was that of the WEST-SAXONS, consisting of six Counties, viz. Devonshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, Hampshire and Barkshire, besides Cornwall, which was afterwards added to it, and had a Succession of sixteen Kings before Egbert, five Pagans, and eleven Christians, viz. Cerdic, Kenric, Ceaulin, Ceolric, Ceolwulf, Cynegils cum Quincom, Kenewalch cum Sexborge, Eskwine, Kentwine, Cedwalla, Ina, Ethelheard, Cuthred, Sigebert, Cynewulf, and Birhtric. This Kingdom was founded in the Year 519, and continu'd till the Time of Egbert, 283 Years; its Royal Seat being Ventceaster, now Winchester.
4. EAST-SAX-
ONY. The fourth Kingdom was that of the EAST-SAXONS, which consisted of the two Counties of Essex and Middlesex, with the South Part of Hartforashire, being generally tributary to Kent and Mercia, and had a Succession of twelve Kings, two Pagans, and ten Christians, viz. Erchenwin, Sledda, Sexred cum Fratris Sigebert the little, Sigebert the good, Swithelm, Sigher cum Seba, Sigebard cum Swanfred, Osfa, Selred and Swithred. This Kingdom was founded in the Year 527, and ended in 747, continuing 220 Years; its Royal Seat being London.
5. NORTHUM-
BERLAND. The fifth Kingdom was that of NORTHUMBERLAND, which consisted of Angles, and of six Counties, viz. Yorkshire, Lancashire, Durham, Cumberland, Westmorland and Northumberland, with Part of Scotland as far as Edinburgh Frith. For above a hundred Years this Kingdom was divided into two, namely Bernicia in the North, and Deira in the South, and had a Succession of twenty one Kings, besides five in Deira, four Pagans, and seventeen Christians, viz. Ida, Ella, Edelric, Edelfrid, Edwin, Oswald, Osmy, Egfrid, Alfrid, Ofred, Kenred, Ofric, Ceolwulf, Eadbert, Osulf, Ethelwald, Alured, Ethelred, Alfwold, Ofric and Ethelred. This Kingdom was founded in the Year 547, and ended in 792, continuing 245 Years, besides an Interregnum of 33 Years after; its Royal Seat being the City of York.
6. EAST-EN-
GLAND. The sixth Kingdom was that of the EAST-ANGLES, which consisted of the three Counties of Cambridge, Norfolk and Suffolk, and had a Succession of fourteen Kings, four Pagans, and ten Christians, viz. Usfa, Titylus, Redwald, Eorpwald, Sigebert, Egric, Anna, Ethelherd, Ethelwald, Aldulf, Elfwald, Beorne, Ethelred and Ethelbert. This Kingdom was founded in the Year 575, and ended in 792, continuing 218 Years; its Royal Seat being Dommoc or Dummoc, now Dunwich in Suffolk, and sometimes St. Edmund's Bury.
7. MERCIA. The seventh and last Kingdom was that of MERCIA, which consisted of Angles, and of sixteen Counties, viz. Glocestershire, Herefordshire, Worcestershire, Warwickshire, Leicestershire, Rutland, Northamptonshire, Lincolnshire, Huntingtonshire, Bedfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Oxfordshire, Staffordshire, Shropshire, Nottinghamshire, Darbyshire and Cheshire, besides Part of Hartfordshire, and had a Succession of fifteen Kings before the Reign of Egbert, and six after, four Pagans, and seventeen Christians, viz. Crida, Wibba, Ceorl, Penda, Peada, Wulfer, Ethelred, Kenred, Ceorlred, Ethelbald, Beornred, Osfa, Egfrid, Kenulf, Kenelm, Beornwulf, Ludecom, Withlaf, Bertulf, Burtred and Ceolwulf. This Kingdom was founded in the Year 585, and ended in 874, continuing 289 Years; its Royal Seat being Lincoln. The whole Number of the Saxon Kings before the Reign of Egbert, and a little after, was a hundred and eleven, of which twenty five were Pagans, and eighty six Christians. This Establishment of the seven Kingdoms is generally call'd by the Name of the HEPTARCHY.

As to the Lives and Actions of these several Monarchs, during the Heptarchy, they have been so exceeding lamely and confus'dly transmitt'd to us, that we can give but little Satisfaction to a curious Reader. We find a short and broken Account of many of them, and that after they had dispossest the miserable Britains, having leisure to survey each others Greatness, they fell into mutual Emulations and Wars among themselves; so that in the Consequence whosoever had most Power, was generally reputed and acknowledg'd King of most if not all the rest. Of these, Ethelbert King of Kent, in the Beginning of this Period, was the most considerable and powerful Monarch, who tho' he had been unsuccessful in his juvenile Attempts, had now by his Conduct and Policy reduc'd all the Kingdoms on the South Side the Humber to his Devotion. And tho' he was a Pagan, to advance his Grandure, he marry'd Bertha, the King of France's Daughter, with this Article, that she should have the free Exercise of the Christian Religion, under the Care and Instruction of Lethard a Bishop, who was sent by her Parents along with her. This prov'd one Step towards the displaying the Light of the Gospel to a rude and Heathen People; and about the same Time there happen'd a remarkable Transaction in Foreign Parts, which being pursu'd, by Degrees brought this great Work to the full Perfection. But before we mention this happy Change of Religion among the Saxons, it may not be amiss to observe, That there were yet remaining among the Britains in Wales, many Bishops, Abbots, Priests, Religious Persons and Monasteries; and at the Command of Oudocus Bishop of Landaf, there were at that Place three Synods conven'd, in which three British Princes, Mouric, Morcant and Guidnirth, were excommunicated for Murders, and compell'd to expiate these Scandals by Alms, Prayers and Fastings.

Kent chief Monarch.

The first Beginning of Christianity among the Saxons, as we are inform'd from Beda, was occasion'd by this Accident: The Northumbrians had now a Custom among them of long Continuance of selling their Children and other Relations into foreign Lands; of which Number some beautiful Youths were expos'd to sale at Rome, whose fair and graceful Countenances invited Gregory Arch-Deacon of that City, among others, to demand who and what they were. Being inform'd that they were Angles of Deira, and Pagans by Education, pitying their Condition, he with a deep Sigh cry'd out What a deplorable Thing it was that the Father of Darkness should be Master of such Angelick Faces! and immediately obtaining Licence of Pope Benedict, he began his Journey towards Britain; but the Citizens of Rome, who could not suffer the Absence of so vigilant a Pastor, caus'd him to be recall'd. But Gregory not long after being advanc'd to the Papacy, in his fourth Year, being mov'd, as Beda tells us, by a divine Impulse, he sent Austin a Monk, whom he design'd for Bishop of the English Nation, with other zealous Monks along with him, to preach the Gospel in Britain. These being on their Journey, discourag'd by some Reports, or their own carnal Fears, dispatch'd Austin in the Name of all the rest, beseeching Gregory that they might return home, and not be sent on an Expedition so full of Hazard, to a fierce and infidel Nation, whose Language they understood not. But the Pope immediately sent back their Messenger with pious exhortary Letters to them, 'not to be discourag'd by vain Reports, but vigorously to pursue the great Work they had undertaken, since their Labours would be attended with perpetual Glory; and that they should obey Austin, whom he had appointed for their Abbot. Besides which Letters the Pope also wrote to Eutherius, Arch-Bishop of Arles, wherein he recommended them to his Care and Protection, and that he would furnish them with all Necessaries; also recommending to him Candidus a Presbiter, whom he had sent to receive and dispose of the Church's Revenues in France.

Monk sent in-

Austin and his Companions being thus confirm'd by the Pope's Exhortations, proceeded in their Voyage, and landed at the Isle of Thanet near Kent, with about forty Persons, together with some Interpreters of the French Nation. At their first Arrival, Austin sent a surprising Message to King Ethelbert, informing him, That he came from Rome, and had brought the Promise of Eternal Felicity to all that would receive it; which when the King heard, he civilly order'd them to remain in the Place where they landed, and that they should be plentifully supply'd with all Necessaries, 'till he had determin'd how to receive them. After a few Days, passing into the Island, the King chose a Place to meet them under the open Sky, possess'd with an old Persuasion, that all Spells and Incantments, if they should use any, would be unavailable, if they were not within Doors. But Austin and his Companions, arm'd with the Divine Power, and bearing for his Banner a silver Cross, with the painted Image of our Saviour, advanc'd slowly, singing their solemn Litanies, and praying for the Salvation of those to whom they were sent. Then sitting down with the King, and preaching the Word of Life to him and his Nobles, the King with no small Courtesie told them, That the Doctrines and Promises they brought were indeed specious and inviting, but being new and uncertain, he could not suddenly consent to quit the Religion of his Ancestors; but because they were Strangers, and came from far Countries purely to communicate such Things as they believ'd to be most valuable, they should receive all Protection and necessary Accommodations; nor would he prohibit them from gaining what Persons they could, to the Belief of their Religion. And accordingly he allotted them their Residence in his Royal City of Daroverne or Canterbury, made provision for their Maintenance, and gave them free Liberty to preach their Doctrine where they pleas'd.

Being settled in the Place provided for them, they began to imitate the Lives ^{Beda.} of the Primitive Christians, applying themselves to constant Prayers and Fasting especially to Preaching to all that would hear them, despising the Riches of this World, being content with the bare Necessaries of Life, and carefully living up to the Rules they taught others. The Success of which was, That many believ'd, and were baptiz'd, admiring the Simplicity of their Lives, as well as the Purity of their Doctrine. They first held their Religious Assemblies at an old ruinous Church on East-side of the City, built in Honour of St. Martin, when the Romans inhabited Britain, in which the Queen usually perform'd her Devotions; 'till the King himself, being convinc'd by the Purity of their Lives, and by their Miracles, as our Author assures us, they obtain'd a full Liberty of Preaching and Building of Churches. The Conversion and Baptism of this Prince caus'd great Numbers to repair from all Parts to hear the Gospel, and leaving their Heathenism, join'd themselves to the Church of Christ; so powerful a Motive is the Example of a Prince to his Subjects. The King shew'd a great Satisfaction at the Faith and Conversion of any of his Subjects, and cherish'd all such as believ'd with a more tender Regard; yet nevertheless he would not compel any to receive Christianity, being taught by the Authors of his Salvation, That the Service of Christ ought to be voluntary, and not constrain'd: Nor was it long before he granted his Teachers Places fitting for their Function, in his City of Canterbury, and conferr'd upon them large Immunities and Possessions.

the English.*

In the following Year, when Austin had converted the greatest Part of the ^{Beda.} Kentish Nation, he pass'd over into France, where according to the Commands of Pope Gregory, he was ordain'd Arch-Bishop of the whole English Nation, by Eutherius Arch-Bishop of Arles. Then returning to Kent, he sent two of his Associates nam'd Laurence and Peter to Rome, acquainting the Pope of his good Success in this Isle, and desiring to be resolv'd in certain Theological, or rather Levitical Questions, some of which were very peculiar, and the Answers no less. And now being exalted to Archiepiscopal Authority he recover'd from the Ruins and other profane Uses a Christian Church in Canterbury, anciently built by the Romans; which he dedicated by the Name of Christ's Church, and appointed it as a See for himself and his Successors. He likewise founded a Monastery

Monastery towards the East, not far from the City, where also King Ethelbert by his Persuasion built and endow'd the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul; in which the Bodies of St. Austin himself, and all the succeeding Bishops of Canterbury, as also of the Kings of Kent, should be interr'd. Within a Year or two after, Austin informing the Pope that there was a Want of Preachers in this Isle, Gregory sent over several, particularly Mellitus, Justus, Paulinus and Rufinian, and with them an Archiepiscopal Pall, Altar Cloaths, Sacerdotal Vestments, Holy Vessels, divers Relicks, and a great many Books; and gave Austin Power to ordain twelve Suffragan Bishops under him, and an Archbishop of York, when that City and Country adjoining should receive Christianity; so that he also should be a Metropolitan, and have twelve Bishops under him, to whom he should likewise send a Pall, but so as to be under the Direction of Austin. With these also he sent Letters both to Austin and to King Ethelbert, containing many pious Instructions; which shews that the primitive Christian Temper had not yet left the Bishops of Rome, tho' infected with some Superstitions. As the Number of Christians encreas'd, Austin ordain'd two of his Assistants for Bishops, Mellitus and Justus, and sent them both to distant Parts. The former by Preaching, converted the East-Saxons, over whom Sebert the Son of Sleda, by Permission of Ethelbert, being born of his Sister Bicula, then reign'd. To congratulate whole Conversion, Ethelbert built them the great Church of St. Paul's in London to be their Bishop's Cathedral; and Justus also had another built at Rocheſter, dedicated to St. Andrew, and endow'd by the same King with large Possessions.

II. Hitherto Austin had labour'd only to convert Pagans and Infidels; but now by vertue of his Archiepiscopal, or rather Legatine Authority conferr'd on him by the Pope, he took upon him to make a general Visitation of his Province: And coming near the Borders of Wales, and assisted by the Power of King Ethelbert, he summon'd all the British Bishops of the adjoining Province to a Synod, at a Place on the Borders of Worcestershire, in Beda's Time call'd Austin's Oak; and began to persuade them by brotherly Admonitions to conform with the Romish Church in celebrating of Easter, and some other particular Points. But not prevailing with them either by Promises or Threats, he appeal'd to a Miracle, as Beda assures us, and restor'd a blind Man to Sight, to whom the Britains could give no Relief. Being somewhat mov'd at this, tho' not inclinable to recede from their ancient Usages, without further Consultation, they requested a second Meeting; to which repair'd seven British Bishops, with many other learned Men, especially from the famous Monastery of Bangor, where Dinooth was Abbot, in which were said to be so many Monks living by their own Labour, that being divided under seven Rectors, each Division had no less than three hundred. One who led an Anchorit's Life amongst them, staid behind, and by his Wisdom effected more than those who went: For being reputed as an Oracle, and demand'd how they might know whether Austin was a Man from God, he answer'd, That if they found him meek and humble, they should earnestly hearken to him, as having the truest Marks of Christ's Disciple; but if he carry'd himself with Pride and Haughtiness, they should not regard him, for he could not be then a Man from God: Adding also some Marks by which they might know whether he was a meek or a proud Person.

With this Advice they hasted to the Place of Meeting; where Austin carrying himself as the Pope's Legate, and their Metropolitan, as they drew near sat still and pontifically in his Chair. This gave immediate Offence to the Britains, who according to Advice rejected his Proposals; and tho' he demand'd their Obedience in only three Particulars, namely in the Time of the Celebration of Easter, in the Manner of Baptism according to the Romish Church, and in assisting them to preach to the English Saxons, promising them to forbear them them in other Things, tho' contrary to the Customs us'd by him; yet they utterly refus'd to comply in any Thing, or to acknowledge him for their Archbishop; declaring among themselves, That if he will not rise to us now, how haughtily will he treat us, if we were under his Power and Subjection? And for a final Answer to him Dinooth of Bangor in the Name of all the rest, declar'd, That as to the Subjection he requir'd, he might be assur'd, That in the Bond of Love and Charity, they were all Subjects and Servants to the Church of God, to the Pope of Rome, and every good Christian by Word and Deed to help them forward in the Way to Life. But other Obedience than this they did not know to be due to him whom he term'd The Pope; which Obedience they were always ready to pay to him and every Christian: Besides they were govern'd under God by the Bishop of Caer-leon, who was to oversee them in all spiritual Matters. To whom Austin is reported thus threateningly to have denounc'd against them; Since ye refuse to accept of Peace with your Brethren, ye shall have War from your Enemies; and since ye will not preach the Word of Life to whom ye ought, from their Hands ye shall meet with Death. Austin liv'd not to see the Issue of his Prediction, but dy'd in the following Year 605, being succeeded in his Archbishoprick by Laurentius, a Roman whom he had ordain'd in his Life Time, to support the weak Estate of a new establish'd Church. Two Years after the poor Britains met with the Punishment suppos'd to have been foretold by Austin, from Ethelfrid King of Northumberland, who meeting them with an Army near Chester, not only destroy'd great Numbers of them, but of twelve hundred Monks, who stood near to pray for the Success of the British Arms, scarce fifty escap'd.

Ethelbert's Care.

Not long after the Death of Austin, King Ethelbert summon'd a Mycel Synod, or great Council, as well of the Clergy as Laity, wherein by their common Consent and Approbation, all the Grants and Charters of this King, whereby he had settled great Endowments on the Church of Canterbury and others, were confirm'd, with heavy Imprecations against any who should afterwards dare to infringe them. This Prince also gave his People several Laws and Statutes, by the Advice of his wife Men, according to the Example of the Romans, written in the Saxon Tongue, and observ'd in Beda's Time; wherein his great Care was to punish such as had stolen any Thing from the Church or Church-Men, thereby shewing how gratefully he receiv'd from them the Christian Faith. In his Reign Christianity daily encreas'd in this Island; and in the Year 608, Laurence Arch-Bishop of Canterbury brought the Scots to some Conformity with him, especially in the Observation of Easter. In 611, this King's Nephew Sebert King of the East-Saxons, founded the Church and Abby of Westminster, and Melleus the Bishop of London dedicated it to St. Peter. Ethelbert omitted nothing that might advance the glorious Cause of Christ, and encreasing in Piety, he dy'd in the Year 616, after he had been near twenty Years a Christian, twenty three chief Monarch of England, and fifty six King of Kent.

Ethelbert dies.

Christianity declines again.

Ethelbert was succeeded in his Kingdom by his Son Eadbald, who at first us'd his Endeavours to extinguish Christianity; not only relapsing to Paganism, but also that which Paganism was wont to abhor, marrying his Father's second Wife. This Wickedness soon discover'd what Multitudes, who for Fear or Countenance of the former King had profess'd Christianity, now returning as eagerly to their old Idolatry. Nor was this Apostacy confin'd to this Province, but soon spread it self over to the East-Saxons; occasion'd and promoted by the Death of their Christian King Sebert; whose three Sons not being in his Life Time brought to Baptism, now after his Decease establish'd the free Exercise of Idolatry; and not so satisfy'd, they set themselves to some open Profanation of the other Sacrament. Coming therefore into the Church where Melleus was administering, they in Scorn requir'd him to deliver to them unbaptiz'd the Consecrated Bread, as he had done to their Father; and upon Refusal, drove him him disgracefully out of their Dominions. Mellitus repair'd immediately to Kent, where finding Christianity in much the same Condition, with Justus Bishop of Rocheſter, left the Nation and paſſ'd over into France. But the Divine Vengeance ſoon overtook theſe impious Men; For Eadbald tormented with an evil Spirit, often fell into Fits of Diſtraction; and the Sons of Sebert, in a Battel againſt the West-Saxons periſh'd, with their whole Army. But Eadbald, within a Year, became penitent, by Means of an extraordinary Accident that Beda relates. When Laurence Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury was preparing to follow Justus and Mellitus into France, we are told that St. Peter, in whoſe Church he ſpent the Night before in Watching and Praying, appear'd to him, and to make the Viſion more ſenſible, gave him many Stripes for endeavouring to deſert his Flock: Which being ſhown to the King the next Morning, and the Cauſe of them related, Eadbald repented, in great Fear diſſolv'd his inceſtuous Marriage, and apply'd himſelf to the Chriſtian Faith more ſincerely than before, together with all his Subjects. But the Londoners refuſing again to receive their Biſhop Mellitus, this King had not ſo much Power as his Father to compel them to it; yet nevertheleſs he and his Nation endeavour'd wholly to ſubmit to the Divine Precepts, and built a new Church to the Honour of the bleſſed Virgin, which was conſecrated by Mellitus.

Lady Monarch.

Lady Edelburga, Daughter of the great Ethelbert; to whose Ambassadors her Brother Eadbald return'd Answer, That a Christian Virgin ought not to marry a Pagan. Edwin in Love with the Lady's Fame, insisted, That her Religion need not be any Impediment, since she and her Attendants should have the free Exercise of it; and further, if upon Examination he found it more excellent than his own, he himself would embrace it. These ingenuous Offers, opening so fair a Way to the Advancement of Truth, were readily accepted; and Paulinus a Roman, was consecrated Bishop of the Northumbers by Justus, and sent as a spiritual Guardian along with the Lady. Paulinus omitted no Occasion to plant the Gospel in those Parts, but with small Success, 'till the next Year this uncommon Accident made way for it: Quincelm, one of the West-Saxon Kings, jealous and envious of Edwin's Greatness, sent Eumerus a desperate Assassin to stab him; who, under Pretence of delivering a Message, with a poison'd Weapon struck at Edwin, whilst he was discoursing with him in his House, by the River Derwent in Yorshire; which being perceiv'd by Lilla, one of the King's Attendants, with a noble Loyalty he interpos'd his own Body to receive the Blow, through which also it reach'd the King's Person, with a dangerous Wound. The Murderer being now encompass'd with Swords, and made more desperate by his own Danger, slew another of the King's Servants in the same Manner. Paulinus improv'd this Opportunity, and at length obtain'd this Promise from him, That if Christ, whom he so magnify'd, would grant him his Recovery, and Victory over his Enemies who had thus basely assaulted him, he would then become a Christian; as a Pledge of which he order'd his young Daughter Eanfled to be bred up in that Religion, who with twelve others of his Family was baptis'd on Whitsunday. Being well recover'd of his Wound, to punish the Authors of so dishonourable an Action, he march'd against the West-Saxons; whom he subdu'd, put some to Death, pardon'd others, and return'd home Victorious.

From this Time King Edwin forsook his Idols; yet ventur'd not rashly on ^{Beda.} Baptism, but still consulted with himself and others, who were Men of the greatest Wisdom; tho' Boniface the Pope, by large Letters of Exhortation both to him and his Queen, was not wanting to quicken his Belief. But while he was long delaying and deferring to compleat his Christianity, Paulinus by Revelation, as was believ'd, coming to the Knowledge of a Secret which strangely besel him in the Time of his Troubles, on a certain Day went in boldly to him, and laying his right Hand on the Head of the King, ask'd him, If he remember'd what that Sign meant. The King trembling, with great Astonishment fell at his Feet: Behold, said Paulinus, raising him from the Ground, God has deliver'd you from your Enemies, and given you what you request-ed; perform now what you long since promis'd him, to receive his Doctrine, which if you do, he shall to your temporal Grandeur add eternal Felicity. Edwin being much mov'd, immediately consulted his great Men, and propounded the Reasons to them, that naturally might induce them to embrace Christianity; to which they with no great Difficulty comply'd, and first of all Coifi his chief Pagan Priest, who also offer'd himself to destroy the Altars and Temples of their Gods, which he immediately effected, making some Amends for his teaching Men to adore them. Then Edwin, with the chief Nobility of his Nation, and many of the common People, in the eleventh Year of his Reign, were baptiz'd; after which vast Numbers of the Vulgar daily flock'd in to be instructed in the Christian Religion, and to be baptiz'd, the next Rivers serving instead of Fonts, which at that Time were wanting, nor were then scarce any Churches built, unless one small one at Tork, which Edwin caus'd to be erected of Wood, for the Solemnity of his own Baptism, where he fix'd Paulinus's Episcopal See, in the Year 627.

Blecca the Governor of Lincoln, with his Family, and most of that great City : In which he built a Church of Stone of curious Workmanship, whose Roof being fallen down, either by Neglect, or hostile Incursions, the Walls were only standing in Beda's Time. Edwin also seeking every way to propagate the Faith which with so much Deliberation he had receiv'd, perswaded Eorpwald, King of the East-Angles, and Son of his Friend Redwald, to embrace the same Belief; who under Edwin retain'd only the Name of a King. But Eorpwald did not long survive his Conversion, being slain in Battel by Ricbert a Pagan; whereby the People having lightly follow'd the Religion of their King, as lightly relaps'd to their old Superstition, for above three Years after. Edwin in the mean Time, to his Faith adding Virtue, by the due Administration of Justice, brought such a Peace and Security over all his Territories, that Beda tells us, in his Reign a Woman with a Child in her Hand might have safely travell'd from Sea to Sea. His Care extended to Fountains near the High-ways, where he caus'd drinking Vessels of Brass to be set upon Posts, for the Refreshment of Travellers, which none either out of Love or Fear would presume to remove; and not unmindful of Regal State, either in Peace or War, he had a Royal Banner, which the Romans call'd Tufa, constantly carry'd before him. But his Glory declin'd on a sudden, after he had reign'd with great Honour and Reputation, being at length slain in Battel with his Son Osfrid, at a Place call'd Hethfeild, now Hatfeild in Yorkshire, and his whole Army routed, by Cadwallon King of the Britains, and Penda the Mercian, who rebelled against him. This happen'd in the Year 633, in the sixth Year of his Christianity, the ninth of his Monarchy, and the seventeenth of his Reign; his Head being carry'd to York, was there deposited in the Church of St. Peter, which he himself had began to build with Stone.

His Death.

This Overthrow prov'd pernicious both to the Church and State of the Northumbrians; for Penda being a Heathen, and the British King of a barbarous Disposition, no Cruelties were omitted in the Slaughter of either Sex or Age; Cadwallon threatening to extirpate the whole Nation, tho' then made Christian. For Beda tells us, that even to his Days, the Britains accounted Saxon Christianity no better than Paganism, and held as little Communion with the one as the other. In these calamitous Times Paulinus was constrain'd to fly with Queen Ethelburga and her Children to Eadbald King of Kent, who kindly receiv'd them, and made Paulinus Bishop of Rocheſter, where he ended his Days. And now the Kingdom of Northumberland became divided as formerly, Osric seizing Deira, and Eanfrid taking Bernicia; both of whom from Christians became suddenly Pagans. But being overtaken by God's Vengeance, neither their Lives nor this Division lasted long; for Cadwallon and Penda, in the first Year of their Reign, found Means to cut off the one in Battel, and the other by Treachery. Cadwallon now ranging at pleasure through both the Provinces, was at length met by the pious Oswald, Brother to Eanfrid, who with a small Christian Army, unexpectedly charg'd him, and destroy'd both him and his suppos'd invincible Forces, by a little River near the ancient Picts Wall, the Place being afterwards call'd Heav'n-feild, from a Cross reported miraculous for Cures, which Oswald there erected before the Battel, in Token of his Faith against the great Numbers of his Enemies. Oswald being the Son of Ethelfrid, by the Sister of Edwin, easily reduc'd both Kingdoms of Northumberland as before into one; nor did he lose any Part of Edwin's Dominions, but rather enlarg'd them over several Nations; so that he became the next chief Monarch of the English.

This Prince obtaining the Kingdom, took particular Care to instruct his People in Christianity; sending to the Scots, among whom he had been baptiz'd, he desir'd some faithful Teacher, who might restore Religion in his Dominions, which the late Troubles had much impair'd; and they, ready to assist, sent Adian a Monk and Bishop of singular Zeal and Humility, with several others, others, whom at their own Desire he seated at Lindesfarne, now Holy Island. Beda says much of the Devotion, Meekness and Charity of this Prince; that he disdain'd not to be the Interpreter of Aidan, while in Scotch or bad English he preach'd to his Nobles and Servants; and that he had the Poor continually serv'd at his Gate: Particularly at a Festival, he not only sent them his best Meats in a Silver Charger, but also order'd the Charger to be broken in Pieces and divided amongst them; which caus'd Bishop Aidan to take him by the right Hand, and to pray that That Hand might never corrupt. In the second Year of his Reign, the West-Saxons, by the Preaching of Berinus, a Bishop whom Pope Honorius had sent, were converted to the Faith with Cynegils their King; whom Oswald receiv'd out of the Font, and his Daughter in Marriage. The following Year the East-Angles were recover'd to Christianity, which for some Years past had been thrown off. But Sigebert, the Brother of Eorpwald, a most learned and pious Man, who had been taught the Christian Religion during his Exile in France, now succeeding in this Kingdom, he instructed his People in the Faith by the Preaching and Labours of Fælix a Burgundian Bishop, who fixt his See at Domoc, or Dunwich in Suffolk. In a few Years after, with the Assistance of some Teachers out of Kent, he erected a famous School, which is generally thought to be the University of Cambridge then first founded. In the Year 640, Eadbald was succeeded by his Son Ercombert in Kent, who was the first of the English Kings who commanded the destroying of Idols in all his Dominions, and the first who establish'd the Observation of Lent by an human Law and Penalty. In the mean Time Oswald, having happily reign'd eight Years, and worthy of a longer Life, met with the same Fate with Edwin, and by the same Hand; being in a great Battel defeated and slain by Penda King of Mercia, at a Place call'd Maserfield, now Oswestree in Shropshire, which as Beda tells us was noted for Miracles after his Death.

Upon the Death of Oswald, the Kingdom of Northumberland again became divided for six or seven Years; Oswy gaining Bernicia, and Oswin obtaining Deira. The former was an illegitimate Offspring, and half-Brother to Oswald, who in a few Years became the next chief Monarch of the English. But the former Part of his Reign was extreamly disturb'd by Penda King of Mercia, by the Rebellions of his natural Son Alkfrid, and by the Oppositions of Ethelwald the Son of Oswald; but most of all by the virtuous Government of Oswin of Deira, whose pious Zeal, Moderation, and princely Qualities did much eclipse his Actions, and lessen the Love and Esteem of his own Subjects. Beda speaks much of the remarkable Piety and Humility of Oswin; but his Virtues were so far from protecting him, that they gave Occasion to Oswy in the seventh Year of his Reign, to begin a fatal War with him. Oswin finding himself much exceeded in Numbers, thought it more Prudence, by dismissing his Army, to reserve himself for some better Opportunity. But committing his Person, with one faithful Attendant to the Loyalty of Earl Hunwald, his suppos'd Friend, he was by him treacherously deliver'd up, and slain by the Command of Oswy; whose Death in twelve Days was succeeded by that of the pious Bishop Aidan, who dy'd of Grief for the Loss of so excellent a Prince. This Fact of Oswy was so detestable to all, and became so afflictive to himself, that to expiate the Offence, a Monastery was founded upon the Place; as many the like foundations were laid, whose Stones were thus cemented with Blood.

Oswy, upon the Death of Oswin, united both Kingdoms again, and as his Greatness increas'd, so did his Virtues and good Actions begin to show themselves. And now Peada the Son of Penda, whose Father had made him King of a Part of his Dominions, was by Oswy's Means converted to Christianity, with his Subject. For coming to Oswy to desire his Daughter Alfreda in Marriage, he would not consent but upon Condition, that he and all his People should embrace the Christian Faith. Therefore hark'ning to what was preach'd to him of eternal Life, and being persuaded by Alfrid the King's Son, who had marry'd his Sister Kyniburg, he readily agreed to turn Christian, whether he obtain'd the Lady or not; and was baptiz'd with all his Followers. Upon his Return, he took with him four Presbyters to teach the People of his Province, who by their Care and Vigilance won great Numbers: Nor did Penda, tho' himself a Pagan, prohibit any in his Kingdom to hear or believe the Gospel, but hated and despis'd all those whose Works were not answerable to their Faith; condemning them for miserable and mean Wretches, who obey'd not that God in whom they chose to believe. About this Time, the East-Saxons, who had formerly expell'd their Bishop Mellitus, and renounc'd their Faith, were by the Means of Oswy thus reconverted. Sigebert the second, coming to visit Oswy, his great Friend, was by him at several Times strenuously dissuaded from Idolatry, and being at length convinc'd, forsook it, and was baptiz'd. On his Return home, he took with him Kedda a laborious Preacher, afterwards made Bishop; by whose Teaching, and the Assistance of others, the People were again recover'd from their Infidelity. This good Prince was afterwards murder'd by the Conspiracy of two Earls near him, who being demanded what mov'd them to a Crime so heinous, return'd this barbarous Answer, That it was because he was so gentle to his Enemies, as to forgive them their Injuries, as often as they besought him. But the Occasion of his Death is much more remarkable; for one of these Brothers who slew him, being for unlawful Wedlock so excommunicated by the Bishop, that no Man might presume to enter into his House; the King not regarding the Church's Censure, upon an Invitation went to feast at his House, whom the Bishop meeting in his Return, tho' penitent and fallen at his Feet, he pronounc'd this Sentence: Because thou hast not abstain'd from the House of this excommunicated Man, in that House thou shalt die; which happen'd not long after, God bearing Witness to his Minister, in the due Power of Church Discipline when spiritually executed on Contemners.

Oswy having reign'd about twelve Years, had now the good Fortune to ruin his chief Enemy Penda, after he had endur'd many Ravages and Devastations from him, and in vain offer'd large Gifts and Presents to purchase his Friendship. Finding himself too weak for human Relief, he turn'd his Gifts into Vows for the Divine Assistance; and according to the usual Zeal of those Times, he devoted his Infant Daughter to perpetual Virginity, and certain large Portions of Lands for the building and endowing of Monasteries. His Vows, as may be conceiv'd, produc'd greater Effects than his Treaties; for hereupon, he with his Son Alfred, gathering a small Army, at Leeds in Yorkshire, engag'd and defeated the whole Body of the Mercians, tho' they were thirty Times more in Number, and led on by experienc'd Commanders. The unexpected Retreat of Ethelwald the Son of Oswald, who join'd with the Mercians, much contributed to this extraordinary Victory; which was attended with the Death of Penda himself, Eihelhere King of the East-Angles, and many other Commanders, who were drown'd in a River call'd Winred. The Fall of cruel Penda, who had been the Death of four or five Christian Kings, caus'd a general Rejoycing, and also brought Oswy to the Height of his Power, who in three Years subdu'd the whole Kingdom of Mercia, and the greatest Part of the Picts in the North. In the Time of his Prosperity, and the Year 664, a Synod of Scotch and English Bishops, in the Presence of him and his Son Alfred, was held at a Monastery in the North, concerning the Time about celebrating Easter; a Controversie which had long before disturb'd the Greek and Latin Churches; wherein the Scots not agreeing with the Customs of Rome, nor yielding to the Disputants on that Side to whom the King was most inclin'd, such as were Bishops here resign'd, and return'd home with their Disciples. Not long after, by Means of Theodore, a learned Monk of Greece, whom the Pope had made Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, under Egbert King of Kent, the Greek and Latin Tongues, with all the Liberal Arts and Sciences, began first to flourish among the Saxons, and daily encreas'd under potent and religious Kings, 'till the Days of Beda, as he himself informs us. And now Oswey having granted Part of Mercia to his Son-in-Law Peadar, and he being slain by Treachery, he was oppos'd by Wulfer, who freed the Country from his Subjection. And thus Oswey ended his Days in Troubles as he began in Wars, after a Reign of twenty eight Years; when falling sick, he was so struck with Remorse for the Blood of Oswin, and of others that he had shed, that he vow'd a Pilgrimage to Rome, in which Place he thought to have laid his Bones: But Death soon put an End to his Designs, and in the Year 670 remov'd him, and the Seat of the chief Monarchy of England from his Dominions.

IV. Upon the Death of Oswey, the chief Monarchy of England, which had continu'd forty six Years in the North, began to remove Southwards, and to fix it self in the Kingdom of Mercia, where it was preserv'd for above an hundred and thirty Years. Wulfer King of Mercia was the first Monarch of this Nature, who in the Life of King Oswey freed himself from his Power, and after his Death became Chief of the English Nation; tho' more in Name than in Reality. For his Reign was not only short, but in a little Time after Oswey's Death, he lost the Island of Linassey to Egfrid King of Northumberland. Yet three Years after he warr'd against the West-Saxons with greater Success, triumphantly pass'd through their Country, and gain'd the Isle of Wight from King Renwald; which Island he gave to Edilwach King of the South-Saxons, who being then baptiz'd, Wulfer became his God-Father. Wulfer himself had not long before been a zealous and cruel Pagan; but now becoming Christian, he destroy'd the Worship of Idols throughout his Dominions, and caus'd the Gospel to be preach'd in all Parts of his Kingdom: Notwithstanding he is tax'd by M. Imsbury with the scandalous Sin of Simony, in selling to Wina, the depriv'd Bishop of Winchester, the Bishoprick of London. In this Reign, and about this Time, Christianity being generally establisht, many considerable Monasteries were founded, and Kings and Queens began to take upon them the Habits of the Religious, and frequently to withdraw from their Thrones to the Monkish Cells. And now Wulfer having reign'd above four Years since the Decease of Oswey, and about seventeen in all, he dy'd, and left his Body to be bury'd in the Monastery of Peterborough, which had been his and his Brother's Foundation.

Egfrid of Mercia chief Monarch.

Wulfer was succeeded by his Brother Ethelred, the third Son of King Pend; who enter'd upon the Kingdom by the Consent of young Kenred his Nephew, who was next Heir to the Crown. This Prince in a short Time not only regain'd Lindsey, and all that Wulfer had lost to Egfrid of Northumberland, but found himself powerful enough to extend his Arms a contrary Way, against Lothar King of Kent whose Country he wasted without respect to Churches or Religious Houses; particularly Rocheſter was plunder'd, and its Bishop Putta driven to such Extremities, that in his old Age he was oblig'd to teach Arts and Musick in Mercia, to preserve himself from Want. Not long after, the South-Saxons, whose King had been baptiz'd in Wulfer's Reign, were all converted to the Christian Faith, by Means of Bishop Wilfrid, who had been depriv'd, and driven from Northumberland by King Egfrid. And now Christianity having been receiv'd by all the English-Saxons, King Ethelred, by the Advice and Consent of Theodore Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, divided the whole Kingdom of Mercia the largest in the whole Nation, into five Dioceses, namely Hereford, Worcester, Lichfield, Leicester, and Cirenceſter; all which were completed in the Year 679. In the following Year, at the Command of Ethelred, and three other Kings, viz. Egfrid of Northumberland, Alfred of the East Angles, and Lothar of Kent, Arch-Bishop Theodore summoned a Council at Hastard in Warfordſhire, in which were receiv'd the Canons of the General Councils, as Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, Calcedon, and another of Constantinople.

Constantinople, with those Constitutions made at Rome by the Synod held under Pope Martin, in the Year 648, which Pope Agatho this Year sent into England. And at the same Time, John the Præcentor or chief Chantor of St. Peter's at Rome, brought over hither the yearly Order and Course of Singings and Readings, as was practis'd there. Ethelred had a long and peaceable Reign, and as his Power encreas'd, that of Egfrid declin'd, who in the Year 685 rashly leading his Army to destroy the Province of the Picts, under his Subjection, he and all his Forces were cut in pieces. From which Time, says Beda, military Valour decay'd in that Kingdom, and not only the Picts, 'till then in a peaceable Condition, but also many of the old Britains recover'd their Liberty for many Years after. In the latter End of King Ethelred's Reign, Ostred his Queen was kill'd by her own Nobles, call'd Southimbrians; but both the Cause and Consequence of this strange Fact is unknown to us. About this Time Ina King of the West-Saxons publish'd his Laws, which are the first that remain to us entire, and were both Ecclesiastical and Civil; by which it appears, that Theft, Murder, and other heinous Crimes, were then redeemable by pecuniary Mulcts. And now at length King Ethelred being stricken with Remorse, for his destroying Religious Places in the Beginning of his Reign, to make amends, he founded the famous Monastery of Bardney in Lincolnshire; into which he retir'd himself, became a Monk, and lastly dy'd Abbot of the Place, after he had reign'd about thirty Years.

Beda. An.

Ethelred upon his Resignation pass'd by his Son Ceolred, and appointed Kenred, the Son of his Brother Wulfer, for his Successor, who was the nearest Heir to the Crown. Of which Prince we know but little, only that he had the Repute of being the chief Monarch of the English, and that after four Years peaceable Government, being desirous of Contemplation, according to the Example of his Uncle Ethelred, he sought a more private and religious Life: And accordingly having appointed his Cosen Ceolred to rule in his Place, he relinquish'd both his Kingdom and Country; and having concerted Matters with Osfa, King of the East-Saxons, a Prince of uncommon Zeal and Piety, he with him and Edwin Bishop of Worcester, travell'd to Rome; where both these Kings were made Monks in the Time of Pope Constantine the First, and in a Monastery of that City spent the rest of their Lives. Such was the accustomed Fervour of those Times; when a Monk's Habit was accounted the greatest Badge of Humility, and a religious Solitude the main Step to Eternity. Ceolred succeeded with the Applause of the People, and reign'd for a few Years in great Peace and Prosperity: But his Quiet was at last disturb'd by the growing Power of Ina, King of the West-Saxons; who having gain'd great Advantages over the Britains, and constrain'd Kent to purchase Peace by a Sum of Money, turn'd his Forces against Mercia. Accordingly a sharp and doubtful Battel was fought between these Rivals Ceolred and Ina, at Wodensburgh in Wiltshire, in the Year 715. The Success of this Battel is uncertain; and the following Year, and the seventh of his Reign, Ceolred feasting with his Nobles, was suddenly possess'd with an Evil Spirit, and expir'd in Despair, as Boniface Archbishop of Mentz, an English-Man, who taxes him for a Defiler of Nuns, writes by Way of Caution to his Successor.

Upon the Death of Ceolred, Ethelbald his Cosen, once remov'd, succeeded him in his Kingdom. This Prince had a very long, and for the most part a peaceable Reign; which he began with the Foundation of the celebrated Monastery of Croyland, now Crowland in Lincolnshire, in Honour of St. Guthlac the famous Anchoret, who is said to have clear'd that Place of Demons and evil Spirits. The former Part of this Reign was in a great measure rivall'd by Ina King of the West-Saxons, who not only worsted the East-Angles in several Encounters, but in the Year 725 also intirely ruin'd the Kingdom of the South-Saxons, slew Aldwin their King, and added all the Dominions to the West-Saxon Kingdom: So that the Saxon Heptarchy was now reduc'd to six Kingdoms.

doms. This Prince is said to have been the first who laid a Tax of a Penny a House to be paid to the Pope, which was afterwards call'd Peter-Pence. And not long after, whether to expiate the Effusion of so much Blood, or to comply with the Genius of the Times, at the Persuasion of his Queen Ethelburga, he resign'd his Kingdom, and ended his Days in a Monastery at Rome. After whose Death, Ethelbald of Mercia commanded all the Provinces on this Side Humber, with their Kings. The Picts were now in League with the English, the Scots peaceable within their Limits, and the Britains were partly under their own Government, and partly under the English. In which peaceful State of the Land, many in Northumberland, both of the Nobility and Commons, laying aside the Exercise of Arms, betook themselves to Monasteries; and many others, both of the Clergy and Laity, Men and Women, hastning to Rome in Companies, thought themselves no ways secure of eternal Life, 'till they were cloister'd there. These Retirements of the best of the People afterwards prov'd a fatal Weak'ning of the Nation; and with this State of the Land the learned and celebrated Beda finish'd his History, about the Year 731.

V. From this Time forwards, and for many Years, we have a more imperfect Account than ever of the Affairs of this Nation; and not long after the finishing his History, Beda dy'd at his Monastery in Northumberland, whose great Piety, as well as Learning, justly obtain'd for him the Title of Venerable Beda. After whose Decease, as Malmsbury observes, all Knowledge of publick Transactions were for a long Time almost lost, since none prov'd an Emulator of his Studies, nor a Follower of his Learning; so that to a sloathful Generation, one more sloathful succeeding, the Love of Learning became cold in this whole Island. In the mean Time Ethelbald reign'd chief Monarch of the English; and his Power was much strengthen'd and confirm'd by his taking Somerton from the West-Saxons, and afterwards much Spoil and Plunder from the Northumbrians. And moreover about the Year 747, he became Master of London, and in effect brought the East-Saxon Kingdom to a Period; so that the Heptarchy was now reduc'd to five Kingdoms. Under this Prince were held two Councils at Cloveshoe in Kent, one in the Year 742, and the other in 747; at both which Ethelbald himself was present. The first was principally to confirm King Withred's Acts concerning the Monasteries in Kent, according to the Directions of Cuthbert Arch-Bishop of Canterbury. The second was at the Instance of Pope Zachary, who by his Epistles severely admonish'd the Saxons of all Sorts, from the Highest to the Lowest, to forsake their wicked and scandalous Actions. Here several Canons were made concerning the Pastoral Charge, and many Provisions against the Inordinacy, extravagant Habits, Incontinency, Luxury, and irregular Lives, of the Clergy, Monks and Nuns, as well as the Laity. The reigning Vices of these Times, as Fornication, Adultery, Murder, Drunkenness, Perjury, &c. were only punish'd with longer or shorter Penances, of Days, Weeks, Months or Years; but what these Penances were, we do not find. These Times were now become loose and luxurious; and Kelwulf King of Northumberland, retiring from his Throne to the Monastery of Lindesfarne, brought those Monks from the Use of Milk and Water to Wine and Ale. But Ethelbald proceeded to greater Irregularities, and contemning Marriage, gave himself all the Freedom of unlawful Enjoyments, making no Difference between Places and Persons, Nuns and other Women; and by his fatal Example the Nobility and People were infected with an universal Viciousness and Luxury. Which being related to Boniface the Pope's Legate then in Germany, he severely reprov'd Ethelbald by an Epistle, which had so good an Effect upon him, that he repented of his former Life, and endeavour'd to make Satisfaction by many charitable Works, and several large Immunities which he granted to the Church and Monasteries. At length, after a Reign of above forty Years, fighting against the West-Saxons in a War not prudently undertaken, he was traiterously slain by his own Subjects, at the Instigation of Beornred, who likewise endeavour'd to step into the Throne, but was himself slain by Osfa the Mercian, before he could compleat his Designs. His Death was accompany'd with the Deprivation of Sigebert, King of the West-Saxons, who for his Cruelty and Injustice was solemnly depos'd from his Kingdom, by the Authority of the grand Council of the same; which is the first Example of that Nature that we have in our English History.

Beornred the Usurper being slain, Osfa Cosen to King Ethelbald succeeded in the Kingdom; being the eleventh King of the Mercians, and the most valiant and powerful of all the English Saxons, so that no Attempts seem'd too high for his Undertaking. The neighbouring Kings foreseeing his ambitious Aims, solicited the Alliance of Charles the Great, King of France, whose Interest could no ways prevail upon Osfa to cause him to desist from his Designs. The first that felt his Fury were the Kentish Men, under Alric their King, whose Overthrow was the less dishonourable, says Malmsbury, because they were vanquish'd by so great a Monarch. The Place was Ottanford, where their King was slain by Osfa's own Hand, their Forces dispers'd, and all their Country wasted by the Mercians. This happen'd about the eighteenth Year of his Reign, when turning his Forces against Kencwulf King of the West-Saxons, who had assisted his Enemies, he overthrew him at Bensington in Oxfordshire, and took the Town. But not long after, in the Year 776, all the Britains, both of North and South-Wales, gather'd themselves together, and invading the Kingdom of Mercia, made terrible Devastations in many Parts of the Country, wasting all with Fire and Sword. Whereupon King Osfa was constrain'd to make a Peace with the other Saxon Kings, and turn all his Forces against the Welsh-Men; who being unable to resist so great a Power, were oblig'd to abandon all the plain Country between the River Wye and Severn, and retire to the Mountainous Parts. Upon which Advantage, Osfa immediately seiz'd on all the plain Country, planted it with Saxon Inhabitants, annex'd it to his own Kingdom, and caus'd a famous Ditch or Intrenchment to be made from Sea to Sea, between his Kingdom and Wales, by which he might the better defend his Country from future Incursions; which Ditch is seen at this Day in divers Places, and is call'd in Welsh, Clawdd Osfa, that is Osfa's Ditch.

Lichfield made an Archbishoprick.

After this Osfa reign'd many Years in great Splendor, and for the most part in Peace, having Trumpets sounded before him when he travell'd or appear'd in publick. And as a Mark of his Grandeur, he procur'd Lichfield to be made an Archbithopruck, over all the Bishops in Mercia and East-England; and because Jambert Arch-Bishop of Canterbury oppos'd him, he bereav'd that Archbithopruck of all its Lands that lay in the Mercian Territories: In which State it continu'd all his Reign. He call'd also a Synod or Council at Calcuith, where among several Canons, Tythes were first order'd to be paid in England, and also declar'd to be by Divine Right. Not long after, Charles the Great, who now held an amicable Correspondence with Osfa, sent a certain Book of Synodical Decrees into England, as Simeon of Durham relates; in which also, as our Author complains, were found many inconvenient Things, and contrary to the true Faith: For, adds he, it had been decreed in a Council at Constantinople, by more than three hundred Bishops, that Images ought to be ador'd, which the Church of God does abominate. Against which Imposition Albinus, or Alcum, the most learned Man of the Nation, wrote an Epistle, and presented that with the Synodical Book to the King of France, in the Name and Person of all the Bishops and chief Men of the English Nation.

About the thirtieth Year of the Reign of King Osfa, and third of Birhtric the West-Saxon, birth was given to new and great Calamities in the Island. For in the West arriv'd three Ships of Danes or Norwegians, by Chance, or for Pillage; who upon their Landing being commanded to come to Dorchester, and give an account of their Lading at the King's Custom-House, they slew the Officer and all that came with him, as an Earnest of the numerous Slaughters, Rapines and Hostilities, which they return'd not long after to commit over all the Island. Three or four Years after these Pagans landed in the North, and plunder'd the great Monastery of Lindesfarne, kill'd many of the Friars, took others Prisoners, sparing neither Clergy nor Laity. These were the first Danish Ships that infested the English Nation; where it is observable, That the same People who were first call'd Normans in the Saxon Annals, are there also nam'd Danes in other Places; which shews, that the Danes and Normans were then accounted to be one and the same People. In the mean Time King Osfa maintain'd his Power, and kept up his Ambition, shewing as little Faith as Mercy: For Ethelbert, King of the East-Angles, coming to his Court, to obtain his Daughter in Marriage, was by the Instigation of his Queen Quendriht treacherously murder'd, and all his Dominions seiz'd and added to the Kingdom of Mercia, in the Year 792. So that now the Saxon Heptarchy was reduc'd to four Kingdoms, viz. Mercia, West-Saxony, Northumberland and Kent; that of the South-Saxons being swallow'd up by the West-Saxons, and those of the East-Saxons and East-Angles by the Mercians. At the same Time the Kingdoms of Northumberland and Kent were in a declining Condition. In the former, Eadbert, an excellent Governor, contrary to the Advice of the neighbouring Princes, and his best Friends, follow'd his Predecessor Kelwulf's Steps, and retir'd to a Monastery. His Son Oswulf was slain by the Treachery of his own Servants: Ethelwold the next King was assassinated by Alfred his Successor, who after eight Years Reign was formally depos'd by his Subjects: Ethelred the next, in four Years Time fled his Country; Alfwold his Successor was slain by a Conspiracy, and Osred in a Year's Time depriv'd by the State: Which frequent and violent Changes brought the Kingdom to a very tottering Condition. As to the Kingdom of Kent, in the Year 793, the Death of Alric, the fourteenth King, put an End to the Race of Hengist; from which Time whoever was advanc'd by Wealth or Faction took upon him the Title of King of that Province.

Rome.

And now Osfa having reign'd with mighty Authority about thirty seven Years, with great Devotion repair'd to Rome, where with the like Zeal of Ina the West-Saxon, he made his Kingdom subject to a Tribute then call'd Peter-Pence and Romscot. Besides which, he made rich Presents to Pope Hadrian for Canonizing St. Alban, the first British Martyr; in Honour of whom, and by way of Penance, he founded a magnificent Monastery near Verulamium, and endow'd it with large Revenues. Also as a Testimony of his Repentance for his great Effusion of Blood, at his Return to his Kingdom, he gave the tenth Part of all his Goods to the Church and Poor; he built another Monastery at Bath, and the Cathedral Church of Hereford, with another Church at Warwick, where the adjoining Town from that and him bears the Name of Off-Church. He did not long survive these Charities, but in Year 794 dy'd in Peace at Osf-ley; and with great Solemnity his Body was interr'd near Bedford, in a Chappel upon the Banks of the Ouse, after a triumphant Reign of about thirty nine Years.

Osfa was succeeded in his Kingdom by his Son Egferth, who being a Prince of great Worth, had been crown'd King in his Father's Time, nine Years before; and after his Death, he restor'd to the Church whatever had been violently taken from it; but this hopeful Prince reign'd but a few Months before he dy'd, and left the Crown to Kenwulf, the next of the Royal Line; who by his excellent Behaviour both in Peace and War sufficiently shew'd that he deserv'd it. In the second Year of his Reign, in a War against Eadbert King of Kent, he not only gave him a total Overthrow, but also took him Prisoner, to the great Dishonour of all his Subjects, and gave his Kingdom to Cuthred. Two Years after, at the Dedication of a magnificent Church built by him at Winchcombe in Glostershire, Kenwulf in the Presence of Cuthred, thirteen Bishops, ten Dukes, many noble Men, and a great Concourse of People, led Eadbert the

VI. The chief Monarchy of England had continu'd about an hundred and thirty Years among the Mercians; but now in the End of the eighth Century, it began to remove from thence to the West-Saxons, and in a few Years became a more real and compleat Monarchy than ever before. The Year 800 made way for great Alterations in this Island, gradually uniting the seven Kingdoms into one, by means of Egbert the famous West-Saxon, who was the only Survivor of the Royal Line of that Kingdom, being descended from Inegild the Brother of King Ina. Having a noble Education, he began early in his Youth to give signal Hopes of more than common Worth and Abilities; which being apprehended by King Birchric, and withal his juster Title to the Crown, he secretly sought his Life, so that at length Egbert was oblig'd to fly for Security to Osfa King of Mercia. But he having marry'd his Daughter Eadburga to King Birchric, was easily prevail'd upon by his Ambassadors to deliver up the Refugee; so that Egbert was constrain'd to make his Escape, and take a new Flight into France, where he much improv'd his Abilities, and refin'd his Education, under the Reign of Charles the Great. At length Birchric met with the Reward of all his Injustice, by the means of his Wife Eadburga, who having prepared a Cup of poison'd Wine for one of his Favourites whom she hated, it accidentally prov'd the Death of the King himself. After whose Decease, Affer relates, That when this Queen, by reason of her wicked Actions, could live no longer among the English, she repair'd to France with all her Treasure, where she was kindly entertain'd by Charles the Great, and upon her making some rich Presents to that Emperor, he propos'd to her to chuse whom she would have for her Husband, Himself or his Son: But she imprudently nam'd his Son, as the younger Man; so that the Emperor with a Mixture of Mirth and Seriousness told Her, That if she had chosen Him, she should have had his Son, but now she was not to expect either. Nevertheless he assign'd her a rich Monastery, where she liv'd some Years as Abbess, but being detected of Incontinency, she was expell'd, and forc'd to wander with one Servant into Italy, where at Pavia she ended her wicked Life in great Poverty.

Birchric being dead without Issue, Egbert after three Years Retirement in France, was recall'd by the Nobility of the West-Saxon Kingdom, and acknowledged King with universal Satisfaction; where he reign'd with greater Glory and Renown, than any of the English-Saxon Kings before him. The former Part of his Reign was wisely employ'd in establishing his own Interest at Home, and in settling his Power and Sovereignty in the Love and Affection of his Subjects. And then finding his own Strength, he began to cast his Eyes upon his incroaching Neighbours; and the first Trial of his Martial Conduct was against the Britains, first making a Conquest of them that still inhabited Cornwall, and after that, in two Years more, he render'd those in Wales Tributaries to his Dominions. His Success and Progress was such, that his Neighbours were exceedingly startled, and apprehensive of his encreasing Power. Beornwulf King of Mercia was the first that actually concern'd himself, and thinking it a Matter of Glory by his Courage and Resolution to remove the Fears of others, was resolv'd to engage with this Conqueror; but meeting with him at a Place call'd Ellandune in Wiltshire, he was totally defeated, in the Year 823. Egbert elevated by this Success, and founding Hopes upon the same Grounds that his Neighbours had done their Fears, while the Fame of his late Success was fresh, he sent Ethelwulf his Son, Ealstan Bishop of Sherburn, and Wulfheard his General with a powerful Army into Kent, to conquer that Province, which

He is recall'd into England.

He conquers Cornwall and Wales.

Then Mercia.

Next Kent, which he accounted not difficult to perform, while the Inhabitants were both with the South and East-Saxons. enervated with Sloth, and disoblig'd at their King. They that were sent vigorously executed his Commands, and passing over all the Country, found their Work more easie than they imagin'd; for having driven out Baldred their King beyond the Thames, they subdu'd all Kent and Surry, with the Southern and Eastern Saxons. And also the same Year, the Inhabitants of East-England dreading and hating the Government of the Mercians, submitted themselves to his Vassallage and Protection.

A. D. 825. The East-Angles having submitted themselves to Egbert, never desisted 'till they had slain Beornwulf and Ludecun the Mercian Kings, who had been continual Disturbers of their Neighbours. Their Successor Witblaf was soon after expell'd his Kingdom by Egbert, but afterwards by the Mediation of Siward Abbot of Crowland, with whom he privately remain'd in that Monastery, was restor'd upon Condition of Subjection, and Payment of an annual Tribute. Still the Kingdom of Northumberland remain'd unconquer'd, which now of it self began to fall into Pieces; the Kings were so frequently slain by the People, that for thirty three Years none had the Courage to accept of the Crown; and many of the Nobility and Prelates fled from the Country, or retir'd into Monasteries. Which Weaknesses and Mismanagements gave a fair Opportunity to the Pagan Danes to enter this Kingdom, terribly wasting not only Cities and Towns, but more especially Churches and Religious Houses; the Lent before whose Arrival, we are told, That on the North Side of St. Peter's Church in York there was seen from the Roof to run Blood. The Causes of these Calamities, and the Ruin of this Kingdom, is attributed by the learned Alcwin who wrot in these Times, to the general Ignorance and Decay of Learning, which much increas'd after the Death of Beda; to their Neglect in educating Youth in the Knowledge of the Scriptures; and to the extravagant Apparel of their Priests and Nuns, discovering their loose and wanton Dispositions, of which many Examples were in Beda's Time. From whence Altars were defil'd with Perjuries, Cloysters violated with Adulteries, the Land polluted with the Blood of its Princes, and infected with the Dissentions of the People; and generally the same Vices reigning of which Gildas before had complain'd, and declar'd to have been the Ruin of the Britains. In this Condition Egbert, who had reduc'd all the South, and design'd a full Conquest of the Island, found them in the Year 827; upon whose Appearance they yielded without any Bloodshed, and gave Security to him for their quiet and obedient Deportment.

He puts an End to the Heptarchy.

A. D. 828. King Egbert having now with great Success subdu'd the HEPTARCHY, and reduc'd it to his own Power, he was solemnly crown'd King of all Britain at Winchester; and by an Edict or Proclamation commanded that the whole Heptarchy should hereafter be call'd Engleland or England, which in Latin was call'd Anglia from the Angles the most numerous and valiant of the three Nations which came over with Hengist; who possess'd, as was formerly observ'd, the Kingdoms of Northumberland, Mercia and East-England, the Jutes having only Kent and the Isle of Wight, and the Saxons East-Sex, South-Sex and West-Sex. Yet the Name of England was us'd long before this Time, tho' never by publick Edict, as appears from Beda and other Writers. Tho' Egbert was now supreme Monarch of England, and in a more absolute Manner than any before him, yet he was not sole King and Governor; for several of the petty Kings, tho' Tributaries, held their Titles for many Years, and some Successions of Kings after him; as Witblaf King of Mercia under himself, Bertulf under Ethelwulf his Son, Beorred King of Mercia, and Edmund King of the East-Angles under the same; and so they continu'd for above sixty Years 'till the Reign of Edward the Elder.

Which he calls ENGLAND.

Thus we have given a general View of the chief Transactions of the Saxon Heptarchy, collected from little else but a Heap of Rubbish, and from trifling, lame and confus'd Accounts; for which we are to beg the Reader's Favour, if he has been disappointed, or complains of Omissions, and the want of some Facts mention'd in other Writers. Both the Secular and Ecclesiastical Story of the Saxons are vastly defective. The former consists chiefly of Wars and Battels, by which we discern great Barbarity, Violence and Rapine; but for what Cause they were undertaken by what Councils they were directed and carry'd on, or what Reason or Equity there was for them, we can hardly so much as guess. Nor are the Battels themselves more artfully describ'd than the Combats of Wolves and Bears, or the Skirmishes of ravenous Birds in the Air. There were frequent Attempts among the petty Kings upon each others Dominions, and as frequent Rebellions of the great Men against them; and many Times, he whom Riches, Popularity or Faction advanc'd, took upon him the Title and State of a King. The Church Story is in a great Measure a confus'd Collection of Legends, Visions, Tales, and vulgar Reports, which pass'd for current in those ignorant and credulous Times. Yet out of these Clouds of Darkness, out of these Monkish and inconsistent Discourses, we may pick out many Things surprizing, and Matter sufficient for strange Admiration, if we take notice of the frequent Fastings, the fervent Prayers, the large and almost profuse Alms of those Times; what stately and magnificent Fabricks, Churches, Palaces, and Monasteries were built and founded in those Days; what plain and unlearned Zeal, what obedient, quiet and hearty Devotion then possess'd the Minds of the People, when in about two hundred Years Time, thirty Saxon Kings and Queens resign'd their Crowns with all the Glories of the World, and enter'd into a Religious Solitude.

he

I. BEING arriv'd at the End of the Saxon Heptarchy, we begin to pass from Darkness to Twilight; from a State of Confusion in Story, to some Degree of Order, and from the Transactions of a many-headed Government, to those of an united Monarchy, founded and erected by the Power of King Egbert. It might have been reasonably expected, that a wise and fortunate Prince, at the Head of such large Dominions, and so numerous a People as the English, after the Expulsion of the Picts and Scots into the Northern, and the Britains into the Western Corners of the Isle, should not only have enjoy'd the Fruits of Peace and Quiet, but left much Felicity as well as Greatness to many succeeding Generations. Yet such is the Uncertainty of Human Affairs, and the Weakness of the best Conjectures, That he who rul'd over all the English should have little Cause to rejoice in the Obedience of those of his own Blood; for he was scarcely establish'd in his united Throne, when both he and his Subjects were alarm'd by the Invasions of a formidable Enemy from from abroad, whose Fury and Violence extended not only to himself, but to his Successors for many Years. For about these Times a new Swarm of People, from the Northern Parts of Europe, under the Names of Danes and Normans, or Norwegians, began at first to infest the Seas, and at length the Lands of the Belgick, Gallick and British Shores, filling all Places with Slaughters, Spoils and Devastations. The Normans first over-run the Belgick Provinces upon the Mouth of the Rhine, and gave to those Parts next the Sea the new Names of Holland and Zealand. Afterwards they sail'd in vast Numbers into the Mouth of the Seyne, and with great Fierceness subdu'd that Northern Part of France, which ever since has been call'd by the Name of Normandy, and became the Seat of a great Norman Duke, and his Successors for several Generations. In the mean Time the Danes began their Inroads and furious Invasions upon the Coasts of England, with mighty Numbers, and with greater Fury and Pagan Barbarity than the Saxons before them; never giving this Island any long Respite for above 230 Years.

England.*

Egbert was now in the full Height of his Glory, and had enjoy'd his Con-<sup>Sax. A.
&c.</sup>quests but a few peaceful Years, when the Danes made their first Invasion in this Reign, which was in the Isle of Shepey in Kent, ravaging those Parts without any great Resistance. In the following Year they arriv'd in greater Numbers with thirty five Ships, and landed at Charmouth in Dorsetshire, where they were vigorously encounter'd by Egbert himself, and a severe Battel ensu'd; in which Herefrid and Wigferth two Bishops were slain, as also Dudda and Osmund, two Saxon Commanders. Egbert had the Advantage in the former Part of the Battel, yet towards Night he lost the Victory, tho' by the Help of it he retreated, and sav'd the Dishonour of an entire Defeat; which was the only Time that Fortune ceas'd to favour this Monarch's Undertakings. But two Years after, the Danes returning with a powerful Navy, and joining in League with the Cornish Britains, Egbert encounter'd all their Forces, gain'd a compleat Victory over them, and freed his Kingdom at that Time from the Invasion of these barbarous Enemies. At length after a mild and glorious Reign of thirty six Years and seven Months, he dy'd and was bury'd at Winchester, leaving his Son great Opportunities of establishing his Fame, and predicting his Felicity, in case what he had obtain'd by Industry, were not lost by Sloathfulness, to which this Nation had been too much addicted. He dy'd in the Year 836, after he had been near nine Years supreme Monarch of the English Nation.

2. ETHELWULF.

*King Ethelwulf divides

Upon the Decease of Egbert, his eldest Son Ethelwulf succeeded in all his<sup>Sax. A.
&c.</sup> Dominions, upon the fourth of February. This Prince had been formerly educated in the Monastery of Winchester, under the Tuition of Helmstan Bishop, and Swithune Dean of that Church, where he enter'd into Orders, and is said to have been both a Monk and Bishop of Winchester. But after his Father's Death, being urg'd by the Nobility and Clergy, and absolv'd from his Vows by Pope Gregory IV. he enter'd upon the Monarchy of England; yet still he retain'd much of the Monkish Temper, lov'd Ease and Solitude, and had small Inclinations to Ambition. Therefore resting satisfy'd with his paternal Kingdom of West-Saxony, he made over the Kingdoms of Kent, and of the South and East-Saxons, which had been his Father's Conquests, to a Brother, or perhaps a Son of his, called Athelstan, who for some Years retain'd those Dominions. He gave the Bishoprick of Winchester to his Tutor Swithune, to whom and Alstan Bishop of Sherburne, he left the Management of his principal Affairs.

The unwarlike Disposition of King Ethelwulf gave both Encouragement and<sup>Sax. A.
&c.</sup> an easy Entrance to the Pagan Danes, who in the Beginning of his Reign made several several Descents into England, and not like generous Conquerors, but devouring Caterpillers, barbarously wasted several Parts of the Nation at the same Instant; so that the Inhabitants were confounded, and at a loss how to make any Resistance. Many of these Northern Princes enter'd the Land at Southampton and Portsmouth; at the former Place with a Defeat, and at the latter with Victory; and not long after, at a Place call'd Mereswar, the English under the Command of Earl Herebert were routed, and the greatest Part of the Army destroy'd. The following Year they committed great Devastations in Lindsey, East-England and Kent; and embolden'd with these Successes, they march'd on as far as Canterbury, Rochester and London it self, with no less barbarous Hostilities. And giving no Respite to the peaceful Desires of Ethelwulf, the next Year they return'd with thirty five Ships, fought with the King at the River Carr, where they had encounter'd his Father, and made good their Ground. But in the ninth Year of this Reign, they met with a considerable Stop in the full Course of their outrageous Insults: For Earl Earnulf with the Men of Somersetshire, Alstan the Bishop, and Count Osfic with those of Dorsetshire, engaging them at the Mouth of the River Pedridan, slaughter'd them in great Numbers, and obtain'd a memorable Victory, which quell'd their Power for about six Years after.

The Danes waste England
in divers Places.

But in the fifteenth Year of this Reign, Mars was more predominant than ever, and Fortune kept the Scale on the King's Side: For the destroying Danes with two or three hundred Ships enter'd the Thames, landed in Kent, and took and pillag'd both Canterbury and London; and proceeding further they defeated Berthulf King of Mercia with his whole Army; then marching into Surry, they behav'd themselves as tho' they were able to withstand the whole Power of the English Nation. Here they were met by King Ethelwulf himself, and his Son Ethelbald, with all the West-Saxon Forces, at a Place call'd Aclea, now Oakley in Surrey; where after a long and sharp Contest, the Victory fell intirely to the English, with a vast Slaughter of these insolent Invaders. So that this was accounted a fortunate Year to England, and added to the King great Fame and Reputation. With the like Success his Brother Athelstan King of Kent encounter'd the Danes at Sandwich, where pursuing of them to the Sea, he took several of their Ships: And in Devonshire, Earl Ceorle at Winleshore so weaken'd their main Power, that in a kind of Despair they withdrew themselves into the Island of Thanet, where they continu'd all the Winter Season; and if Destiny had not withstood the English Nation, the Danes in human Probability might have been totally expell'd the Land. But the Saxons imagining themselves free from the common Enemy, renew'd their old Contests with the ever depressed Britains, against whom Burthred King of Mercia successfully obtain'd the Assistance of King Ethelwulf, whose Daughter Ethelswith he had obtain'd in Marriage; which for a while supported the Fame and Power of that valiant but unfortunate Prince.

They are several Times worsted by the English.

Ethelwulf, now enjoying Peace, sent his youngest Son Alfred, then but five Years of Age, with a large Retinue to Rome, whom Leo the Pope both consecrated to be King afterwards, and adoped to be his Episcopal Son. But this Peace lasted not long; for in the same Year the Danes landed afresh in Thanet, where Ealker with the Forces of Kent, and Hudda with those of Surry engag'd with them, and at first repell'd them; but the Slain and Drowned were at length so many on either Side, as left the Loss almost equal on both. In the next Year the Danes winter'd again in Shepey, and became more formidable than before. Insomuch that the King, Nobility and Clergy being extreemly alarm'd and affrighted at the Devastations of these Pagan Invaders, and judging these Calamities to be the Effects of their Sins and Corruptions, bethought themselves of a wholesom and uniform Remedy, as they term'd it, and a proper Security against their Enemies; which was an Act of the great Council or Parliament in those Days, since often called The Grant of King Ethelwulf, of the Tithe of the Profits of all Lands to the Church, free from all Burdens, Taxes and Exactions whatsoever. This Grant, by the Consent of the grand Council, was sign'd by all the Arch-Bishops, Bishops, Abbots, Abbesses, and Secular States of all England; and likewise by Burthred King of Mercia, and Edmund King of the East-Angles, then subject and tributary to King Ethelwulf. After this Grant was confirm'd and subscrib'd, Ethelwulf with great Solemnity offer'd it upon the Altar of St. Peter's in the Cathedral of Winchester, where the Parliament was held, and the Bishops caus'd it to be publish'd in every Church of their respective Dioceses and Districts.

A. D. 855. He takes a Journey to Rome. Having settled these Affairs at home, he took his beloved Son Alfred with him, and with great Devotion took a Journey to Rome, where he was honourably receiv'd and entertain'd for the Space of a whole Year; in which Time he rebuilt the English School that Osfa King of Mercia had founded in that City, which had been burnt down, and now bore the Name of Thomas the Holy. His Return from Rome was through France, and being a Widower, he there marry'd Judith the beautiful Daughter of Charles the Bald then Emperor, in honour of whom he ever plac'd her in a Chair of State, and gave her such Marks of Dignity as were contrary to the West-Saxon Law that had been made upon the Account of Etheburga's Crimes. His Absence and this Marriage gave Occasion to a dangerous Conspiracy in his own Nation, form'd and carry'd on by his eldest Son Ethelbald, Bishop Alstan his imagin'd Friend, and Enwulf Earl of Somerset, who us'd all possible Endeavours to deprive him of his Kingdom. This Insurrection was expected to produce nothing less than an unfortunate War: But Ethelwulf foreseeing the Dangers and Miseries of Civil Discord, out of his meer Clemency and great Condescension by the Assent of his Nobles, agreed to divide the whole Kingdom between Himself and his Son. Accordingly a Division was solemnly made, but with so much Artifice and Partiality, that the Western and best Parts were given to the Son, and the Eastern and worst left to the Father; which rais'd such an Indignation among many of the Nobility, that they offer'd the King their utmost Assistance for the Recovery of the whole; but he peacefully dissuaded them, resting satisfy'd with the Portion assign'd him. Two Years after, finding himself declining, he dispos'd of his Kingdom to his two Eldest Sons Ethelbald and Ethelbert, and his Hereditary Estate to his other Sons and Daughters. For the Advantage of his Soul, he order'd that in his Hereditary Lands, every tenth Hide or Mansion should maintain one poor Parson with Meat, Drink and Cloathing; and he commanded that three hundred Marks should be paid annually to Rome, for these Purposes, one hundred to buy Oyl for the Lamp in the Church of St. Peter, as much for Oyl in the Church of St. Paul, and the other hundred to the Pope himself.

His Death. Not long after he dy'd at a Place call'd Stamrige, upon the 13th Day of January, in the Year 857, and was bury'd at the Cathedral in Winchester, having reign'd twenty Years and five Months.

3. ETHELBALD.

A. D. 857. Ethelwald and Ethelbert succeed. II. Ethelwulf left four Sons behind him, Ethelbald, Ethelbert, Ethelred, and Alfred, who all successively ascended the Throne, and became Kings of England. Upon his Decease, his two eldest Sons divided their Father's Kingdom, according to his last Will and Testament; Ethelbald the Eldest succeeded him in West-Saxony, whilst his second Brother Ethelbert reign'd in Kent, as also over the East and South-Saxons. Notwithstanding this Division, Ethelbald has been always accounted supreme Monarch: But we have very little remaining of his Person and Actions. All that we find is, that he was a luxurious and peridious Prince; and being charm'd with the Beauty of his Step-Mother Judith, he marry'd her, contrary to the Laws of God and Man. But not long after, we are told, that by the Admonition of Swithun Bishop of Winchester, he repented of his Incest, put away his unlawful Wife, and observ'd all Things that the Bishop enjoin'd him. Having, without any other memorable Action, reign'd almost three Years, he dy'd on the twentieth Day of December, and the Year 860; being bury'd first at Sherburn the Cathedral in Dorsetshire, and afterwards remov'd to the Church at Salisbury. Ethelbald dies.

Upon the Decease of Ethelbald, his second Brother Ethelbert, who had been join'd with him in the Government, succeeded in the whole Monarchy of England, which he rul'd with great Peace and Concord at home. But from abroad he was soon molested by the destroying Danes, who with a powerful Navy landed at Southampton, and took and plunder'd the City of Winchester. But in their Return to their Ships, they were met by Osrick Earl of Southampton, and Ethelwulf of Barkshire, who put them to flight, and constrain'd them to abandon their Booty. Afterwards, taking a large Compass, they again enter'd the Isle of Thanet, and there took up their Winter Quarters. The Kentish Men being weary'd out with frequent Allarms, found themselves oblig'd to purchase their Peace by a Sum of Mony; but the Pirates under Pretence of receiving this Mony, and confirming the League, made an Excursion into the Country, and wasted all the Eastern Parts of Kent. Nevertheless the Inhabitants, by uniting all their Forces, expell'd these perfidious Wretches. About which Time King Ethelbert, after a worthy Reign of five Years, dy'd, much lamented by his Subjects, who honourably interr'd him at the Cathedral of Sherburn, by his Brother Ethelbald. A. After Landing. Ethelbert was succeeded in his Kingdom by his next Brother Ethelred, the third Son of Ethelwulf, whose Reign was more tempestuous than any before him, and was one continu'd Conflict with the Pagan Danes. In the Beginning of which a vast Army of these Ravagers, under the Conduct of Hinguar and Hubba, two valiant Brothers, invaded the Nation, landed in East-England, and there wintering made a Truce with the Inhabitants, only with Design to obtain from them a sufficient Number of Horses for their Men. Being well furnish'd for a long Expedition, in the following Year they pass'd over the Humber as far as Tork, where the Civil Dissentions of the Northumbrians afforded them great Incouragement and Advantage. For they had lately depos'd Osbert their King, and had chosen Ella the Head of another Faction in his Room; but being at length rous'd by the common Danger, both Parties united, made Head against the Danes, and prevail'd; but too rashly pursuing them into Tork, then but slenderly walled, the Northumbrians were terribly slaughter'd both within and without, their two Kings slain, and the City burnt. The Remainder of the People made the best Terms they could with the Enemy; yet notwithstanding they were over-run, and the Country ravag'd as far as the River Tine, and Egbert, one of the English Race, appointed King over them. Brompton gives us this particular Occasion of the Danes marching to Tork; That Bruern a Nobleman, whose Wife King Osbert had ravish'd, call'd in Hinguar and Hubba to revenge the Injury: A remarkable Example, if the Truth were as evident. Being thus victorious, the Danes in the following Year pass'd over into Mercia and winter'd at Nottingham; which so allarm'd Burhed the King of that Country, with his Noblemen, that they implor'd the Assistance of our King Ethelred, with young Alfred his Brother. readily agreed; and assembling their Forces, together with Edmund King of the East-Angles, they join'd the Mercians, and offer'd Battel to the Enemy; but the Danes apprehending the Hazard, kept themselves within the Town and Castle; 'till the Mercians, weary'd out with Delays, came to Articles of Truce with them. Upon which the Danes abandon'd the Place, and return'd back to York with great Booty, where they continu'd about a Year, practising great Severities and Cruelties.

tions in Lin-

Winter being past, the Danes soon broke their Truce, pass'd over Humber into Lindsey, and landing at Humberstone, miserably wasted all the Country; and particularly destroy'd the famous Monastery of Bardney, killing all the Monks in the Church without Mercy. Having continu'd in those Parts all the Summer, and consum'd all Things with Fire and Sword, about the Feast of St. Michael they enter'd Kesteren, another Part of Lincolnshire, and there committed the like Ravages and Barbarities. At length the valiant Count Algar drew together all the Youth of Hoyland, now Holland in the same County, with Wibert and Leofric two Knights, who march'd at the Head of them, together with a brave Body of two hundred Men belonging to Croyland Abby, who were led by one Toly, then a Monk. These taking with them about three hundred courageous Men from Deeping Langtoft and Baston, to whom also join'd Morchard Lord of Bourne, with his strong and numerous Family, and being met by Osgot Governor of Lincoln, an old Commander, with the Lincoln Squadron, upon the Feast of St. Maurice they resolutely engag'd the Pagan Destroyers, kill'd three of their Kings, great Numbers of the Soldiers, and pursu'd the rest to their Camp. From the Death and Burial of these three Kings, the Village before call'd Laundon, was afterwards call'd Trekingham, and now by Corruption Frekingham. But the Night following, Gothburn, Bafey, Osketil, Halfden and Hamond, all five Kings, and as many Earls, Hinguar, Hubba, Frena, Sidroc the Elder and Younger, coming in from several Parts with great Spoils and numerous Forces, the greatest Part of the Christians, terrify'd with their Power, retir'd in the Night. The rest having early in the Morning heard Divine Service, and receiv'd the Sacrament, resolv'd to die for their Religion and their Country, and march'd directly against their Enemies. Algar drew up his Forces to the best Advantage, leaving one Part to Friar Toly and Morcard of Bourne, another to Osgot of Lincoln, and headed a third himself; and finding them much inferior in Number to the Enemy, he form'd them into the Shape of a Wedge, against the Archers setting as it were a Palisado of their Bucklers, and against the Violence of the Horse a Wood of Lances; in which Posture they kept unbroken 'till Night approach'd. The Enemy perceiving that neither their Archers nor Horse could do Execution, counterfeited a Flight, which occasion'd the English to break their Ranks and pursue, contrary to the Orders of their Commanders, so that they were easily broken and dispers'd with great Slaughter. The brave and renowned Algar, with his Commanders and a few Soldiers, clustering together upon a Hill, long sustain'd the Brunt of the Pagan Army, and seeing the stoutest Christians dead, they continu'd valiantly fighting over their Bodies, 'till with many Wounds they expir'd. Only a few young Men of Sutton and Gedney, casting away their Arms escap'd to the adjoining Wood, from whence with much Difficulty they reach'd Croyland, and brought the sad News of the Overthrow, as the Monks were at their Vespers. Not long after the Danes plunder'd and burnt the rich Abby of Croyland, and massacred all the Monks; from whence they march'd to the Monastery of Medeshamsted or Peterborough, where they did the like; and thence with innumerable Ravages they pass'd on to Huntington, then to Grantebrig or Cambridge, and then to the Isle of Ely, where they pillag'd and burnt that famous Monastery, and kill'd the Monks, with great Numbers of others who had retir'd thither for Security. After this they march'd into East-England, where meeting with Earl Wulketule, who made a vigorous Resistance, they cut him off with all his Army,

Army, and winter'd at Thetford. Here the pious Edmund, King of the Country, opposing them, was put to flight, taken at Heylesdune, now Hoxon, and set up as a Butt to shoot at; where calling upon God, and professing himself a Martyr, he was first scourg'd, then shot through with many Arrows, and at length beheaded; the Place of his Burial being afterwards call'd St. Edmund's Bury. At the same Time Dummoc or Dunwich was also destroy'd by these Ravagers, and the Bishop's See was remov'd to Helmham in Norfolk.

The furious Danes having over-run Northumberland, Mercia and East-England, in the following Year bent their Course towards the West-Saxons, whose Territories had not felt the Effects of their Avarice and Cruelty, and who alone were in a Capacity to resist them: For the Monarchy not being completely establish'd, the Overturning of the Heptarchy had weaken'd all the other Provinces. Arriving at Reading, the Danes with new-Recruits and a mighty Force encamp'd between the Rivers Thames and Kenet, and sent two Earls to forage in the Country; but they were met by Ethelwulf Earl of Berkshire, who engag'd them at Englesfeld, kill'd one of their Earls, and obtain'd the Victory. Four Days after King Ethelred with his Brother Alfred gave Battel to the chief Body of the Danes, in which Earl Ethelwulf was slain, together with great Numbers on both Sides, and the Danes kept the Field. Yet the Advantage was not so great against the English, but in four Days after the King and his Brother appear'd again in the Field at a Place call'd Escesdune, or Ashdoune, where they engag'd on both Sides with their full Strength. The Danes divided their Army into two Bodies, the one led by Bascai and Hulfden their two Kings, the other by their Earls; and the first engag'd with Ethelred, and the latter with Alfred. In the former Body King Bascai was slain, in the latter the two Sidrocs, besides three other Earls, Osbearn, Frena and Hareld; and both were put to flight, with the Slaughter of many Thousands; so that such a Victory had not been known for many Ages. Yet after this great Loss, within fourteen Days Time, being headed by Agnere and Hubba, they engag'd the King and his Brother at a Place call'd Basing, where they apparently gain'd the Advantage. Still the Loss sustain'd by the English could not be great, for about two Months after, they were so well recruited that they durst a third Time engage with the Pagans at Merotune, tho' lately reinforced, and divided into two Bodies, and in the same Posture they had formerly fought. Both these Bodies were put to flight, tho' for a great Part of the Day they kept the Advantage, and the Slaughter was great on both Sides; and yet the Annals tell us that the Danes remain'd Masters of the Field; so various was the Fortune of this Day, or rather so uncertain their Intelligence. Of all the Landings and Devastations of the Danes, from the Days of Ethelwulf 'till their two last Battels with Ethelred, or of their Leaders, whether Kings, Dukes or Earls, the Danish Historians of best Credit are wholly silent; so little Value they had for the Memory of their barbarous and inhuman Actions; unless we may suppose them, according to Affer, to have come from Danubius, or some other Parts, rather than Denmark. In the Summer, there happen'd a dreadful Plague, of which King Ethelred is said to have dy'd, after he had reign'd above five Years in great Reputation. He dy'd on the 23d Day of April, some say by the Wounds receiv'd in his last Battel; which seems to be confirm'd by an Inscription on his Tomb at Winborne, cited by Mr. Camden; but that being of a modern Date, the Authority of it is doubted by many.

youngest Son of King Ethelwulf, who like Augustus compleated it, and so firmly fix'd it, that it continu'd ever since. Notwithstanding his Reign was fill'd with infinite Troubles, and innumerable Molestations from the Danes, which sometimes reduc'd him to greater Exigencies, than had been known to any of his Predecessors. This Prince is by some said to have been first supreme Monarch of England, and by others the first King that ever was anointed in this Nation. He was couragious and brave, of a winning Behaviour and a charming Conversation, and a ready Wit and profound Wisdom. Being now twenty two Years of Age, he took Possession of the Kingdom not without Reluctancy, being justly apprehensive of the constant Invasions and barbarous Hostilities of the Pagans. And he had scarcely solemniz'd his Brother's Funeral, when in a Month's Time with an inconsiderable Army he was oblig'd to engage the whole Power of the Danes at Wilton; where at first by his Courage and Valour he forc'd them to fly, but at length finding the Number of the Pursuers to be small, they rallied, encounter'd the wearied English, and became Masters of the Field. And that it might not seem strange to any that the Numbers of the Christians were so small, Asser and the Annals tell us, That in this one Year the English had been spent and weaken'd by eight or nine several Battels against the Pagans, besides innumerable Skirmishes; in which, tho' the Danes lost one King and nine Earls, or principal Commanders, yet receiving such frequent Recruits from beyond the Seas, whilst the English wanted that Advantage, it is no Wonder if they prevail'd. But now being tired with incessant Hostilities, this Year a Peace was made with the Danes, upon Condition that they should leave the Kingdom; which they for some Time observ'd, but to no great Effect. For the next Year the Danes having landed again, march'd from Reading to London, and there took up their Winter Quarters; where the Mercians were constrain'd to make Peace with them.

In the Summer following, these Rovers march'd Northwards, and winter'd at Torksey in Lincolnshire, where the Mercians gladly renew'd their Articles of Peace. Notwithstanding which, removing their Forces to Rependune, now Repton upon Trent in Darbyshire, they there forc'd Burhed King of the Mercians to quit both his Kingdom and the Nation, and retire to Rome; leaving all his Dominions to their Possession. His Kingdom was farm'd out by the Danes to one of his Servants call'd Ceolwulf, upon Condition that he should restore it upon the same Time it was demanded. After which, these Pagan Devourers divided themselves into two Parties; one of which, under the Conduct of Hafden one of their Kings, march'd into Northumberland, where they winter'd by the Tine, subdu'd all the adjacent Countries, and wasted the Territories of the Picts, and the Pictish Britains. The other Party, commanded by Cuthrun, Oskitell and Amund, three other of their Kings, march'd directly to Grantbrig or Cambridge, where fixing their Quarters, for a Year they spread themselves like Locusts over all that Country. In the mean Time King Alfred, now perceiving that these Mischiefs at Land proceeded from the Enemies being Masters at Sea, mann'd out a small Fleet, designing to surprize these Pirates before their Landing; and meeting with seven of their Ships, they took one, and dispers'd the rest: A promising Success from so small a Beginning; for the English at that Time were but little experienc'd in Sea Affairs. The following Summer the Danes remov'd to a Castle of the West-Saxons call'd Werhum; where Alfred, whose Power had been much weaken'd, either by a wise Management, or as some say by Money, brought them to such Terms of Peace, that they swore the most solemn Oaths, immediately to depart the Land. But in a short Time, falsifying their Oaths, they with all their Horse got by Night to Exeter, and winter'd in those Parts. At the same Time Hafden their King had brought his Affairs to that Perfection in Northumberland, that he divided that Country amongst his Men, and began to cultivate it with Tillage. And it was in this Year, according to Asser, that Rollo with his Danes or Normans, having winter'd ter'd here in England, pass'd over the Sea, invaded France, and took Possession of all Neustria, since call'd Normandy, there reigning himself Fifty Years.

An. In the following Year, the Danish Fleet sailing or roving about the West, met with such a Tempest near Swansich in Hampshire, as overset an hundred and twenty of their Ships, and left the rest easie to be master'd by those Gallies, which King Alfred had plac'd there to guard the Seas. At the same time the Danes were besieg'd by the King's Troops in Exeter, and being humbled by the Loss of their Fleet, they offer'd sufficient Hostages, took several Oaths, and enter'd into new Articles of Peace. According to which Articles they left West-Saxony, and departed into Mercia, of which they divided part of it among themselves, and left the rest to Ceolwulf their substituted King. But notwithstanding all their Oaths and Obligations, in the Beginning of the next Year, they with a great Power enter'd into West-Saxony, and quartering at Chippenham in Wiltshire, wasted all the Country, forc'd many of the Inhabitants beyond Sea, and took Possession of the chief Parts of it: Inso much that the King himself was constrain'd with a few of his Nobles, and with some Soldiers and Vassals, to retire among the woody and boggy Parts of Somersetshire, where he led a melancholy Life, in great Trouble and Scarcity, having no Provisions but what he could get by Incursions from the Pagans, or from those Christians who had submitted themselves to their Power. At length he was forc'd to take Lodgings with a poor Neatherd; where we are told that the Man's Wife reprimanded him for suffering her Bread to take Damage at the Fire, no ways supposing him to have been the Man who had fought so many Battels, and obtain'd so many Victories over the Pagan Power. His Retirement was so private, that neither his Friends nor Enemies could tell where he was; and all this Time his Royal Patrimony became a Prey, both to the Danes and the revolting English. And here performing an extraordinary Act of Charity, in the Time of his greatest Want, it is said that he receiv'd a Promise from Heav'n, by Way of Vision, that he should have a speedy Deliverance from all his Trouble and Afflictions.

m. Dnn. This began to appear in a short Time: For Hafden and the Brother of Hinguar, coming with twenty three Ships from North-Wales, where they had made great Devastations, landed in Devonshire near a strong Castle call'd Kenwith; where by the sudden Sally of the Garrison, they were slain with twelve hundred of their Men. This gave Encouragement to King Alfred to build a Fortress at Athelney in Somersetshire, in which he bravely defended himself and his Followers. And in seven Weeks Time he march'd from thence with his Subjects and Vassals there, to engage with the Pagans. And coming to Ecbryt-stone now Brixstone, he was met by the Inhabitants of Wiltshire, Somersetshire and Hampshire, who receiv'd their King with extraordinary Satisfaction, as one risen from the Dead. But finding the Enemy to be far superior in Numbers, and other Advantages, before he engag'd them, according to Ingulph and Malmesbury, he undertook a very uncommon Adventure; which was to take upon him the Form and Habit of an ordinary Musician, and with one Companion to enter the Danish Camp as a Spy. Here he became so acceptable by his Singing and Playing, that he was at length introduc'd to the King's Tent; and having there and in the rest of the Camp learnt as much as was convenient, he again return'd to his Castle at Athelney, where calling together all his Followers, he related the careless Condition of the Enemy's Camp, and with what Ease they might be destroy'd. Being thus encourag'd, they muster'd up all their Power, and being led on by a valiant King, at Edendon in Wiltshire, they engag'd the whole Forces of the Danes, and gain'd an intire Victory. They pursu'd them to one of their fortify'd Castles, where Alfred closely besieg'd them for fourteen Days; 'till being pinch'd with Famine, they were reduc'd to that Necessity, as to beg a Peace on Condition that the King should receive what Hostages he demanded from them, without deposing any himself. Upon which they made such a Peace as they had never done with any King before;

During this Negotiation, another Swarm of Danish Rovers from beyond the Seas, sail'd up the Thames, and winter'd at Fullingham, now Fulham; but in the following Year, with another Body of their Countrymen, they pass'd over into France and Flanders, where their Conquests and Ravages shew'd that the French and Flemish were no more able than the English to defend themselves from these Pagan Invaders. In the mean time King Alfred, now at Peace and at Leisure, resolv'd to encrease his Naval Forces, and after three Years Diligence, he provided a considerable Fleet; with which he engag'd several of the Danes, and taking two of their Ships, he order'd the Men to be thrown over-board; and not long after he took two more, with two of their Princes, but not without some Loss. Two or three Years after another Fleet of Danes appear'd on these Seas, so large that one Part thought themselves powerful enough to enter France, while the other making up the Rivers Thames and Medway, besieg'd the City of Rockester, and having built a strong Fort before the Gates, from thence they attack'd the Place. But the Inhabitants made a brave Resistance, and held out against all their Forces, 'till Alfred himself came to their Relief, the Fame of whose Approach frighted the Besiegers to their Ships, who leaving all their Horses and many Prisoners, return'd to the Coasts of France. King Alfred having now reinforc'd his Fleet, resolv'd to suppress the Danish Pirates who then shelter'd themselves among their Countrymen in East-England, which occasion'd a Breach of the League between him and King Guthram; and this Design so prosper'd, that coming to the Mouth of the River Stoure by Harwich, they met with thirteen of their Ships, which came prepar'd by an Encounter, took them all and kill'd their Men. But growing secure upon this Success, and keeping in a careless Posture, the Danes with all the Naval Forces, engag'd them in their Return, and much diminish'd the Honour of their Triumph. In the following Year King Alfred, after so many Cities being burnt, and such dismal Destruction of People, not only took the City of London from the Danes, who had it long in their Possession, but he repair'd it, and restor'd it to its ancient Lustre; and then committed it to the Government of Ethered Earl of the Mercians, to whom he gave his Daughter Ethelfleda in Marriage. And now Affairs being brought to a better Order than formerly, all the English, namely the Mercians and Kentish Men, as also the East and West-Saxons, who before had been dispers'd, and made Prisoners by the Danes, return'd to their Habitations, and put themselves under King Alfred's Protection: And the King was now freed from the Insults and IncurSIONS of the Danes for about eight Years.

And now the Affairs of the Nation being brought to a peaceable Posture, the renown'd Alfred proceeded to many worthy Regulations, and to promote all Things that might tend either to the Honour or Advantage of his Subjects. Finding that in these Times Learning was at so low an Ebb in the Kingdom, that few on the South side of the Humber could read English, and scarce a Priest who could understand Latin, he order'd Gregory's Pastoral to be translated into English, and sent a Copy of it to every Bishop. And for the further Advancement of Knowledge, he sent into France for Grimbald and John the Monk, and into Wales for Affer, who read to him and wrote the History of his Life; all whom he plac'd at Oxford, where he founded that famous University in in the Year 886, and erected three Colleges, one for Grammarians, another for Philosophers, and a third for Divines. For the Conveniency of Civil Government, this excellent Prince repair'd all his Cities and Castles, and built others in the most necessary Places, changing the whole Face of the Kingdom into a much better Form; and having walled several Towers and Castles, he made them defensible against all the Pagan Power. Nor was he less careful in the Political Affairs of the Nation; for many of his own Subjects, under the Name of Danes having committed frequent Spoils and Rapines, in order to restrain all Excesses, he first divided all the Provinces of England into distinct Counties, and those again into Hundreds and Tythings, as also Parishes; so that every legal Subject dwelling in some particular Hundred or Tything, if he was suspected of any Robbery, he was to be condemn'd or acquitted by the same Division. He divided the Governments of the Provinces into two Offices, into Judges whom we now call Justices of the Peace, and into Sheriffs, who still retain that Name. And by this King's Care and Industry, there succeeded so great a Tranquility throughout the Realm, that if a Traveller had lost a Bag of Money in the High-Way, he might have found it untouched the next Day. And others add, That tho' there were Gold Bracelets hung up at the Parting of several High-Ways, yet Justice was so strictly executed, that no Man durst presume to touch them. He was so exact and careful in doing Justice, that he frequently enquir'd after all the Judgments and Decisions of the whole Country made in his Absence, and very strictly examin'd the Equity of them; and if he found any Failure in the Sentences of his Judges, he demanded whether it proceeded from Ignorance or a corrupt Mind; if from the former, he reprov'd their Folly and Insolence in undertaking what they understood not, and commanded them either to quit their Places, or by Study and Books make themselves fit to answer the Ends of them: And it was wonderful to see so many illiterate Earls, Sheriffs and publick Ministers, apply themselves to laborious Studies, even in their old Age, rather than forfeit their Places and Reputations. This Prince's Laws, of which many were Ecclesiastical, were for the most part Collections from the Laws of Ina, Osfa and Ethelbert, to which some new ones were added. These are extant in Lambard, and one or two of the Secular Laws are observ'd among us to this Day: As particularly, That for Entailing Estates, 'They that had 'Book-Land, or Estates in Land that came to them, or pass'd by Deed from 'their Ancestors, could not sell or alienate it from their Heirs: And that for vouching of Things sold, &c. 'No Man's Horse or Oxe could be sold without a Voucher, one that should take upon him to make good the Sale, and the 'Thing sold according to the Bargain.

He divides the Nation into Counties.

His Care of the Publick.

His Laws.

And now after eight Years Intermision, the Kingdom became infested worse than ever by a fresh Invasion of the Danes; for vast Numbers of them being driven by the Emperor Arnulf out of France march'd Westward to Boloign; where taking Shipping in two hundred and fifty Vessels, together with their Horses, they arriv'd in the Mouth of the River Limene in Kent, near to the great Wood Andred, a Wood that extended an hundred and twenty Miles in Length, and thirty in Breadth. Into this Wood they drew up their Ships about four Miles from the River's Mouth, where they built a Fortrefs; and after them one Haesten, with eighty Vessels more enter'd the Mouth of the Thames, and built a Fort at Midleton, while these remain'd at Apledore. King Alfred to hinder this Storm that threaten'd his Kingdom, first resolv'd to prevent the usual Correspondence between new Comers and those already settled in the Nation, which had ever prov'd of pernicious Consequence. He strictly oblig'd the Danes of Northumberland and of East-Sex by an Oath of Fidelity, and receiv'd Hostages from them; and having gather'd together a considerable Power, he encamp'd himself between the Enemies two Armies, at such a Distance, as to be ready to attack either, in case they offer'd to remove; then dividing his Army into two Parts, one continually observ'd the Enemy's main Body, whilst the other remain'd ready to restrain such Parties as foraged in the Country. The Danes rang'd about 'till they came to Essex, and then again pass'd the Thames into Surry, where at Farnham King Alfred's Troops met them, and put them to flight. Their King was wounded, and with one Party staid behind, the rest cross'd the Thames into an Island near Ceolne or Colebrook; where the King's Army besieg'd them so long, that their own Provisions fail'd. In the mean Time the Danes of Northumberland, not able to hold their Hands while their Countrymen were enriching themselves with Booty, broke their Faith, and with an hundred Ships coming to the East-Angles, scour'd the Southern Parts, as they did with forty Vessels the Northern Coasts, and sailing about to the West, they went and invested Exeter. Upon which Alfred hasten'd with all his Army towards that City, only left a strong Party of Welsh, who marching to London join'd the Citizens and others from the West, and pass'd on Eastwards to Beamsfleet; where Haesten having built a Fort was himself gone out to forage, leaving a considerable Party to defend it. But the English soon cut this Party in pieces, plunder'd the Castle, took much Booty and many Prisoners, and either destroy'd all their Ships, or brought them up to London or Rochester. Among other Prisoners they took the Wife of Haesten, with his Sons, which so affected the Barbarian, that he begg'd Peace of the King, and gave an Oath and Hostages for his Peaceable Deportment. Alfred willingly set his Wife and his Sons at Liberty, to one of whom he himself became God-father, and Earl Ethelred to the other; and besides all, he generously bestow'd on him a large Sum of Mony.

But Haesten being return'd to Beamsfleet, could not restrain his ravenous Inclination, but without regard to his Reputation, proceeded to ravage all the adjacent Country; and joining with the other Danish Army, he built another Castle at Shobery in Essex. Then passing the Thames with such as join'd them from Northumberland and East-England, they press'd on towards the Severn, wasting all the Country as they march'd. In the mean Time King Alfred still carry'd on the Siege of Exeter, where the Danes being extreamly distress'd with Famine, and having eaten many of their Horses, resolv'd to sally out and join with their Countrymen who lay encamp'd on the East Side of the River; but the King, with Loss of several considerable Men of his Party, defeated them, and oblig'd the Remainder to fly into Essex to their Ships and the Fort they had built in that Country. But no sooner was one Party suppress'd but another sprung up: For Laf, one of their Leaders, before Winter gather'd a strong Army out of East-England and Northumberland, and depositing their Wives, Ships and Goods into the Hands of the East-Angles, march'd Day and Night with such Expedition, that they came and took the City of Wirheal near Chester in the West, before the Pursuers could overtake them. And having wasted all the Country, the following Year they abandon'd the Place, and invaded North-Wales, from whence laden with Plunder they return'd into Northumberland and East-England; then proceeding into Essex, they seiz'd on a small Island call'd Mercy, and another Party returning by Sea from the Siege, landed upon the Coast of Suffex, where the Inhabitants of Chichester by a Sally slew many of them, and took some of their Ships. At the same Time such as had possess'd themselves of Mercy drew up their Ships some into the River Thames, and others into Lee-Road, on the Banks of which, the following Year they built a Fort about twenty Miles from London, at or near Ware. The Inhabitants of London looking upon this as a dangerous Curb, with other Assistants endeavour'd to demolish it, but were repell'd with the Loss of many Men, and amongst the rest, three of the King's Officers. Upon which Alfred in the Time of Harvest incamped nearer the City, to preserve the Reapers from the Danish Incursions; and riding on a certain Time by the River Lee, he discover'd a Way, by digging large Ditches, and dividing the Streams of the River, to cause the Enemies Ships to rest upon dry Land; which he attempted with such Success, cess, that the Danes perceiving they were not to be got off, suddenly sent away their Wives and Children into East-England, and march'd on foot as far as a Place call'd Quatbrig upon the Severn, where they built a new Fortrefs and winter'd. While the Citizens of London, with great Joy and Triumph brought such of the Ships as they could get off, into their own Road, and burnt or disabled the rest.

During these Wars and Calamities, there began a dreadful Pestilence, which continu'd three Years, and rag'd both amongst Men and Beasts. In which the King lost most of his choicest Nobility, as Swithulf Bishop of Rochester, and several great Earls; Ceolmund in Kent, Brithulf in Essex, Wulfred in Hampshire, besides Eadbald Bishop of Dorchester, Eadulf the King's Officer in Sussex, Beornwulf Governor of Winchester, Eigulf Master of the King's Horse, and many others. This Disaster was attended by many Irruptions of the Danes inhabiting Northumberland and East-England, into the Territories of the West-Saxons, by means of their long Gallies, which they had built several Years before. To overmatch which King Alfred with great Charge and Industry order'd new Gallies to be built twice as long, higher and yet both swifter and steddier than them, some of sixty Oars, and some of more. At the same Time the Isle of Wight, the Coasts of Devonshire, and other Maritime Parts were severely infested by six Danish Ships which hover'd about those Quarters. The King by way of Experiment commanded some of these new Gallies to be mann'd out against them; which occasion'd a Fight partly by Water and partly by Land, manag'd with great Dexterity and Courage on both Sides. Two of the Enemy's Ships were stranded, one escap'd away into East-England, and all the rest of the Men were slain or taken Prisoners; but not without considerable Loss on the King's Side. The Prisoners were brought to the King at Winchester, where he commanded them all to be hang'd up as Pirates and common Enemies; and the same Year not fewer than twenty of their Vessels perish'd on the Southern Coasts with all the Men.

A great Plague

The Danes no gain worsted.

After these tempestuous Times King Alfred enjoy'd about three Years of Peace, which to his perpetual Renown he employ'd in the noblest Exercises, and after the most laudible Manner. And if we consider his whole Life, we very rarely find any that so admirably discharg'd all the Offices of a King and Christian; by whose Example it will appear that no Infirmary of Body, no Labour of Mind, nor no Disquiets and Dangers can excuse any from performing their Duties owing to God and Men. The perpetual Distractions, Cares and Anxieties in which he liv'd and reign'd have been already mention'd, yet his inward Grievs were as afflicting as his outward Molestations, for scarcely one Day from his Infancy 'till he was forty five Years of Age, was he free from extraordinary Pains, and unaccountable Distempers in his Body. Yet in the midst of an infirm and shatter'd Body, he shew'd a courageous and heroick Mind, which even in his most debas'd Condition prov'd a continual Terror to his Enemies. His personal Valour was amazing, and his Actions in the Camp continually surprising; and in his Reign he fought with the Danes fifty six set Battels by Sea and Land, of which eight happen'd in one Day; so that by his wonderful Courage and Conduct, he so waited their Forces, tho' they still came in fresh and vast Numbers, that they were constrain'd to give what Hostages he demanded, and submit to such Conditions as he thought fit to impose. In the midst of all the Disturbances and Distractions of his Life, he order'd the Matters of State concerning his Kingdom, practis'd all the Art of Hunting, instructed all his Gold-smiths and Artificers, contriv'd new Buildings more magnificent than any of his Predecessors, he himself being the Inventor and Architect, read many Books, and saw that others did the like. He was constantly present at Divine Service, read Psalms or Prayers, and alone in the Night Time when all others were at Rest, he frequented Churches and perform'd his Devotions; he oversaw the Distribution of Alms to the Poor and Strangers, set himself to the searching of the Causes of unknown Things, and in all these Employments, and during his most afflicting Pains, he behav'd himself with incomparable Affability and Pleasantness to all Men. Many Franks, Frisons, Galls, Pagans, Britains, Scots and Armenians voluntarily became his Subjects, as well Noble as Ignoble, all whom he lov'd, honour'd and reliev'd according to their several Qualities and Conditions. He constantly and attentively heard Sermons either from Strangers or his own Chaplains; and most affectionately lov'd his Bishops, the whole Clergy, his Earls and Nobles, his Servants and Familiars. He took personal Care of such of their Sons as were at Court, no less than of his own Children, instructing them himself Night and Day in good Manners and Literature. And notwithstanding his incessant Care, and vast Improvements that he made in himself and others, his Humility was so great, that he frequently bewail'd his Condition both to God and his familiar Friends, that he was destitute of Divine Wisdom, and of the Liberal Arts.

The Distribution of his Time and his Revenues.

No Prince in the World was ever more nicely careful of the two precious Things in Man's Life, his Time and his Revenue, and no Man wiser in the Management and Disposition of both. As to his Time, by Day and Night, he divided it by the Burning of certain Tapours into three equal Portions: The one was allotted for Devotion and God's Service, another for the Ministration of publick and private Affairs, and the third for Sleep and necessary Refreshment; and how each Hour pass'd, he was continually put in mind by one who had that Office. As to his Revenue, for the Management of that, he commanded all his Annual Income to be divided into two equal Parts; the first of which he appointed to Secular Uses, and subdivided it into three Portions. The first Portion was appointed to pay the Wages of Soldiers, his choicest Ministers, and those who by their Turns attended him in his Court: For of such he had three Divisions, each waiting their Month, and then resting two at their own Homes, return'd to their former Monthly Service. The second Portion was assign'd to Workmen and Architects, of whom he constantly employ'd great Numbers of all Nations. The third Portion was kept in readiness to relieve or honour Strangers according to their Worth and Quality, who came from all Parts to see him, and to live under him. The other equal Part of his annual Revenues was with a most free Will devoted to the Service of Almighty God; and he caus'd it to be divided into four Portions. The first of which he bountifully confer'd upon such Poor as flock'd to him out of all Nations. The second bestow'd on two great Monasteries, which he caus'd to be built at Ethelingsaeg, and at Scyftesburg. The third went to a famous School which he had erected for the Instruction of the Nobility of his own Nation, said to have been at Oxford, but Affer names no Place. The fourth was bestow'd on the Monasteries round about in West-Saxony and Mercia, and some Year by Turns to the Churches and Servants of God in Britain, Cornwall, Gall, Armorica and Northumberland; and also in Ireland he either according to his Ability sent Relief, or resolv'd to do it, as Opportunity and his Incomes would permit. Many more Excellencies might be related of this admirable Prince, but we shall dismiss this Subject with that Character given him by a great Man, who upon a due Consideration of all Things thus breaks forth. 'O Alfred, the Wonder and Astonishment of all Ages! If we reflect upon his Piety and Religion, it would seem that he had never gone out of a Monastery: If on his warlike Exploits, that he had liv'd no where but in a Camp: If on his Writings and Studies, that he had spent his whole Life in an University: And lastly, if we regard his Administration of the Affairs of his Kingdom and Subjects, one would think that his whole Time had been employ'd in nothing else but enacting Laws, and promoting Justice in his Tribunals and Courts.

Character.

His Death.

At length being arriv'd at the fifty first Year of his Age, God was pleas'd to remove this Great Man, after a tumultuous yet glorious Reign of twenty nine Years and above six Months, in the Year 900, and upon the 25th Day of October.

ber. His Body was first bury'd at Winchester, next remov'd into the Church of the new Monastery; and lastly his Body, Monument, Church and Monastery were all remov'd without the North Gate of the City, since call'd Hide.

IV. The Sorrow occasion'd by the Loss of King Alfred was much alleviated by the Succession of his eldest Son Prince Edward, a Person highly promising in all his Actions; who tho' he was inferior to his Father in Learning and Abilities, yet he afterwards far exceeded him in Power and Grandeur, enjoying the Benefit of those Labours which his Father had sustain'd. But the Beginning of his Reign was much disturb'd by the Pretensions of his Cousin Ethelwald, who is said to have been Son to his Father's Elder Brother Ethelred, who was his immediate Predecessor in the Kingdom. However his Title was thought sufficient, if he could find Power to support it; accordingly he seiz'd on two Towns call'd Winburn and Treacanam; in the former of which he fortify'd himself, declaring he would live or dye in that Place. But his Resolutions were of small Advantage, for the Memory of King Alfred was so dear in those Parts, that the Inhabitants would admit of no Successor but his Heir. King Edward, assur'd of their Fidelity, led an Army to a Place call'd Baddanbryg, not far from Winburn; which so terrify'd his Rival Ethelwald, that notwithstanding all his boasted Valour and Constancy, he fled out of the Town by Night, and got to Northumberland, where he join'd with the Danish Army, and was acknowledg'd as King of England: King Edward commanded some to pursue him, but not reaching him, he caus'd his Wife to be seiz'd, who being a profess'd Nun, and taken out of the Monastery without Leave from the King or Licence from the Bishops, he return'd her to the Profession and Place from whence she came. Thus King Edward repell'd Ethelwald without Fighting; and the Kentish Men the following Year, at a Place call'd Holme fought successfully against a Multitude of Danish Pirates. In the mean Time Ethelwald pass'd from Northumberland into France, where being reinforc'd by the Normans, he return'd the next Year into England; and joining with great Numbers of Danes inhabiting Northumberland, East-England, and other Places, he invaded Mercia with Fire and Sword, as far as Cirekelade in Wiltshire. Then passing over the Thames, he wast'd all Places, as well within Bradene as the adjacent Parts, and so return'd. King Edward with what Forces he could raise hasten'd after them, and laid waste all their Lands lying between Decil's Ditch in Cambridgeshire and the River Ouse, as far as the Marshes and Fens. Thinking it convenient to return, he gave Orders that his whole Army should decamp and march together; but the Kentish Men, careless of themselves, staid a while behind, by which Delay of theirs, and being separated from the King's Forces, the Danes were encourag'd to give the King Battel, which was very obstinate and bloody on both Sides. The King lost the Earls Sigulf and Sigelm, with many other of his Nobles, and the Danes their King Eatrick, Ethelwald the Author of this War, with a greater Number than the English, tho' they had the Honour of keeping the Field. This Battel was fought in the Year 905, but we know not the Effect of it, but only in the second Year after, a Peace was concluded between King Edward and the Danes of East-England and Northumberland, at a Place call'd Ityngasford, which lasted for the Space of three Years.

lately broken. But in the following Year they broke this also, and furiously invaded Mercia, where they were met by the English at Teoten hale, or Tetnal in Staffordshire, and overthrown. King Edward was then in Kent, and had gather'd together about an hundred Sail of Ships, besides such as were sent to the Southward and met him at Sea. The Danes imagining that he had shipt off the Majority of his Forces, took the Liberty to rove about beyond the Severn, and wherever else the Hopes of Booty could invite them. Whereupon King Edward sent the lightest of his Army before, to divert the Enemy 'till he could come up; and then following with the main Body, he ingag'd them in their Return at Cantbridge in Glocestershire, where he gave them a memorable Defeat. The Annals relate, that many thousands of them were slain, together with Eowd their King; but Huntington mentions two other Kings, Haldene and Eolwulf, besides Uther a Consul, and eight other Noblemen, whose barbarous Names may without any Loss to the Reader be omitted. In the following Year Ethered Duke of Mercia, to whom Alfred had given London with his Daughter Ethelfled in Marriage, now dying, King Edward resum'd that City, and Oxford, with the adjoining Countries into his own Hands. And in the Year after, he built by his Soldiers, or much repair'd the Town of Hartford on either Side of the Lee, and leaving a sufficient Number at Work, he march'd about the Middle of Summer with the other Part of his Forces into Essex, and encamp'd at Maldon, while his Soldiers built Witham in the same County; where a considerable Part of the Country, formerly subject to the Danes, yielded themselves to his Protection. And now reigning in Peace, about the Year 915, he took care for the Restoration of the University of Cambridge, as his Father had done for that of Oxford: And by the Assistance of Pope John and Arch-Bishop Plegmund, and by the Advice of all the Bishops and chief Men of his Kingdom, he confirm'd to the Doctors and Scholars of this University, as also to their Servants, all the Privileges which had been granted by himself or his Predecessors, to endure for ever by a perpetual Right, as appears by the Copy of a Charter still extant.

Her Buildings.

About two Years after, the Danes from Northampton and Leicester, broke the Peace by a furious Inroad made into Oxfordshire, where they committed all Kinds of Rapine, and made great Slaughters; while another Party with less Success march'd into Hartfordshire, where the Inhabitants, now sufficiently inured to such Allarms, bravely resisted them, repell'd them and recover'd the Booty they had taken, and made themselves Masters of their Horses. During these Contests Ethelfleda the King's Sister, and Relict of Ethered Duke of Mercia, having Charge of that Country, behav'd her self as she had done continually in her Husband's Time, with such uncommon Courage and Conduct as she became a mighty Help to her Brother in his Wars, and nobly defended all those who were under her Care. But the Britains who were Neighbours to the Mercians, disdain'd to be check'd and restrain'd by a Woman, were so hardy as to make some Incursions into the English Territories. She to divert and chastise them, sent a Party into Wales, which easily defeated the Welch, took the Castle of Bricnam-mere by Brecknock, and besides thirty four other considerable Captives, brought away that King's Wife Prisoner into Mercia. In the following Year this valiant Woman bravely attack'd the Town of Darby then in the Hands of the Danes, took it by Storm, after they had refus'd Battel in the open Field, and then subdu'd all the Country round, tho' with the great Hazard of her Person, and the Loss of four of her best Officers who were slain at the Entry of the Gate. After this Victory she conquer'd Leicester with the greatest Part of the Danish Army that lay in those Parts; and also those of Yorkshire promis'd Submission and all good Deportment. But this Virago is not only celebrated by all Writers for taking of Towns and Castles from the Enemy, but also for repairing and building many others in the English Territories: As particularly Chester, Tamworth, Leichfield, Stafford, Warwick, Shrewsbury, Wedensbury, Wedensbury, Eadsbury, Finborow, Rimcorne, Brimsbery, Brigge, and several others: And generally such as were repair'd by her had formerly by her Valour and Conduct been wrested out of the Hands of the Enemy. At length after eight Years Government of Mercia, this renown'd Lady dy'd at Tamworth in Staffordshire, and was bury'd in the Porch of St. Peter in Glocester by her Husband. Huntington further writes, that she was reported to have been of so great Power, that by some she was not only call'd Lady and Queen, but King also, out of Admiration of her Abilities. She left only one Child, a Daughter nam'd Alwina, for she became so affected with the Pains of Child-bed at her Birth, that she would never more accompany with her Husband. To which Passage Ingulph adds, that in respect of the Cities she built, the Castles she fortify'd, and the Armies she manag'd, it might have been thought that she had chang'd her Sex. She made her Daughter her Heir, but King Edward so far understood his Interest, that within a Year he sent for his Niece into West-Sex, and took all Mercia into his own Hands.

Sax. Ann.

But to return back to this Prince, and his Affairs: The Year after the Taking of Darby, a new Fleet of Danes from the Southwards arriv'd at Lidwic in Devonshire under the Conduct of two Commanders call'd Ottor and Roald. Sailing Westward round the Land's End, they enter'd the Mouth of the Severn; where landing, they ravag'd all the Coast of Wales, and coming to Irchenfield, they took Kuneleac a British Bishop Prisoner, for whose Ransom King Edward afterwards gave Forty Pounds. As they proceeded, the Inhabitants of Herefordshire and Glocestershire, with some others, oppos'd their Progress, and put them to flight, killing their Captain Roald, with the Brother of Ottor, and many others: And pursuing them to a Wood, they there besieg'd them 'till they gave Security for departing out of the King's Dominions. In the mean Time the King hover'd with his Army between Severn and Avon, so that they durst not touch upon these Quarters, except twice in the Night Time, and then they came home short, being all cut off except some that by swimming escap'd to their Ships. The rest being almost famish'd in a small Island, remov'd from Place to Place, 'till at length they pass'd over into Ireland; and this was the Issue of this Invasion, when the Country enjoy'd a Breathing Time from these Calamities. The Pirates being departed, King Edward the better to secure himself against the Attempts of their Countrymen inhabiting about Bedford and in Buckinghamshire, who were always ready to join with fresh Comers, led his Army to Buckingham, where he continu'd a Month, and order'd Forts to be erected on each Side of the River Ouse. This Management so curb'd the Power of the Danes, that many of them submitted themselves, particularly Turkitel a Commander, together with most of the considerable Men about Bedford, as also several about Northampton. This encourag'd the King to go down the following Year to Bedford, which being yielded to him, he continu'd there about a Month, and took care for the Building a Burb, as the Annals call it, on the South Side of the River Ouse, which Townlet was in the Saxon's Time call'd Mikegate. The following Year, a little before Midsummer, he went again to Malton, where he built another Burb, and fortify'd the Town. And now Turkitel the Dane finding he was like to have but small Success in this Nation, while the King so wisely and industriously manag'd his Affairs, got leave with as many Volunteers as would follow him, to pass into France, where he knew his Countrymen might find him Employment. The King still pursu'd his Designs and Business, and to add to his Strength, he re-edify'd Torcester in Northamptonshire, and caus'd it to be fortify'd, and likewise built and fortify'd a Place call'd Wigingmere, now Wigmore in Herefordshire.

The Danes decline.

Edward increases in Strength.

Sax. Ann.

While King Edward was buied about the Fortifications of Wigmore, the Danes of Northampton and Leicester, being apprehensive of the Inconveniency of so many strong Towns, laid Siege to Torcester. But after a Days vigorous Resistance, and Supplies coming in, they left the Place by Night, and being pursu'd purfu'd and surpriz'd between Burnwood and Aylesbury, they lost many of their Men, and much of their Baggage. About the same Time the Danes of Huntington, judging their Fortrefs not proper for their Purpose, demolish'd it, and erected another at Temesford in Bedfordshire, by the Assistance of their Countrymen in East-England. From thence they made Excursions to Bedford, in hopes of recovering that Town, but the Garrison sally'd out, and repell'd them with a great Slaughter. After which they rais'd a greater Army, both out of East-England and Mercia, which in a short Time fate down before Wigmore, but after one Days Trial, they were oblig'd to depart, with what Booty they could get out of the Country. Upon these Acts of Hostility many of King Edward's Friends gather'd themselves together, and uniting their Forces, besieg'd the new Fort at Temesford, which they took by Storm, after a vigorous Resistance; in which they slew the Danish King, the two Earls Toylea and Mannan, with all the rest in the Place, who chose Death rather than Submission. Incourag'd by this Success, the Inhabitants of Kent, Surrey and Essex, with several from other Parts, went and laid Siege to Colchester, and so bravely carry'd on their Attacks, that in a short Time they took the Place, and put all the Danes to the Sword, except such as had the good Fortune to escape over the Walls. To the Relief of these great Numbers of Danes inhabiting the Ports and other Towns in England, united their Forces; but coming too late, they pleas'd themselves with the Hopes of revenging the Injury upon Maldon; but that Town being timely reliev'd, they departed, not only with the Loss of their Design, but also of many Thousands of their Men. King Edward being jealous of their Countrymen hasten'd this Summer with an Army of West-Saxons to Passham upon the Ouse, where he continu'd 'till Torchester was encompass'd with a Stone Wall. Which had such an Influence upon the Danes in those Parts, that Thurfert an Earl, with the Lords of the neighbouring Towns, and all their Army as far as Hampton North of Weolind came and submitted to him. Now the King's Forces desir'd to return home, yet Part of them were order'd to Huntington, where they repair'd the Breaches and fortify'd the Town; upon the Sight of which, all the People of those Parts submitted, and desir'd the King's Protection. In the same Year he march'd with his West-Saxon Forces to Colchester, where repairing and fortifying that Town, all the People of East-England, living under the Danes, together with the Danish Army, as well by Sea as by Land, swore Obedience to him, and to observe his Commands. The Danish Army at Cambridge also surrender'd themselves, and took the same Oath. By this Means King Edward's Power and Dominions were not only enlarg'd, but also all the East-Angles were freed from the Tyranny of the Danes, who had kept them in Subjection for about fifty Years, ever since the Death of King Edmund; whose Body was this Year remov'd from Hoxon in Suffolk to St. Edmund's Bury in the same County.

The following Year still added to King Edward's Greatness and Sovereignty; for coming to Stamford and erecting a Castle on the South Side of the River, all the Inhabitants in those Parts acknowledg'd him their supreme Lord. At the same Time his Sister Ethelfleda dying, as we have formerly mention'd, all Mercia was reduc'd to his Power; which was immediately follow'd by the Submission of Howel, Cledanc and Jeothwell the petty Princes of North-Wales, with all the Northern Britains, who put themselves under his Protection. After this the King visited Nottingham, which he repair'd, and plac'd both English and Danes in it, of which two Nations, all inhabiting Mercia now became his Subjects. And to pursue and compleat his good Fortune, the next Year he march'd with an Army to Tethwall in Cheshire, where he took Care for the building and fortifying that Town. While he continu'd there, he sent for another Party of Soldiers out of Mercia, and order'd them to repair and fortify Manchester in Lancashire. The next Year King Edward to secure all about him went down with an Army to Nottingham, where he order'd a Borough to be be built on the South Side of the River over-against it, and a Bridge to be made for Intercourse between them. From thence he march'd as far as the Territories of the Picts, to a Place call'd Bedecanwillan, where he commanded a Town to be built and strongly fortify'd. Upon which the King of the Scots chose him for his Lord and Patron, together with the Scotish Nation it self, as likewise did Regiwald the Son of Eadulf, and all the Inhabitants of Northumberland, English and Danes, in the North as well as in the Southern Parts, as also the King of the Britains call'd Straetgledwalli, with all his Subjects. These are the great Atchievements of King Edward as they are summarily set down in the Saxon Annals, which shew his Power so great, that none of his Predecessors extended his Dominions to such a Proportion. By Malmesbury we are told that as it were to compleat his Grandeur, a little before he dy'd he reduc'd the Inhabitants of Chester and the Country about it, who having conspir'd with the neighbouring Britains had attempted to shake off the Yoke; but he by his Diligence prevented their Forces joining, and by the Terror of his Name soon constrain'd them to submit themselves. And thus after a fortunate and triumphant Reign of about twenty four Years, this great Prince dy'd at Farrington in Barkshire in the Year 924, and was bury'd in the Monastery at Winchester by his Father; leaving behind him a numerous Issue of five Sons and nine Daughters.

8. A T H E L S T A N.

V. Of the five Sons that King Edward left behind, three ascended the Throne and became Kings of England, viz. Athelstan, Edmund and Edred. Ethelward was nearer than all the rest, but dying a few Days after his Father, he made way for the Succession of Athelstan, who tho' the Eldest, and legitimated as it were by the after Marriage of his Mother, yet being born of a then Concubine, could hardly have obtain'd the Crown during the Life of Ethelward. Concerning the Birth of this Prince, Malmesbury and Brompton have this peculiar Story: That in the Reign of King Alfred, when his Son Edward was young, in a Village of the West-Saxons, the Daughter of a Shepherd by Name Edgina, had a Dream that the Moon shone out of her Womb so bright, that all England was enlighten'd by the Splendor of it: Which being told to a grave Matron, who had been Nurse to several of the King's Children, she took her into her House, and educated her as tenderly as if she had been her own Daughter, instructing her to demean her self as might become a Person both of Birth and Breeding. In process of Time, Prince Edward, the King's eldest Son, occasionally passing through the Town, thought himself oblig'd in Civility to visit his Nurse; which brought him to a Sight of this beautiful Maid, whose Charms so captivated his Affections, that he was incessantly importunate to lye with her. His Desire being at length obtain'd, Edgina prov'd with Child, and being deliver'd of a Son, in respect to her former Dream, Edward gave him the Name of Athelstan, which signifies The most Noble. But how uncertain soever his Birth was, he prov'd an excellent Governor; and now being thirty Years of Age, he ascended the Throne by the Consent of all the Nobility, and was crown'd at the Royal Town of Kingston upon Thames, not without the Predestination of his Father by his last Will and Testament. By his own Pregnancy and Education he had arriv'd to many noble Qualifications of Mind, suitable to the Dignity of his Employment; and his Grandfather Alfred is said to have presag'd to him a fortunate Reign, being much enamour'd with his excellent Behaviour and his beautiful Features. When he was very young, he conferr'd on him the Honour of Knighthood, by investing him with a Purple Robe, a Belt adorn'd with Gems, and a Sword of the Saxon Fashion put in a golden Scabbard; and caus'd him to be educated in the House of his renowned Daughter Ethelfleda, and her valiant Husband, that he might be train'd up in such Actions as might render him fit for that good Fortune and Condition which the Hopes conceiv'd of him did portend.

He is opposed by Alfred.

The Deferts of this Prince, and the general Affection of the People were not effectual to prevent all Inconveniencies proceeding from the Condition of his Birth. One Alfred made a considerable Opposition against the Choice, as of an illegitimate Person, and conspired with his Accomplices to seize him in the City of Winchester, and to put out his Eyes. But the Plot was happily discover'd, and Alfred denying it utterly was sent to Rome, there to purge himself before the Pope; where coming to take his Oath before the Altar of St. Peter, he fell down, and being carry'd by his Servants to the English School, he dy'd three Days after. By reason of this Accident the Pope would not dispose of his Body, but sent to know the Advice of King Athelstan; who being prevail'd upon by the Friends of Alfred, consented that he should have Christian Burial, tho' his whole Estate was adjudg'd confiscate for his Treason. Such good Fortune had Athelstan against this Domestick Enemy. In other Places he found little Trouble, except on the North Side of the Humber; where Inguald, one of the Danish Kings, seiz'd on Tork, and Sithric the Danish King of Northumberland, who formerly had kill'd his Brother Niel, by Force made himself Master of Davenport in Cheshire. Malmesbury says that Sithric was a Barbarian both in Mind and Nation, that he was Kinsman to Guthram so remarkable in King Alfred's Reign, that having proudly contemn'd the Power of former Kings, now humbly desir'd the Alliance of Athelstan by Messengers, whom he himself follow'd to make good what they had petition'd on his Behalf. Athelstan found him a Person so considerable, that he gave him his Sister Edgitha in Marriage, upon an Agreement that he should be first baptiz'd. Not long after Sithric dy'd, and was succeeded in his Kingdom by Godefrid his Son; but King Athelstan thought fit to dispossess him, and reduc'd all Northumberland to his own Dominions, to which he might lay Claim, both by an ancient Right, and a new Alliance. From which gaining of the Kingdom of Northumberland we may observe, That as King Edward had before conquer'd the Danes of East-England, and had also added Mercia to his own Kingdom; so King Athelstan by the Expulsion of King Godefrid, who was also of the Danish Race, became the first King that ruled all England, without any King under him. And by his Conquests and Acquisitions, this Prince justly deserv'd the Title of first Monarch, tho' his Modesty occasion'd him to wave it, leaving it to his younger Brother Edred, who was the first King that assum'd it.

Upon the Reduction of Northumberland, Godefrid fled into Scotland, and his Brother Anlaf into Ireland; and the former was shortly follow'd by Ambassadors from King Athelstan to Constantine King of the Scots, who demanded the Fugitive to be deliver'd up, upon the Peril of a speedy War. Some write that a War did really commence which Athelstan carry'd on with numerous Forces both by Sea and Land, and drove his Enemies before him by Land as far as Dunfeodor and Merlermore, and by Sea as far as into Cathness. But Malmesbury affirms, that not daring to displease him, both Constantine and Eugenius King of Cumberland readily came to a Place call'd Dacor, where they deliver'd up themselves and their Possessions into the Hands of the King of England, who became God-father to the Son of Constantine, now order'd to be baptiz'd in Testimony of the Agreement. But while they were preparing for their Journey, Godefrid escap'd, and travelling into several Parts with one Turfrid, at length gather'd some Men together, and laid Siege to Tork, where he us'd all verbal Methods to induce the Inhabitants to yield, but not prevailing, he retir'd, and was shortly after taken with Turfrid, and imprison'd in a Castle, from whence by deluding their Keepers they made their Escape. Turfrid not long after was shipwreckt and drowned at Sea; Godefrid after having endur'd much Misery, came in a suppliant Manner to the King's Court, who kindly receiv'd him;

but after he had been generously treated for four Days, he suddenly retir'd to his Ships, and his old Employment of Piracy. In the mean Time King Athelstan demolish'd a Castle which the Danes had fortify'd at Tork, and carefully divided the large Booty he found in it among his Soldiers: For this Prince was so liberal, that he never hoarded up Money for himself, but bestow'd what fell to him, either among his faithful Servants, or upon Monasteries,

But now a great Tempest began to gather against him in the North, where Constantine King of Scotland, exasperated by the late Invasion, join'd with Anlaf from Ireland, and engag'd Eugenius King of Cumberland, with great Forces rais'd out of several Nations summon'd to their Assistance. After four Years Preparations they invaded England by the River Humber, and pass'd up the Country to a Place call'd Brunanburg in Northumberland; Athelstan purposely giving way to obtain better Advantage against them. Anlaf perceiving the Valour and Resolution of Athelstan, and fearing his own Forces tho' numerous, resolv'd first to spy out the Posture of his Enemies: And following the Example of King Alfred in the last Age, in the Habit of a Musician, by his Harp and Voice he got Admittance into the King's Tent, where he plaid the part both of a Spy and a Singer. Being dismiss'd in the Evening with a Reward, while he was viewing the King's Tent, and the Avenues to it, he was observ'd by one who had been his Soldier and well knew him; who upon acquainting the King with it, and being blam'd for letting such an Enemy escape, answer'd, That he had first given his Military Oath to Anlaf, and if he had betray'd him, the King might have justly suspected him for the like Treason. But as an Instance of his Fidelity he advis'd him to remove his Tent, which prov'd very seasonable; for a Bishop with his Retinue coming immediately after, and pitching his Tent in the same Place, was the first that lost his Life in the Night Time. For Anlaf chose rather by Night to surprise his Enemy, than fairly to give them Battel in open Field by Day Light; and accordingly he fell suddenly upon the English, and kill'd the Bishop who came but that Night to the Camp, which causing a great Tumult, the King, tho' a Mile off, and his whole Army took the Alarm, and by Day Light came to the Place of the Slaughter, where they found the Assailants tired and disorder'd by their late Travel, and for want of Sleep. King Athelstan with the West-Saxons met with Anlaf himself, and Turketul his Kinsman and Chancellor with the Londoners and Mercians engag'd Constantine; which occasion'd vast Bloodshed on both Sides. The Dispute continuing hot and violent, by reason of the Multitude of the Barbarians, Turketul took with him a select Body of Londoners, and a valiant Captain call'd Singin, and with them rush'd into the Middle of the Enemies, where he hewed down whole Ranks of Men on both Sides of him. He bravely pass'd through the Heaps of Orcadians and Picts, bearing a Wood of Darts and Arrows on his Breast Plate, and breaking in upon whole Companies of Cimbrians and Scots, he at length reach'd Constantine himself, whom he dismounted, and would have taken alive; but the Scots were so concern'd for their King, that they made a very dangerous Resistance, and many of them pressing upon the few English that follow'd him, and all aiming chiefly at Turketul, he began to repent of his Rashness, seeing no Means of escaping or getting off his Prisoner; when on a sudden Singin coming in afresh to his Rescue, kill'd King Constantine. And now their King being slain, the Scots were so discourag'd, that they soon retir'd; and the Report flying about the Army, Anlaf and all his Followers fled, after an incredible Slaughter of Danes and Scots upon the Place. This Battel, which prov'd highly to the Honour and Advantage of Athelstan, was fought from Morning 'till Night, and was the bloodiest that ever had been known in England; in which Ingulph assures us, that besides Constantine, five other Kings were there slain, twelve Earls, and an infinite Number of the inferior Sort. Turketul, who had gain'd so much Honour, not long after, leaving all secular Affairs, became Abbot of Croyland in Lincolnshire, which at his own Charge he had repair'd from the Danish Ruins, and there left the Memorial of his former Actions.

All Kings seek Alliance with him. This Victory added vastly to the Reputation of King Athelstan, and the Fame of it flying through all Christendom, all Kings were ambitious to obtain his Friendship, and on any Terms to make Alliance with him. Henry the Emperor sent Ambassadors to desire one of his Sisters in Marriage for his Son Otho; Hugh King of France requested another for his Son; and Lewis Prince of Aquitain begg'd the like Favour for his own Person. With these Ambassadors were brought such rich and noble Presents as had never been seen in the English Nation, as rich Perfumes, Gems, Horses of the finest Breed with golden Furniture, Vessels of Onyx, and other most rare and precious Things, besides the most valuable Reliques in those Times. All which were kindly receiv'd by King Athelstan, who under the Conduct of Turketul and his greatest Courtiers sent four of his Sisters, who, as Ingulph says, for Chastity were superior to Diana, and for Beauty exceeded Helena. The two Eldest were marry'd to the Emperor's Son and another great Prince of his Court, and the two Youngest to the Kings of France and Aquitain; and the King's Courtiers return'd home loaded with noble Gifts, who to the meanest of them were richly presented. The Renown of Athelstan being so great abroad, nothing could withstand him at home, where soon after his Success in the North against the Scots, he with his Brother Edmund invaded Wales, and with great Ease reduc'd Ludwal their chief King to Subjection. Then causing all the petty Kings of Wales, as well as Ludwal, to meet him at Hereford, under the Name of Tribute he impos'd on them a yearly Payment of twenty Pound Weight of Gold, 300 of Silver, 25000 Beeves, and as many Hounds and Hawks as he should demand. Moreover because in the Western Parts towards Cornwall the Britains and English dwelt confusedly together, which bred Dissentions, and frequently drew the Affections of the English from their Prince, he expell'd all the Cornish Britains out of Exeter, and other Parts of Devonshire; tho' they had formerly dwelt there in equal Right with the English. And to their Country of Cornwall he fix'd certain Limits, dividing it from Devonshire with the River Tamar, as he bounded the other Northern Britains with the River Vaga or Wey.

His Laws. Thus dreaded at home and fear'd abroad King Athelstan liv'd in Peace for near three Years; during which Time he made several Laws, by the Advice of his wise Men and chief Commanders, for the preserving of Quiet, and the Government of his Country. The Substance of these, as well as those of his Father Edward's, are extant to this Day; among which were establish'd the Price of Murder or Man-killing, from the King to the Peasant; the Punishment of which at that Time was only Pecuniary, not Capital or by Death, which because it makes out the peculiar Usage of those Times, we shall recite in particular. The Price of the King's Life by the Common Law of the English was 30000 Pieces of Silver call'd Thrimsa's, suppos'd to be about three Shillings a Piece; whereof one Half was paid to the King's Relations, and the other Half to the Nation or People. The Life of an Arch-Bishop or Earl was valu'd at 15000 Thrimsa's, to be divided as the former: The Life of a Bishop or Alderman at 8000: The Life of a Field-Marshal, Knight-Marshal, or General, at 4000: The Life of a Mass-Thane or Priest, and a Secular or World-Thane, at 2000: And the Life of a Peasant or Countryman at 267 Thrimsa's. King Athelstan still liv'd in great Glory and Renown; and among the foreign Princes that paid their Respects to him, Harold King of Norway sent him a Ship whose Stern was of Gold, and the Sails of Purple, besides other rich Presents; and his Ambassadors were nobly rewarded by the King at York. At length in November 940 this great Prince ended his Days at Glocester, and was bury'd with many Trophies at Malmesbury, after he had reign'd fifteen Years and odd Months. This Prince's great Actions are only fully'd by the Death of his younger Brother Edwin, of whom some Writers tell us, That King Athelstan being jealous of his Virtues, left being added to his Birthright, might some Time call in question his Illegitimacy, caus'd him to be drown'd in the Sea; others say he was expos'd with one Servant in a rotten Bark without either Sail or Oar; where the young Prince in a desperate Condition threw himself into the Sea; but the Servant more patient recover'd Land, and reported the Event. But this Story is believ'd by Malmesbury, by reason of his great Kindness to his other Brothers and Sisters, and says that it was only to be found in the Songs of former Ages, and in no good Author. And Huntington mentions the Loss of Edwin by Sea, but speaks of it as of a sad Accident, and a great Misfortune to King Athelstan; so that we need not trouble our Reader with more Particulars in this Matter. Yet we cannot finish this Reign without taking some Notice of another Romantick Story mention'd by Bromton and other Modern Writers, That in this King's Reign, at the Time of a great Invasion by the Danes, one Guy Earl of Warwick returning from the Holy Land in the Habit of a Pilgrim, at a Time when Athelstan was in great distress for a Champion to fight Colebrand a monstrous Danish Giant, who in Behalf of the Danes had challeng'd any Person the English should bring into the Field; Guy accepted this Challenge, and without being known to any but the King, fought the Giant near Winchester, and kill'd him, and the Danes yielded the Victory; while Guy privately retir'd to a Hermit's Cell near Warwick, and there ended his Days.

9. EDMUND.

The great Athelstan was succeeded in his Throne by his Brother Edmund, who tho' but a Youth of eighteen Years of Age, was not inferior to him in Courage and Bravery. As an Instance of his Power, in the second Year of his Reign he invaded Mercia, and freed that Province from the Authority of the Danes, from whom he took the five Cities of Leicester, Lincoln, Nottingham, Stamford and Darby, where they had been plac'd by his Father King Edward; but at this Time it was not thought convenient that they should continue. For from what Simeon of Durham relates, it appears that he had Matter of Jealousie and Provocation from those Danes who inhabited Northumberland, whose King, Anlaf by Name, wasted the Country from York Southwards to Northampton, but was stopt in his Progress by King Edmund near Leicester. Here Peace was made between them by the Intervention of two Arch-Bishops, Odo and Wulstan, which was enobled by the Conversion of Anlaf himself, to whom King Edmund was God-father, who also not long after receiv'd Reginald, another King, from the Hands of the Bishops at Confirmation. At the same Time their Territories were bounded North and South by Watling-street. But this Treaty continu'd not long in Force; for in two Years Time King Edmund invaded their Dominions, and drove both Anlaf and Reginald out of Northumberland, reducing the whole Country to his own Subjection. Not long after he harra's'd Cumberland, and gave it to Mulcolm King of Scotland, upon Condition that he should assist him in all his Wars both by Sea and Land. Matth. Westminster adds, tho' with no great Probability, that King Edmund having by the Assistance of Lewellyn Prince of North Wales, conquer'd Cumberland, he not only depriv'd Dunmaile of his Kingdom, but also his two Sons of their Eye-sight.

Advantages.*

During the Time of Peace, Odo Arch-Bishop of Canterbury set forth divers Canons, in the second of which he admonish'd the King and the Nobility, that they obey'd their Arch-Bishops and Bishops with all Humility. The King also by the Advice of his Bishops and Lay Nobles, commanded and established many Laws, of which several were purely Ecclesiastical. And to shew his Love to God, and Bounty to his Church, he gave the Town of St. Edmund's Bury, with the Liberties thereof, wholly to the Martyr of that Name, and to the Monks

Monks that liv'd by serving at his Altars; and likewise he added many Privileges and Advantages to the Abbot and Monks of Glassenbury. Thus did King Edmund flourish, still giving Hopes of greater Actions to be perform'd by him, when in the Height of the Expectations of his Friends, and his own Confidence, a venturous Act cut him off, and a strange Accident depriv'd the People of their Prince. The Year that follow'd the Conquest of Cumberland, the King solemnly kept the Feast of St. Augustine, with many of his Nobility, at a Place now call'd Puckle-Church in Glocestershire. As he sat at the Table with his Guests, he espied one Leof a notorious Robber, who for his Crimes had been banish'd by the King six Years before. Being enrag'd at the Man's Boldness of appearing there, without considering his Royal Dignity, he arose from the Table, ran furiously upon Leof, caught him by the Hair, and pull'd him to the Ground. The Robber expecting nothing less than Death, resolv'd not to dye unreveng'd, but pulling out a short Dagger, gave the King a Mortal Wound in the Breast, whilst he lay upon him with his full Weight. The Company being vastly surpriz'd at the Accident, immediately surrounded the Murderer, and cut him in pieces, who yet like a wild Beast at Bay made a furious Resistance, and before he was kill'd wounded several of the Assailants. This was the strange End of King Edmund, after he had reign'd in great Reputation six Years and six Months. His Body was bury'd at Glassenbury, where St. Dunstan was then Abbot; and the Town where he was kill'd was bestow'd on the same Monastery to sing Masses for his Soul. This happen'd in the Year 946.

10. E D R E D.

A. D. 946. Tho' King Edmund left two Sons by the Queen his Wife, namely Edwi and Edgar, yet his youngest Brother Edred succeeded him in the Throne, and was unanimously crown'd at Kingston. The Course of his brave and pious Actions sufficiently shew'd that he did not degenerate from his Ancestors; and he was the very first King of England, who in Writing stil'd himself King of Great Britain. In the first Year of his Reign he subdu'd all Northumberland, which was frequently revolting by the Practices of its petty Princes; in which Action he gain'd such an extraordinary Reputation, that the Scots swore Obedience to him to will whatsoever he should will, as the Saxon Annals express it. But the Northumbrians ever unfaithful, now also shew'd the Unsteadiness of their Disposition. They recall'd Anlaf, and set him up for a considerable Space; and after that they chose one Eric the Son of Harald, a Dane, for their King, against whom Edred enter'd Northumberland, and having wasted the Country, return'd to the South. In his Retreat Eric boldly fell upon his Rear, which engag'd him to face about, and prepare to charge the pursuing Enemy; which so discourag'd the Northumbrians, that dreading to prove what they had sufficiently experienc'd, they threw off Eric's Authority, kill'd Arnanc the Son of Anlaf, with great Presents appeas'd King Edred, and submitted themselves to his Government. And now quitting the Administration of their petty Kings, Northumberland was thenceforth govern'd by Earls, of which one Osulf is reported to be the first. In this late War Wulstan, Arch-Bishop of York, sided, or at least conniv'd, as Malmesbury words it, with his Compatriots in their Revolt, for which he was committed to Prison, where having continu'd a considerable Time, he was at last pardon'd and releas'd, out of Respect to his Gown and Function. As Edred thus proceeded to equal the Worth of his Predecessors, he was seiz'd with a languishing Distemper, and being admonish'd by the Abbot Dunstan of his approaching Death, he did not only bear that Affliction with Patience, but spending his Time in Acts of Devotion, made his Palace a School of all Virtues, and being at length consum'd by a tedious Sicknes, departed this Life on the Feast of St. Clement,

VI. After the Death of Edred the Succession naturally fell to Edwi, the Eldest Son of King Edmund, who now advancing towards Man's Estate, was unanimously admitted King, and crown'd at Kingston. He was now about fourteen Years of Age, and was so extraordinary fair and comely, that he obtain'd the Sirname of Pancalus, or altogether Fair; which Youth and Beauty unhappily expos'd him to the Arts and Allurements of loose Persons. Most Writers give him the Character of a dissolute Prince, and that he gave very great Offence to the Nobility by his inordinate Behaviour on the very Day of his Coronation. At that Time there was a Lady in his Court nearly related to him, who tho' very handsom her self, had a Daughter far exceeding her in Beauty, by Name Algiva: Which Mother and Daughter, by their unchast Deportment, had so insinuated themselves into his Favour, that he could neither be at Rest, nor dispatch any publick Business without them. The Ceremony of the Coronation, and the Dinner being over, he suddenly withdrew himself from the venerable Assembly of his Prelates and Nobility into the Chamber of these Women, where he cast himself upon a Bed between them. This was highly resented by the Lords, but none durst adventure to bring him back but Dunstan Abbot of Glasfenbury, and Kinsl Bishop of Lichfield; who boldly enter'd the Chamber, and finding the Crown laid aside, and the Wearer of it in the Arms of two Concubines, Dunstan sharply rebuk'd the Women, gently reprehended the King, beseech'd him not to put so great an Affront upon his Nobility, and notwithstanding his and their Threats, he pull'd him from them, set the Crown upon his Head, and brought him back almost by Force into the Assembly.

This unusual Way of Proceeding with a crown'd Head had many mischievous Effects; and the Women transported to all the Degrees of Malice and Revenge, resolv'd to procure the Ruin of Dunstan, which they so far effected, that the King caus'd all the Wealth of his Monastery to be seiz'd, and banish'd him into Flanders; nay so great an Aversion he conceiv'd against Men of his Profession, that all the Monks were reduc'd to a low Condition in his Reign; and William of Malmesbury complains, that his Monastery, which for 270 Years had been inhabited by Monks, was now made a Stable of Clerks. He and others concern'd for a Monastical Life relate this Story with sharp Reflections upon his Person, which some others do more indifferently; however he was but a Child, and consequently liable to be seduc'd by the Charms of Women, and the Conceit of his Royal Authority, which he look'd upon as uncontrollable. At length Arch-Bishop Odo excommunicated him, and pronounc'd a Separation or Divorce between him and his beloved Algiva; and the People so resented the Indignities offer'd to the Church, that the Mercians and Northumbrians revolted from him, and set up his younger Brother Edgar, leaving to him the Kingdom of the West-Saxons, the ancient Patrimony of his Family. As for the two Ladies Odo was not satisfy'd with exercising his spiritual Jurisdiction in cutting them off from the Body of the Church, but by the Council and Assistance of the Nobility, he caus'd Algiva to be drawn out of the Court, contrary to the King's Will and Pleasure: And the Severity ended not here; for after that they added Marks of Scorn, defacing her Beauty by hot Irons, and laming her by cutting the Sinews of her Hams; after which they banish'd her into Ireland. Edwi having been King near four Years, and finding that he wanted Power and Interest to revenge himself, dy'd after two Years State of Excommunication. His Death happen'd in the Year 959, and his Body was interr'd in the new Monastery at Winchester.

Edgar the great Monarch of England.

He prepares vast Fleets.

All Nations

He reforms many Vices and Irregularities.

The Death of King Edwi immediately made way for his Brother Edgar,^{Malm.} who peaceably ascended the Throne, and became Monarch of all England at sixteen Years of Age; which Title he bore after an uncontrollable manner, and with a better Colour, and a greater Appearance than any of his Predecessors. His whole Reign was a continual Calm, without Wars or Dissentions, so that he obtain'd the Surname of Peaceable; all which he supported by an extraordinary Care and Vigilance, and with no less Majesty and Authority. His Actions, tho' not without some Mixtures of Vice, were generally noble, politick and pious, and his Government was attended with great Glory and Prosperity. Shortly after his Advancement, in an Assembly held at Branford, he revok'd all the unjust Decrees of his Brother Edwi, and took care to put his Adultress to Death, and for the recalling of the famous St. Dunstan with great Honour, whom he first made Bishop of London and Worcester, and soon after Arch-Bishop of Canterbury. This Prince understood and practis'd the true Interest of his Country, which was to make good Laws, and to be Master at Sea; and was so wise as to know, that it was better to hinder the Invasion of an Enemy, than to suffer his Kingdom to be the Seat of War, which would naturally bring Devastation and Poverty, and make the Conqueror himself a Loser. Upon which Account he with great Diligence and Expence fitted out three vast Fleets, and was the first King of England who was truly Lord of our Seas. For every Summer, says Malmesbury, immediately after Easter, he commanded his Ships from each Shore to rendezvous at a convenient Place, and usually sail'd with the Eastern Fleet to the Western Parts of the Island; then sending that back, he sail'd with the Western Fleet to the Northern; and thence with the Northern, he remov'd to the Eastern Coasts, sailing in this manner quite round the Isle. In all which Voyages he was very diligent to prevent the Incursions of Pirates, and courageous in the Defence of his Kingdom against Foreigners, and no less careful in the training up his Subjects for Military Employments. Each of these Fleets, as we are assur'd, consisted of 1200 Ships, and each of considerable Bulk for those Times; so that the whole Number must amount to 3600 Sail, as some of our Authors expressly affirm, but others say 4000 Vessels; and there are some who add a fourth Fleet to these three, by which means the Number will be increas'd to 4800 Sail, as may be seen in Matthew Westminster.

These numerous Fleets added much to the Fame and Grandeur of this Prince,⁸ gave a rise to that Right so long claim'd by the Crown of England to the Dominion of the Sea, and so clear'd the Northern World from Rovers and Pirates, that all Traders were ambitious of putting themselves under his Protection. This, and the Encouragement given to Foreigners, caus'd great Numbers to come over from Saxony, Flanders, Denmark it self, and other Places. But Malmesbury says that their Arrival was a great Detriment to the Natives of this Island, 'who from the Saxons learnt Rudeness and Fierceness, Effeminateness 'from those of Flanders, and Drunkenness from the Danes; being before free from those Vices, contented with a natural and innocent Simplicity, and not addicted to admire the Customs and Fashions of other Nations. But still King Edgar was very diligent in suppressing these Vices, and particularly that of Drunkenness, which the Danes had introduc'd with such mischievous Effects; upon the Account of which he order'd Silver or Golden Pins to be fix'd to the Sides of their Pots or Cups, beyond which it was unlawful to drink themselves, or cause others to do the same. And because the Lives of the Secular Clergy became more and more luxurious and scandalous, he in a severe Oration to them openly display'd all their loose and scandalous Actions and Vices, and at length committed the Care of their Reformation to Dunstan Arch-Bishop of Canterbury.

bury, Ethelwold Bishop of Winchester, and Oswald Bishop of Worcester, with Order that by his regular Authority, and their Episcopal Censures, the impious Seculars might be ejected, and the virtuous Regulars restor'd to their Monasteries. That Justice might be done in all Parts of his Kingdom, in his frequent Circuits and Progresses through the Country, he took a special Account of the Actions and Demeanor of his Ministers and Judges, so that the greatest Person could not evade the Law, nor the Poorest want the Benefit of it. With the Corruptions and Vices of these Times, he also extirpated the wild Beasts, by imposing upon Ludwal King of Wales an annual Tribute of three hundred Wolves, which so destroy'd them in three Years Space, that in the fourth there was none to be found.

For the Support of his Grandeur, and towards the sustaining of the Charge of his Navies, this Prince had at once eight petty Kings, who being his fiduciary Clients or Vassals, were by Oath bound to be ready at his Command, and to serve him both by Sea and Land; which Oath they took at Chester, where he had order'd them to meet him, as he sail'd about the North of Britain with a great Fleet. Their Names were Kened King of Scotland, Malcolm King of Cumberland, Maccure King of the Isles, with five of Wales, namely Dufval, Griffith, Hurwald, Jacob and Judehil; who all meeting him at his Court of Chester, to set forth the Splendor and Greatness of his Dominions, he went into a Gally, and caus'd himself to be row'd by these eight Kings on the River Dee, whilst he himself held the Steerage, and was waited upon by all his Dukes and Nobility in another Barge. In this pompous Manner he was carry'd to the Monastery of St. John Baptist, where an Oration being made to him, he in the same State return'd to his Palace; and being arriv'd there, he is said to have declar'd to his Nobles about him, That his Successors might then boast themselves to be truly Kings of England, when they should like him be attended by so many Kings his Vassals. King Edgar did not long out-live this Act of Ambition; tho' some say this was but the Epilogue of a more pompous Solemnity, being the same Year publicly crown'd in the City of Bath, with an infinite Confluence of all Sorts of People. This Ceremony, according to some, was omitted 'till the fifteenth Year of his Reign, when he was thirty Years of Age, out of Penance for some former Sins; tho' others are of opinion, that it was this Year only repeated, a Thing not very unusual among the Kings of England. In this or the next Year, according to Ingulph, dy'd Swovebing a Monk of Croyland, in the 142d Year of his Age, and shortly after him another in the 115th; which being in a most fenny and waterish Air in Lincolnshire, is so much the more remarkable. About the same Time dy'd the famous Turketul, who from Chancellor to King Athelstan chose to become Abbot of this Place, and repair'd and much enrich'd the Monastery, after it had been ruin'd by the Danes; and he was the first that by adding to the two great Bells of that Abby six more, made the first tuneable Ring of Bells in England.

The Story of Edgar's Marriage with Elfrida.

Notwithstanding the many just and honourable Actions of King Edgar, this Prince was not without remarkable Stains, especially in relation to Women; which are acknowledg'd by Authors most favourable to his Memory. Of which we have this memorable Instance: Ordgar Duke of Devonshire had a Daughter nam'd Elfrida, so celebrated for her extraordinary Beauty, that the very Flame of her warm'd the King's Affections into the Passion of Love; and to be assur'd of the Truth, he sent over Athelwold his Secretary and Confident, resolving to marry her himself, if she was found as beautiful as was reported. Athelwold at the first Sight of her was so captivated with her Looks, that he conceal'd his Message, and resolv'd to obtain her for himself; which being with no Difficulty effected, he vilify'd her to the King as a Woman of very ordinary Features, and of so small a Stature, as would dishonour his Royal Bed; by which means he marry'd her with the King's own Consent, whole Thoughts he now diverted by other Objects. But at length Athelwold's Enemies discover'd discover'd the Intrigue, and inform'd the King of the whole Deceit; and the more to exasperate him they omitted no Words that might describe the wonderful Beauty of the Lady. Upon which, the King being inwardly inflam'd, resolv'd by another Stratagem to over-reach this Deceiver; and the better to effect it, he with a pleasant Air told him that he would at a set Time give him a Visit, and see whether his Lady was as fair as Fame had represented her. This unexpected Design so exceedingly struck him, that he earnestly begg'd of Elfrida to consult his Preservation, by putting on her worst Cloaths, and deforming her self by what other Means she thought best. She was now sensible that instead of a King she had marry'd a Subject; and this rais'd such a Female Indignation in her, that against the coming of King Edgar she dress'd her self after the most glorious and charming manner that Pride and Resentment could possibly invent. This had such powerful Effects upon the King, that his Love being the more kindled by being so long defrauded, he for a Pretence appointed a Day of Hunting in a Place now call'd Harewood Forest, where he found an Opportunity to compleat his Revenge, and to slay Athelwold with a Dart. The Earl's natural Son coming after the Fact was committed, and viewing his Father's Dead Body, the King sternly demanded of him How he lik'd this Game? To whom he calmly reply'd, That whatsoever pleas'd the King, ought not to displease him; with which Answer the King's Fury was so appeas'd, that he ever after highly favour'd this Youth, and endeavour'd to expiate the Crime committed upon the Father, by the Kindness shew'd to the Son. The King immediately after marry'd the fair Widow, and caus'd her to be crown'd Queen, tho' much against the Consent of Arch-Bishop Dunstan, who never would see her; and she to make the usual Amends for Murthers and other horrid Crimes committed, built a Nunnery in the Place where her Husband was slain.

He is addicted to Women.

Another Thing laid to this Prince's Charge is, that he took a Virgin nam'd Wilfrida by force out of a Nunnery, where she had been plac'd by her Friends to avoid his unlawful Pursuit, and kept her as his Concubine: But for this he was so penitent as to submit to a seven Years Humiliation impos'd by St. Dunstan, without the wearing of his Crown. There was another Story of the King, which shew'd him to have been more constant to his Love, than could be expected from a young amorous Man with Sovereign Authority. Coming to Andover, not far from Winchester, he attempted to enjoy a certain Duke's Daughter highly celebrated for her Beauty, and commanded her to be brought to his Bed. The Mother of the Lady not daring directly to deny him, yet abhorring to be subservient to her Daughter's Infamy, resolv'd by the Favour of the Night to deceive him; and accordingly sent one of her waiting Maids in her room, who was not unhandson, nor wanted Address towards the making of her Fortunes. For as soon as it was Morning, she made an Offer to rise, which causing the King to ask, Why she would make such haste from him, she answer'd, That she could no longer have the Happiness of his Company, because her Lady had set her some Work to finish. This extreamly startled the King, who imagin'd that he had the Duke's fair Daughter in his Arms; and while he continu'd silent, she with the utmost Tenderness besought him to set her free from the cruel Service of her Lady, as a Recompence for her lost Virginity. The King, confounded at his Disappointment, was for some Time divided between Compassion for the poor Maid, and Anger at his being abus'd; but at length he turn'd it all into a Jest, set her free, carry'd her along with him, and lov'd her to that Degree, that he kept himself to her alone, till he marry'd the above-mention'd Elfrida. These were the Stories commonly related of King Edgar, which undoubtedly would have been much aggravated by the Monks, had he not oblig'd them by building so many Morastories, to the Number of near fifty; which indeed prov'd one great Occasion of the Danes conquering England, for by these means he exhausted the Treasury, and gave great Portions of Lands for the Maintenance of the Monks, who refus'd his Son Ethelred Assistance according to his Necessity. However England highly flourish'd under his Government, and his Reign was more splendid and magnificent than any of his Predecessors or Successors. As to his Person, he was both low and slender, yet so well proportion'd, that he often chose to contend with such as were thought strongest in his Court; and dislik'd nothing more than that they should spare him out of Respect, or Fear of hurting him. And he was so warm and courageous in his Temper, that when Kened King of the Scots was jestingly heard to say in his Court, That he wonder'd how so many Provinces should be govern'd by such a little Man, it so fir'd his Mind, that immediately sending for Kened as for some private Business, he drew him out into a secret Place, and taking out two Swords, which he had brought under his Garment, he gave one to Kened, declaring, Now it should be try'd who ought to govern, and who to obey; for it was a Shame for a King to be forward in a Feast, and backward in a Fight. Kened much confounded, fell at his Feet, begg'd Pardon of him, and declar'd, That he had spoken indiscreetly, but no ways intended to his Dishonour or Detraction; with which the King was satisfy'd. After this great Prince had reign'd sixteen Years and two Months, he dy'd in the thirty second Year and Flower of his Age, on the eighth Day of July, and the Year 975. His Body with all Funeral Solemnity was bury'd in the Abby of Glassenbury.

Dun.

VII. After the Death of the great Edgar, the Kingdom was soon brought into a declining and dangerous Condition; and with him dy'd all the Glory and Power of the English Saxon Nation, which in less than one Age after sustain'd the Miseries of many Invasions, and a double Conquest. Nor was the Succession determin'd without Faction and Disturbance; for having two Sons by two several Wives, the great Men of the Kingdom became divided, Arch-Bishop Dunstan, and all the rest of the Bishops being for Prince Edward, his eldest Son, while Queen Elfrida, Widow to the King, and many of her Party, were for setting up her Son Ethelred, then about seven Years of Age; raising some Scruples, and objecting against the Legitimacy of Prince Edward, as if King Edgar had not been lawfully marry'd to his Mother. Whereupon the Arch-Bishops, Dunstan and Oswald, with the Bishops, Abbots, and many of the Nobility, met together in a great Council, and chose Prince Edward King, as his Father had ordain'd by his last Will and Testament; and being thus advanc'd, they immediately anointed and crown'd him at Kingston, he being then but a Youth of fifteen Years of Age. Shortly after this King's Coronation, dreadful Comets appear'd, which were Forerunners, if not Portenders, of the Miseries of the Nation; being immediately succeeded by Barrenness of Ground, Famine amongst Men, Death of Cattel, with other Calamities. Among the Troubles of this Reign none prov'd of more pernicious Consequence than the Factions between the Monks and Secular Priests, which were begun in King Edwi's Days, and now being unhappily reviv'd extended themselves to the Nobility, many of whom sided with each Party. Dunstan with the Bishops and Monks firmly adhered to King Edward, the Seculars and the other Party favour'd Queen Elfrida and her Son Ethelred; and many of the Nobility and great Men expell'd the Abbots and Monks which Dunstan had plac'd in Monasteries, and brought in the Secular Clerks or Priests with their Wives; all which were done by the Force of Arms. To appease these Tumults, and to end the Controversies between the Monks and the Seculars, several Synods or Councils were summon'd, particularly one at Winchester, and another at Caln in Wiltshire. That at Winchester ended with confirming the Monks in their Possession, being mov'd to it by a Voice from a Crucifix, that pronounc'd in favour of them. But this being justly look'd upon as an imposture, the Synod of Caln was conven'd, where while the Dispute continu'd violent, the Room where they met suddenly fell down, kill'd several, and wounded others; but Dunstan strangely escap'd upon a Beam, which some alledg'd was supported by a Miracle: Which Accident in a great measure quieted the Controversie, and brought both Parties to join with Dunstan and the Monks.

King Edward
stab'd.

In the mean Time King Edward kept to a quiet and undisturb'd Life, who being very religious and mild by Nature, out of Self-Denial and Ease, permitted his Step-Mother to order all Affairs as she pleas'd, respecting her as his Mother, and cherishing his younger Brother with the utmost Love and Tenderneſs. She on the other ſide from his Kindneſs conceiv'd a more implacable Hatred, and was no ways ſatisfy'd with the Sovereignty ſhe now enjoy'd, 'till ſhe could force the Title from him; but ſhe ſtill conceal'd her Deſigns with the greateſt Artifices, 'till ſhe found a convenient Opportunity for Execution. At length the Poor innocent Prince, wearied with Hunting, and tormented with Thirſt, while all his Companions follow'd the Game, rode alone to her Palace at Corfe Caſtle in Dorſetſhire, in order to reſreſh himſelf. The Queen receiv'd him at the Gate with all the Marks of Reſpect and Love, urging him to alight from his Horſe; but he reſuſing that, ſhe order'd Wine to be brought to him; but while he was drinking, one of her Servants, before inſtructed, ſtabb'd him with a Dagger in the Back. He exceedingly aſtoniſh'd at this barbarous Treatment, immediately fled with all Speed towards his Companions; but the Wound being mortal, and he ſpent with the Loſs of Blood, fell to the Ground, and having one Foot in the Stirrop was dragg'd through By-Ways, and trac'd by his Blood by thoſe ſhe ſent after him, who brought back the Dead Body, and bury'd it privately at Werham. Here they imagin'd that they had bury'd his Memory as well as his Body; but the Place of his Sepulture, as it is ſaid, grew famous for Miracles, whereupon Duke Elfer, who was acceſſary to his Murder, interr'd it Royally at Shaſtsbury; but notwithſtanding this Amends, he dy'd ſhortly after eaten up with Lice. Elfrida was ſo convinc'd of her Wickedneſs, that from her Courtly and Luxurious Life, ſhe betook her ſelf to very ſevere Penances, as wearing Hair-Cloath, ſleeping upon the Ground without a Pillow, and other Auſterities, in which ſhe continu'd all her Days. Thus fell Edward the Younger, in the eighteenth Year of his Age, after he had only born the Name of King three Years and a half, who for his Innocence, and the ſuppos'd Miracles after his Death, obtain'd the Surname of Martyr: Which Opinion of his Sanctity was the more confirm'd by the great Calamities which ſhortly after puniſh'd the Land, and which the People believ'd were inflicted on them for this Murder.

14. ETHELRED II.

His Brother Ethelred
ſucc.
reigns.

Upon the Removal of the unfortunate Edward his half Brother Ethelred easily ſtept into the Throne; a Youth of a moſt comely Aſpect, but not above ten or perhaps twelve Years of Age. Malmesbury gives us this ſhort Character of Him and his Reign; That he rather diſtreſs'd than govern'd his Kingdom for thirty ſeven Years; That the Courſe of his Reign was cruel in the Beginning, miſerable in the Middle, and diſhonourable in the Conclusion. To Cruelty he attributes the Death of his Brother, which he approv'd of by not puniſhing the Murderers; he was remarkable for his Cowardice and Negligence, and miſerable in reſpect of his Death. His Sluggiſhneſs was predicted by Arch-Biſhop Dunſtan, when at his Baptiſm he ſuperadded his own to the Water of the Font. Yet it was no Inſtance of ill Nature which the ſame Monk tells us, that upon the News of his Brother's Murder, he cry'd out exceedingly; which ſo enrag'd his Mother Elfrida, that for Want of a Rod ſhe beat him with a Wax Taper 'till he was half dead; which gave him an inſuperable Averſion to a Sight of

of those Lights ever after. Shortly after his Brother's Death he was publicly crown'd at Kingston by Arch-Bishop Dunstan, who perform'd the Solemnity with great Reluctancy, and as he put the Crown upon his Head, he in a sort of Prophetical Manner declar'd, That since he had aspired to the Crown by the Murder of his Brother, the Sin of his ignominious Mother, nor those of her Counsellors should not be expiated but by great Bloodshed of his miserable People; for such Calamities should fall upon England as it never sustain'd since it had that Name. About the Time of the Coronation, at Midnight a wonderful Cloud sometimes bloody, and sometimes fiery, appear'd all over the Land, portending, as it was believ'd, the Return of the dreadful Danish Tempest, which had been happily allay'd for above fifty Years.

He is crown'd by Arch-Bishop Dunstan.

These barbarous and inhuman Rovers, understanding the true State of England under the Government of a Child, and not beloved, in the third Year of his Reign landed at Southampton, and from seven great Ships took the Town, pillag'd the Country, and carry'd away great Booty. From whence they pass'd to the Isle of Thanet, which they also wasted; when about the same Time others from Norway did the same by the Country lying about Chester. The following Year these Pirates extreamly harrafs'd the Maritime Parts of Devonshire and Cornwall; and in the next, three other Vessels arriv'd, and much infested the Coasts about Portland; to which Mischiefs this was added, that the City of London was burnt, in the Year 981, but by what Accident is not discover'd. The Disorders hereby rais'd in the Nation were increas'd by Domestick Disturbances: For an unknown Difference arose between the King himself and the Bishop of Rochester, insomuch that the King laid Siege to his City. Upon which Arch-Bishop Dunstan sent him a terrifying Message, admonishing him To beware of the Vengeance of St. Andrew, the Patron of the City. But the King, tho' young and unwise, would not regard Arguments of that Nature, but continu'd his Siege, 'till Dunstan was oblig'd to purchase his Removal with an hundred Pounds; which so affected the Arch-Bishop that he sent him this new Prophetical Message, That since he had respected Silver and Mony more than God and Religion, the Calamities formerly foretold should speedily come upon him, tho' not 'till his own Death. And within two Years this celebrated Arch-Bishop dy'd, and his Death was usher'd in with strange Fevers among Men, and prodigious Fluxes among Cattle. Immediately after succeeded these Mischiefs, which less than a Prophet might foresee: The Danes furiously invaded the Coasts of Devonshire, against whom Goda and Stremewold, two valiant Men, made head, and put them to flight, but lost their Lives in the Contest. For two Years they caus'd but little Disturbance, but in the third they violently infested the Eastern Coasts, under the Command of Justin and Guthmund, and plunder'd the Town of Gippswich, now Ipswich. They were bravely oppos'd by Brictnoth the most valiant Duke of the East-Saxons, who fought with them at Maldon, where great Multitudes on both Sides were slain; but the English were at length worsted by reason of the Loss of their Commander. And now all Havens, Harbours and Landing-Places were fill'd with Danes, who swarm'd in such Numbers into the Land, that it could not be known where to meet them with Advantage. Doubtless the readiest Course had been for this King to have imitated his Father, and mann'd out a sufficient Fleet to scour the Seas; but he was too unactive to follow his Example, and as generally the Humour of a Prince makes a strong Impression upon the Minds of his People, especially the Nobility, and those near him, as he lay idle and useless, so they contracted a dangerous Rust. And agreeable to this sloathful Temper, by Siricius Successor to Dunstan, and two Dukes Ethelward and Alfric, it was advis'd, That those who could not be beaten with Iron, should be brib'd with Gold; of which ten thousand Pounds was agreed, and given them on Condition they should quit the Country, and no more infest the Coasts. An infamous Example, says Malmesbury, and unworthy of Men, to redeem their their Liberty with Mony, which no Violence can force from an unconquer'd Mind.

The Danes renew their Devastations.

This Sum of Mony quieted the Danes for about a Year, but the Sweet of it soon rais'd their Appetites for more. And accordingly they landed in the North, took and plunder'd Bamborough, and then directing their Course to the Mouth of the Humber, they wasted Yorkshire and Lincolnshire on both Sides of the River, kill'd Men, Women and Children, and gather'd a vast Booty. The Country Men with some Precipitation made head against them, but in the Battel, three of the Leaders, Frana, Frithegist and Godwin, being Danes by the Father's Side, betray'd them, and procur'd their Defeat. At the same Time no less Treachery was practis'd at Sea by Alfric the Son of Elfer Duke of Mercia, who having been formerly banish'd for his Crimes, and now recall'd, and intrusted with a Fleet to surprize the Danes in the most advantageous Place, he over Night gave them Intelligence, and then fled to them himself, as Florent relates it; which his Fleet perceiving pursu'd him, took his Ship, yet by some Accident miss'd his Person; but by chance falling upon the East-Angles, they kill'd and drowned many of them. But Huntington says, that the Danes being forewarned by Alfric, not only all escap'd, but with a great Number of Ships setting upon the King's Navy kill'd many of the Londoners, and led many of their Vessels in Triumph, together with Alfric himself. By this Time the furious Swane, King of Denmark arriv'd, who being join'd with Anlaf King of Norway, with a numerous Fleet enter'd the Thames, attack'd London, and endeavour'd to break in and burn it when it was scarcely rebuilt; but the Citizens so strenuously oppos'd their whole Power, that they forc'd them with great Loss to break up the Siege. Exasperated by this Repulse, they invaded Essex and Kent, wasted the Sea-Coasts with Fire and Sword, and then pass'd into Sussex and Hampshire; and Horsing their Foot, they made their outrageous Progress through many Countries, sparing neither Houses, Buildings nor Fields, nor Men, Women or Children. To put a Stop to these Mischiefs, the sloathful King and his unactive Counsellors again implor'd the Assistance of Mony, which was offer'd to the Danes by his Ambassadors; and the Sum agreed on was sixteen thousand Pounds, in expectation of which they retir'd to their Ships at Southampton, where they winter'd. This being a Time for Compliments rather than Action, Anlaf King of Norway receiv'd Hostages for his Safety, and accepted of Ethelred's Invitation to his Court, which was then at Andover. Being royally entertain'd and adopted the King's Son at Confirmation, or Baptism, as also nobly presented, he engag'd to depart the Land and molest the Kingdom no more; and accordingly returning to his own Country he faithfully kept his Word.

New Devasta-
tions.

This was no ill Advice given Ethelred, to take off such a powerful Assistant from Swane; but as Arms abroad have but small Effect without good Council at home, so in Cases of Invasions Consultations without Action will not avail to remove an unfaithful pertinacious Enemy. The Influence of the last Mony operated scarcely three Years, when the Danes with a powerful Fleet enter'd the Mouth of the Severn, and wasted South-Wales, Cornwall and Devonshire, burnt many Towns, and destroy'd Multitudes of poor People; then fetching a Compass, they came and winter'd at Tavestock. The next Year they sail'd to the Mouth of the River Frome, and wasted the greatest Part of Dorsetshire, with many other Parts; and tho' the English several Times made head against them, yet they were always hinder'd from Battel, either by Treachery, or some other Misfortune. It would be an endless Work to relate how the Danes wallow'd up and down in every particular Place, and to enumerate all the Devastations they made, and the Desolations they left behind them. Being march'd into Kent, and having besieg'd Rocheſter, King Ethelred and his Counsellors were so rous'd, that they prepar'd both a Fleet and a Land Army against them. But the King and his Commanders, alike in Disposition, delay'd their March from from Day to Day, and severely oppress'd the Country where they quarter'd; nor did they do any Thing tending to the publick Good, but burden'd the People, wasted the Treasury, and by their foolish and effeminate Carriage more embolden'd the Enemy to proceed; who in the following Year pass'd over into Normandy, probably for Recruits, but at their Return committed greater Hostilities than before. In the midst of these dismal Times, and horrid Depopulations, Oxford and Cambridge were both burnt and destroy'd by the Danes in the Year 1000; and all Studies ceas'd in each of these Places, 'till above 130 Years after, as Thomas Redburn relates, one Robert Bolean began to read his Lectures on the Scriptures Anno 1133; from which Time, adds he, the Scholars have continu'd both at Oxford and Cambridge.

The two Universities burnt.

An. 1000. In the mean Time the King, to make some Diversion, undertook an Expedition both by Sea and Land into Cumberland, where the Danes had been most planted and liv'd in Peace; and there, and in the Isle of Anglesey, he imitated his Enemies in Ravages and Devastations. About the same Time the Danes returning out of Normandy, enter'd the Mouth of the River Ex, laid Siege to Exeter, batter'd the Walls, and resolv'd to storm it; but the Inhabitants, like those of London, made so brave a Defence, that they were oblig'd to retire, all which was immediately reveng'd upon the poor helpless Country People, who after the Loss of their Goods and Houses were murder'd in great Multitudes. At length those of Devonshire and Somersetshire united in one Body, and made some Resistance at a Place call'd Penho, but being overpower'd in Numbers, were repell'd with great Slaughter. This both encourag'd and inrag'd the insolent Enemy, who now horning all his Men, committed greater Ravages in Devonshire than ever, and then return'd with his Fleet to the Isle of Wight, and sometimes there, and at othertimes in Hampshire and Dorsetshire, he without Resistance follow'd this ordinary Course of Life, doing such Execution by Sword against Men, and by Fire against Towns, that he terrify'd all from engaging with him either at Sea or Land. King Ethelred, whom no Adversity could thoroughly awaken from his soft and easie Life, by the Advice of Counsellors as unactive as himself, sent an effeminate yet assuming Courtier call'd Leof, to propose a third Tribute or Present to the Danes for Peace; to which these Devourers readily harken'd, but cunningly enhanc'd the Sum to twenty four thousand Pounds; which being paid down, they desisted from all Acts of Hostility.

More Calamities.

The third Tribute paid to the Danes. 24000 Pounds.

An. 1002. King Ethelred having thus bought off his Enemies, resolv'd to strengthen his Family by some potent Alliance; and accordingly he treated with Richard Duke of Normandy in France, a Person with whom formerly he had great Enmity, and marry'd his Daughter Emma, a Lady of such admirable Beauty, that she was stil'd the Flower and Pearl of Normandy. Her Mother's Name was Gunnor, descended from an eminent Danish Family; for which it was hop'd, that her Interest might be sufficient to oblige the Danes to more Reason and Fidelity. But the King being now swell'd with the Thoughts of his new Alliance, resolv'd upon a violent and dangerous Expedient, which was to take a full Revenge for all the Insults and Barbarities of the Danish Nation. It seems at this Time vast Numbers of Danes dwelt in Peace in all Parts of this Nation, in a manner incorporated with the English, who leading lazy and idle Lives, lorded it over the Inhabitants, whom they made Servants and Drudges, and their Wives and Daughters subservient to their Pleasures; whence they were call'd Lord-Danes, and to this Day in some Countries a lazy idle Man is from thence call'd Lurdane. To put an end to all their Power at once, the King resolv'd upon a general Massacre; and with the utmost Secrecy sent Letters into all Parts, commanding all his Subjects upon a certain Hour on the ninth Day of July, to set upon the Danes wherever they found them, and to destroy them all without Mercy. This Command was strictly executed, and the Danes, who by a League solemnly sworn had been admitted to inhabit among the English, were most most shamefully and barbarously murder'd; no Age or Sex escap'd, the Women were butcher'd as well as the Men, and the Brains of Children dash'd against the Walls. At London, in the Time of this Execution, great Numbers fled to Churches, but those sacred Places were no Security, for they were all without Pity slain as they stood embracing the Altars. And when the Multitude found themselves Masters, they proceeded to new Barbarities, digg'd Holes in the Ground, put Danish Women in them up to the Waste, and then set fierce Mastives upon them, which cruelly tore off their Breasts. A popular Fury, when back'd by Authority knows no Bounds, nor Authority it self, when it has broken publick Justice. There were several Danes of the highest Quality in the Land, receiv'd upon the publick Faith as Hostages to ratifie the late Peace; among whom was King Swane's Sister Gunildes, Wife to Count Paleng, who several Years before had come into England with her Family, where she had receiv'd the Christian Faith; and being a Woman of great Prudence and Temper, had often interpos'd to make Peace between the two Nations, and had now lately given up her self, her Husband and her Son as Hostages to King Ethelred. This Princess had first her Husband and Son slain before her Face, and was then order'd to be beheaded her self, which Sentence she took with an unconcern'd Bravery and Courage, and at her Death foretold, That her Blood would cost England dear, and would not be long unreveng'd.

King Swane resolves to revenge it.

Nation.

The Consequences of this horrid Massacre were very terrible to the English Nation; for King Swane being exasperated to the highest Degree of Rage and Resentment, invited all Strangers to his Assistance, and resolv'd contrary to his former Methods, to make a full Push, and conquer the whole Kingdom. Accordingly with a powerful Fleet, arriving at the South Western Parts of the Nation, by the Treason or Negligence of Count Hugh, whom Queen Emma had recommended to the Government of Devonshire, he storm'd the City of Exeter, demolish'd the Walls from the East to the West Gate, and march'd off with great Booty. After this he wasted Wiltshire, where a strong Party drawn out of several Countries, advanc'd to give him Battel. But when the Armies were just ready to engage, Alfric the English General, whose Son's Eyes the King had put out for the Father's Treason, feign'd a sudden Sickness, and discourag'd his Army so far, that the Soldiers retir'd with Precipitation. Upon which Swane without Resistance march'd up to Wilton, which he both plunder'd and burnt, and having dealt in the same manner with Salisbury, he return'd to his Ships. The following Year he sail'd to the Coasts of Norfolk, where landing he plunder'd and burnt the City of Norwich, using such Expedition, that he altogether surpriz'd the valiant Ulfketel Duke of the East-Angles, who wanting Time to levy an Army, by the Advice of the Nobility of those Parts, made Peace with him. But Swane in a few Days perfidiously broke it, and removing suddenly from his Ships, he soon plunder'd and burnt Thetford. Ulfketel having Intelligence of this unexpected Enterprize, order'd a Party to hasten and burn his Ships in the Harbour, which out of Fear or Design was neglected; while he with the utmost Secrecy and Diligence gather'd together his Forces, courageously march'd against the Enemy, and made a brave Attack, as they retreated towards their Ships. But being inferior in Numbers, most of the best Quality among the Eastern English lost their Lives; yet the Danes receiv'd very great Loss, and with much Difficulty recover'd their Fleet; confessing that in the whole Island they never met with so sharp an Engagement, as they did from this valiant Commander.

The Miseries of England.

So great a Famine happen'd in the following Year that it forc'd a Cessation, and for a while drove Swane back into Denmark, but supply'd the Place of his Sword in the Destruction of the poor People of England, as many of which perish'd by Hunger, as formerly had suffer'd in a Year by his Cruelties. So that England was now in a miserable Condition, and involv'd in all sorts of Calamities: The King was luxurious, sloathful and remiss, wanting Vigour and Resolution in all Emergencies : The Nobility and Officers were negligent and unexperienc'd, yet highly possess'd with private Heats and Animosities, which occasion'd not only a dangerous Difunion, but a betraying of all Secrets to the Enemy : The Church Men hated the King, stood upon their Privileges, and refus'd to contribute any considerable Sums to the publick Necessities. To all which Mischiefs, besides Famine, Providence was pleas'd to add Storms and Tempests, which much endamag'd the King's Ships, and weaken'd the Naval Power of the Nation. So that the Enemy had free Liberty to range and ravage as they thought fit; and accordingly an innumerable Multitude of Danish Ships were seen in Sandwich Road in the Year 1006, from whence Swarms of Rovers over-ran all Kent and Sussex, destroying all with Fire and Sword. The King to oppose them rais'd an Army out of Mercia and West-Saxony, with a Resolution to engage them in Person; but they who held it safer to live by Rapine, than to hazard a Battel, by swift and easie Removals, frustrated the slow Motions of a heavy Camp, and following their usual Course of Robbery, they carry'd a vast Booty to the Isle of Wight, where they safely winter'd 'till Christmas. Then understanding that the King was in Shropshire, where he was wickedly implov'd in the Blood of some worthy Subjects, they over-ran Hampshire and Berkshire as far as Reading and Wallingford, which they burnt with other Places. Then returning by another Way, they found many of the People in Arms by the River Kenet; but making their Way through, they with new Plunder recover'd their Ships. The King and his Courtiers being weary'd with the Fatigues of the last Year's unsuccessful March against the quick Motions of the Danes, agreed to have Recourse to their last Remedy their Coffers; and therefore sent a fourth Time to buy a dishonourable Peace, which every Time prov'd dearer, and now could not be obtain'd under thirty six thousand Pounds, which was extorted from the Nation already half sunk with Poverty. At the same Time Ethelred advanc'd Edric, surnam'd Streone, to the Dukedom of Mercia; a Person who having rais'd himself to his Favour and vast Fortunes, by his subtle and plausible Tongue, shortly prov'd a mighty Instrument in the Ruin of England.

The next Year produc'd something laudable, which shew'd the King had not lost all Care of his Nation; for he enacted that every 310 Hides of Land should furnish out a Gally, and every nine Hides find a Corset and Head-Piece, and commanded the Ships to be built with the utmost Expedition; which when ready, were victuall'd and mann'd with choice Soldiers, and their Rendezvous appointed at the Port of Sandwich, to secure all the Coasts from the Descent of Foreigners. Now a Hide was so much Land as one Plow could sufficiently till in a Year; which made the Fleet very numerous, so that England was believ'd to be now in a safe Condition; when suddenly Dissention, the Bane of all good Designs, sprung up among the Nobility. For this Year, Brithric, the Brother of Duke Edric, proud and deceitful like himself, falsely accus'd Wulwoth, a great Officer of the South-Saxons, to the King, who fearing the Malice and Potency of his Enemy, immediately fled to the Sea, where with twenty Ships he practis'd Piracy upon the Coasts. Upon a Belief that he might be easily taken, Brithric follow'd him with eighty Vessels, but by a violent Storm they were all cast on the Shore, where Wulwoth soon after burnt them. This Misfortune so dishearten'd the King and his Nobility, that they suddenly return'd home, ordering the Fleet up to London; so that the People were tax'd and oppress'd to no Advantage. Upon this, the next Year, Turkill a Danish Earl arriv'd on the Coasts with some Ships, and in August was follow'd by an innumerable Company of Danish Vessels commanded by Hemming and Eitlaf, who landing in the Isle of Thanet, join'd with Turkill, pass'd to Sandwich, and then to Canterbury, where they forc'd the Inhabitants and Neighbours to purchase their Peace with three thousand Pounds. Then returning to their Ships, they sail'd to the Isle of Wight, from whence entering Sussex and Hampshire, shire, they follow'd their usual Exercises of Plundering and Burning. King Ethelred was again so sensible of his Peoples Miseries as to levy Forces throughout the Land, which he order'd in Places near the Sea to restrain their Irruptions; but all was acted so unskilfully, or at least so unsuccessfully, that the Enemy follow'd their Rapines as much as ever. Once having gone further than usual from the Sea, the King suddenly stepp'd in between them and their Vessels, seiz'd on a necessary Pass of theirs, and resolv'd with his whole Army to die or overcome. But after all this fair Prospect, the traitorous Edric, who had now marry'd the King's Daughter, by subtle Arguments urg'd, That as Circumstances now stood, it was their Interest to permit the Danes to pass unmolested; which Council prevailing, the Enemy got safe back to their Ships contrary to their Expectations, with great Joy and Booty. After which they went to the Coasts of Kent, and resolv'd to winter in the Thames, where they maintain'd themselves on both Sides of the River; often attempting to gain London, but were as often repell'd by the Citizens with no small Loss.

A. D.

Before Winter was over, leaving their Ships, they march'd through Chiltern Wood into Oxfordshire, burnt the City, and returning thence with divided Forces, wasted the Country on both Sides of the Thames; but hearing that an Army from London was marching against them, they on the North Side, passing the River at Stanes, join'd with those on the South, and being laden with extraordinary Spoils, pass'd through Surry to their Ships, in repairing of which they spent the Lent following. After Easter, they enter'd Suffolk, and coming near Ipswich to a Place call'd Ringmere, they were warmly entertain'd by the brave Ulfketel and his Forces; but his Men at length giving back, through the Subtlety of a Danish Servant amongst them who began the Flight, lost the Field, tho' the Cambridgeshire Men still made a noble Resistance, which turn'd much to their future Honour. In this Battel fell Ethelstan, the King's Son-in-Law, Oswi a Nobleman with his Sons and many others, together with a great Number of the ordinary Sort. The Danes being Masters of the Field, had now East-England at their Mercy, in which horring themselves, they spent three Months in the most barbarous Ravages, burnt Thetford, Cambridge and other Places, and kill'd all they could meet in their Way, tossing Infants on the Points of their Spears. After this, their Foot by Sea, and their Horse through Essex, return'd to the Thames, where continuing a few Days, they again quit- ted their Ships, and pass'd into Oxfordshire, which they wasted, together with the Counties of Buckingham, Bedford and Hertford; and having burnt the Towns, and kill'd Mankind, and all other living Creatures, they return'd to their Ships. Yet still the same Year they made a third Excursion into Northamptonshire, and burnt that Town with all about it; then as to fresh Pasture they betook themselves to West-Saxony, where having wasted Wiltshire and other Parts, they return'd again to their Ships, as so many ravenous wild Beasts glutted with Blood to their Dens. They were neither yet so wearied with Travel, nor satisfy'd with Wealth, but that in the following Year they took a larger Range than ever. For on the North Side of the Thames, with Fire and Sword they wasted all East-England, Essex, Middlesex, Hertfordshire, Buckinghamshire, the Counties of Oxford, Bedford and Cambridge, with Half of Huntington, and the greatest Part of Northampton; and on the South Side Kent, Surry, Sussex, with the Counties of Southampton, Wilts and Berks.

Dreadful Ravages and Barbarities from the Danes.

Canterbury taken.

Upon these insupportable Mischiefs, Messengers were sent to solicit for Peace, promising them more Money; which they accepted, but without any Intention to keep their Faith. For they soon broke their Words, first by plundering the Country in several Parties, and in September by laying Siege to Canterbury, which in twenty Days they took by the Treachery of Almere the Arch-Deacon. Here they committed unheard of Barbarities by Way of Sport and Diversion: They slew some by the Sword, threw others over the Wall, others into the Fire, hung up some by the Privy Members, Infants torn from their Mothers Breast

Breasts were either tost on Spears, or had Carts drawn over them, Matrons and Virgins were dragg'd about by the Hair and ravish'd; Alfage the Arch-Bishop was taken, wounded, and imprison'd in a noisom Place; Christ-Church was burnt, Monks, Men, Women and Children were decimated, whereof nine were kill'd, and the tenth reserv'd to a Life worse than Death: So that of the whole Multitude there remain'd only four Monks, and eight hundred Men. They kept the Arch-Bishop Prisoner for seven Months, during which Time these barbarous Miscreants were visited with a Plague in their Bowels, of whom two thousand perish'd miserably; and those who surviv'd being grievously tormented, the Christians took Occasion to urge the Delivery of the Arch-Bishop, but they still deferr'd it. As soon as Spring appear'd, the traiterous Edric, and the rest of the Nobility of both Orders assembled at London, where they held their Councils, and continu'd so long, 'till a fifth Sum or Tribute was paid to the Danes, which now was rais'd from thirty six to forty eight thousand Pounds. In the mean Time the Arch-Bishop had his Ransom set at three thousand Pounds, which he constantly refusing to pay or procure, was at length barbarously murder'd by them in a full Assembly of drunken People; his Body being afterwards bury'd in the Church of St. Pauls in London. The Tribute being paid, and the Peace confirm'd by solemn Oath on both Sides, the Danish Fleet retir'd, only forty five Ships remain'd with King Ethelred for the Defence of England against all Foreigners, on Condition to be maintain'd with Victuals and Cloathing. It appears from the Saxon Laws, that besides this Payment of forty eight thousand Pounds, it was this Year resolv'd that a yearly Payment should be made call'd Danegeld, that is twelve Pence upon every Hide of Land in the Nation, for the Subsistence of those who were to hinder the Irruptions of the Danes and other Pirates; which Tax continu'd for about thirty eight Years, 'till it was remitted by Edward the Confessor. So that there were two Sorts of Danegeld; the former, those five occasional Sums formerly recited; the latter, that continu'd Tax last mention'd. But both Sorts alike contributed to the Ends for which they were paid: The former only bought off the perfidious Danes for a small Time; and the other was so far from securing the Coasts by scouring the Seas, that Turkill, who staid behind as Admiral of the new modell'd English Fleet, seems to have done it for no other End, besides squeezing the Nation's Mony, than to give Intelligence to King Swane when it would be most seasonable to reinvade the Land.

The Payment of Danegeld.

Accordingly in July 1013, King Swane with a powerful Force landed at Sandwich, resolving now to make a full Conquest of the Nation; finding it sufficiently weaken'd by Divisions, and exhausted by Poverty. He stay'd but a few Days there, finding Humber to be a more convenient Place, into which he enter'd; and passing up the Trent, he sail'd to Gainsborough in Lincolnshire, where he landed, and encamp'd his great Army. To which Place Earl Uthred with the Northumbrians repair'd to him with all Speed; the Inhabitants of Lindsey, afterwards those of Fisburgh, and by Degrees all such as inhabited North of Watling-Street, yielded up themselves, deliver'd Hostages, and swore Allegiance to him as their King. He only now impos'd upon them the Furnishing of his Army with Horses and Provisions, and then delivering the Hostages and the Fleet into the Hands of his Son Canute, with a choice Party of Auxiliaries taken from the English, he undertook an Expedition against the Southern Mercians. Having pass'd over Watling-Street he gave order to his Men to waste the Fields, burn the Villages, rob the Churches, kill all the Males, and reserve the other Sex for their Lust. Which being rigorously executed, in the Terror of these Actions he march'd to Oxford, and took it sooner than he expected; where having receiv'd Hostages, he hasten'd to Winchester, which in a great Fear also yielded, and deliver'd up their Hostages. From thence he turn'd his Course towards London, and not being careful in finding a Bridge or Ford over the Thames, he lost many of his Men in that River. Nor was his Expedition against London prosperous; for using all Methods of Force and Policy to take the City, where Ethelred himself, and Turkill with his Forces resided, he was bravely repell'd as at other Times. Upon which he directed his March to Wallingford, and after that to Bath, where, after he had made new Devastations, he stay'd some time to refresh his Army. To which Place Ethelmar Earl of Devonshire, with other Officers of the Western Parts, repair'd, gave Hostages, and made Peace with him; whose Example was not long after follow'd by the Citizens of London, who finding it in vain to strive against the Universal Current, and dreading his Cruelties, sent also their Hostages, and made their Peace. Which Things being accomplish'd according to his Desires, Swane was by all the Nation of the English both stiled and accounted King; if by Right we can call him a King, says our Author, who acted all things like a barbarous Tyrant.

Ethelred retires to Normandy.

VIII. From this Time we may date the first Sovereign Power of the Danes in England, for which in the Space of two hundred Years they had been often contending, with infinite Ravages and Devastations. And now Ethelred, being a King more in Name than Nature, thought it most consistent with the Straitness of his Fortunes to send away Emma his Queen, and his two Sons Edward and Alfred with all his Treasure into Normandy to her Brother Richard, the second of that Name, and Duke of that Province. He himself continu'd for some time at Greenwich with the Danish Fleet then lying in the Thames, and from thence remov'd to the Isle of Wight; where having kept a melancholy Christmas, he follow'd them into Normandy, and at Roven was splendidly entertain'd by the Duke, tho' known to have behav'd himself proudly and churlishly to his Sister Emma, besides his dissolute Company with other Women. In the mean Time Swane the Tyrant, residing at Gainsborough, laid insupportable Taxes upon the Country, besides the Contribution for Maintenance of his Fleet; and at the same Time Turkill at Greenwich was not backwards in his Exactions for enriching himself and his Followers. So that both Parties were fully agreed in this, by their Violence and Rapines to harass and exhaust the miserable English Nation. But Swane to all his other Cruelties and Impieties, added one, which in the Opinion of our Writers, compleated his Condemnation. He endeavour'd to prophane the Memory of the King and Martyr St. Edmund, and exacted a grievous Tribute from the Town of St. Edmund's Bury, where his Body rested; threatening that if the Mony was not speedily paid, he would lay the Town in Ashes, demolish the Church of their Martyr, and put the Clerks to various Torments. Now to proceed in a Story, once universally believ'd; because, say they, he would not moderate his Wickedness, divine Vengeance would not permit the Blasphemer to live. But at Gainsborough, as he held an Assembly, incircled with arm'd Men, upon his casting out his Threats, he immediately saw St. Edmund coming arm'd upon him, whereupon he cry'd out, Help, Fellow Soldiers, St. Edmund comes to kill me! upon which Words, he receiv'd a mortal Wound by the Hands of the Saint, and dy'd soon after in great Torment; his Body being bury'd in the City of York. Thus much our Monkish Writers report concerning his Death, which seems to hint this Truth to us, that Swane was kill'd by some unknown Hand, who had the good Fortune to escape. All agree that he met with a sudden End at Gainsborough, which Place was his chief Residence the short Time of his English Sovereignty, and the Place where most of his Ships and Soldiers lay, in order to make their Excursions as occasion requir'd.

Canute succeeds him.

King Swane being dead, his Subjects the Danes elected his Son Canute, or Cnut, for his Successor. But the Inclinations of the English were towards their own natural Prince, whom they assur'd by Messengers sent to Normandy, That they would assist and join with him against all Pretenders, if he would promise to govern them with greater Care and Clemency than formerly. Ethelred before he would put himself self into their Hands, thought fit to send over his Son Edward to promise all good Deportment, and to found the Affections of the Nobility and People, who finding all Things correspondent to his Desires, return'd back with Confidence to bring over his Father. The King was receiv'd by his Subjects with all imaginable Joy and Applause, and he to oblige the Nation, and to answer their Expectations, us'd all Diligence and Dispatch in raising an Army against Canute; who lying now at Gainsborough with his Fleet and Hostages, was no less diligent in levying Men and Horses, threatening severely to chastise the Revolters from his Father's Kingdom. But Ethelred's Forces surpriz'd him before he was fully prepar'd, and constrain'd him to quit the Parts of Lindsey, the Inhabitants of which being left to the Anger of their Countrymen, were prosecuted without Mercy by Fire and Sword. Canute sailing away with his Fleet, and being driven by Weather into Sandwich Road, there to revenge himself upon the English Nation, he cut off the Ears, Noses and Hands of all the Hostages he had in his Power, and setting them a-shore, departed for Denmark to recruit his Army. Upon the Danes Departure another Calamity succeeded; for on the 27th of September, the Sea arose to such a Height, by an impetuous Wind and Tide, that it broke the Banks, and overwhelm'd many Villages, and drown'd a vast Number of People. And notwithstanding this great Damage to the Nation, yet Necessity urging, a new Tax of thirty thousand Pounds was levy'd for paying the Danish Fleet which lay at Greenwich. The next Year produc'd Mischiefs of another Nature, when at an Assembly of the Estates, as well Danes as English, held at Oxford, by the Advice of the traiterous Edric, the King caus'd several Danish Noblemen to be put to Death under Pretence of a Conspiracy against his Person. Besides this, Edric by plausible Words intic'd Sigeferth and Morcar, two Northumbrian Earls, into his Lodgings, and there secretly murder'd them; upon which their Servants and Dependents arose and endeavour'd to revenge their Deaths, but were repell'd by the King's Soldiers, and pursu'd into the Tower of St. Frideswith's Church, where Fire being set to it, they all miserably perish'd in the Flames. The King, without any known Cause, seiz'd upon the Estates of the two murder'd Earls, and commanded Algetha, the Wife of Sigeferth, to be kept Prisoner at Malmesbury, as a Lady of great Power and Interest. But not long after Edmund the King's Son coming thither, fell in Love with her, and without his Father's Knowledge, marry'd her; after which he took her with him into Northumberland, where invading the Lands of Sigeferth and Morcar, he subdu'd that Country.

Canute retires to Denmark.

An. Dni.

About the same time King Canute arriv'd with a vast Power from Denmark, and as some write with two other Kings, Lachman of Sweden, and Olaus of Norway, making for the Port of Sandwich, where it is said that Turkill join'd with him, and gave the English a great Defeat. Canute coasting about Kent, enter'd the Mouth of the River Frome, and by it pass'd up into the Counties of Dorset, Somerset and Wilts, where he committed his usual Kinds of Hostilities. King Ethelred then lay sick at Cosham in Wiltshire, but had his Place better supply'd by his Son Edmund, whose only Infelicity was to have the false Edric join'd with him, which not only hinder'd his present Success, but brought him into great Danger of his Life. For Edric made a Faction in the Army, and plotted the Prince's Death, which being timely discover'd, Edmund was oblig'd to remove suddenly from the Place where he lay. This Discovery gave an Occasion to Edric to throw off the Mark he had worn so long, and openly to revolt to Canute, to whom he carry'd off no less than Forty Ships; which had such an Influence upon the West-Saxons, that they immediately gave Hostages to Canute, and provided Horses for his Army. Canute, being thus strengthen'd beyond Expectation, in the Beginning of the following Year, with Edric the Traitor, pass'd over the Thames at Greeklade, and invaded Mercia, and proceeded in the usual manner with Fire and Sword. Whereupon Prince Edmund gather'd together what Troops he could; but upon their March, the

the Mercians refus'd to meet with the Danes and West-Saxons, except the King and the Londoners would support them, and thereupon the Army disbanded it self. But shortly after, Edmund with great Diligence rais'd more Forces, and sent to his Father at London, to come and join him with all his Power; to which Ethelred agreed, but upon joining their Forces by the subtlety of the Enemy a Rumor was spread, that if the King did not use extraordinary Precautions, he would speedily be betray'd. Which so confounded the dispirited King, that he disbanded his Army, and retir'd to London; while his Son hasten'd into Northumberland, as was suppos'd, to raise a greater Army against Canute. But in this both sides agreed in the same Measures; Canute and Edric wasted one Part of the Country, and Edmund and Uthred destroy'd the other, only with this Difference, that one Party harra's'd the miserable Inhabitants, because they would not revolt, and the other pretended to punish them for their Neutrality. So that the Counties of Buckingham, Bedford, Huntington, Northampton, Lincoln and Nottingham were ravag'd because they dare not oppose King Ethelred; and Staffordshire, Shropshire and Leicestershire were wasted, because they refus'd to fight against the Danes. At length Canute, piercing into Northumberland, Prince Edmund retir'd to London, and Uthred was constrain'd to submit himself to Canute, and give up the North Country with Hostages; which notwithstanding, either by Command or Permission of Canute, he was kill'd by one Turebrand a Danish Nobleman. Upon this, Canute preferring one Eric to be Earl of Northumberland, hasten'd Southwards by another Way to his Fleet; with which he join'd his Army before Easter. About the same Time King Ethelred dy'd at London on the 22d Day of April, 1016, after an inglorious and miserable Reign of thirty seven Years, and was bury'd in the Church of St. Paul's in London.

In this Reign many Ecclesiastical and Secular Laws were enacted or confirm'd, among which these three were uncommon, 'That Priests should not marry, it 'being the Custom then for them to have two or three Wives. That none should 'be sold out of their Country, especially to a Pagan. That Widows should remain so for twelve Months after their Husband's Death. Other Laws were made for the Preservation of the Peace, Correction of false Mony, and bringing of Weights and Measures to a just Rule.

15. EDMUND Ironside.

1016.
His Son Edmund succeeds him in West-Saxony.

The rest obey Canute.

Edmund the third Son of Ethelred, and the Eldest alive, was by the Nobility at London chosen his Successor; who was not his Son by Emma his Queen, but as Matthew of Westminster says by an ignoble Mother, or Concubine, tho' others affirm her to be the Daughter of Earl Thorold, and King Ethelred's former Wife. But setting aside the Obscurity of his Birth, he was a Man without all Exception, both for Strength of Body and Mind, whence he obtain'd the Sirname of Ironside; and he might have made large amends for his Father's Cowardice, and his Mother's Dishonour, had he enjoy'd a longer Life. Having obtain'd the Crown, Edmund hasten'd into West-Saxony, where he was joyfully receiv'd by the People, and acknowledg'd for their Sovereign; while a far greater Number with many Bishops, Abbots, and others of the Nobility meeting at Southampton swore Allegiance to Canute; and having abjur'd the Race of Ethelred, receiv'd an Oath from him of good Government, as well in Religious as Secular Affairs. Canute much animated by so considerable a Part of the Nation, hasten'd to London with his Fleet, about Rogation Week, where being arriv'd on Surrey Side, he caus'd a great Ditch to be made, and drew up his Ships Westward of the Bridge. He also surrounded the City with a vast Intrenchment, and made several Attacks; but the Citizens so bravely defended themselves, that he found it more advantagious to break up; therefore leaving a Guard Guard for his Ships, he hasten'd into the West to meet with King Edmund, before all his Forces were gather'd together. He found him very ill provided to receive an Enemy; but notwithstanding that, Edmund ventur'd to give him Battel near Gillingham in Dorsetshire, with such Success, that he forc'd Canute and his Army to retreat. Encourag'd with this Success, he made greater Preparations, after Midsummer, he resolv'd to engage with Canute a second Time; and meeting him near a Town call'd Swarstan, he gave him Battel, which must have prov'd fatal to the Danes, had not the Traitor Edric, together with Almar and Algar, the chief of the Nobility, who commanded the Hampshire and Wiltshire Men, join'd with them. So that it prov'd a drawn Battel, notwithstanding Edmund perform'd all the Offices of a stout Soldier, and an expert General, which being parted by the Night, was renew'd with great Vigour the next Morning, and Edmund would again have won the Victory, but when he was near obtaining of it, the perfidious Edric cut off the Head of one Ofsmear, who in his Face much resembled the King, and lifting it up on high, cry'd to the English to behold the Head of their Party, and if they valu'd their own Lives to fly immediately. This much startled and discourag'd them, 'till Edmund, sensible of the Cheat, from a Hill made himself known to his Soldiers, and tofs'd a Spear against Edric, which missing him kill'd two other Persons who were next him; and recovering Courage, his Soldiers press'd bravely upon the Danes, but were parted by the Night as before.

Several Battels between him and Edmund.

Canute finding that in all Probability he would receive but small Advantage from a pitch'd Battel, decamp'd in the Night, and returning to London, where he left his Ships, again invested the City. Upon which King Edmund with Speed march'd into West-Sex to recruit his Forces; and now the perfidious Edric, having sufficient Experience both of his Valour and Conduct, thought it the most effectual Method to be reconcil'd to him, that he might reveal his Councils, and by his treacherous Insinuations stem the Current of his good Fortune. He made Application to him, owning him for his natural Prince, swore future Fidelity to him, and obtain'd Pardon for what was past. Being sufficiently recruited, Edmund directed his March to London, rais'd the Siege, and drove the Danes with Dishonour to their Ships. After two Days he pass'd the Thames at Brentford, where many of his Men were lost in the Water; yet coming suddenly upon the Backs of his Enemies, he put them to flight. By his Loss sustain'd in passing the Water, and his several Engagements, the Number of his Men were so diminish'd, that he found himself oblig'd to retire into West-Sex for Recruits; which the Danes perceiving, they return'd and besieg'd London a third Time, using all possible Means to become Masters of it. Yet still the Industry and Courage of the Inhabitants frustrated all Canute's Attempts; so that despairing of Success he drew off his Men, and with his Fleet enter'd a River then call'd Arenne, where landing in Mercia, he proceeded after his usual Way to waste the Country with Fire and Sword; then he caus'd his Foot to pass by Ships to Medway, and the Horse by Land with the Captives and Cattel. In the mean Time King Edmund having with great Diligence levy'd a strong Army a fourth Time, cross'd the Thames again at Brentford, and march'd into Kent; where at a Place call'd Otford, he bravely engag'd the Danes, who not able to sustain the Force of his Arms, fled in great Numbers into the Isle of Shepey. And here he might have obtain'd a compleat Victory, had not Edric, still as treacherous as ever, by his specious Allegations obstructed and detain'd his Pursuit of the Enemy at Englesford: And Edmund, who never wanted Courage, here wanted Prudence to be so mis-led, and from this Time began to be forsaken by his wonted good Fortune.

*Canute besieges

He is several Times worsted.

King Edmund finding the West-Saxons most firm and loyal to him, return'd for a while into their Country for new Recruits, the Opportunity of whose Absence

A bloody Battle at Ashdown.
 Absence Canute took to vent his Malice and Revenge upon a naked People; for marching into Essex, he from thence invaded Mercia, where he shew'd more Cruelty than ever, commanding his Men to omit no Punishment that could be inflicted upon Enemies. Edmund with an Army gather'd out of all Counties overtook and engag'd them in their Retreat at Ashdown in Essex, where a Battel was fought with great Resolution and Bravery on both Sides; and Edmund had a fair Prospect of gaining the Victory, which the impious Edric perceiving, as he had formerly engag'd to Canute, fled over to him with all the Troops under his Command, and so leaving the English overnumber'd and disappointed, by his Villany procur'd their Defeat and Ruin. For they never receiv'd a greater Blow, almost all their Nobility here falling, particularly Alfric, Godwin, Ulfketel and Ethelward, all Dukes; Eadwoth also Bishop of Dorchester, and Wolk an Abbot, who came to the Place to pray for the Army's Success, among the rest lost their Lives. Speed tells us that the Remembrance of this Field was retain'd to his Time, by certain small Hills there remaining, from whence have been digg'd the Bones of Men, Armour, and the Water-Chains of Horse Bridles.

Edmund by Treachery is worsted.

Edmund and Canute fight a Combat.

and divide the Nation between them.

Yet this great Disaster did not so far discourage King Edmund, but by his Diligence in a short Time he brought himself into a Condition to make another Trial of his Fortune in the Field, and both the Armies fac'd each other in Glostershire. Upon which, as Huntington assures us, the Noblemen dreading the Courage of Edmund, and the Power of Canute, began to murmur among themselves, and to declare how foolish it was for them so often to venture their Lives for the Ambition of others, who alone ought to fight for the Crowns they wore. Which Saying being agreeable to the Temper of the two Kings, they generously agreed, to prevent the Effusion of more Blood, and to decide the Controversie by a single Combat between themselves. In which we are told, That their Darts and Lances on both Sides being broken, they fell furiously with their Swords upon each others most incomparable Armor, the resounding Noise of which struck the Ears of the Spectators with Terror, and their Eyes were dazled with the Flashes of Fire which flew from the Swords of these Heroes. At length the admirable Valour of Edmund prevail'd, whom Canute very strenuously resisted, but fearing the Success, he thus obligingly accosted his Adversary: Young Man, the most valiant of all others, what Necessity is there for either of us to dye by the Sword, out of Ambition of Governing? Let us be Adoptive Brothers, and divide the Kingdom; let me have a Share in yours, and do you Command in mine. With these Words the generous Mind of the young King was mollify'd, and a Kiss of Peace was given on either Part; after which their Followers came together, and weeping for Joy, Edmund by Agreement had the Western Parts of the Land, and Canute and the Danes the Eastern. Matthew of Westminster agrees with Huntington as to the Combate, but Malmesbury says that Canute declin'd the Combate, but agreed to the above-nam'd Division of the Land. But Simeon, Hoveden and Florent of Worcester all mention the Division, but say nothing about any Combate propos'd. So great an Uncertainty we have of the Affairs of these Times. All agree that the Danes retir'd to London after this Division, and were peaceably receiv'd by the Inhabitants, and permitted to take up their Winter Quarters in the City.

The Death of King Edmund.

King Edmund did not long survive this Division, but dy'd suddenly at the Feast of St. Andrew, after a very short but vigorous and honourable Reign of seven Months, three Weeks and five Days, and was bury'd by his Grandfather King Edgar at Glassenbury. Our Authors speak as uncertainly about the Death of this worthy Prince, as about his Combate: Simeon, Florent and Hoveden, mention no Cause of it: Malmesbury confesses it was uncertain of what Disease or Casualty he dy'd, but adds, That Fame charg'd Edric with hiring two of his Chamberlains, in whose Fidelity he confided, to murder murder him with a sharp Iron thrust into his Body as he sat to ease Nature. Huntington will have it done at Oxford by one of the Sons of Edric, as the King sat in a Privy-House, with whom agrees Matthew of Westminster. Radulphus de Diceto names neither Place nor Person, but says it was done with an Iron Spit, by the Procurement of the Traitor Edric. Thus Edmund in the same Year both began and ended his Reign; leaving two Sons behind him, Edward and Edmund, and two Daughters call'd Margaret and Christian; besides three Brothers, Edwin by his own Mother, and Alfrid, and Edward, afterwards call'd the Confessor, by his Step-Mother Emma. With Edmund fell the Glory of the English Saxons, and the aged Body of their oppress'd Monarchy, seem'd to be bury'd with him in the same Sepulchre: For however it might seem to recover it self in the same Age, yet it prov'd like a Plant new set after it had been long out of the Ground, which while there remains any Sap in the Root will shoot out fresh Branches, but those so weak and tender, that the least Storm blasts and destroys them. By his Death the Danes prevail'd, and the Saxon Monarchy in a great measure ended, after it had continu'd 189 Years from the Establishment made by King Egbert, 421 after the Saxons had wholly dispossest the Britains, and 567 after the first Entrance of the Saxons under Hengest and his Companions.

CHAP. V.

From the Beginning of the Monarchy of the Danes in England under Canute, to the Death of Hardecnute, the last King, and the Restoration of the Saxons in Edward the Confessor.

Containing the Space of about 26 Years.

16. I. CANUTE.

I. THE Danes had formerly in some Parts of the Nation, as in East-England and Northumberland, set up their petty Kingdoms, but now at length, after two hundred Years Struggle, they obtain'd the entire Monarchy of England. They had formerly been Strangers, fierce Invaders, and savage Destroyers, but now they became principal Inhabiters, and chief Proprietors, and Canute one of their Kings Lord of the whole; soften'd and civiliz'd not so much by Christianity and good Education, as by Policy and Secular Interest. This Prince upon the Death of King Edmund, finding that he had several Relations left, who were dear to the English Nation, summon'd all the Bishops and Nobility to meet at London, and subtly demanded of such as had been present at the Agreement between him and Edmund, What Provision was made by that Agreement for the Sons and Brothers of Edmund, and whether in case Edmund dy'd before Him, any of them was to succeed in the Kingdom of the West-Saxons? They being overcome with Fear made Answer, That to their Knowledge Edmund neither living nor dying had made any Provision for his Relations, but design'd Him the Protector and Guardian of his Sons 'till they should come to Age. By this false Testimony they hop'd for Favour and Rewards from Canute; but some of them receiv'd a just Recompence for for their Perjury, by being not long after put to Death. But Canute taking the Advantage that it afforded him, immediately exacted Oaths of Fidelity from all the Nobility, who readily chose him for their King, and at the same Time abjur'd the two Sons of Edmund from ever being Kings of this Nation. Thus Baseness and Fear caus'd the English Nobility servilely to submit, so that there was no want of any Thing to effect his Purposes but his bare Commands; which they often prevented by their Readiness in doing those Things, to which they knew he was but inclin'd. For Edwin, the Brother of King Edmund, a young Prince of excellent Endowments and great Hopes, was by them immediately vot'd to Banishment; which Resolution so full of Injustice and Flattery, gave Occasion to Canute, immediately to consult with the Traitor Edric how to take his Life. This wicked Design was by Edric first left to one Ethelward, who did not answer their Expectations; so that a seeming Reconciliation was pretended, and Edwin recall'd from Banishment, by which means Opportunity was given for some to end his Life whom he had most trusted. Edric not satisfy'd with this, advis'd Canute also to put to Death the two young Sons of King Edmund, namely Edward and Edmund; but this being accounted a Thing very odious, and such as would exasperate the People to have them murder'd in England, within a short Time they were sent to the King of the Swedes there to be dispatch'd, who notwithstanding the League and Kindness between him and Canute, abhorr'd the Fact, and by no Intreaties would be brought to commit it, but convey'd them to Solomon King of Hungary, by him to be carefully educated. Edmund in process of Time ended his Days in that Retirement; but Edward marry'd Agatha Daughter to Henry Emperor of Germany, by whom he had Margaret afterwards Queen of the Scots, Christina that turn'd Nun, and Edgar-Aetheling, who shall be treated of hereafter.

Canute divides England into four Parts.

Canute being settled in his new Power and Sovereignty over all England, divided his Kingdom into four Parts; he committed the Government of Mercia to Edric, as an Instrument not yet to be laid aside, assign'd East-England to Earl Turkill, Northumberland to Eric, and reserv'd West-Saxony, as the ancient Possession of the English Line, to his own proper Management. After which he proceeded to punish such as were concern'd in the Death of King Edmund, who having discover'd themselves in Hopes of a Reward, he kept them close Prisoners, and in a grand Assembly of the People caus'd them to be executed, as those whom their own Mouths had condemn'd. Having thus smooth'd the Way, he made a Covenant with the Nobility and People, to govern according to Law, which was confirm'd by Oath, and an Amnesty decreed for whatsoever had formerly pass'd between the two Nations. Then to strengthen and establish his Interest, after the Death and Absence of all Competitors, he su'd and marry'd the famous Emma, Widow of King Ethelred, in July following; concluding that it would win him the Hearts of the People, and divert the Thoughts of her Brother Richard Duke of Normandy from the Sons she had had by the former King. Being now arriv'd at the Height of his Wishes, he thought fit to remove the Scaffolds by which he had ascended, lest they should serve the End of some other Pretender. He had for a long Time made use of the Treachery of Duke Edric; but now instead of loving he detested the Man, as well out of Fear as Honour, therefore thought it high Time to remove him. It is reported that after he had procured King Edmund to be slain in the Manner before related, he came to Canute and congratulated him as sole Monarch of England, to whom the King answer'd, That for so great a piece of Service he would exalt him above all the English Nobility. Remembering therefore that Promise, at a Time when Edric began to upbraid him with his great Services in betraying his two Sovereigns Ethelred and Edmund, he convicted him of Treason from his own Mouth, and caus'd him in the Time of Christmas to be beheaded, and his Head to be set upon a Pole on the highest Tower in London. Authors vary as to the Manner of his Execution, but all agree that he

he receiv'd the just Reward of his Villanies. Upon his Account several other Noblemen were put to Death, as Norman the Son of Duke Leofwin, Ethelward the Son of Duke Aglemar, and Brithric the Son of Elfege Governor of Devonshire, who suffer'd under the Pretence of being Accomplices, or at least Familiars with this Traytor. But still King Canute thought himself not secure, but by keeping a standing Army in the Nation, for the Maintenance of which, in the following Year, he exacted a severe Tax of seventy or eighty two thousand Pounds out of all England, besides fifteen thousand out of the City of London. But no less than these Severities could be expected from an Usurper and a Foreigner; yet after a few Years, at the Importunity of the Nobility he sent back his Army to Denmark, having first taken Security for the Safety of his Nation by a particular strict Law made against killing any Danes.

Canute lays a severe Tax upon the Nation.

Dnn. These Things were done in the South, while in the Northern Parts a Contest arose between Malcolm Son of Cyneth King of the Scots, and Uthred the Son of Waldef Earl of Northumberland, or rather his Successor Eric, for Uthred was slain by Canute two Years before. This Rupture proceeded to a great War, as our Author terms it, wherein on the Parts of the Scots, Eugenius Calous King of the Lothians was engag'd; but he does not tell what were the Effects of so great a Controversie. In the mean Time King Canute having united the English and Danes in one Government, thought the best Cement would be to frame their Minds to the same Laws and Customs, for which purpose he call'd a general Assembly to Oxford, where both Parts consented to observe the Laws of King Edgar and Ethelred. And here they establish'd many wholesom Acts both for the Clergy and Laity to observe, some of which are extant in Lombard, and a few of those touching Religion we have mention'd here, as having been observ'd a long Time after, and some of them to this Day. And first, for the Celebration of God's most Divine Service, it was ordain'd, 'That all decent Ceremonies, tending to the Encrease of Reverence and Devotion, should be us'd as need requir'd. That there should be no Markets, Fairs, Assemblies, or other Secular Actions practis'd on the Lord's Day. That all Christians should receive the Eucharist, or Sacrament of the Lord's Supper at least three Times in the Year. That if a Priest kill'd a Man, or committed any notorious Crime, he should be depriv'd of his Order and Dignity. That a marry'd Woman convict of Adultery, should have her Nose and Ears cut off. That a Widow marrying within twelve Months after her Husband's Decease, should lose her Jointer and Dowry. These and many others were made, whereby Sin and Looseness were much restrain'd, and the Nation peaceably and justly govern'd. As also were divers other Countries by this King's pious Endeavours; particularly by means of a young Gentleman of the Danish Royal Blood nam'd Odin, whom Canute brought over with him into England to be instructed in Learning, where he improv'd so well, and by his Travels through France, that he obtain'd the Sirname of Sapient; and afterwards by his Preaching in Finland, Zeland, Scandia and Swedeland, he converted great Multitudes of Pagans to the Christian Faith.

Dnn. King. West. An. King Canute having so well settled his Affairs here, he thought he might safely give a Visit to his ancient and native Kingdom of Denmark, to which Place he sail'd in the third Year of his Reign, and continu'd there the whole Winter. Huntington writes, that he led thither an Army of English and Danes against the Vandals, by which he must mean no other than the Swedes: That incamping near his Enemies with Intention not to fight 'till the next Day, Godwin the English General without his Knowledge set upon them unprepar'd, kill'd many, and put the rest to flight. In the Morning the King, imagining that the English were either run away or revolted to the Enemy, let the Danes in order of Battel, and advanc'd towards the Swedish Camp, where he found nothing but Blood, Carcasses and Plunder, which caus'd him not only to reward Godwin with an Earldom, but exceedingly to prize the English, and to hold hold them in no less Esteem than the Danes themselves. In the Spring he return'd into England, and at Easter held a grand Council at Circester, in which he banish'd Duke Ethelward, or Edward, as others call him. In the following Year, fearing the growing Greatness of Earl Turkil the Dane, he banish'd him and his Wife Egitha out of England; and found occasion to do the like by Eric the Danish Earl of Northumberland, upon the same Principle of Jealousie. As soon as they set foot in Denmark, Matthew says, that Turkil, who had first perswaded King Swane to invade England, was kill'd by the Noblemen of the Country. But whether it was that these banish'd Persons excited the People against their King, or that his Absence caus'd his Authority to be despis'd, Huntington tell us that Canute in the ninth Year of his Reign carry'd over another Army against Ulf and Eilaf, who had rais'd such great Numbers against him both by Sea and Land, that they gave him a considerable Defeat. But others make this the same Expedition with the former; and indeed had his Affairs been so much embroild'd now in Denmark, he would not so soon have cast his Thoughts upon the Conquest of Norway; from whence having Intelligence that the People despis'd Olaus their King, he sent great Sums of Money to make way for his own Power, which had such prevailing Effects, that in the following Year 1028, he found sufficient Incouragement to sail into Norway with Fifty Ships. The Success was, that he drove Olaus out of his Country, and then easily reduc'd it to his own Power, whither Olaus the following Year returning to try the Minds of the Revolters was slain by them with all his Followers. Canute being now King of England, Denmark and Norway, return'd with Applause into England; tho' not so secure in his Thoughts, but that under colour of an Embassy, he sent into Banishment Hacun a powerful Dane, who had marry'd the Daughter of his Sister Gunilda. This Man was grown so powerful and popular, that he stood in fear of being kill'd or depos'd by him, and thereupon he drove him to such Extremities, that within twelve Months he either perish'd at Sea, or else was kill'd in the Isle of Orkney.

Such were the Fears of this Prince, and such the Means he us'd to prevent them, declining no Actions or Methods that might fix and secure the Crown on his Head. But now the Occasions and Temptations for Injustice being remov'd, he resolv'd to be eminently religious, as such who having gain'd vast Riches by infamous Practices, frequently think to appease the supream Majesty of Heav'n by dedicating some part of them to pious Uses. Accordingly in the fifteenth Year of his Reign he took a Journey to Rome, visited the Tombs of the holy Apostles, and on St. Peter conferr'd extraordinary Quantities of Gold, Silver and other valuable Presents; procur'd from Pope John a Relaxation of all Tribute and Toll to the English School there, gave large Alms to the Poor both in his Passage and Return, and bought off several Tolls and Impositions laid upon Travellers. From this City he sent an Epistle to the English Bishops and Nobility, which is extant in Malmesbury and begins thus. 'Canute King of all England, Denmark, Norway and Sweden, to Ailwoth Metropolitane, &c. Wherein, having first given the Reason of his Pilgrimage to Rome, which was especially to honour St. Peter, he makes relation of his honourable Entertainment with the Pope, the Emperor Conrade, and other Foreign Princes, shewing what excessive Sums were exacted by the Pope from the English Arch-Bishops, when they receiv'd their Palls from Rome; for the redressing of which, and other Grievances, the Pope oblig'd himself in a solemn Assembly of four Arch-Bishops, twenty Bishops, and an innumerable Multitude of Princes and Noblemen. Then he proceeds in vowing the Remainder of his Life and Reign to the only Service of God, and the due Administration of Justice to his People; to which end he first gives Command to his Counsellors, that thence forward they presume not, upon any respect to give Countenance to the least Injustice in his Kingdom: And next to his Officers of Justice, that as they tender his Royal Favour, and their own Lives, they deviate

‘not from exact Equity, in respect of any Man whatsoever, no not for the enriching of the King’s own Treasury, because, adds he, there is no Necessity that my Revenues should be augmented by any unjust Exactions: And so concludes with a strict Charge to all his Bishops and Justices, upon their Allegiance both to God and himself, to take care in his Absence, that God’s Church and his Ministers be not defrauded of their Tithes and Rights, whereof he vows at his Return to take a most severe Account.

From Rome this King went to Denmark, and at his Return to England he spent a great Part of his Time in building and repairing Monasteries and Churches. He returns to England. In Essex he built the Church of Ashdown, in the Place of that great Victory over King Edmund which won him the Crown. In Norfolk he founded the noted Abby of St. Bennet’s in Holme, which Saint he highly respected; and in Suffolk with a special Devotion he rebuilt and endow’d the Monastery of St. Edmund’s Bury, which Saint he no less dreaded. His Buildings; For it is reported that the seeming Ghost of St. Edmund often affrighted him; for which Cause, as also to expiate the Sins of his Father, who had done great Damage to his Possession, he surrounded the Monastery with a deep Ditch, and offer’d up his Crown at the Martyr’s Tomb. He gave rich and extraordinary Jewels to the Church of Winchester, of which one is recorded to be a Cross, worth one Year’s Revenue of the Kingdom; and to Coventry he gave the Arm of St. Augustine the great Doctor, which he bought at Pavia in his Return from Rome, for which he paid a hundred Talents of Silver, and one of Gold. The Magnificence of this great King now so shin’d in the Eyes of his Courtiers and Flatterers, that they extoll’d him equal with Alexander, Cyrus and Cæsar, and applauded him as possess’d with more than Human Power. But to convince and reprove such mischievous Instruments, and to shew the small Power of Kings in respect of the King of Heav’n and Earth, he caus’d his Royal Seat, says Huntington, to be plac’d by the Sea-shore at Southampton while the Tide was flowing in; and being seated in his Robes, and his Courtiers about him, he with all the Air of Majesty spoke in these Terms, Thou Sea art under my Dominion, and the Land on which I sit is mine; nor has any unpunish’d resisted my Commands: I charge thee therefore presume no further upon my Land, nor dare to wet the Feet of thy Sovereign Lord. But the Sea, as at other Times, came rolling on, and both wet his Feet, and dash’d against his Robes; which caus’d him suddenly to rise up, and cry’d out, Let all the Inhabitants of the World know how vain and frivolous is the Power of Kings! Nor is there any that can deserve that Title, but he whose eternal Laws the Heav’ns, Earth and Sea obey. From which Time this King would never wear his own Crown, but commanded it to be put upon the Head of the Crucifix at Winchester. From whose Example, according to Petrus Piſtaviensis, arose that Custom of hanging up the Armour of great Men in Churches, as Offerings made to God, by whose Assistance they had obtain’d any Honour to themselves, or Benefit to their Country, either by Victory, or an honourable Death. He reproves his Courtiers by an Example.

This King’s Building of so many Churches and Monasteries so far repair’d his Fame and Esteem with the Monkish Writers, that notwithstanding all his Violence and Injustice, and his being a Deposer, and a Procurer of the Death of King Olaus one of their Saints, they all dismiss him with a very fair Character. Nay some tell us, that for his Piety he was rewarded with another Kingdom, that of Scotland, which, according to Matthew of Westminster, at this Time depended on England; for he writes that the Scots now rebell’d, and that thereupon he march’d thither with an Army, and easily conquer’d Malcolm the King, with two other Reguli which Huntington mentions by the Names of Melbeathe and Fermare. But if the Kingdom of Scotland was given him for his Piety, that of Heav’n follow’d not long after; for within two Years he dy’d, at Shaftsbury on the twelfth Day of November, and was bury’d in the old Monastery at Winchester, after he had reign’d nineteen Years, wanting a few Days. It cannot wife inhibiting Him from taking those Things away which he had committed to God and that holy Place. But notwithstanding all this Zeal and Resolution, the Arch-Bishop was at length prevail'd upon by Threats or Promises; so that the Ceremony was perform'd, and Harold acknowledg'd King of all England.

As to the Character of this Prince, Brompton tells us, That in all Respects he degenerated from the Worth of his Father Canute, for he was altogether careless both as to Matters of War and Peace, only he would pursue his own Will, and what was misbecoming his high Station, chose rather to go on foot than ride, whence from the Lightness and Swiftmess of his Feet he was call'd Harold Harefoot. One of the first Things he attempted was to insnare and destroy his Emulators and Rivals in the Throne, particularly King Ethelred's two Sons, Edward and Alfred, then in Normandy. In order to effect his Purpose, the Author of the Encomium Emmae says that he forg'd a Letter to these two young Princes in the Name of Queen Emma their Mother, earnestly inviting them into England: Wherein, personating her, 'She seem'd to chide them gently for their Delay, in not coming over to inspect their own Affairs; since they could not but know that it daily confirm'd the Usurper in his Power, who omitted no Artifices to gain the chief Nobility over to his Party; yet also as-sur'd them that the English Nation had much rather have one of them to be their King; and in conclusion, urg'd them to come as speedily and as privately as they could, to consult with her what Methods were most proper to be taken. This Letter was sent to the two Princes in Normandy by an express Messenger, with Presents also, as from their Mother; which they innocently and joyfully receiving, return'd answer by the same Hand, That one of them would be with her shortly, naming both the Time and Place. Alfred the younger was judg'd most proper for this Affair, who at the appointed Time, with a few Ships, and a small Number of Normans on board, appear'd on the Coast, and no sooner landed, but fell into the Snare that Earl Godwin had laid for them, being sent purposely to betray them. For being deluded into a Belief that he was sent for by the King then at London, he was in the Way met by Earl Godwin at Guilford, who with all seeming Friendship kindly entertain'd him, but in the Night surpriz'd the Prince and made him Prisoner, with all his Company, to the Number of about six hundred Normans. Most of these were us'd with the greatest Barbarity, put to various Kinds of Torments and cruel Deaths; and being twice decimated, every tenth Man suffer'd without Mercy. The unfortunate Prince was brought to London, and by the King sent bound to Ely, where he had his Eyes put out as soon as he landed; and being deliver'd up to the Monks to be kept there, out of Pain and Grief he dy'd soon after in their Custody. This did not satisfy King Harold, for soon after he banish'd the Mother Queen Emma out of the Kingdom, tho' Winter was then begun. She retir'd not into Normandy, because, as some alledge, Duke William, the base Son of her Nephew Robert, was then in the French Court, and some add, that her Son Edward was gone into Hungary to consult with his Cousin Edward, whom Canute had formerly banish'd thither. Therefore she went directly to Flanders, where she was courteously receiv'd by Baldwin Earl of that Country, who pitying a distressed Lady and Queen, assign'd her Bruges for her Habitation, and munificently provided for her during her whole Continuance.

Emma banish'd.

After two Years this Queen was visited by her Son Harde-canute out of Denmark, and they comforted themselves with the Hopes of better Fortune, that either the Hearts of the English would relent, or the Usurper by some other Means finish his Days or his Reign. Harold on the other Side, encourag'd by Possession, omitted nothing that might serve to exclude them, or any other Pretenders; and accordingly provided himself with a Fleet, the only Bulwark of the Island, for the furnishing of which every Port in the Nation was oblig'd to pay eight Marks of Silver to every sixteen Ships. This Tax so exasperated the English, that it gave Occasion to the Welsh to commit several Acts of Hostility;

But these Things could not accomplish the Hopes of the Banish'd, which was left to be effected by Death, which not long after on the sixteenth Day of April seiz'd upon King Harold, after he had reign'd with no Reputation four Years and as many Months. He was bury'd at W. stminster, and left neither Wife nor Child behind him. As for his Laws we have only one mention'd by Mr. Selden, which was, That whatsoever Welsh Man, coming into England without Leave, was taken on this Side Osfa's Ditch, should lose his right Hand.

III. The States of the Land as well English as Danes, that had stood up for the Interest of Harold, now seeing him fallen, thought it most advantageous to make way for their Peace, before Harde-canute should command their Obedience by his Sword: Therefore they unanimously sent Messengers to him at Bruges, where he continu'd with his Mother, humbly desiring him to come over, and receive the Crown as his Right. Hereupon he hasten'd to Denmark, there to settle Affairs, and from thence with sixty Ships and many Soldiers he came over in the Month of August, and landing at Sandwich was there joyfully receiv'd, and both by English and Danes admitted, and crowned King. Having obtain'd the Kingdom, he perform'd but little worthy of his Condition and Station, but made use of that Advantage only to please and gratifie his exorbitant Passions. His first Undertaking was to shew his Resentment against Harold, for the Injuries offer'd to himself and his Mother, whose Body he caus'd to be digg'd up by Alfric Arch-Bishop of York, Earl Godwin and others, the Head to be cut off, and both that and the Trunk to be cast first into a Ditch or Privy, and then into the Thames, where being caught in a Fisherman's Net, it was by some of his Relations convey'd to Land, and bury'd in a Burying-Place of the Danes, which constant Tradition affirms to be the Church and Church-yard of St. Clements Danes in London. Following on this Course of Revenge, which some stile by the Name of Piety to his Relations, he deservingly depriv'd Living Bishop of Worcester, who was concern'd in the barbarous Treatment of his Brother Alfred; but within a Year he was appeas'd with a Sum of Mony, and restor'd him. Godwin that subtle Earl found Means to purchase his Peace with an extraordinary Present, which was a Gally with a gilded Stern, wonderfully rigg'd, furnish'd out with all Conveniencies both for War and Pleasure, and mann'd with eighty choice Soldiers, every one having upon each Arm a Golden Bracelet weighing sixteen Ounces, an Helmet and Corlet finely gilt, a Danish Scimitar adorn'd with Silver and Gold hung on his left Shoulder, in his left Hand a Shield with gilt Bos and Nails, and in his Right a Lance, which in the Language of the English was call'd a Tegar. This uncommon Present was not sufficient 'till he also took a solemn Oath, 'That Prince Alfred lost not his Eyes by his Advice or Desire, but in that he merely obey'd King Harold, then his Sovereign Lord; which Oath was also taken by most of the Nobility of the Land.

At the same Time he enquir'd after such as had been cruel to his Relations, and much incurr'd the Displeasure of the People by a new Tax he laid, for the Payment of eight Marks to every Rower in his Navy, and twelve to every Officer, a Burden so heavy, that every one repented their helping of him to the Crown. However he collected the Tax with all Rigour, insomuch that two of his Officers for that purpose call'd Feader and Turstan, going to Worcester, were slain by the People. The King highly incens'd sent Leofric Duke of Mercia, Godwin of the West-Saxons, Siward of the Northumbrians, and others with great Forces, and Orders to kill all the Men, to burn the City, and waste all the Country. Terrify'd with this News, all the People fled, the Country Men to several remote Parts, and the Citizens to a small Island in the Severn call'd Beverage, which they fortify'd and valiantly defended, 'till Peace was granted them, and free Liberty to return home; but they found their City plunder'd and burnt. Appeas'd with this Act of Severity, Harde-canute began to show a better Temper, and shortly after he gave a kind Entertainment to Edward his Brother, the Son of King Ethelred and Emma, who now return'd home, after a tedious Exile in Normandy. To his further Commendation he took care to prefer his Sister Gunhilda to be Wife of Henry the German Emperor; a Lady of admirable Beauty, who in her Father's Time had in vain been courted by several Lovers. Her Brother sent her forth with all imaginable Pomp and Splendor, the Nobility both accompanying her to the Sea, and greatly contributing to the Expences, besides what the King's Exchequer could furnish. But Covetousness was not this Prince's Crime, for he delighted in extravagant Expences, especially in Banquets and Feasting; and he allow'd four Meals a Day in his Court, which Huntington attributes to his Bounty, as rather desiring that Meat should be taken away untouch'd from such as were invited, than that such as were not invited should complain of Scarcity. As Harde-canute liv'd so he dy'd in his beloved Custom of Feasting, at Lambeth at a Nuptial Entertainment, which with great Splendor was solemniz'd between Tovy a Danish Nobleman, and Gorthy the Daughter of Osgod Clapa, a great Lord of the same Nation, in the Height of his Mirth and Jollity, carousing with the Bride and some of the Company, he suddenly fell down speechless, and dy'd on the eighth Day of June, in the Flower of his Age, after a short Reign of two Years and almost two Months.

He wastes Worcester-shire.

He marries his Sister to the Emperor.

His strange Death.

Such was the End of this dissolute young Prince by that Vice which was too familiar to the Danish Nation, which to the Cruelty they shew'd before they got Possession of the Land, they afterwards added Gormandizing and Drunkenness. But as he exceeded all in this kind, so tho' he was born in England, and consequently might have naturally follow'd the Customs of that Country, yet out of Simpathy with the Humour of the Danes, he bore most Affection to them; nay and suffer'd them most insolently to domineer over the English. So that we are told, If a Dane met an English Man upon a Bridge, the latter durst not move 'till the former pass'd over; and if the English Man did not bow in the most humble Manner, his Head should be broken, or for his Clownishness he should be severely bastinado'd. And according to Knigh-ton, this Harde-canute so far increas'd this Insolence, that upon every English Family he impos'd a Dane as their Lord and Governor; which confirm'd the Occasion of the Word Lordane formerly mention'd. The same Vices of Luxury and Effeminacy, which had procur'd Slavery to the English, were now come to the Height in the Danes, and, as in all Changes of States, caus'd their Ruin in this Nation, and made way for another Revolution. Not that the English were much reform'd, for they still retain'd such Distempers, as within a few Years procur'd the intire Destruction of their Empire; but being unreasonably insulted and oppress'd, upon the Death of Harde-canute they found Means to throw off their Yoak, and to slay and banish the most insolent and tyrannical of that Nation. And as the old Romans, for the Expulsion of their Kings, annually solemniz'd the Lugalia, so the joyful English in Imitation of them, being freed from the Danish Tyranny, instituted the annual Sports of Hock-Tide, which signify'd the Times of Scorning or Triumphant; of which there are some Reminders to this Day. Harde-canute dying without Issue, and Denmark being then embarrass'd with Troubles, with him expir'd, not only the Dominion, but in Effect all Attempts or Invasions of the Danes in England; which tho' they had been continu'd, and often renew'd with mighty Numbers, for two hundred and fifty five Years from their first Invasion, left no considerable of England.

Earl Godwin

I. THE English being happily deliver'd from the Power of the Danes, took the Advantage of the last King's dying without Issue, and began to cast their Eyes upon the Posterity of the unfortunate King Ethelred, particularly Edward, the Son he had by Queen Emma. However this Prince was still at a Loss, not knowing what Methods to take for his Safety, 'till at length he resolv'd to cast himself upon the Counsel and Fidelity of Earl Godwin, who being sent to for a friendly Conference, for some Time consider'd in his Thoughts whether he should acknowledge him or not, but at length consented to converse with him. Edward gaining Access, was ready to fall at his Feet, which when he would not suffer, he related the sad Story of his Brother Harde-canute's Death, and with great Promises begg'd his Assistance towards his safe Return into Normandy. Godwin gave him this unexpected Answer, That he had better live gloriously a King in England, than ignominiously to dye an Exile; that the Crown did of Right belong to him, as the Son of Ethelred, and Grandson of Edgar, one who was ripe in Years, inured to Toils, and taught by Experience how to administer publick Affairs, and by his own Afflictions how to prevent those of his People. To effect this there would be no Obstacle, if he would confide in him, whose Interest was so great in the Land. Therefore on Condition he would establish a firm Friendship with him, prefer his Sons, and marry his Daughter, he should shortly see himself a King; tho' now as one shipwrackt in his Fortunes, and a Man banish'd from all Expectations, he implor'd the Aid of another Person. This Prince's Circumstances were such, as not to reject so fair Proposals, but to agree to every Thing, and comply with the State and Condition of the Times; and whatsoever he requir'd he promis'd by Oath. Godwin was a Man fitted by Nature for the managing such an Affair, having a very smooth insinuating Tongue, so eloquent and prevailing, that he could work upon the Affections of the People as he desired, and draw them with Ease to any Thing he design'd. He procur'd a Council to be summon'd to Gillingham, where persuading some by his Authority, some by Promises, and others being already inclin'd to favour Edward's Cause, he easily brought over a great Majority to his Party; the rest who made Opposition, were overpower'd at present, disgrac'd, and afterwards banish'd out of the Land. On Easter Day, which this Year fell on the third of April, he was crown'd at Winchester by the two Arch-Bishops, Edsi of Canterbury, and Alfric of York, assisted with other Prelates, of whom Living, Bishop of Worcester, much contributed to the compleating this Design. This happen'd about ten Months after the Death of Harde-canute, so that this Alteration requir'd some considerable Time, and probably found as considerable Opposition, notwithstanding the great Power of Earl Godwin. And thus was the Monarchy of the English restor'd to the English Royal Blood, and the People so unexpectedly deliver'd from the Danish Tyranny, were exceedingly transported with Joy, yet still making way for another Revolution, which they little imagin'd was so near.

ms. b. Edward was now near forty Years of Age, of a soft and complying Temper; and being the Creature of Earl Godwin, he conform'd himself wholly to his Dictates and Advice. The first material Thing he did, was to seize on the Treasure of his Mother Emma, then at Winchester. The Cause alledg'd was, that she had been hard and unkind to him in the Time of his Exile and greatest Necessities; and in reality, she is believ'd to have born too little Affection, either to Ethelred or his Children: But Godwin however seems to have been the Instiller of this Treatment into the King's Mind, bearing a secret Hatred against her, for concerning her self about the Cruelty shewn to her Son Alfred. Simeon expressly says, that King Edward did it by the Advice of Leofric, Godwin and Geward, who accompanying him from Glocester to Winchester, he came suddenly to her, and took away all the Gold, Silver or Jewels she had then in Possession; to which Matth. Westminster adds, that he yet commanded that she should be supply'd with Necessaries, and be free from all further Molestation. But how fair soever his Actions were towards his Mother, Godwin took care that he should deal justly with him, in the Marriage of his Daughter Egitha, which about this Time he procur'd to be solemniz'd. The Lady for her admirable Perfections and Qualifications might well deserve a Crown; so that this was none of those many Things wherein the Earl impos'd upon the King. In-gulph the Abbot, who in his Youth had often been pos'd by her both in Grammar and Logick, testifies that she was most beautiful, most chaste and virtuous, but especially noted both for her Humility and Learning, favouring nothing of the Insolence either of her Father or Brothers, but mild, modest, faithful and obliging, never doing any kind of ill Offices, so that it became a Proverb, 'That as a Thorn produces a Rose, so Godwin begot Egitha.'

He seizes on his Mother's Treasury.

He marries Godwin's Daughter Egitha.

ms. Dm. Edward thus settled in the Throne, still thought himself not secure, while any eminent Persons of the Danish Blood continu'd in the Land. Therefore he banish'd Gunhilda, the Sister of King Canute, marry'd first to Hacun, and then to Harold both Earls, but now a Widow, who with her two Sons Hemming and Turkill, were oblig'd to leave the Land, go first to Bruges in Flanders, and then to Denmark. But while he thus thought to prevent Storms at home, he was threaten'd with a Tempest from the Northern World, where Magnus the Son of Olaus King of Norway, to revenge the Injury done here to his Father in the Reign of Canute, prepar'd to invade England. King Edward to secure himself, provided a strong Fleet, which lay expecting Magnus in Sandwich Road; but Swane King of Denmark, tho' he had no Reason to oblige the English, yet to hinder the Growth of a dangerous Neighbour, intirely diverted Magnus by making an Invasion of his Kingdom. This rais'd such Fews between these two Northern Kings, that Magnus in revenge enter'd Denmark in the following Year, expell'd King Swane, and made himself Lord of the Country. Upon which Swane sent Ambassadors to King Edward, desiring him, That he would now return such Kindness as he had receiv'd from him, when he was in Danger. Godwin's Opinion was for supplying him with a Fleet of fifty Vessels, both to requite Swane, and to give a check to the Success and Ambition of Magnus; but Earl Leofric and others thought it safer That the King should only be a Spectator, rather than to run the Hazard of disobliging the prevailing Party, and bringing Danger upon himself. And tho' Swane had by his Invasion of Norway, done that which tended to the Repose of England, yet since he took those Measures purely from his own Interest, he could not take it amiss, if King Edward also should steer his Course by the same Compass. And their Counsel had this good Effect, that as Magnus, tho' he held the Crown of Denmark all his Life, offer'd no further Attempts upon England, so Harold Harvager his Uncle and Successor, as soon as he came to the Crown sent Ambassadors to King Edward, and made a solemn League and Alliance with him. This was look'd upon as a great Happiness to the Nation; but an Earthquake at Worcester and Darby, a Pestilence and Famine in many Places, much diminish'd the Enjoyment of it.

He engages with the Emperor against Baldwin Earl of Flanders.

While King Edward was free from Wars at home, he was engag'd by Henry the Emperor against Baldwin Earl of Flanders, with whom he had a Contest about a Palace of his Country, which the Earl had fir'd. Pope Leo and Swane King of the Danes assist'd by Land, and lest Baldwin should escape by Sea, he procur'd King Edward to secure the Coasts, which he perform'd, lying with his Fleet before the Port of Sandwich, 'till he understood that an Accommodation was made between them. In the mean Time Swane, the Son of Earl Godwin, having formerly been banish'd, or left the Land, for deflouring Edgitha Abbess of Chester whom he would have marry'd, came back from Denmark with eight Ships, pretending a great Desire to be reconcil'd to the King; and Earl Beorn, a Dane and his Cosen-German, undertook to make his Peace. The War being ended between the Emperor and Earl Baldwin, this Beorn and Godwin who commanded forty two Vessels, by the King's leave were remov'd to Pevensey; to which Place Swane came and sollicit'd his Cosen Beorn, according to Promise to carry him to the King at Sandwich, and obtain his Pardon. Beorn without Scruple repair'd to him, attended only with three Servants, but Swane having brought him to Bosenharn, where his Ships lay at Anchor, carry'd him on Board, caus'd him to be bound, and removing to Dartmouth, he there murder'd him, and threw his Body into a deep Ditch. The Inhabitants of Hastings took six of Swane's Ships, and killing all the Men, carry'd the Vessels to the King at Sandwich. Swane with the other two fled into Flanders, where he continu'd 'till afterwards Aldred Bishop of Worcester brought him back, and notwithstanding all this, reconcil'd him to this gentle King. Crimes of this Nature were at this Time but too common, and too little punish'd; such was the Wickedness of the English Nation, which now again fell into a dangerous Security, tho' the late dreadful Scourge was but just remov'd from their Backs. Nay at this very Time it was again shaken over them: For Osgod Clapa, having with his Wife, as well as other Danes, been banish'd the Land, had got together twenty nine Ships, which infested the Coasts of Essex, but after great Damage done, they met with a Storm, and two of their Ships being driven on Shore, the Men were all put to the Sword. But the English were not only put in mind of the late Danish Cruelties, but the Remembrance of the old Devastations from the Irish Scots was reviv'd on the other Side of the Isle; but with this Difference, that whereas formerly the Britains were Sufferers, now they were become Actors and Abettors. For, as Florent tells us, this same Year in the Month of August, certain Pirates from Ireland, with thirty six Ships enter'd the Mouth of the Severn, where joining with Griffen, King of South-Wales, they ravag'd the Country, and caus'd much Mischief. They proceeded in several Places with Fire and Sword, but whether they retir'd of themselves, or were suppress'd by the English Forces, we do not find.

He is too kind to Strangers;

The next Year but one, King Edward to comfort and relieve his People now oppress'd with Famine and Poverty, took off the Tax formerly mention'd call'd Danegeld, impos'd by his Father Ethelred, which had laid heavy upon them for thirty eight Years. But as this Effect of his Indulgence to them, tended much to their Ease and Conveniency, so other Acts of his Kindness to Strangers

this very Year, prov'd of dangerous Consequence to the whole Nation. The Occasion began from Eustace Earl of Boloign, Father to the famous Godfry, and Husband to Goda the King's Sister, who having been to visit the Court, and returning through Canterbury to take Ship at Dover, one of his Harbingers was so rude with a Townsman in seeking for Lodgings, that in the Heat of Anger he provok'd him to kill him. The Earl with his whole Retinue going into the House where this Servant had been kill'd; slew both the Murderer and eighteen more who defended him; but the Townsmen running to Arms, reveng'd themselves by the Slaughter of twenty one more of the Earl's Servants, and the wounding almost all the rest. Eustace with much Difficulty escaping, with great Clamour hasten'd to the King, and being seconded by other Norman Courtiers, he rais'd him to that Fury, that he immediately order'd Earl Godwin to march to Canterbury, and punish the Citizens with military Execution. He on the contrary alledg'd, That no Man was to be condemn'd unheard, inwardly grieving that the King should favour Strangers more than his own Subjects; for many of them he had prefer'd to great Places, and Trust, both in Church and State; particularly Robert a Norman was made Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and William another of that Country Bishop of London, which much exasperated the English against the Normans. Being join'd with some others who lov'd their Country, Godwin urg'd; That the chief Actors in the late Disorder should first be fairly try'd; in case they were found innocent to be dismiss'd, but if culpable to be fin'd, or undergo some corporal Punishment for the Breach of the King's Peace, and the Violence and Affront that they had offer'd to the Earl. He further put him in mind, That it was his Business to protect his People, and not to condemn them without due Process. In conclusion he refus'd to obey his Commands, not regarding the King's Anger, which he conceiv'd would last but a short Time; but Edward displeas'd at his Behaviour, and being by others excited to Revenge, he call'd an Assembly of all the Nobility at Glocester. Most repair'd thither, only Godwin and his Sons appear'd not, suspecting that the Nobility were too much of the King's Humour, but immediately took to Arms. Godwin rais'd Forces out of his Earldom, which consisted of Kent, South-Sex and West-Sex; his Eldest Son Swane did the same in his, which contain'd Oxfordshire, Glocestershire, Herefordshire, Somersetshire and Barkshire; and Harold the youngest Son out of his, comprising Essex, East-England and Huntingtonshire.

^{An.} These took up their Quarters at Beverstan, and spread a Report that their Forces were to march against the Welsh, who design'd an Irruption into Herefordshire; and Swane under that Pretence lay encamp'd with Part of his Army in those Parts. But the Welsh having some notice of this Artifice, prevented it by clearing themselves at Court, where Godwin and his Sons were render'd so odious, that the King's Army now immediately expected to march against them. Edward had sent to Leofric Earl of Mercia, and Syward of Northumberland to come and assist him in this Extremity; who after a little Time gather'd together a considerable Force, with which Rodulph, the King's Nephew by his Sister Goda, join'd himself. In the mean Time Godwin and his Sons proceeded into Glocestershire, and incamp'd at a Place call'd Langtree, from whence they sent to the King then lying at Glocester, and demanded Earl Eustace and his Company to be deliver'd up, together with such Normans and Bulloignois as held the Castle at Canterbury, upon Refusal denouncing War. The King was much surpriz'd at this Message, not knowing how to act; but upon hearing that the Forces of Leofric, Syward and Rodulph were on their March, he sent back the Messenger with an absolute Refusal. They were newly gone when the King's Forces arriv'd at Glocester, so enrag'd, that he with great Difficulty restrain'd them from marching immediately to engage with Godwin. Leofric and the wiser Sort, sensible of the Miseries of a Civil War, persuaded the King to come to a Treaty, of which they conceiv'd the greater Hopes, because Godwin had had given Orders to his Sons not to engage first, but to defend themselves if they were attack'd by the King's Forces. They brought both Parties to this Agreement, that Hostages should be given on both Sides, and the whole Contest be referr'd to a further Debate to be held at London. The King having encreas'd his Forces out of Mercia and Northumberland, went with them and his Nobility to London; and Godwin having done the like in West-Sex, repair'd to Southwark. The grand Council, by way of Satisfaction to the King, order'd Godwin and his Son Harold to appear before them unarm'd, and but with twelve Attendants, and to deliver up all their Forces into the Hands of the King. They pleaded That they could not give up themselves into the Hands of their Enemies without sufficient Caution and Security, otherwise they were ready to surrender their Forces, and to obey the King in all Things that were consistent with their Honour and Safety; but to come unarm'd, and with so few Followers, was to hazard both their Lives and Reputations. The King by this Answer was further exasperated, and thereupon an Edict was publish'd by Consent of the Council and Army, That Godwin and his Sons should quit the Land within five Days. His Soldiers dreading the Consequence, began to abandon him, so that finding it safest to give way to the Times, the Earl departed with his Wife Gytha, and three Sons, Swane, Gyrth and Tosti, into Flanders to Earl Baldwin, Father-in-Law to Tosti, with as much Treasure as the Ship could carry. Harold and Leofwin, his other Sons, went to Bristol, where taking a Ship that their Brother Swane had provided for himself, they sail'd into Ireland. Harold's Earldom was conferr'd on Elgar, the Son of Leofric; and the King to pursue his Indignation, depriv'd Egitha his Queen of all her Jewels and Treasure, and sent her away only with one Attendant to the Nunnery of Warewell, there to be kept in Custody by the Abbess his Sister.

William Duke

visits King Ed-

The Enemy thus remov'd, William Duke of Normandy, with a great Train of Normans, came over into England to visit his old Friend King Edward, where he and his Retinue were nobly and magnificently entertain'd, richly presented, and imprudently led to the chief Castles and Forts, and shew'd the whole Strength of the Nation, and whatever else was in a short Time to be their own. Tho', as Ingulph assures us, there was yet no Expectation of his succeeding in the Kingdom, or at least no Mention made of it between the King and the Duke. About the same Year, we are told that Queen Emma was accus'd both of consenting to the Death of her Son Alfred, and also of preparing Poison for Edward, and lastly of Incontinence with Alwin Bishop of Winchester, and all this by Robert the Norman, whom the King had made Arch-Bishop of Canterbury. Upon which Accusation, being closely confin'd to Warewell, she wrote to all the Bishops of England, who were her Friends, professing, That she was more afflicted at the Scandal rais'd against the good Bishop, than at her own Infamy; and that she was ready to clear her Innocency by undergoing the severe Trial by Ordeale, and passing over red hot Irons. Upon which the Bishops met, and had easily prevail'd upon the King to remit and forget all, but Robert violently oppos'd them, demanding of them, How they durst defend a Woman guilty of so many Crimes? concluding, That if she would pass bare-foot and blindfold over nine red-hot Plow-shares, four stiddy Paces for herself, and five for the Bishop, she might pass for Innocent. Whereupon the Day of Trial was appointed, and before the King and all his Bishops, except Robert, she pass'd unhurt over all the Plow-shares; using these Words to her Leaders, as not knowing she was past Danger, O Lord, when shall I come to the Place of my Purgation? But having her Eyes uncover'd, and seeing herself at Liberty, she fell upon her Knees, and with Tears gave Thanks to her Deliverer; whereby she recover'd both the Love, and her former Estate of the King, with the Esteem and Applause of the People. In Memory of which she gave nine Mannors, according to the Number of the Plow-shares, to the Cathedral of Winchester, and beautify'd it with many rich Ornaments; as likewise the King, repenting the Injury done to her, bestow'd on the same Church the Isle of Portland and other Possessions. The Substance of this remarkable Story is deliver'd both by Bromton and Knignton, and Harfsfield has enlarg'd it with some Circumstances. But the ancient Authors, as Malmesbury and others, are wholly silent in this Matter; so that the Story is justly suspected, tho' not yet fully confuted. Of more Certainty we find that this famous Queen dy'd the Year after this suppos'd fiery Trial, and was bury'd in the Cathedral of Winchester.

In the same Year Griffin the Welsh King made an Inroad into Herefordshire, and ravag'd a great Part of the Country; against whom the Inhabitants arose, and the Normans that held the Castle of Hereford sall'y'd out and engaging him were defeated, so that he return'd home with great Booty. Not long after Harold and Leofwin, Sons of Earl Godwin, returning out of Ireland, pass'd with many Vessels up the Severn, and landing in the Counties of Somerset and Dorset, they plunder'd many Villages; and tho' great Numbers march'd against them, they put them to the rout, and having slain thirty principal Officers, besides many of the ordinary Sort, they return'd with much Booty to their Ships. King Edward alarm'd with the News, and expecting Earl Godwin as well as his Sons, order'd forty well-furnish'd Ships into Sandwich Road to prevent his Landing; but notwithstanding this Care, he found Means to come ashore undiscover'd in Kent, where he sent Messengers round about, and first engag'd the Inhabitants of Canterbury who own'd him as a Sufferer for their Sakes, then those of Sussex, Essex, Surry, and all the Sea-men of Hastings, and others of those Maritime Parts, who promis'd to live and dye with him. The Fleet having Notice of his Landing, some were sent to pursue him; but he concealing himself, they return'd first to Sandwich, and then came up to London. Godwin pass'd to the Isle of Wight, and coasted about 'till he was join'd by his Sons Harold and Leofwin. Yet still they forbore all Hostilities, but on the Coasts and elsewhere they drew over as many Men as they could, especially Sea-Men, and so made for Sandwich Road, from whence the News flew to London, and so startled the Court, that immediately Command was issu'd out from the King to all his Loving Subjects, to hasten and assist him in a Time of so great Necessity. Yet they delay'd so long, that Godwin had Opportunity to pass up the Thames as far as Southwark, where waiting for a Tide, he spent the Time in conferring with the Londoners, whom he procur'd to act according to his Designs. At high Water he advanc'd further, and no Opposition being made upon the Bridge, he row'd up by the Southern Bank 'till he met with his Land Army, which he drew up in Battalia formidable to the Spectators on the other Side; and now he directed his Navy towards the King's Gallies, shipping off his Men, and making all Things ready to follow. Edward by this Time on the other Side had gather'd together a competent Force, and all Persons expected an Engagement; but the Soldiers on both Sides agreed in this, that they were not willing to fight English against English, which gave the wiser Sort an Opportunity of mediating a Peace, by means of which the two Armies were speedily disbanded. The Effect of it was that Godwin, his Wife and Sons were restor'd to their former Honours and Estates, all except Swane, who as a Penance for Murdering his Cosen Beorn had undertaken a Pilgrimage bare-foot from Flanders to Jerusalem, and in his Return dy'd of a Cold he had got in Lycia. The King receiv'd his Wife Egitha the Earl's Daughter to her former Dignity; Right and Justice was now promis'd to all Men, and such Normans as had abus'd his Authority and given him ill Counsel, were banish'd the Land. Some few, as Robert the Deacon, Richard his Son-in-Law, Alverede the King's Groom, Axfred surnam'd Cooksfoot, and some others whom the King much favour'd, and who had done no ill Offices, were permitted to stay. But Robert Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, William Bishop of London, and Ulf Bishop of Lincoln with their Followers with much Difficulty escap'd, and got over Sea: Yet afterwards William upon the Account of his good Temper was permitted to return. Osbirne and his Companion Hugh surrender'd their Castles, and by Leave of Earl Leofric, pass'd through his Government into Scotland, where they were entertain'd by King Macbeth. In this same Year on St. Thomas's Night happen'd so violent a Tempest, that it overturn'd many Churches and Houses, and broke and tore up by the Roots an innumerable Quantity of Trees.

A. D. 1053. In the following Year, Res the Brother of Griffin King of South-Wales being taken Prisoner, as a publick Enemy, for the many Insolencies he had committed, was by Command of King Edward put to Death at a Place call'd Bulendum, and his Head sent to him at Glocester. This afforded sufficient Matter for Discourse, but as little Reports are suppress'd by greater, this was soon quash'd by the Rumour and Talk about the Death of Earl Godwin, which happen'd the same Year at Easter. King Edward celebrating this Feast at Winchester, and Godwin, as his Custom was, sitting at the Table with him, was suddenly seiz'd with so violent a Distemper as struck him speechless, and threw him down from the Seat where he sat. His three Sons, Harold, Tosti and Gyrth being present, remov'd him into the King's Chamber, hoping it was but a Fit that would not last long; but he lay in that languishing Condition four Days, and dy'd on the fifth, and was bury'd in the old Monastery. This is the usual Account of his Death; to which the Norman Monks, and such as write in favour of them, add other Circumstances, which much shew his Guilt, or their Malice. They relate, that Mention being made at the King's Table of Alfred his late Brother, he thereupon look'd very angrily at Godwin; and he to vindicate himself, readily reply'd, That he perceiv'd that upon every Mention made of that Prince, he cast a frowning Countenance upon him: But, added he, let not God suffer me to swallow this Morsel, if I am guilty of any Thing done, either towards the taking away his Life, or against your Interest. After which Words, he was choak'd with the Bit he had just put into his Mouth, immediately sunk down, and never recover'd. But whatever was the Manner of his Death, he was a Man of an active and a turbulent Spirit, not nicely conscientious either in gaining or keeping, and not to be vindicated in his forcing his Sovereign to what he pleas'd. But had he not been so great a Lover of his Country, and an Enemy to Strangers, those who wrot in the Norman Times, and who durst not but write what would please their Masters, would have dismiss'd him without this Story, and with a fairer Character. His first Wife was the Sister of King Canute, who was kill'd by Thunder, a Judgment which was believ'd fell upon her for her Cruelty, for she made Merchandise of selling handsom Boys and Girls into Denmark. By his second Wife he had six Sons, Harold, Swane, Wined, Tosti, Gyrth and Leafwin; his Earldom of West-Sex was given to his Son Harold, and the Earldom of Essex, which Harold had before, was conferr'd on Algar the Son of Leofric Earl of Mercia.

Earl Godwin dies.

His Character.

A. D. 1054. In the next Year, Syward the valiant Earl of Northumberland was sent with a powerful Body of Horse and a strong Fleet into Scotland, where he fought a Battel with Macbeth King of that Country, whom he defeated, with the Deaths of many of his Scots, and such Normans as had before gone over to him; and quite expelling him, he made Malcolm King in his stead, according to the Orders he had receiv'd from King Edward. But this Victory was purchas'd with the Lives of many of the English and Danes, besides Syward's own Son, of whose Death when he heard, he demanded Whether he had receiv'd his Wound before or behind? and when he was answer'd Before, he declar'd himself Glad, otherwise he should not have thought him worthy of Burial. King Edward having sent this Earl into the North to fight, about the same Time he sent Alfred Bishop of Worcester with great Presents, to treat with the Emperor of Germany about his Cousen Edward, the Son of King Edmund Ironside, and of sending him out of Hungary into England; for having no Issue of his own to succeed succeed him, and the Sons of Godwin being very powerful, he took Care for his nearest Kinsman, to whom the Crown of Right should belong. But Syward Earl of Northumberland did not long survive his Victory, and his Son's Death, dying the following Year at York, where he was bury'd in the Monastery of St. Mary's without the Walls, built by himself, according to Ingulph, tho' Simeon speaks of his being interr'd at a Monastery call'd Galmanko of his own Erection. Huntington, who gives him the Epithete of Consul Rigidissimus, tells us his Disease was a Dyfentery, and that he was highly afflicted that he should end his Days in such a Manner. Therefore perceiving his Death to approach, he cry'd out, How asham'd am I, that I could not dye gloriously in one of the many Battels I have fought, but bethus reserv'd to the ignominious Death of Beasts: Arm me with my impenetrable Corslet, gird me with my faithful Sword, and set my Helmet upon my Head; give me in my left Hand my large Buckler, and in my right my gilded Scimiter, that being a valiant Soldier, like a Soldier I may die. Thus couragiously he spoke, and as he spoke, he dy'd standing in that honourable Posture he desir'd. His Son Walteof being very young, his Government was bestow'd on Tofti the Son of Earl Godwin.

Syward's Death.

About the same Time King Edward in an Assembly held at London, banish'd Earl Algar the Son of Leofric, without any Cause says Simeon, but Huntington writes, that he was publickly convicted of Treason. Whether guilty or not, he thought himself so aggriev'd, that he went over into Ireland, and there procuring a Fleet of eighteen Piratical Vessels, he with them sail'd to Griffin King of the Welsh, desiring his Assistance against his Sovereign King Edward. Griffin ready to serve him in this Particular, soon rais'd a considerable Force, and joining with Algar invaded Herefordshire, against whom the King's Nephew Rodulph made Head, one of small Courage, who meeting them two Miles from Hereford, hors'd all the English contrary to their accusom'd Way of Fighting; which only serv'd them for the greater Conveniency of flying; for when the Battel was scarce begun, Rodulph with his French and Normans first began to run, which soon occasion'd the rest to follow, who in their Flight lost about five hundred Men, besides what were wounded. Griffin and Algar swell'd with this Success enter'd Hereford, where they slew several Canons who in their Habits would have maintain'd the great Door of the principal Church against them; which done they burnt the Monastery with all its Ornaments and Relicks, kill'd several of the Citizens, took more Prisoners, plunder'd and burnt the City, and departed with great Spoils. The King highly allarm'd at these Actions, commanded Forces to be rais'd throughout England, which rendezvousing at Glocester, he committed the Conduct of them to Earl Harold, who marching speedily into Wales, encamp'd beyond Straddale, where Griffin and Algar durst not face him, but knowing him to be a Man both of Skill and Vigour, they retir'd into South-Wales. Harold finding the March difficult, left the greatest Part of his Forces to observe their Motions, and with the rest return'd to Hereford, which he strongly fortify'd. During this Employment, the two Commanders thinking it best to obtain Peace, sent to desire a Meeting at a Place call'd Byligesleage, where a firm Peace and Amity was concluded; in Pursuance of which Algar sent away his Ships, and went himself to the King, by whom he was restor'd to his former Command. But Griffin the next Year broke the Peace on his part, by setting upon Leofgar Bishop of Hereford, whom he slew together with his Clerks, and Agelwoth Vice-Earl of the County, and many others.

Earl Algar rebels.

He is restored.

In the following Year, Edward the Son of King Edmund Ironside, at the Desire of his Uncle came into England out of Hungary, being by him design'd for his Successor; but not long after he dy'd at London, and was bury'd at St. Paul's Church, leaving behind him one Son nam'd Edgar Etheling, and two Daughters, Margaret and Christina. Not long after he was follow'd to a better Life by Earl Leofric, who dy'd in his own Village of Bromleage, and was bury'd in a Monastery of his own Founding at Coventry, a pious charitable Man, and the Nestor of his Age, one to whose Counsels several Kings, and the whole Nation had often been oblig'd. He was succeeded by his Son Algar in his Earldom, which soon miss'd him, he being banish'd a second Time in less than a Year after his Father's Death, yet by the Assistance of Griffin, the Welsh King, who would not desert him, and a Fleet of Norway Men, which by Chance came into his Aid, he shortly after by Force recover'd his Government: So successful was Treason in these vicious Times. The following Year 1060, Malcolm King of the Scots came and gave a Visit to King Edward, and contracted so great a Friendship with his Neighbour Tosti, who brought him on his Way, that they became sworn Brethren, tho' to what Effect, the Event shew'd within two Years; for Tosti being gone to Rome with Aldred Arch-Bishop of York, his sworn Brother Malcolm took the Advantage of his Absence, and cruelly wasted the Places under his Government, and broke the Peace of St. Cuthbert in the Holy Island, as Simeon complains. While Malcolm thus distress'd the Northern Parts, Griffin King of the Welsh, both by Sea and Land severely harass'd the West, which occasion'd King Edward from Glocester to dispatch Harold with a Party of Horse, soon after Christmas, to surprize him, if possible. Yet Griffin got Notice of his coming, and with Difficulty escap'd; but abandoning most of his Ships, Harold commanded them to be burnt, and so return'd. About Rogation Week with a considerable Fleet Harold set Sail from Bristol, and compassing the greatest Part of Wales, he join'd himself to the Horse, with which his Brother Tosti by the King's Order met him, and did such Damage to the Country, that the Britains yielded themselves to him, deliver'd up Hostages, consented to pay Tribute, and entirely renounc'd Griffin their King. At present Griffin escap'd, but in the following Year he was taken by Griffin King of North-Wales; and being for his perfidious Dealings punish'd with Death, his Head, together with the Head of his Ship, were sent as a Present to Harold. He sent them to King Edward, who was so generous as to bestow the Dominions of Griffin upon his two Brothers, Blechgent and Rithwalan, who in the Presence of Harold swore Allegiance to him, to obey him both by Sea and Land, and engag'd to pay whatever had been paid out of the Country to the former Kings of England. Griffin left behind him a Son nam'd Caradoc, who was highly dissatisfy'd to find his Inheritance thus made over to his Uncles; therefore when Harold, as a Curb to the Country and his own Conveniency of Hunting, had erected a stately House upon the Severn, furnish'd with the choicest Provisions, Caradoc out of Disdain and Revenge, suddenly came down with a Party, kill'd all the Artificers, demolish'd the House, and took away all the Provisions.

Thus was Harold disappointed in those Parts; but soon after his Brother Tosti was in greater Danger, from a Conspiracy rais'd against him in his own Government of Northumberland; occasion'd by an Officer nam'd Gospatrick, with whom having a Contest, his Sister Queen Egitha caus'd him to be slain at Court. This Quarrel being espous'd by the Friends of Gospatrick, two of them, nam'd Ganiel and Ulf, were treacherously drawn in, and murder'd in Tosti's Chamber. These Actions, with the intollerable Exactions upon the Country, so incens'd the Inhabitants, that three or four of the principal Men, viz. Ganiolbarn, Demstan and Gloineorn, with four hundred others in Arms, enter'd York, and first slew two of Tosti's Household Servants, who were flying from the City, and the Day following, above two hundred more of his Attendants, on the North Side of the River Humber. Then breaking open his Treasury, they rifled all they could find, and departed. Upon which Tosti made great Complaints to the King, and at his Desire, his Brother Harold was appointed to accommodate this troublesome Affair. But as they were going into the North for that purpose, the whole Country in a manner met them them at Northampton, and afterwards at Oxford vehemently oppos'd the Designs of Tosti, declaring, That they were free Men born, and as freely educated; That they would not indure the Insolence of an Earl; for they had learnt from their Ancestors to chuse either Death or Liberty. They continu'd so unanimous and resolute, that in a short Time they procur'd Tosti and his Ministers to be all banish'd. He went over with his Wife to Baldwin Earl of Flanders, his Father-in-Law, and Morchar, the Son of Algar, according to the Country's Request, was made Earl of Northumberland in his room. This was the most probable Occasion of Tosti's Banishment; tho' Huntington, who had heard many Stories of hated Earl Godwin and his Sons, gives us a different Account; namely, That Tosti being jealous of the King's Favour towards his Brother Harold, openly assaulted him in his Presence at Dinner; and afterwards when Harold had prepar'd an extraordinary Entertainment for the King at Hereford, Tosti slew several of his Servants, and put their mangled Limbs into the Butts of Wine and other Liquors, making a barbarous Jest, That they should not want pickled Meats. The same Author says, that the King foretold, That the Destruction of their Family was nigh, and that the Wrath of God would not much longer be deferr'd: For, adds he. they were arriv'd to that Degree of Barbarism and Cruelty, that if they lik'd the House or Possession of any Man, they would by Night procure the Owner to be murder'd, with all his Children, to get his Estate: And these were at that Time the chief Justiciaries of the Kingdom.

He and his Agents are ba-nish'd.

But if the King upon this or some other Occasion predicted the Ruin of the Sons of Godwin to be just approaching, it so far prov'd true, that their ill Stars began to operate about this Time; for Tosti was not only banish'd the Land, but Harold was driven from it by the very Winds and Seas. Being at his House at Bosenham in Sussex, a Place unjustly obtain'd by his Father, Harold for his Recreation with some of his Retinue, took a Fisher-Boat on the Sea; but sailing a little further than they design'd, a Tempest arose, and drove them cross the English Channel to the Coasts of Normandy, where they were oblig'd to land in the Territories of the Earl of Ponthieu. The Inhabitants of that Country, according to a barbarous Practice usual in most Sea-Coasts, immediately seiz'd upon the Earl and his Followers, took them Prisoners, and put Fetters upon them. Harold upon this hired a Messenger to go to William Duke of the Country and acquaint him, That he was sent over by the King of England, by his Word and Presence to confirm what other lesser Envoys had only whisper'd; but that he was detain'd Prisoner, and hinder'd from the Discharge of his Message by Gwido Earl of Ponthieu. Upon which Harold by the Command of Duke William was immediately set at Liberty, and by Gwido conducted to his Court; where being honourably entertain'd, he was also invited to an Expedition into Little Britain, where at that Time the Norman Duke made War. By his Wit and Valour he so well recommended himself to the Duke, that he was highly esteem'd by him; to whom, that he might also the more endear himself, he promis'd by a solemn Oath, That when King Edward dy'd, he would deliver up the Castle of Dover to him, which was then under his Command, and procure him to succeed in the Kingdom of England. Upon which Promise the Duke's Daughter, as yet too young for Marriage, was contracted to him; and he was sent home with very rich Presents. This is the Account that Malmesbury and some others give of this important Accident. But Ingulph tells us, That King Edward now grown old, perceiving his Brother Edgar Etheling both in Body and Mind unfit to govern, and on the other Side Duke William his Kinsman by the Mother of great Merit and Renown, sent Arch-Bishop Robert, to acquaint the Duke with his Purpose of making him his Successor, not long before Harold came thither. But if the Substance of this be true, it must be by some other Messenger, for Arch-Bishop Robert was dead long before. Edmer and Simeon write, That Harold went into Normandy by the King's Permission, or Connivance, to free his Brother Wulnod, and his Nephew Hacun the Son of Swane, whom the King had taken Hostages of Godwin, and sent into Normandy; that King Edward foretold Harold that his Voyage thither would be to the Detriment of all England, and his own Reproach; and that Duke William then inform'd Harold, That Edward before his coming to the Crown had promis'd him that he should succeed him, if ever he obtain'd it himself. Lastly Matthew Paris believes him driven to Normandy by a Tempest, where to gain his Liberty he made a Promise contrary to his Intentions, and enter'd into that secret Confederacy out of Necessity.

His Character.

Whatever the Occasion of his Promise and Engagement was, the Time drew near, that he should be put to the Trial. For now approach'd that Year, that dreadful Year to him, and his English-Saxon Nation, signaliz'd by a famous Comet, which according to Ingulph portended that great Change of Government, that slaughter of the People, and that great Calamity which shortly fell upon the Land. King Edward declining in Years and Strength daily grew weaker, yet kept his Christmases at Westminster, and assisted at the Dedication of St. Peter's Church there, which he had founded, or at least re-edify'd it with great Magnificence, and by a Charter granted it many Immunities and Privileges, to which was annex'd the first great Seal us'd in England. But on the fifth Day of January, having receiv'd the Blessed Eucharist, he recommended his Soul to God, and quietly departed this Life; to the exceeding Grief of the miserable People. According to his Commands he was bury'd in his late Dedicated Church with great Solemnity; having reign'd from the Death of Harde-canute twenty three Years, six Months, and twenty seven Days. This Prince is noted for his great Innocence and Simplicity, being much inclinable to Devotion and Religious Exercises; and we are told that he was the first King of England that by Touching cur'd that Distemper call'd the King's Evil. He is said to have been so chaste, that never as a Husband enjoy'd his own Wife, tho' a very beautiful Lady; for which, as well as his other Virtues, and particularly his Charity to the Poor, he is commonly stil'd St. Edward the Confessor. But he was indeed but a weak and easie Prince, and too liable to be mis-led by the Suggestions of those about him, as may be observ'd in his severe Proceedings against his Mother and Wife: Tho' that very easiness of Nature is in him reckon'd for a Virtue, as appears from this Story related by Abbot Ailred: This King being in an Afternoon laid down upon his Bed to repose himself, with the Curtains close about him, and no Person in the Chamber, a Boy employ'd in the meaner Offices of the House came in, who seeing none in the Room, and finding the Chest open where Hugolin the Chamberlain kept the Money for the King's ordinary Expences, he run hastily to it, and filling his Pockets with Money departed: All which was thorough the Curtains seen by the King, who without Disturbance let him pass. The Boy finding his Success, resolv'd to make a second Attempt; and coming to get more, the King call'd out to him, Sirrah, you had best be content with what you got, for if Hugolin comes, he'll not only whip you severely, but take away all you have stolen. Upon this the Boy fled, and when Hugolin came in, and express'd much Passion for the Money that he mis'd, the King calmly bad him rest contented, For, the poor Rogue that has it, wants it more than we. So that in short, we may rely upon Malmesbury's Character of this Prince, That if we consider his Simplicity, he seem'd very unfit for Government; yet by reason of his Virtue and Piety towards God, he was so directed by him, that the most Politick and Courageous Kings have scarce ruled more happily: For during his Reign the Kingdom was never invaded by Foreign Enemies, nor disturb'd by Civil Contentts, but what were easily suppress'd.

Yet it was the Misfortune of the Nation, as well as himself, that he was formerly driven into Banishment, and living in another Country, was moulded into the Humour, Fashions and Customs of it, and out of good Nature constrain'd to be grateful to such as had well deserv'd of him in his Necessities, more than than the Temper, if not the Interest of his own Subjects could bear. Yet most of the People in Compliance and Conformity with him did so transform themselves into Foreign Shapes, as foretold their Subjection in a short Time to those the Manners and Usages of whom they had already assum'd; so that the Conquerors had nothing to do but to Master their Bodies, since their Minds and Affections were theirs already. Ingulph, an Eye-Witness, informs us, That Edward being bred up in Normandy, through his long Continuance in that Country was almost chang'd into a Frenchman, and brought great Numbers over with him, whom he promoted to various Dignities, and highest Places of Trust. Thus introduc'd, all the Nation began to leave off their English Customs, and to imitate the Manners of the French: All the Nobility in their Houses spoke the French Tongue, as an Instance of Gallantry, made their Writings and Letters after the French Fashion, and became assum'd of their own Usages, both in these and other Matters: And this Humour, together with the Vices of the Nation, more and more encreas'd, 'till at length to those they admir'd they became Slaves and Vassals: So much was that Saying verifi'd, 'That where a Foreign Tongue prevails, it is reckon'd half a Conquest. The Laws of this Prince His Laws. have bore a great Reputation, being collected from those of the Mercians, West-Saxons and Northumbrians, as well as from those of Alfred, Edward the Elder and Edgar, reduc'd into one Body, and writ in Latin, of which we have still some Remains. But when the Reader hears the Laws of St. Edward, so much applauded, and so much contested after the Conquest, he is to remember that the English-Saxon Laws are there meant, which were in a great Degree the Fountain of those which to this Day we term the Common Law, tho' the Forms of Pleading and Process were afterwards brought in by the Normans. But they receiv'd their Denomination from King Edward, as being in Effect the last King of the Saxon Race, and one whose Memory the People reverenc'd, for the high Reputation he had gain'd for his great Sanctity, and Clemency to his Subjects. In this Prince the Royal Regnant Line of the West-Saxon Kings, which from Cerdic the first of them had Dominion in Britain five hundred and forty seven Years, receiv'd its Period.

II. Tho' the Glory and Happiness of the West-Saxon Family was now at a Period, yet this did not put an End to the English Empire, and in its own Fall involve the Fate of the Nation: This was reserv'd to be the Work of an inferior House, out of which a Stranger should arise to pull down the whole Fabrick, and bury himself in its last Ruins. King Edward being dead, three laid Claim to the Crown; first Edgar Etheling, the undoubted Heir, as being Grand-Son to King Edmund Ironside, who was Elder Brother to the King last in Possession. The next was William Duke of Normandy, the Kinsman of the late King by his Mother Emma, being her Brother's Grandson, one who in Blood could find no Pretext, but upon the Kindness and Promise of his deceas'd Kinsman. The last was Harold the Son of Earl Godwin, who could produce no shew of Right by Descent, but positively alledg'd the late King's Designment, and thought he could plead more Merit than both the other. Edgar was too much a Stranger, and had neither Time nor Ability in Estate or Mind to make any more Interest than what mere Conscience had wrought in the Minds of the People, which is usually very feeble and infirm upon such Occasions. William was a glorious Prince, and as such acknowledg'd, but between him and England was a Ditch so deep and spacious, that the Danger was too far distant to be much regarded. Harold was a noble and popular Man, the greatest Minister of the deceas'd King, one of great Valour and dextrous Conduct, civil and obliging, and of such Qualifications as fitted him for a Crown; and what was more advantageous,

A Dispute about the Succession.

Harold is elected King.

vantagious, he had all the Court and Grandees at his beck, whom he had either oblig'd by his Kindness, or won by his Authority. He therefore took the immediate Advantage of his Power, and being declar'd Successor by the late King, on the same Day that he was bury'd, he assum'd the Title, and was crown'd King, being chosen, as Simeon assures us, by the Princes of all England. Only a Manuscript Chronicle in the Cottonian Library relates, That when King Edward laid upon his Death Bed, Earl Harold came to him, and desir'd him to nominate him for his Successor, to whom the King reply'd, That he had already made Duke William his Heir. But the Earl and his Friends still persisting in their Request, the King turning his Head to the Wall, reply'd, When I am dead, let the English make either the Duke or the Earl their King: Which if true, shews that it was but a Consent in part, which was also extorted from him.

He begins laudably.

Harold being made King immediately proceeded to the Performance of many laudable Actions: He repeal'd many hard and antiquated Laws, and made others that were better; he became a Patron to Churches and Monasteries, and seem'd not only to respect, but to reverence the Bishops, Abbots, Monks and all the Clergy; to all good Men he shew'd himself humble and obliging, to the Vicious he declar'd an Aversion, commanding all his Officers to detect and punish all Thieves, Robbers and Disturbers of the publick Peace; and in conclusion, he made it his Business to defend his Country both by Sea and Land. But both his own Fate, and that of the Nation was too urgent to permit him long to continue these Methods. On the 24th of April a dreadful and unusual Comet appear'd with great Lustre for seven Days; seen, as was reported, throughout the World. The first Mischief believ'd to have been portended by it, was from Harold's own Brother Tosti, who having been banish'd chiefly by his Procurement, and unable to bear his Brother's high Preferment, was excited by so much Envy and Indignation, as to endeavour his certain Ruin. For which purpose he sail'd out of Flanders with some Ships to the Isle of Wight, from whence having forc'd Money from the Inhabitants, he practis'd Piracy upon all the Coasts 'till he came to Sandwich Haven. Harold being then at London, immediately got ready both a strong Fleet, and a considerable Party of Horse, resolving like a good Warrior to go in Person to Sandwich; which being made known to Tosti, he took all the Seamen with him he could find, and sail'd to the Coasts of Lincolnshire, where he burnt many Villages, and kill'd many Men: But Edwin Earl of Mercia, and his Brother Morchar Earl of Northumberland, hasten'd into those Parts with an Army, and soon constrain'd him to abandon the Country. From whence he sail'd into Scotland to King Malcolm, where he continu'd the whole Summer. In the mean Time King Harold sail'd to the Isle of Wight, and ply'd all Summer 'till the middle of September about those Coasts, having also a Land Army plac'd to the best advantage on the Sea Side. For he expected a more formidable Invader than his Brother Tosti, namely the great William Duke of Normandy, who before had sent Messengers to him to remind him of his Promise and Oath, and to require a Performance of what had been agreed between them. Harold thought it very unreasonable to require such a Performance of one actually in Possession of a Kingdom, and who was come to it by the unanimous Consent of the Nobility and People. Therefore he made Answer, That what he then promis'd was in Captivity, when he wanted his Liberty, which could not be called his own Act, since it was extorted by Necessity. But supposing what he had done had been voluntary, it could not have been valid, since as King of England, he could not marry a Foreigner, without the Assent of the States of the Nation, much less alter the Succession and Right to the Crown, without their Knowledge, Consent and Allowance. He insist'd further, That since the Duke's Daughter was dead, the marrying of whom was the Foundation of the Alliance, all Obligations were dissolv'd. To these Reasons Harold, thinking himself sufficiently powerful, added Contempt,

Duke William reminds him of his Promise.

according to Matth. Paris, and sent away William's Ambassadors on lame and maimed Horses.

This Usage was highly provoking to Duke William, who thereupon made the utmost Preparations for an Invasion. In the mean Time King Harold, having expected him all the Summer, and now concluding that he had deferr'd his Voyage 'till the next Spring, remov'd all his Forces from the Southern Coasts, and march'd towards the North, where he was call'd by a new Storm that threaten'd him from those Parts. This was rais'd by his Brother Tosti, who applying himself to Harold Harvager King of Norway, join'd Fleets with him, and sail'd up into the River Humber, and next into the Ouse; where landing at a Place call'd Rickale, they march'd to Tork, and took it by Storm. Before Harold could arrive in these Parts, the two Brother Earls, Edwin and Morchar, with considerable Forces march'd against them, and upon the twentieth Day of September, at Fulford on the Ouse, engag'd them with great Bravery, and with good Success in the Beginning: But after a long Fight, the English unable to sustain the Violence and Numbers of the Norwegians, retired with the Loss of many of their Men, both in the Field of Battel, and in the adjoining River. Upon this, the Norwegians receiv'd from the Inhabitants of Tork five hundred Hostages, and leaving there a hundred and fifty of their own, return'd towards their Ships. Five Days after the Battel, King Harold arriv'd at Tork; from whence marching to a Place upon this Occasion since call'd Battel-Bridge, he engag'd their whole Forces, and after a terrible Resistance both Harold Harvager and Tosti were slain, and the Victory remain'd to the English. But we ought to remember what Malmesbury tells us of one Norwegian, who with incredible Valour keeping the Bridge a full Hour against the whole English Army, with his single Resistance retarded their Victory; and scorning to accept of Quarter, 'till no Man daring to grapple with him, as too strong and desperate, he was at length shot dead with an Arrow; and by his Fall open'd the Passage of Pursuit to a compleat Victory. But Olave the King of Norway's Son, and Paul Earl of Orkney, who had been left with many Soldiers to guard the Ships, upon surrendring themselves, and giving Hostages and Oaths never to return to England as Enemies, were permitted freely to depart with twenty Ships, and the small Remainder of their Army. The Body of Tosti being known by a Wart between his Shoulders, was carry'd to Tork, and there bury'd. In the Plunder of the Field, if we may believe Adam Bremensis, so great a Quantity of Gold was found, that twelve lusty young Men were scarcely able to bear it on their Backs. Whatever the Quantity was it prov'd of dangerous Consequence to King Harold, who being flush'd with Success, and excited by Covetousness, impolitickly took that and all the Plunder to his own Use; which so disoblig'd his Soldiers, in defrauding them of the Price of their Blood, that they began to renounce his Interest, and repented of their former Services; which was so much the more dangerous, because he was so much weaken'd by the two last Battels, losing most of his best Men, and Flower of his Army. This Error was no sooner committed, but as he sat feasting in a triumphant Manner at Tork, he receiv'd the uncomfortable News, that the Norman Duke was landed with very numerous and disciplin'd Forces, from which Time we may date the Fall and Ruin of this Prince.

Tosti joins with the King of Norway.

They are both defeated and slain by Harold.

Harold is impolitick.

Here it will not be improper to look a little back, and give some short View and Account of this famous and fortunate William Duke of Normandy. This Prince was Natural Son to Robert the Sixth Duke of Normandy, by Arlotta, the beautiful Daughter of a Skinner in Falaise, with whom he fell in love, as she stood gazing at a Door, while he pass'd through the Town, from whose Name, according as some conjecture, was deriv'd the Word Harlot. But notwithstanding his dishonourable Birth, when he was about nine or ten Years of Age, his Father declar'd him his Successor, and caus'd his Nobles and chief Norman Subjects to swear Fealty to him, and afterwards carry'd him to do Homage

An Account of William Duke of Normandy.

Homage to Henry the First, King of France, for the Dutchy of Normandy, according to the Custom of the former Dukes. Then delivering him to the Guardianship of that King, and to the Care of the Duke of Bretaign, he made a Pilgrimage to the Holy Land, in which Journey he dy'd; leaving the Young Prince to be the Founder of his own Fortunes, rather than the Heir of his Father's; which he found expos'd to all the Difficulties arising from the Tenderneſs of his Age, the Reproach of his Birth, a ſuſpected Guardian, a diſputed Title, and a diſtracted State. For upon the firſt News of Duke Robert's Death, the Nobles of Normandy, who were intruſted with the Government during the Son's Minority, found themſelves involv'd in great Difficulties, by the open Factions of ſome Noblemen, who envy'd their Greatneſs, and by the private Practices of others, who being deſcended from ſome of the former Dukes, reſolv'd to ſet up themſelves, but at firſt conceal'd their Deſigns, and join'd with the common Murmurers againſt the preſent Adminiſtration. The Governors were ſtill faithful to their Truſt, and judg'd the Preſence of the young Prince neceſſary to ſupport their Authority and his Title; they thereupon prevail'd with the King of France to ſend him into Normandy, which he did with great Honour to himſelf, and Kindneſs to his Pupil, as well as Satisfaction to all his Loyal Subjects; but to the great Diſappointment of thoſe who pretended their Diſcontents were only againſt the Governors, and not the Succeſſion.

His Troubles
and Bravery.

No Prince ever came ſo early into the Cares and Burdens of a Crown, nor ^{ibid.} felt them longer; engag'd in Toils and Difficulties, in Hardſhips and Dangers; his Perſon expos'd to the Arms of Enemies, and the Plots of Aſſaſſins; his Reign embroil'd by the Revolts of his Subjects, and the Invaſions of his Neighbours; and his whole Life ſpent in the neceſſary Defence of his own Title and Dominions, or in the ambitious Deſigns of acquiring greater. Yet none ever ſurmounted all with more Conſtancy of Spirit, Prudence of Conduct, and Felicity of Fortune: For he had a ſtrong and active Body, and a brave and vigorous Mind; and ſeem'd to have been born more for a Heroe, than a happy Man. His firſt Conteſts aroſe from the Pretenders to the Succeſſion, who favour'd by the Defects of his Birth, found ſo many Followers at home, and ſuch Aſſiſtance from Neighbours abroad, that they rais'd great Forces, and conſtrain'd the young Duke to appear, not only at the Head of his Councils, but of his Armies too, before he was eighteen Years of Age. Theſe Civil Wars continu'd long, with many various Succeſſes, bloody Encounters, defeating of Troops, ſurprizing, beſieging and relieving of Towns, and waſting of Countries; till at length William by his Vigilance, Bravery and Induſtry totally ſubdu'd, not only the Forces, but the Courages of all his Competitors and Enemies at home, and conſtrain'd them to quit both Normandy and France, and to ſeek new Fortunes in ſeveral Parts of Italy, as Apulia, Calabria and Sicily.

When Duke William had ſubdu'd all his Domeſtick Foes, another appear'd ^{ib.} from abroad more formidable than any of the former: This was Martel Earl of Anjou, who was not only a Prince of great Power, but was alſo ſtrengthen'd by the Aſſiſtance of the King of France himſelf, who jealous of the Norman Greatneſs was very ready to join in the Reducing of an aspiring Prince. To which End he encourag'd, if not ſet on foot the Earl of Anjou's Pretenſions to the Dutchy of Normandy, gave him his Aſſiſtance to juſtifie his Claim and purſue it by Arms, and by Degrees engag'd in an open and declar'd War againſt the Duke. This he proſecuted with much Paſſion and Violence, appear'd himſelf in the Field with his Nobility, and threaten'd, That nothing but the Ocean ſhould ſtop the Progreſs of his Arms. On the other ſide Duke William proceeded with invincible Bravery, and with ſuch a Preſumption of Succeſs, that he ſcorn'd to ſet upon his Enemies by Surprize, but ſent them Notice of the very Day he would give them Battel; a ſort of Courage unknown to this preſent Age. After many Succeſſes, he at length brought the Conteſt to the Decision of two fierce Battels. The first ended in an intire Victory on the Duke's Side, with the Slaughter of three Parts of his Enemies, amounting to above thirty thousand Men. This Loss rather enrag'd than discourag'd the King of France, who gave neither himself nor his Enemies any Quiet'till he had engag'd the Normans in a second Battel, with greater Forces and Fury on both Sides, but the same or worse Success than the former. For in this the King of France lost the Flower of his Army, the greatest Part of his Nobles, and with great Difficulty escap'd himself in Person. Yet that but little avail'd this unfortunate Prince, who was so sensible of his Loss, and Dishonour, as he conceiv'd, gain'd by so unequal a Match, that he had not the Courage to survive it long, but dy'd with Grief of it, and left Duke William a calm and peaceable Reign. This gave him Opportunity in a short Time to enlarge his Dominions, first by the Earldon of Mans, and next by Part of the Dukedom of Bretaign: After which he liv'd in Peace for a considerable Space, 'till he disturb'd his own and his Neighbours Quiet by new and greater Adventures.

Decision

His great Successes.

*Malmsh.
Camden.

This happen'd not long after by Means of the Death of King Edward the Confessor, from whom he had receiv'd, or pretended a Promise of being his Successor to the Crown of England, and likewise the Assistance of Harold the present Possessor. But when Harold, as we before related, refus'd to make any Compliance, this valiant Prince, not doubting his usual Train of Prosperity, resolv'd to obtain that by Force of Arms, which he could not gain by Arguments. But knowing he was to grapple with a stout and resolute Prince, and a powerful Nation, he us'd more than common Diligence and Application. And first assembling the Estates of Normandy, he represented to them his Claim to the Crown of England, the Wrong done him by Harold, and his Resolutions of righting himself; the Glory as well as Justice of the Enterprize, the Prospect of Success from his own Right, and the Hatred of the Usurper in England, as well as the Friends and Intelligences he had in that Kingdom; the Greatness of the Riches and Possessions by the Conquest of his Enemies, and the Share he design'd for his Friends and Followers, according to their Zeal and Contribution towards the Support of this Cause. At first he met with great Opposition and Backwardness, and many Difficulties were started; but the Vigour and Bravery of this Prince, together with the Hopes of Fame and Riches, soon dissipat'd all Doubts and Obstructions; so that his Subjects became very unanimous in joining in this extraordinary Design. He kept all his Soldiers in pay the whole Year, and tho' at great Charges he hired others from adjacent Parts. He us'd great Caution and Wisdom in the Choice of his Men, lifting such as were tall and of a hardy Constitution. His Captains and Officers were excellently skill'd in warlike Affairs, and of a mature Age both to govern themselves and others; not heady rash young Men, who by their Heat and Indiscretion often ruin an Army. And indeed he was admirably well serv'd at that Time, his Prelates striving who should excel each other in Acts of Religion and Piety, and his Nobles in Deeds of Magnanimity and Generosity; so that Malmesbury admires how they should so much degenerate in his Time, within the Term of sixty Years; not considering the luxurious Effects of Wealth and Prosperity, of great Possessions, and Affluence of all Things in a new conquer'd Country. As to the Pretences us'd by Duke William against Harold, Brompton with great Probability reduces them to these three Heads. First to revenge the Death of Prince Alfred his Cosen, who had been formerly murder'd by the Means of Earl Godwin. Secondly to restore Arch-Bishop Robert, Earl Odo, and the rest of the Normans, unjustly banish'd in the late Reign. And Thirdly Harold had contrary to his Oath possess'd himself of England, which as well by the Right of Consanguinity, as by that of a double Promise, ought to be his.

for his Wisdom, Conduct and Bravery, he found a Concurrence in his Design from many Princes his Friends, and some who had been his greatest Enemies. He was assisted with Money or Soldiers by the Dukes of Britain and Brabant, the Earls of Flanders and Bologne, and his ancient Competitor the Earl of Anjou; by many Princes of France, the most consider'd in that Court, as the Duke of Orleans, Earls of Poitou and Maine, excited by the Glory or Advantage of the Enterprize, at the Time when the Infamy of their King gave them no Hopes of Action at home, and left that Crown unconcern'd at what pass'd abroad. The Emperor sent some choice Troops, and experienc'd Commanders, to serve in this Expedition; and Pope Alexander induc'd by the Fame of the Duke's Piety and Virtues, and possess'd with the Justice of his Cause, sent him a consecrated Banner with several Reliques; which in those Times was thought sufficient both to justify his Title, and to sanctify his Arms. Having receiv'd the Banner as a good Omen, he assembled his Nobility and Officers at Lillibone, where laying open the whole Cause to them, they promis'd to stand by him with their Lives and Fortunes, which Resolution he cherish'd by Promises of great Rewards, according to the Merit of their Actions. His whole Fleet is said to have consisted of nine hundred Sail, but others increase the Number to above a Thousand; being all small flat-bottom'd Vessels, fit for transporting Men and Horses. Of which an Anonymous Writer, about the Reign of his Son Henry, has given us the Particulars; William his Sewer the Son of Osbern supply'd him with sixty Vessels: Hugh his Nephew, afterwards Earl of Chester, with as many; Hugh de Mumfort with fifty Ships, and sixty Soldiers; Romus the Eleemosynary of Tescan, afterwards Bishop of Lincoln, with one Ship and twenty Men. Nicolas the Abbot of St. Audoen supply'd him with fifteen Ships and a hundred Men: Robert Earl of Angus with sixty Ships: Gerold the Sewer with as many: William Count of Deurons with eighty Ships: Roger of Montgumeri with sixty: Roger de Baumont with sixty: Odo Bishop of Baieux with a hundred: Robert de Mortimer with a hundred and twenty: And Water Gisfard with thirty Vessels and a hundred Men. Besides these, from others of his Dependants he had many other Ships, from every one according to his Abilities. His Wife Matilda for the Honour of the Expedition caus'd a Ship to be made nam'd Mora in which he himself cross'd the Sea, having on the Prow a Child of Gold with the right Hand pointing to England, and with the left holding an Ivory Whistle in his Mouth; for which the Duke her Husband afterwards assign'd her the County of Kent.

He puts to Sea,

and lands near Hastings.

With all these Advantages the valiant Duke began and finish'd his mighty Preparations, by a generous Concurrence of his own Nobles and Subjects, and a Confluence of most of the bold adventurous Spirits in the neighbouring Provinces, led on by the Desire of Glory or of Gain. In the Month of September they all rendezvous'd at St. Valerie a Port Town, where they staid many Days for a Wind, which Stay caus'd the common Soldiers to murmur, condemning their Leader for attempting to gain another Man's Country, and alledging, That his Father had miscarry'd in the like Design, and that it was fatal to the Family to be obstructed by Heaven in their Endeavours after Things too high for them. The Duke was sensible of the Danger of such superstitious Suggestions, therefore by the Advice of his Council, he caus'd the Reliques of St. Valerie to be brought forth and expos'd for the obtaining a fair Wind; and immediately after their Expectations were fully answer'd. The Soldiers then very chearfully call'd to each other to put out to Sea, and the Duke himself being the first that went on Shipboard, by his Example hasten'd the rest. Following close to the Admiral Gally, they had a fair and quick Passage; and after they had refresh'd themselves, they landed at or near Hastings on the Coast of Sussex. At the Duke's first touching upon Land, his Foot slippt by Accident, and threw him down upon the Ground; which a Soldier observing he immediately turn'd it to a good Omen, and cry'd out aloud, That he had already already taken Possession of England. As soon as his Army had landed, he strictly charg'd them not to plunder or commit any Outrages, declaring, That they ought to spare those Things which would shortly be their own. For fifteen Days he continu'd with his Army in a quiet and peaceable manner, either to expect the Event of his Claim and to consider how to proceed, or to build a Fort to have recourse to in Case of Extremity; for he had order'd his Ships to be burnt, according to Camden's Account, that his Men might think of nothing but Death or Conquest. where he builds a Fort.

William's Arrival was accompany'd with some of those fortunate Hits, Circumstances or Accidents which usually attend upon Conquests. Harold, who had expected him all the Summer, was now absent and in the North; where he not only weaken'd his Forces by two bloody Encounters, but after that highly disgusted his Soldiers by defrauding them of their Share of the Norwegian Spoils. So that he was just ripen'd for Ruin, when in the midst of his Jollity at York he receiv'd the fatal News of the Duke's Landing in Sussex; and being now to lose all, his Fate hurry'd him to Resolutions and Actions quite contrary to those of him who was to raise himself out of his Misfortunes. His Adversary proceeded with the utmost Caution and Judgement, and he with a continu'd Precipitation, neither allowing Time for gathering together his Troops, nor for Consultation upon so weighty an Affair; but all bloody as he was, and with a slender Force hasten'd towards the Place where the Normans lay, as if the Fortune of Cæsar had been devolv'd upon him, because of his late Northern Success. Coming to London all in a Flame, he would not tarry for such Supplies as were on the Way to join him, but hurry'd into Sussex, with a Resolution to engage the Enemy, before a third Part of his Army could well be put in order. Yet he sent some Spies to survey the Number and Strength of the Normans, who being discover'd, Duke William with uncommon Courtesy caus'd them to be shown through all the Camp, and to be sent back with Rewards. At their Return they much applauded the Magnificence and Confidence of the Duke, and declar'd to Harold that all the Army seem'd to be Priests, because they had their Faces and Lips close shaven; contrary to the Custom of the English who then wore large Mustachoes. The King smiling at their Simplicity, reply'd, That he well knew those they had seen to be no Priests, but valiant Soldiers. His Brother Gyrth, a Youth of Courage and Knowledge above his Years, upon this took occasion to advise him Not to fight in Person, since he could not deny but either by Choice or Compulsion he had given William his Oath: Therefore he ought to withdraw himself, and permit him and the rest to try their Fortune, who were never oblig'd by any Oath, and might justly fight in Defence of their Country. If he fought, it was to be fear'd that Death or Flight would be his Fortune; but if the same befel them, he might either succour them flying, or revenge their Deaths. Harold would by no means harken to this Advice, thinking it tended to his Dishonour, and that a King's declining to meet Death at the Head of his Army, would be such a Mark of Cowardice as would blemish the Actions of all his Life. And being push'd on by his unlucky Fate, he hastily sent away the Monk who brought him these Proposals, 'That either he should resign his Kingdom; Or hold it of him; Or else try the Justice of his Cause by their two single Swords in the fight of both Armies: Or in case Harold should refuse all these, he was ready to submit to the Apostolick See. His Answer was, God, and the Swords of the Nation, should decide the Controversie. No Hopes of Accommodation appearing, both Parties prepar'd to fight the next Morning: The English are said to have spent all the Night in Singing and Drinking, and the Normans in much Devotion, and receiving the Sacrament. Harold's Rashness.

He marches against Duke William.

He rejects William's Proposals.

He prepares for Battel.

The memorable Day being come, which was to decide the Fate of the Nation, the English were drawn up into a close Body arm'd with Battel-Axes and Shields, and by the Standard stood the King on Foot with his Brothers, that the Danger being common, none might think of flying. The Front of the Normans consisted of Foot, most of them Archers, flank'd on each Hand with a Wing of Horse, in which consisted the great Strength of their Army. The Duke himself cheerfully and audibly declar'd, That his Cause was just, and that God would respect it accordingly, and call'd for his Armor, which being brought to him in a hurry, his Corset was put on the wrong Way, which Error he corrected by this pleasant Conceit, He now perceiv'd that his Dukedom was chang'd into a Kingdom. At the Head of his Army he put the Soldiers in mind 'of the Valour and Renown of their Ancestors, and of the Success 'and good Fortune of his own Arms, and concluded with Confidence of Victory 'from the Guilt and Perjury of the present Usurper of the English Crown. The Normans upon this began with the famous Song of Rowland, by the Martial Example of that Heroe to rouse and excite themselves to Imitation; and imploring the Divine Assistance advanc'd against the English, who were as ready to meet them, tho' the Ground they stood on was strait and inconvenient. The Fight began with great Fury, Order and equal Bravery on both sides; in which the English were severely gaul'd by the thick Showers of Arrows from the Norman Long-Bows, before the Battel join'd; which was a Weapon then unus'd in England, and thereby the more surprizing, the Wounds coming from Enemies so far distant, and not suddenly to be reveng'd. But when they came to a close Fight, the Normans were hew'd down by the English Bills after a deplorable manner; and their Points were so strong and so close together, that no Charges of the Norman Horse could break the English Ranks, tho' the Duke assaulted them so often, and with so great Bravery, that he had three Horses kill'd under him in the Attempt. But finding them to continue firm, he at length by a Signal caus'd his Men to feign a sudden Flight; upon which the English, easily deceiv'd by their Courage as well as Hopes, began such an eager Pursuit, as caus'd them to dissolve their Ranks, which otherwise had been impenetrable. The Sight of this gave Occasion to the Normans to return, and fall with fresh Fury into the disorder'd Body of the English, so that they soon broke them, and drove them to a rising Ground. Yet in their Flight they often rally'd, and sold their Lives at very dear Rates; and part of them having gain'd a Hill, when the Normans climb'd up after them, by casting down Stones quite over-power'd them. In another Place, by their Knowledge of the Country, being more dextrous in passing a Ditch, they made an exceeding Slaughter of their Enemies, and fill'd it up with their dead Carcasses. Thus the Success remain'd doubtful, and the Battel vastly bloody, from nine a Clock in the Morning 'till it grew dark, when Harold, after he had discharg'd all the Parts of a skilful Commander and valiant Soldier, was shot into the Head with an Arrow and dy'd. His Death turn'd the Scale, and caus'd the English to betake themselves to flight. With Harold fell his two Brothers Gyrth and Leofwin, with the greatest Part of the English Nobility; so that William remain'd a compleat Victor, who by his noble Courage, Diligence and Conduct well deserv'd the Success. He shew'd himself generous to his dead Enemy, and without Ransom gave his Body to his Mother, tho' she had offer'd large Sums for it; and when, as it lay in the Field, a certain Soldier by way of Contempt gave it a Wound in the Thigh, he immediately cashier'd him for so mean and cowardly an Action. Harold dy'd on the 14th Day of October, after a short but vigorous Reign of nine Months, one Week and two Days; and was by his Mother's Care bury'd at Waltham in a Church of Canons founded and endow'd by himself.

Thus ended the Empire of the English-Saxons in this Nation, who from their first Entrance under Hengist and Horsa, had kept Possession and with some Interruptions held Dominion for about six hundred and seventeen Years. And here it may justly be said, that notwithstanding the Valour and Conduct of the Normans, the English were the chief Forgers of their own Fortune; and they behav'd themselves as if they desir'd to be slav'd by those whom they admir'd, and imitated only in the worst of their Qualities. For besides the late Mismanagements of Harold, in other Respects a wise Prince, the Nation and Nobility were divided into Factions, and could not agree upon the Person to succeed him; and Edwin and Morchar retir'd with Discontent into Northumberland, not regarding the Safety of their Country, because their ambitious Purposes were not gratify'd. A firm Union, and a wise Management must still have put a stop to William's Arms; but instead of Preparation for expelling the common Enemy, the Nobility became Enemies to one another, and strove for that Crown which the Duke had already got, on the Point of his Sword, tho' not on his Head. These were prodigious Miscarriages, not incident to any who had their Reason, but absolute Effects of such vicious Tempers as infatuate Mens Minds, enervate the Power of their Souls, and render them abject, and ripe for Servitude. Such were the English at this Time, as we are assur'd from Malmesbury, who being of English as well as Norman Descent, professes that he had no Prejudice to either Nation, and declares, That for some Years before the Arrival of the Normans, Piety and all good Literature became so unfashionable even among the Clergy, that contenting themselves with a very small Share of Devotion, as well as Learning, they could scarce read Divine Service; and to understand Grammar was next to a Miracle. The Monks were clad in fine Stuffs, and observ'd not the Rules of their Orders. The Nobles were given up to Gluttony and a dissolute Life, neglected the Service of the Church, made a Prey of the common People, debauch'd their Daughters whom they had in their Service, and then turn'd them off to the Stews. While the meaner Sort spent Night and Day and their whole Substances in Rioting and Drunkenness, and those other Vices which effeminate Mens Reasons. From hence it came to pass, that being carry'd away with Temerity and Fury, rather than true Valour, they engag'd with Duke William, and brought such Calamities upon themselves and their Country. In Sum, the English then wore their Cloaths short, cut their Hair, loaded their Arms with golden Bracelets, mark'd their Skins with divers Images, would eat 'till they surfeited, and drink 'till they vomitted; which last Vices they communicated to the Conquerors, in all Things else following and admiring their Modes. But our Author would not have this understood of all, but of the English in general; for to his Knowledge, there were many good Men both among the Clergy and Laity. 'But,' adds he, as the Mercy of God often permits the Bad as well as Good to enjoy the like Prosperity; so his Justice does not always exempt good Men from partaking in the common Calamities of their Country. Since Divisions and Factions, Immorality and Impiety occasion'd such great Miseries to our Ancestors, we ought carefully to remember this one Maxim, That the same Causes ordinarily produce the same Effects.

more in State and Ability at home, and in a short Time more in Fame and Reputation in the World. All which proceeded from that Branch of the Northern People call'd by the Name of Normans; who having for many Years receiv'd more of the Sun and Civility than the English themselves, are thus described by the judicious Malmesbury. They were at this Time a People very curious in their Cloathes, choice in their Diet, but without Excess; train'd up to War, and scarce knowing how to live without it; quick in attacking their Enemy, and when open Force was too hazardous, over-reaching them by Cunning and Stratagem, or corrupting them with Money. They built large Edifices, tho' they liv'd in them at a moderate Expence; apt to envy their Equals, and desirous of surpassing their Superiors, yet defended those who were subject to them, from the Violence of Strangers. While they were pleas'd they were faithful to their Sovereign, but upon a slight Occasion they would renounce their Fidelity, judging of their Perfidy according to Success, and changing Sides for Advantage; yet being Lovers of Humanity, they treated Strangers with the same Respect and Civility as they did themselves, nor did they disdain to marry with those who were subject to them. And this must be own'd for their Honour, that by their coming hither they reviv'd the Discipline of the Christian Religion, then almost extinct in England: Whence, as our Author observes, might be seen Churches new built in the Towns and Cities, and Monasteries erected after a nobler Way of Architecture, insomuch that the whole Country began to flourish after an extraordinary Manner. These Advantages the Nation in general obtain'd by this Change, tho' it prov'd fatal to many noble Families in particular; to which Advantages we may add, That the English Nation for above five Hundred Years before had been but little known for any Atchievements abroad, 'till King Canute made use of their Assistance in his Wars against the Swedes: But after this, we shall find that this Nation under the Conduct of their Princes of the Norman Race made a nobler Figure abroad, and in a short Time conquer'd that Country by which they had been before subdu'd.

marches into Kent.

Kent submits.

William marches towards London.

The first of these Princes that govern'd this Nation was the renowned William, who was about forty two Years of Age when he gain'd that famous and decisive Battel at Hastings. There like a wise General, who design'd to make the best Advantage of his Success, he resolv'd to leave no strong Place behind him; so having left a sufficient Garrison in his late built Fort at Hastings, he march'd from thence to Romney in Kent, and reveng'd himself upon the inhospitable Inhabitants of that Place, for the Slaughter of some of his Men, who by Mistake had landed there. He continu'd his March along the Coast to Dover, to which Castle great Multitudes had fled for Refuge, as to a Place then thought impregnable; yet all these at the first Approach of the Conqueror, without Resistance yielded to his Mercy. After which, continuing about eight Days in the further Fortification of the Castle, and leaving there his sick Men, he march'd from Dover towards London, when in a short Time the Body of the Kentish Men came in to him voluntarily, swearing Fealty, and giving Hostages for Security; whereupon the City of Canterbury presented him with her Submission by certain Deputies sent for that Purpose. This Relation being made by Pictavienses, who was himself an Eye-Witness to these Transactions, may serve sufficiently to confute that vulgar and plausible Story of the Kentish Men meeting this Conqueror with green Boughs, and their procuring from him a Confirmation of all their Privileges.

The Duke, having reduc'd all Kent to his Subjection, receiv'd Intelligence that Stigand Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, together with the Earls Edwin and Morchar, being supported by the City of London and its Mariners, intended to set up Edgar Etheling, the true Heir, for their King; upon which this valiant General resolv'd to prevent all such Attempts, and therefore marching towards London, he encamp'd not far from the City. From thence certain Companies panies fall'y'd out against him, but with five hundred Horse he easily repuls'd them, killing great Numbers as they pass'd the Bridge; and here began the Miseries of England. The Duke seem'd resolv'd before this to use all gentle Methods, and to reduce the English by kind Usage; but finding they made head against him, and put him to further Trouble and Danger, he chang'd his Purpose, and proceeded with greater Severity. For upon this unfortunate Sally, he commanded or permitted all the Buildings South of the Thames, now call'd Southwark, to be destroy'd by Fire. But not being able as yet to enter the City, he resolv'd first to subdue the Countries lying South-West on the other Side of the Thames, and thereupon march'd towards Wallingford in Barkshire, where he permitted his Soldiers to ravage several Parts of the Country. In the mean Time Aldred Arch-Bishop of York, Wulfstan Bishop of Worcester, with Edgar Etheling himself, and other Noblemen, confounded in their Designs, and transported with Fears, quitted London, and repaired to the Duke at Berkhamsted in Hertfordshire, where submitting themselves, they swore Fealty to him, and upon their giving Hostages, he made a firm League or Contract with them; nevertheless he still permitted his Men to burn and plunder all the Way they march'd, which is reasonable to understand of such Places as had not yet submitted to him. The Nobility submit.

The Feast of Christmas approaching, the Duke with all his Army march'd up towards London, and was met by all the chief Men of the City; at which Time all the Bishops and Lay Nobility requested him That he would accept the Crown, declaring, That they had been always accusom'd to obey Kings, therefore they were ready to acknowledge him for their Sovereign. Upon which he immediately consulted with his greatest Intimates, and shew'd much Aversion to his Acceptance of that Honour at present; but all persuaded him to a Compliance, as being to their Knowledge the unanimous Desire of his whole Army. He weighing all Things, could not but yield to the Importunity of so many Petitioners; therefore staying near London, he sent some of his Men before to erect a Fortrefs and Place of Security in the City, and to prepare all Things fit for such a royal and magnificent Solemnity. The Day design'd for his Coronation was Christmas-Day, and Stigand Arch-Bishop of Canterbury being under some Censures from the Pope, the Ceremony was perform'd by Aldred Arch-Bishop of York; who first in a neat short Speech demanded of all the English there present, Whether they did consent to have the Duke crown'd King? who all chearfully and unanimously gave their Assents. At the same Time the like Question was put to the Normans by the Bishop of Constance, and the same Approbation given. Duke William being thus elected King, as Pictavienses expresses it, Aldred in the Abby Church at Westminster set the Crown upon his Head, and plac'd him on the Throne in the Presence of all the Bishops, Abbots and Lay Nobility: And the old Book of Ely, as also Florence of Worcester, gives us the Form of the Coronation Oath which he took before the Clergy and Laity at the High-Altar, being the same in Effect with that of the English-Saxon Kings; Namely, 'That he would protect the Holy Church and its Governors; That he would govern all the People subject to him prudently and justly; That he would ordain and keep just Laws, and wholly forbid all Rapines and unjust Judgments; to which Malmesbury also adds, 'That he would behave himself mercifully towards his Subjects, and would govern both the English and Normans by the same equal Law. After this he never claim'd any Power by pure Conquest, but as a regular Prince submitted himself to the Orders of the Kingdom; being desirous to have his Testamentary Title, weak as it was, to make good his Succession, rather than his Sword. They offer William the Crown.

William being thus establish'd in his Throne, immediately began to perform all Things worthy of his Dignity; so that he seem'd inflam'd with a new Zeal for the attempting great and noble Actions, using his utmost Endeavours both in Divine and Secular Affairs. In the first place he distributed great Quantities William crown'd King.

ties of Treasure found in Harold's Exchequer among his faithful Friends and Followers; as also many rich Gratuities which he bestow'd on the Monasteries, and large Alms to the Poor. He likewise presented the Pope with a great Sum both in Gold and Silver, besides the Standard of King Harold, in the doing of all which he was much assisted by the Benevolence of all the Cities, and of several great and wealthy Men, to obtain the Favour of their new Lord. While he staid in London he order'd all Things justly, wisely and mercifully, some of which tended to the particular Honour and Advantage of that City, while others prov'd highly beneficial to the whole Nation; and in all other Matters he chiefly consulted the Good of the Church and Kingdom. He enjoin'd all his great Men to observe Equity in all their Actions, and ever to regard that Eternal Monarch by whose Assistance they had been victorious; and tho' they were Conquerors, they ought not to oppress the Vanquish'd, who were Christians as well as themselves, lest by Injuries they should provoke those to rise up against them whom they had already subdu'd. Next he restrain'd the Common Soldiers by severe Edicts from violating the Chastity of Women, or so much as frequenting Taverns and infamous Houses; he also strictly prohibited all Murders, Robberies and Tumults. Thus as he bridled the People by Arms, so those very Arms were restrain'd by just Laws, appointing Judges to inflict severe Punishments upon those common Soldiers who should dare to transgress his Orders; and for a Time he was no more partial to the Normans, than to any other Nation then in his Service.

These were the happy Beginnings of this King's Reign; but he not staying long in London, retired to a Place not far off call'd Berking, till the Fortrefs he had begun at London was finish'd; for he found it absolutely necessary to curb the fickle Humours of that great and stubborn People. For his greater Security he plac'd Norman Garrisons in Winchester, Dover, and many other Places; and in Memory of the great Battel he obtain'd over King Harold, he gave Orders for the Building of that noble Monastery near Hastings call'd Battel-Abby, which he endow'd with great Privileges and Immunities. During his Stay at Berking, the powerful Earls Edwin and Morchar, came and submitted themselves to the King's Mercy and Clemency; in which they were follow'd by many other Noblemen of great Note, to whom he generously restor'd their Estates which had been forfeited, and having taken their voluntary Oaths of Fidelity, he receiv'd them into his Favour. As for Edgar Etheling, who was sometimes call'd England's Darling, to alleviate the Regret he might receive by the missing of a Crown, he not only shew'd him great Favours, but also conferr'd upon him very large Possessions. After this he made a Progress into divers Parts of the Kingdom, in all Places ordering such Things as were not only advantageous to himself, but also to his People in general. And now wherever he travell'd he found none to oppose him, nor the Roads any ways obstructed, all Men willingly submitting themselves to him; whilst he look'd upon the Common People with a benign Aspect, commiserating their Condition, and ordering his Men to treat them with Mercy, especially when he observ'd the poor Widows with their little Children upon their Knees imploring his Clemency. And this is the Account that King William's Chaplain Pictavienses has given us of the two or three first Months of his Reign.

mandy.*

II. King William having establish'd all Things for the Nation's Security and his own Subjection, resolv'd to make a Journey into his own Country of Normandy, and accordingly committed the Government of this Nation to his Brother Odo Bishop of Bayeux, and his Cousen William Fitz-Osbern. The Removing so soon from a new gain'd Country, looks like a Strain of his usual Courage and fearless Temper; but yet like a politick Prince he took extraordinary Pledges along with him, such of the Nobility as were most potent, particularly Arch-Bishop Stigand, the two great Earls Edwin and Morchar, Earl Waltheof, with with several of the chief Nobility, and also Edgar Etheling himself. With this noble Train he arriv'd at Normandy, and celebrated the Feast of Easter at the Abby of Fescamp, where he was met by Rodolph the potent Father-in-Law to the King of France, with great Numbers of the French Nobility, the handsomest of whose Youth envy'd the Beauty and Gracefulness of the young English Gentlemen; while others were ravish'd with the Richness and Magnificence of the King's Habit, as well as those of his Attendants, as also the Quantity of his Silver and Gold Plate, which, says our Author, would be incredible to relate. So that when these Noblemen return'd home, they were fill'd with Praises of the Magnificence, and especially the Generosity of King William, who pass'd all that Summer, and the Beginning of the following Winter in this Country.

While Normandy was thus happy, the English were severely oppress'd, according to Vitales, by Odo and Fitz-Osbern in their Governments, especially those in Kent, who being highly exasperated, took Occasion from the Absence of Odo and Hugh Montfort with a considerable Force, to send to Eustachius Earl of Bulloign, then the King's Enemy, inviting him to join with them in the Surprizal of Dover Castle. He agreed with them in the Design, and pass'd over in the Night with a Fleet fill'd with chosen Soldiers, and joining with them attack'd the Castle; but finding the Defendents more resolute and numerous than they expected, he drew off with his Men to his Ships, and return'd home; after which he was reconcil'd to the King, and was honour'd as one of the greatest Personages about him. About the same Time Edrick, surnam'd the Forester, in the County of Hereford, call'd in the Assistance of two Kings of Wales, and ravag'd several Parts of that Country. These Transactions were sufficient to hasten the Return of the King, who leaving the Government of Normandy to his Wife Matilda and his Son Robert, cross'd the Sea into England in December; where he was now to satisfy three Sorts of Men, First such Adventurers, with whom he had not yet clear'd; Next those of his own People, who justly expected a Recompence, but being very numerous, some were to live upon Promises; Lastly the People of this Kingdom, by whom he was now chiefly to subsist. Being arriv'd at London, he treated the English Bishops and Nobility with much Subtlety and Officiousness, granting them what they ask'd, and freely hearing them what they offer'd; but at the same Time began to have a stricter Hand and Eye over them than before, and exacted a severe Tax upon the English Nation, which was that of Danegeld, which had been remitted by Edward the Confessor. Upon which Occasion Malmesbury informs us that Aldred Arch-Bishop of York lov'd William as his Son, and honour'd him as a King, while he carry'd himself with Temper and Justice towards the English, but when he levy'd this unreasonable Tax, he sent Messengers to him concerning it; but they being roughly treated, he took the Liberty to denounce a Curse against William and all his Progeny. Which had such an Effect upon the King, that he immediately sent Friends to appease the Arch-Bishop, but before they got to him, he dy'd with Grief. But some Time before he dy'd, he had the Honour to crown the King's Wife Matilda with great Solemnity, who in the same Year was deliver'd of a Son, nam'd Henry, afterwards King of England.

The Taxes and Impositions seem to have been the Occasion of a fresh Rebellion this Year in the West; for the City of Exeter refus'd to swear Fealty to the King, or admit of a Garrison there, tho' they offer'd to pay Contributions: But not being satisfy'd with that, he sent this Message to them, That he was never us'd to such Subjects; therefore tho' it was Winter, he march'd in Person with an Army against it, always placing the English in the Front. Approaching near the City, the chief of the Citizens came out to meet him, begging Peace, promising Obedience, and depositing such Hostages as the King demanded; but in the mean Time the ordinary Townsmen refus'd to deliver up the City, where-whereupon he commanded his Army to make their Approaches to it. Then bringing one of the Hostages before the Gates, he there put out his Eyes, and beginning to batter and undermine the Walls, the Inhabitants implor'd his Mercy, which he readily granted, by the Mediation of those who first came over to him, with the Clergy, who all begg'd Pardon for the Folly and Obstinacy of the Common People. So all Things were forgiven them, and they had their Goods secur'd from the Violence of the Soldiers, by placing Guards at the Gates to keep them out. But Githa, Mother to King Harold, with many Citizens escap'd and fled with great Riches into Flanders. Here within the Walls the King chose out a Place for the Building of a Castle, and left Baldwin the Son of Earl Gilbert to see it compleated, and with many stout Soldiers to remain there in Garrison. Not long after this Expedition the King thought fit to divide the Lands among his Norman Commanders, as well as those of other Nations; which is to be understood, only of the Lands of those who had been in Arms against him in the Battel of Hastings, and of those who were engag'd in the late Insurrections; all which he look'd upon as forfeited Estates. And this appears plainer from the Controversie between Warren the Norman, and Sherburn the Englishman, whose Lands tho' the King had given them to Warren, yet when Sherburn alledg'd in Court, That he never bore Arms against the King, that he was his Subject as well as the other, and held his Lands by the Law establish'd among all his Subjects, the King himself gave Judgement against Warren, and commanded that Sherburn should hold his Land without Molestation.

It is reduc'd.

Edwin and Morchar rebel.

They are receiv'd into Favour.

Edgar Etheling goes into Scotland, and marries his Sister to that King.

One Insurrection was no sooner quell'd, but another more dangerous began, by means of Earl Edwin, who after Promise of one of the King's Daughter's in Marriage, was unjustly disappointed. This and some other Affronts provok'd him and his Brother Morchar to take up Arms; and being both very powerful and popular, many in the Northern Parts, where their Governments lay, came in to their Assistance, as also their Nephew Blethyn, Prince of North-Wales, with a great Number of Welshmen. Upon this, the King as a vigilant Commander inquir'd into all Places of Strength that might be serviceable to their Retreat; and to prevent their seizing of them, he fortify'd such as were most advantagious, as the Castle of Warwick, which he now built, and committed to the Custody of Henry de Beaumont, afterwards made first Earl of Warwick. At the same Time he built Nottingham Castle, and gave the Custody of it to William Penderel a Norman; which vigorous Proceedings so discourag'd the two Earls, that doubting of Success, they soon begg'd the King's Mercy, and were generously receiv'd into Favour. Upon which the Inhabitants of York deliver'd up the Keys of their City to the King, who was now ready to besiege it; but still doubting of their Fidelity, he immediately rais'd a Fortrefs in the City, and mann'd it with a strong Garrison. In his Return, he built Castles or strong Forts at Lincoln, Huntington and Cambridge, and plac'd in each of them valiant Commanders. Upon which Archil a potent Nobleman of Northumberland made his Peace with the King, and deliver'd his Son to him as an Hostage; likewise Egelwin Bishop of Durham was now receiv'd into Favour, and by his Mediation, a Peace was concluded with Malcolm King of Scotland who had been a Favourer of this Insurrection. But this continu'd not long, for about Autumn following, Earl Gospatrick, with several of the Northumbrian Nobility, fearing to be imprison'd as many others at that time were, drew over Prince Edgar Etheling to their Party, and with him, his Mother Agatha, and his Sisters Margaret and Christina, pass'd by Sea out of England into Scotland, where being kindly receiv'd by King Malcolm, they remain'd all that Winter in Peace. And Malcolm was so affected with the Beauty and Virtues of the Lady Margaret, that about two Years after he marry'd her himself; by whom the Blood of our ancient Kings was preserv'd, and conjoin'd with the Normans in King Henry the Second, and by that means became English again.

But notwithstanding these Precautions, Godwin, Edmund and Magnus, Sons of the late King Harold, coming out of Ireland, landed in Somersetshire, engag'd with Eadnoth, formerly their Father's Master of the Horse, slew him with many others, and taking large Booties both in Cornwall and Devonshire, return'd again to Ireland. These were unsettled Times, often accompany'd with Troubles and Disturbances; when several Norman Gentlemen and Persons of Quality, uneasie in the Nation, took their leaves of the King, and return'd into Normandy. Besides Commanders and Officers, great Numbers of the common Soldiers, tired with the perpetual Desolation of the Country, where they saw nothing but Rapines and daily Slaughters committed, not only by themselves, but by the Natives issuing out of the Woods and other Retreats, killing what Normans they could, desir'd now to be disbanded, that they might return and live in Peace in their own Country; which Request was readily granted by the King, who kindly dismiss'd them, having first well paid and rewarded them for all their Services.

cc. The next Year was remarkable for new and greater Troubles in the North, which began to break out upon the Arrival of Robert Cumin, the new Governor at Durham; who, not being so cautious as valiant, lying securely as he thought in the City, was surpriz'd in the Night by the Northumbrians, and he and all the Normans except one, to the Number of seven hundred were massacred. And while this Infurrection was on foot, the fugitive English in Denmark so far prevail'd with King Swane, that they procur'd his Assistance to recover their Rights, and his Kingdom, as was pretended; and accordingly he sent a Fleet of two hundred and Forty Sail well mann'd, under the Conduct of his Brother Osbern, and his Sons Harold and Canute. These arriving in the Humber, landed their Men in order to march to York, and ravag'd the Country through which they pass'd; and being shortly after join'd by Edgar Etheling and all his Associates from Scotland, they became very strong and formidable. Upon their nearer Approach to the City, the Normans who kept the Castle, fearing lest the Houses near them being pull'd down might serve the Danes to fill up the Ditches, set them all on fire, which so violently rag'd by reason of a high Wind, that it soon burnt all or most of that noble City, together with the Cathedral Church, The Danes land. the Monastery of St. Peter's, and a famous Library. But the Divine Vengeance severely punish'd this Barbarity, for before the City had done burning, the Danish Fleet arriv'd, and both the Danes and Northumbrians, besieging the Castles, quickly became Masters of them, with a terrible Slaughter of their Governor and three thousand Normans, very few escaping. After which the Danish Fleet, together with the Northumbrians, well loaded with Plunder, retir'd to their former Quarters. New Troubles

cc. The King upon receiving this ill News immediately sent his Queen into Normandy for her greater Security, and threaten'd not only to chastise the Rebels, but to extirpate the Northumbrians. But before he march'd, wisely considering that these Discontents arose in a great Measure from his own Management and Partiality to the Normans, he began to show a greater Regard to the ancient Saxon Laws, and to curb the Insolence of his Countrymen, and withal recall'd many of the English Noblemen from Banishment, and made a firm League with them. Arriving in Yorkshire, which was then Part of the Earldom of Northumberland, he put most of the People to the Sword, and laid the whole Country waste, to prevent the Danes harbouring themselves there, who now with their English Confederates lay incamp'd at York. courag'd in the City, that they soon surrender'd it to the Conqueror. Yet Malmesbury represents this Victory as not so easily obtain'd, and informs us that the valiant Earl Waltheof in this Fight at York, cut off the Heads of a great many Normans one after another, as they would have forc'd a Gate which he took upon him to defend. After this Victory, the King soon became Master of the whole Country, and recover'd it from the Danes as much by Mony and Promises as by Force. Edgar Etheling retir'd into Scotland, and several of the Nobility were generously restor'd to Favour, particularly Gospatrick and Waltheof, the latter of whom the King so admir'd for his Strength and Valour, that in a short time after he gave him his Neice Judith in Marriage, together with the Earldoms of Northampton and Huntington. But the Country suffer'd miserably in this War, all the Northern Parts being so depopulated by the Danes and Normans, that between York and Durham there remain'd no Town inhabited, but the Land lay waste and untill'd for above nine Years. This was also attended by so dreadful a Famine in all those Parts, that in this Year, as well as the next, the miserable Remains of the People were forc'd to feed upon Horses and Dogs, and even Man's Flesh, to save themselves from perishing.

Reg. 4.

The King disposes of all Preferrments to the Normans.

III. King William having quell'd the Insurrections in the North, and in other Parts, from this Time began to show a greater Aversion to the English,^{Vizals &c.} whose Unconstancy he daily dreaded; therefore by hard Usage, Imprisonments and Banishments he constrain'd them to submit. He gave most of the Earldoms and Baronies, Bishopricks and Prelacies of the whole Nation to his Normans, and scarce permitted the English to enjoy any Place of Honour, Dominion or Power. To William Fitz-Osbern, Sewer of Normandy, he gave the Isle of Wight and Earldom of Hereford. He gave the Town and County of Chester, first to Gherbod a Flemming, then to Hugh of Almonches. To Roger Montgomery he first gave Arundel, and then Chicester, and afterwards the County of Salop. To Walter Giffard the County of Buckingham; to William Warren the County of Surrey; and to Ralph Guader the Earldom of the East-Angles. And to many other noble Persons, he distributed many Cities and Towns, with great Power and Honours; and to many Strangers and others of mean Quality, he gave many Titles and Honours, insomuch that they had here in England Clients and Dependents far richer and more powerful than their Fathers were in Normandy. But to his two half Brother's Odo and Robert he was profuse in his Gifts and Honours. The former was Earl of Kent, a Count Palatine who gave Laws like a King, and Justiciary of England, the chief Man for administering Justice under the King; and after the Death of Fitz-Osbern, he made him Vice-Roy of the whole Kingdom. He had besides for his Share one hundred eighty four Lordships or Mannors in Kent, and two hundred fifty five more in other Counties. Robert had the Earldom of Cornwall given him, in which he had two hundred eighty four Lordships, besides five hundred fifty eight more in other Counties.

He reduces the Clergy to Subjection.

Nor did the King think himself secure only by having all Persons in Secular Authority his Dependents, and at his Command; but he also brought the Clergy, Arch-Bishops, Bishops, Abbots, and all Degrees of that Function under his Subjection. For the Bishopricks and Abbies which held Baronies, hitherto free from all Secular Service, were now put under Military Service; and according to his Will and Pleasure he appointed how many Knights and Soldiers they should find in Time of War, and drove many Ecclesiasticks out of the Kingdom, who refus'd to submit to this hard Constitution. He did not only charge their Lands with the Tenure of Knights Service, but also quarter'd Soldiers which he had hired in France, Germany and Spain, in all Monasteries of England; who were not only a Charge to their Purses, but also Spies upon their Actions. Nor did he think this enough to restrain the Power of the Clergy, who then bore the chief Sway in the Government; but by the malicious Advice of Fitz-Osbern, Osbern, and others of his Council, he search'd all the Monasteries, and took away the Mony which the richer Sort of English out of Fear of his Severity had secured there, and commanded it to be carry'd into his Exchequer. Mat. Paris says he robb'd all the Monasteries of their Gold and Silver, not sparing their Shrines and Chalices: And yet he did not think himself secure from the Power of the Clergy in that Age, 'till he had brought into England most of the Laws and Usages generally observ'd in Normandy, and had made such Bishops, Abbots and Governors, who would in all Things submit to his Ordinances; and therefore all Divine and Human Matters were chiefly according to his Will and Pleasure. To this purpose a great Council was held at Winchester, eight Days after Easter, at the Command of the King, and the Consent of the Pope; in which Stigand Arch-Bishop of Canterbury was depriv'd, together with Agelmar Bishop of Elmham, Agelrick Bishop of Selfey, and several Abbots; the King promoting this Work, that he might put into their Places Men of his own Nation, for the Security of his new acquired Kingdom. He also kept several Bishops and Abbots in Prison during Life, without any evident Cause, and without Condemnation by Synods or Secular Laws, purely out of Jealousie that they endeavour'd for a new Revolution. Yet in his new Promotions he generally acted with Wisdom and Honour, and for the most part advanc'd Men of Piety and real Worth. Particularly he gave the Archbishoprick of Canterbury to Lanfranc, an Italian of great Learning and Abilities, then Abbot of Caen in Normandy: The Archbishoprick of York was given to Thomas Chanson of Bayeux, and the Bishopricks of Winchester, Elmham and Selfey, to his three Chaplains, Walkelin, Arfast and Stigand. And notwithstanding many Acts of Severity and Injustice, which were often the Effects of Danger and Necessity, this Prince generally endeavour'd to promote Peace and Piety in the Nation.

But the English Nation was now so far disgusted, that they resolv'd to endeavour to throw off the Norman Yoke; and accordingly they assembled a numerous Army, and once more set up Edgar Etheling for their King; Fretheric Abbot of St. Albans, a rich and powerful Man, being the chief Promoter of this Design. Upon which the King became very uneasie, fearing at last to lose that Kingdom which he had acquir'd with so much Blood. Wherefore by the wise Advice of Arch-Bishop Lanfranc, he began to deal more gently with the English Nobility, and proposing to them Terms of Peace, he invited them to a subdolous Treaty; who suspecting no unfair Design, under the Conduct of Abbot Fretheric met the King at Berkhamstead, where after many Debates, he in the Presence of the Arch-Bishop solemnly swore upon the Holy Evangelists, and the Relicks of the Church of St. Albans, 'That he would observe the good, approv'd, and ancient Laws of the Kingdom, which the holy and pious Kings, his Predecessors, and chiefly King Edward had ordained: By which the English being satisfy'd, all return'd to their Habitations. But the King, who had conceal'd his Intentions, within a few Days after privately and suddenly endeavour'd to ruin those separately, whom united he could not overcome; which he perform'd by killing some, dispossessing others, and outlawing many more, to the Breach of his Oaths, and the great Affliction of the English. Upon this Prince Edgar fled again into Scotland, and several of the English Nobility into Denmark, and some into Norway, pursuing any Methods to avoid the Norman Yoke. Abbot Fretheric fled into the Isle of Eby, where he shortly after ended his Days; upon whose Death the King kept the Abby of St. Albans vacant in his Hands, and very much oppress'd it by cutting down the Woods, and impoverishing the Tenants; and unless he had been restrain'd by the Reproofs of Arch-Bishop Lanfranc, he had irreparably destroy'd that noble Foundation.

lowers, and slain; Morchar betook himself to the Isle of Ely, where he met with Egelwin Bishop of Durham, Siward surnam'd Barne, Walter Bishop of Hereford, and many other great Men of the English. These daily increasing, sent for Hereward, a Person renowned in many Places for his extraordinary Valour, to be their chief Commander; particularly urging him on the Behalf of Thurstan, then Abbot of the Place, and his Monks, who were Owners of the Isle; and upon their Account the same was fortify'd against the King. Not long after, the King, who never gave Time to Insurrections, march'd down against these Male-Contents, and by the Assistance of his Marriners, stopp'd up all the Passages on the East Side of the Island, and built a Castle at Wesbich; and on the West Side he made a Bridge from the Continent to the Isle, two Miles in length. Yet still he met with great Difficulties and Resistance, 'till after the Loss of many Men, he was advis'd to seize all the Lands and Goods belonging to the Monastery, that were out of the Isle, and divide them among his Soldiers, in order to oblige them to greater Care and Vigilance. This being effected, and the King's Power increasing, the Monks after a Consultation with their Abbot resolv'd not only to submit to the King, upon Condition he would honourably restore all their Lands, but also to give him a thousand Marks, and accordingly sent their Proposals; which were readily and graciously accepted, and the Island peaceably deliver'd into his Hands. The Noblemen were all constrain'd to submit to the King's Mercy, only the valiant Hereward with a few Followers with great Difficulty escap'd over the Fens, and got into Scotland. Then the King, having cut off the Hands and put out the Eyes of many of the common Soldiers, let them go; but for Earl Morchar, with the Noblemen and Gentlemen taken with him, he sent them to several Prisons; and Bishop Egelwin, being sent to Abingdon, there starv'd himself to Death. The better to secure the Island to his Obedience, the King quarter'd forty Norman Knights in the Monastery, obliging the Monks not only to find them Subsistence, but also their usual Wages.

The King having happily finish'd this Adventure, found that the Root of all his Dangers was in Scotland, which Country had always been a Sanctuary for his Enemies and the Male-Contents of his Kingdom, and now the Receptacle of his Competitor Prince Edgar. Therefore to put an End to all future Disputes, and also to revenge some late Devastations made in England by the King of Scotland, he resolv'd to invade that Kingdom in Person, and accordingly with a powerful Army enter'd Galloway, where the Soldiers were more harass'd in passing over the barren Mountains and Marshes than pursuit of the Enemy; wherefore he was oblig'd to turn another Way, and march directly towards King Malcolm's Army in Lothian, with a Resolution to finish the War with one Battel. But Malcolm wisely considering the Danger to which he was expos'd, sent Ambassadors to King William with Terms of Agreement; and the other considering the Hazards of a Battel in a difficult and unknown Country, accepted of his Terms, on Condition that he should take an Oath of Fealty to him, and all Offenders on both Sides be pardon'd. And hereupon King Malcolm did his Homage to King William; but whether for all Scotland, or the Low-Lands, or for Cumberland, Authors are not well agreed. In the Memory of this Treaty there was a Stone Cross erected in the Middle of the Mountains of Stanemore in Richmondshire, which was call'd the Royal Cross, having the Arms of both Kings engraven on the several Sides of it, which was for the future to serve as a Boundary between the two Kingdoms, the Remainder of which was to be seen in Camden's Time. And here with the universal Change brought about in England, the Kingdom of Scotland is likewise observ'd to have had no small Share: The former great Recourse of the English into Scotland, both to attend the Queen and her Brother Edgar, as well as for their own Safety, not only introduc'd the English Language, into the Court and Country, but also the Fashions, Vanity of Apparel, Riot, Luxury and Excess of

of the English, much to the Damage and effeminating that hardy and warlike Nation. And many of the English, forsaking the Place of their Birth and Habitation, were receiv'd into the Favour of that King; who being by his Liberality there settled, have since that Time propagated, and brought forth Branches of many noble Families, whose Posterity continue to this Day. And we are inform'd that about this Time were the Degrees and Titles of Honour first known in that Country, as Duke, Earl, Baron and Knight; and the nobler Sort of the Scots, in Imitation of the French and English, began to be call'd by the honourable Titles, from the Names of their Families, or the best of their Possessions.

ulph. In this Year, a Contest of another Nature was also decided, which was between the two Arch-Bishops of this Kingdom, Lanfranc and Thomas, who being lately return'd from Rome, by the Pope's Order a great Synod was held concerning the ancient Dispute of the Jurisdiction of the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury over the other at York; where the Matter being fully debated on both Sides, at length the Synod gave Sentence in favour of the See of Canterbury, in the Presence of the King, the Pope's Legate, the Bishops and Abbots of several Orders; and the Decree was subscrib'd by the King, Queen, and chief of the Nation.

A Contest between the Sees of Canterbury and York.

u. An. IV. For about seven Years, King William had met with Disturbances only in his new acquir'd Kingdom; but now having surmounted these Difficulties, he was disquieted with new Troubles from the King of France, who this Year renew'd the ancient Contest, and invaded his Dominions about Normandy. Upon which the King without Delay transported a powerful Army into Normandy, as well English as Normans; and in a short Time, chiefly by the Valour and Bravery of the English, he retook the City of Mans, and the Province of Maine, which had lately revolted; but not without great Spoil in destroying of Vineyards, and burning of Cities and Towns. Here Edgar Etheling came to him out of Scotland, who was graciously receiv'd with all his Followers, and he himself honourably maintain'd in the King's Court, where he was generously allow'd a Pound Weight of Silver for every Days Expence: A rare Example of a prevailing Conqueror, shew'd upon a Man so unconstant, who had twice broken his Oath of Fidelity, and dangerous so near his Person, as being the only Competitor of his Crown. But this Prince dealt more roughly with the new Pope Gregory, who about this Time by Letters demanded an Oath of Fealty from him for the Crown of England, to be held of the Roman See; alledging, 'That the Royal Power next under God was to be subject to the Care and Government of the Apostolick Jurisdiction. To whom King William return'd a free Answer, in which he utterly deny'd any such Authority, and he was so far from paying him any such mean Submission, that Eadmer assures us, He would not permit any Subject in his Dominions to acknowledge any Man for Pope, but whom he had first allow'd of, nor so much as to receive his Letters, unless they had been first shewn to himself.

While the King continu'd in Normandy, a dangerous Conspiracy was form'd against him in England, not only by some of the English, but also Norman Nobility; which was occasion'd by Ralph de Waher, Earl of Norfolk and Suffolk, who having marry'd Emma the Daughter of Roger Earl of Hercford, Cosen to the King, without his Consent, was so transported with the Greatness of the Alliance, and the Power of Wine, that on the Wedding Day he perswaded his Guests into a Rebellion. With whom the Bride's Father readily join'd, together with Waltheof, lately made Earl of Northumberland, with several other Barons, Abbots and Bishops. But Earl Waltheof repented the next Morning, alledging that he was deluded and overcome with Wine, and immediately went to Lanfranc Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, confess'd the whole Design, and receiv'd Absolution from him; by whose Advice he also went into Normandy, discover'd discover'd all to the King, and threw himself upon his Mercy. But the rest returning to their several Castles, began the Rebellion with all their united Forces, and confederating with the Welshmen, they burnt and plunder'd many of the King's Towns: But the Governors of his Castles, together with the People of those Countries, soon frustrated their Designs; for Wulstan, Bishop of Worcester, with a great Number of Men, and Egelwin, Abbot of Evesham, with his Tenants, being sent for to his Assistance with Urse, Sheriff of Worcestershire, and Walter de Lacy and his Men, all marching together prevented the Earl of Hereford from passing the Severn, and joining with Earl Ralph at the appointed Place. At the same Time Odo Bishop of Bayeux, and Godfrey Bishop of Constance, being incamp'd near Cambridge, hinder'd Earl Ralph from marching any further; who seeing his Designs thus disappointed, retired to Norwich, where committing the Castle and the Garrison to the Custody of his Wife, he took Ship, and sail'd over into Bretaign, and from thence into Denmark. But his Opposers took as many of his Followers as they could find, and either kill'd or disabled them; and the King's Lieutenants laid close Siege to the Castle of Norwich, which at length surrender'd, and the Countess, with those of her Party, by the King's Permission left England, and went over to her Husband in Denmark. Not long after, Earl Ralph with Cannute, Son to Swane King of Denmark, and a certain Earl call'd Hacun, return'd to England with two hundred Sail of Ships; but finding no great Prospect of Success, they withdrew into Flanders.

King William now return'd from Normandy, and some Relicks of the Rebellion remaining in the West, he hasten'd thither, where he soon put an End to all Tumults, and us'd the Conspirators with great Severity, cut off the Hands of some, put out the Eyes of others, hang'd some upon Gibbets, and those who escap'd best, suffer'd Banishment. Nor could Earl Waltheof himself escape Punishment, notwithstanding he had reveal'd the Conspiracy; for after the King had tax'd him with Ingratitude, he caus'd him to be beheaded at Winchester, tho', as it is said, he had before promis'd him his Pardon, his great Possessions being his greatest Enemies; for he was Earl of Northumberland, Northampton and Huntington, which Dignities were by the King thought more fit for his Norman Subjects; and the Desire of a new Marriage excited his Wife Judith not a little to promote his Death. His Body being bury'd at the Abby of Croyland, his Tomb soon became so famous for pretended Miracles, and the King thereby so far disoblig'd, that he depriv'd the Abbot of the Place, and put in Ingulphus, one of our most considerable Historians. By reason of this Conspiracy Malmesbury excuses the King's future Severity to the English, and says he scarce found any of them faithful, which so exasperated his Temper towards them, that he depriv'd the more Powerful of them first of their Mony, then of their Lands, and afterwards many of them of their Lives. So that from about this Time we may date that remarkable Epocha, which the same Author mentions in another Place, and which had continu'd to his own Time, namely, That England was then become the Habitation of Strangers: So that it is certain when he wrot, that tho' many English Men enjoy'd Estates, yet there was no Native original English Man, who was Earl, Bishop, or Abbot; but, adds he, Foreigners devour the Riches of England, and eat out its very Bowels.

The King having with his usual Success suppress'd all Disturbances, and committed the Earldom of Northumberland to the Care of Walcher Bishop of Durham, went a third Time into Normandy, enter'd Bretaign with an Army, and there besieg'd the Castle of Dole, which belong'd to the rebellious Earl Ralph; but the Garrison so long defended it, that Philip King of France found Time to relieve it, and raise the Siege; so that the King was oblig'd to return into England, and to pass this and the next Year in Peace. During which Time, according to Brompton, a great Synod was held in St. Paul's Church in London, under Arch-Bishop Lanfranc, the use of Ecclesiastical Synods being 'till then almost obsolete in England. In this the Precedency of Bishops in Synods and Councils was determin'd, and the chief Thing ordain'd was, That severall of the Bishops Sees should be remov'd from smaller Towns to Cities: By Virtue of which, the See of Selfey was translated to Chichester; that of Wells to Bath; that of Shirburne to Salisbury; that of Dorchester to Lincoln; and that of Litchfield to Chester, which was afterwards remov'd first to Coventry, and then to Litchfield again. About the same Time also the See of Elmham was remov'd to Thetford, and not long after to Norwich.

After King William had, as he imagin'd, finish'd all Wars and Contests both at home and abroad, a less suspected and more unnatural War broke out in Normandy, which with some Intermissions lasted two or three Years. This was occasion'd by his eldest Son Robert whom he had left in Normandy, a Gentleman of an aspiring and prodigal Temper, who being openly assisted by Philip King of France, and privately encourag'd by his own Mother Matilda, boldly laid Claim to the whole Dukedom of Normandy, alledging his Father's Promise made to him when he first gain'd England. Accordingly being assisted by the French King, he vigorously invaded the Country, burnt several Towns, and made great Devastations. The King, tho' at first discompos'd at the News of his Son's Insolence, yet believing it had no deeper Root, but what would soon wither or be cut off by his Presence, gather'd immediately what Forces he could raise, and with an Army of his English Subjects sail'd over now to invade Normandy, as he had done formerly to invade England with the Normans. In the first Year, after no very great Struggles on either Side, a Truce and a Peace was made; but in a short Time Duke Robert, restless in his Ambition, broke through all Obligations, enter'd into new Acts of Hostility, and at length press'd very hard upon his Father near the Castle of Gerboret. At which Place they came to a general Battel, which was very obstinate on both Sides, in which Duke Robert furiously encounter'd his Father unknown to him, and not only wounded him in the Arm with his Lance, but dismounted him. King William thus fallen, immediately call'd for a Horse, storming to see his Blood split in his own Land, which had never been drawn by the Weapons of Foreigners, and in a great Rage threaten'd Revenge. Robert knowing his Father's Voice hastily alighted, and in his Arms took him from the Ground, humbly desiring his Pardon for this unknown Fact, and Forgiveness of his rash Attempt; then mounting him upon his own Horse, he brought him in Safety out of the Throng, who now seeing himself too weak to withstand the Enemy, left the Honour of the Field to Robert, with the Loss of great Numbers of his Men, and the Wounding of his Son William Rufus. This uncommon Accident in a short Time after brought both Parties to an Accommodation; and Peace being made, Robert return'd into England with his Father, but could never wholly regain his Favour. This was the only considerable Defeat the King receiv'd in his whole Life; in all the rest of which he was so successful, that even Foreign Nations dreaded his very Name.

During the Time of these Wars, the better to secure the City of London, the King laid the Foundation of a strong Castle or Citadel, surrounded with a large deep Ditch, lying on the East Side of the City, now call'd the Tower of London; the chief Surveyor of which Work was Gundulph, Bishop of Rochester. Therefore those who would have it founded by Julius Caesar are much mistaken, unless they can prove that the King only built it upon some old Foundation laid by him; which yet is not probable, since no Author relates that ever Julius Caesar came to London. About a Year after, Duke Robert marching into the North against King Malcolm, founded another remarkable Castle upon the River Tine, at a Ford or Passage where before stood a small Village call'd Monkcester, from certain Monks who liv'd there in great Austerity and Retirement: But after the Building of this Fortrefs, it was from thence call'd New-Castle upon Tine, which Name it still retains.

A general Survey made of the Nation.

Domesday-Book.

The King's Revenues.

and Forces.

V. King William had now so firmly establish'd his Affairs both at home and abroad, that for the last seven Years of his Reign he met with no very considerable Disturbances; so that he had leisure to apply himself to the Arts of Peace, and the Orders of the State, in which he was no less skilful and vigorous than in those of War. In some Things he proceeded laudably and honourably, in others severely and arbitrarily, and in all Things considerately and politickly. One of his great Designs was to make a general and compleat Survey of the whole Nation, which he began this Year, and did not finish it 'till six Years after. This great Work was manag'd and carry'd on by particular Commissioners, who were some of the greatest Earls and Bishops of the Nation; who by the Verdict or Presentment of Juries, or certain Persons sworn in every County, Hundred or Wapentach, enquired and noted down what Arable Land, Pasture, Meadow and Wood every Man had, and what was the Extent and Value of them in the Time of King Edward the Confessor. And also at the same Time, the Survey was made by Counties, Hundreds, Towns or Mannors, Hides, half Hides, Virgates and Acres of Arable Land, Meadow, Pasture and Wood. Also they noted what Mills and Fishings, and in some Counties, what and how many Free-Men, Sock-Men, Villains, Borders, Servants, young Cattle, Sheep, Swine, working Horses, Hives of Bees, &c. belong'd to every Town and Man-nor, and whole they were; always in every County putting down the King's Name first, and after him all the great Men in Order, that held of him in Chief, with Numbers plac'd before them, for the easier finding them in the Book, as may be seen in the Catalogue of Tenants in Chief, or the Possessors of such Lands at the Time of the Survey. All England, with Part of Wales, was describ'd, except the three Counties of Westmorland, Cumberland and Northumberland; and the Description or Survey written was in two Books, now call'd the great and little Domesday-Book, remaining in the Custody of the Vice-Chamberlains of the Exchequer. The little Book contains only the Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk and Essex. The Reason given for the Name of Domesday is, That it was no more lawful to depart, or appeal from what was in it, than from the Day of Dome, or last Judgment. And being the highest Record in the Kingdom, it was then, and still continues to be a decisive Evidence in any Trial where there is Occasion to refer to it.

This great Survey did not only increase, but also much more ascertain the Revenues of the Crown, which then consisted of several Branches: As first the Crown Lands, which consisted of one thousand four hundred and twenty two Mannors or Lordships in several Counties, besides several Farms and Lands in Middlesex, Shropshire and Rutlandshire. These with the Escheats forfeited to the King for Felony or Treason, or reverted to the Crown for want of Heirs, together with the Kents reserv'd of the Baronies and Lands he gave to his Followers, rais'd a vast Revenue in Money. Another Branch was a Land-Tax call'd Hidage, which this King found here before his Arrival in the Time of Edward the Confessor, as appears every where in Domesday-Book. A third Branch was Tolls and Customs for many Cases, Wardships, Knights Fees, Forfeitures, Fines and pecuniary Punishments for Murder, Manslaughter, Batteries, Fightings, Trespasses, Misdemeanor, &c. which were all redeem'd and satisfy'd by Penalties and Fines, as well now as in the Saxons Times. Not to proceed to every Particular, in short this King's Revenue in general was so very great, that Vitales assures us that it was computed at above one thousand and sixty Pound of Sterling Money every Day of the Year, besides his Gifts, Presents and pecuniary Punishments; which was an immense Sum in those Days, amounting to near four hundred thousand Pounds per Annum, and which now by a moderate Computation may be valu'd at five Millions of our Money. Besides this vast Revenue, he had a mighty standing Army, especially of Horse, with which he made good his Acquisitions without any Expence or Charge out of his Exchequer: For the same same Author affirms, that he so distributed the Lands of England to his Followers and Soldiers, that he had sixty thousand Knights or Horsemen constantly at his Command, to be employ'd in any Expedition where Occasion requir'd.

As this King was careful as to his Revenues and Power, so was he no less diligent as to Laws and Government; and upon pretence of Justice and Piety, or else of Necessity and Safety, he abolish'd several ancient Saxon Institutions, and made several new, besides great Changes in others. He also caus'd the Laws of the Kingdom, which had been anciently written in Saxon, and by Edward the Confessor publish'd in Latin, now to be translated into Norman. He order'd all Pleas in the several Courts to be made in the same Language, as likewise all Petitions presented to the King, and all Orders of Court and Council. This introduc'd new Terms, new Forms of Pleading and of Process, new Names of Offices and of Courts; and with them all the Customs and Subtelties of the Norman Pleas and Conveyances, instead of the old Saxon Simplicity. Among the Saxons it was usual to grant Lands and Houses by bare Words, and with the Delivery of some trivial Gift, as an Horn, a Sword, an Arrow, or a Helmet; yet the Honesty of those Times left them little subject to any Disputes or Contentions. But this Prince reduc'd all Grants to Writing, to Signature, and to Witnesses, which in Time introduc'd more Cavils and Actions, than former Methods. He appointed Justices to preserve the Peace, and to administer Justice in every County, pursuant to what was us'd in the former Reigns. For the Pleas of the Crown, and those of greater Moment between Subjects, he created learned and noble Judges, and ordain'd four Terms each Year, consisting of a certain Number of Days, wherein Justice should be duly administer'd, and all Suits heard in such Places as the King should appoint, and find most convenient. Besides these Orders he instituted the Courts of Chancery and the Exchequer; the first for tempering the Rigor of Laws, according to the Dictates of Conscience and Equity; and the other for determining all Actions concerning the Revenues of the Crown, and punishing unjust Officers who levy'd or receiv'd them, as well as backward Paymasters. By these Changes he also abrogated the Judiciary Power exercis'd by the Bishops in each County where Justice was administer'd; where the Bishop with the Alderman, or Earl of each Shire, sat as Judge in those Courts, which had not only increas'd their Authority but also their Revenue, by a Share they had in the King's Fines they levy'd.

But whatever Innovations and Changes were made in all other Things, the Government of the Peace and Security of the Kingdom seems to have been continu'd as before; and particularly he retain'd the Use of that famous Law, not yet wholly disus'd, call'd the Borough Law, by which every free Man of the Commons of England stood as Surety for each others good Behaviour, every Borough or Tything being oblig'd to produce their Criminals to Justice; by which means Innocence became every Man's Interest, as well as Duty, since they were otherwise to share in the Penalty. In the Beginning of his Reign the Kingdom had been much infested with Outlaws and Robbers, and many Normans were secretly murder'd by the English, as they pass'd alone upon the High-Ways or the Fields, especially in the Night. To remedy which Mischief, he impos'd a heavy Fine upon the Hundred where the Body of any Norman should be slain, whether the Authors of the Fact were discover'd or not. All Adulteries by his Laws were made equal with Manlaughters and Murders; and for all Rapes and Robberies, he caus'd them to be punish'd so severely by cruel Mutilations of Members, and Hardships of Labour, as left them miserable Spectacles, or Warnings of their Crimes, during the rest of their Lives. By the Rigor of these Courses, and suppressing of Idleness and Luxury, the chief Causes of such Offences, he in Time reduc'd the whole Realm to such Security, that it is recorded that in his Time a fair Virgin with a Purse of Gold in her Hand, might have travell'd through the Nation, without any Danger to her Honour, or her Money.

His Partiality
to the Nor-

Notwithstanding many excellent Laws and Regulations, which greatly display'd the Wisdom and Abilities of this Prince, several of his Actions were misinterpreted and dislik'd, and others were too apparently blameable to admit of any Vindication, as favouring too much of the Tyrant and Oppressor. Particularly after an arbitrary manner he dispeopled the South-Western Parts of Hampshire, destroy'd all the Towns and Villages, with thirty six Mother Churches, turn'd out the poor Inhabitants, for above thirty Miles together, and made a Forest for wild Beasts, which the English then call'd Itene, and at this Time The new Forest: Of which W. Mapes, who liv'd in the next Age, severely observes, That the Conqueror took away great Quantities of Land from God and Men, and converted it to the Use of wild Beasts, and the Sport of his Dogs. This he did either to make a more easie Access for his Normans into England, in case of Insurrections; or to indulge himself in his Hunting, or else to raise Money by Methods, tho' never so unjust. For he, more merciful to Beasts than to Mankind, appointed most grievous pecuniary Fines, and other more severe Penalties, to be inflicted on those who should presume to trespass upon his Game and Retirement. But the Divine Vengeance seem'd to have pursu'd him not long after in the untimely Deaths of several of his Posterity: For his second Son Richard, was in this Forest goared by a Deer, or poison'd by a pestilential Blast; his third Son William was afterwards casually slain by an Arrow in the same Place; and his Grandson Henry, by his Son Robert, while he hotly pursu'd his Chace, was caught up by a Bough, like Absolon, and left hanging 'till he dy'd. Besides several Acts of Injustice and Oppression, this King in a particular Manner disoblig'd the English by his apparent Partiality to his Countrymen the Normans: For he did not only give them the greatest Preferments, introduce their Customs, and publish his Laws in their Language, but also endeavour to make their Language to be general in the Nation. To which End, he caus'd many Schools to be erected for teaching that Tongue, which was a Bastard French, not well understood by the French themselves, and scarce at all by the English. But his Endeavours were in a great Measure frustrated by the Over-Ballance of the Numbers of the Nation, in Proportion to the Strangers, and by a general Aversion in the English to change their Language, which they thought would occasion the final Overthrow of their Liberties. So that in this very Reign, instead of the English speaking of the Norman, the Normans by means of Intermarriages, ordinary Commerce and Conversation, began generally to use the English Tongue, which has ever since compos'd the main Body of our Language, tho' chang'd like others by Mixture of many new Words and Phrases, not only introduc'd by this great Revolution, but by the Uses and Accidents of each succeeding Age.

He seizes upon his Brother Odo.

In the midst of his Partiality to the Normans, this Prince shew'd so much Justice, that he would spare none who were guilty of great and known Crimes. Nor would he pass by his Brother Odo, whom he had made Bishop of Bayeux, and Earl of Kent, and on whom he heap'd such great Honours and Favours. This Prelate, aspiring to the Papal Chair, had purchas'd a magnificent Palace at Rome, whither he was going with a noble Retinue, and a vast Treasure, when the King came suddenly upon him in the Isle of Wight, where he was ready to set Sail, and seiz'd him with his own Hand, when he could not persuade those about him to do it, since he alledg'd he was a Clergy-Man, and not to be sentenc'd without the Judgment of the Pope; but the King reply'd, he seiz'd on him not as a Clergy-Man, but as Earl of Kent; whereupon all his mighty Riches were taken from him, and his Estate confiscated: The Crimes the King laid to his Charge were the grievous Oppressions of the People during his Government, and the Seduction of his Subjects to forsake the Realm without his Leave; for he had engag'd Hugh Earl of Chester, with many Knights and other Persons of Quality, to attend him in his Journey to Rome. This happen'd in the Year 1082, after which, for four or five Years, 'till the last of the this Reign, we find but little of Moment; only in the Year 1084 the King laid a heavy Tax of no less than six Shillings upon every Hide of Land throughout England; being threaten'd with an Invasion from the Danes, against whom in the next Year he rais'd a vast Army, but found no great Service for his Soldiers. In the same Year his Queen Matilda dy'd in Normandy,^{Matilda dy'd} to her Husband's great Affliction. In the next, Edgar Etheling having obtain'd the King's leave, went into Italy with two hundred Knights, from whence he pass'd into the Holy Land with Robert the Son of Godwin to fight against the Saracens; but his Sister Christina had some time before vow'd her self a Nun in the Monastery of Rumsey in Hampshire.

^{Calmsb.} The last Year of this Reign, which was 1087, prov'd very calamitous to England by reason of the malignant Feavers and Famines that destroy'd vast Numbers; also sudden Fires consum'd several of the principal Cities in the Nation; and St. Paul's Church, with the greater and better Part of the City of London, were burnt to the Ground. In which Year King William having settled his Affairs in England, and taken new Oaths of Fidelity from the Nobility, pass'd over into Normandy with a powerful Army, to revenge himself upon the King of France for former Injuries; but not long after a Truce was made between them for a considerable Time. This was well observ'd on King William's Part, 'till the King of France indiscreetly took an Occasion to jest upon his great Corpulency, for which he was then in a Course of Physick, declaring, That his Brother of England was gone only to lay his great Belly at Roven, and he doubted he must be at the Charge to set up Lights at his Up-rising. This Scoff from a young King so rous'd and exasperated the old Warrior, that he swore a desperate Oath, That as soon as he was Church'd,^{He is provok'd by the King.} he would save him the Charge of setting up of Lights, and come himself, and light a thousand Fires in the Bowels of France. Accordingly in August following, the King to make good his Oath, enter'd France with a mighty Army, destroy'd all the Corn and Fruits, committed great Ravages, and burnt many Towns and Villages; after which he besieg'd the City of Mante, took it soon after, and burnt it, commanding the Fire to be continu'd 'till all the Buildings and Churches were burnt to the Ground. But the King being too eager in his Revenge, his Body was soon inflam'd by the Warmth of the Season, as well as the Heat of the Fires; and then in his Retreat, upon leaping over a Ditch on Horse-back, he so bruis'd the Rimm of his Belly against the Pummel of the Sattel, that he was soon thrown into a dangerous Distemper that ended his Days.^{He receives a Hurt.}

^{over.} The King finding his Death approaching, began to be apprehensive of his future Happiness, and to think upon Acts of Mercy and Charity, and order'd great Sums to pious Uses, particularly for the re-edifying those Churches he had burnt in Mante. He likewise gave Order for the setting at Liberty the Earls Morchar, Roger and Syward, as also Wulnoth, Brother to King Harold, whom he had kept Prisoner from his Childhood, together with all others who were in Custody, either in England or Normandy; not excepting his Brother Odo, who not without much Intercession was releas'd. Vitales tells us that a little before his Death, he made a solemn Speech to his Sons and Friends about him, 'wherein he recounted many charitable Deeds and munificent Gifts of his own, but withall he acknowledg'd with infinite Sorrow, that he had been brought up in Wars, and polluted with Blood, and that he had been guilty of many Cruelties and Oppressions in relation to the English. Here he bequeath'd to his three Sons his whole Estate; to his eldest Son Robert the Dukedom of Normandy; but for the Kingdom of England, having obtain'd it by so many Crimes, he durst leave it to none but God; tho' his Desire was, that William, his most obedient Son, might enjoy it after his Decease. But to Henry, his third Son then living, he left five thousand Marks in Money, without any Territories. His Son Henry complaining of this, and asking,

H. I.

His Death.

What he should do with the Money, unless he had some Place to secure it; he in a propheticall Manner is said to make Answer, That in Time he should enjoy all the Honour that he himself had, and that he should exceed both his Brothers in Glory and Riches. Then to prevent any Disturbances in England, he wrot a Letter to Arch-Bishop Lanfranc in favour of his Son William, who having receiv'd it with his Father's last Benediction, immediately hasten'd towards his new Kingdom. The King having settled his Affairs concerning this Life, the better to prepare for the next, caus'd himself to be remov'd to the Village of Hermuntrade, near Roven, to avoid the Noise of that City, where shortly after, with all the Marks of Devotion, he departed this Life, upon Thursday the ninth Day of September, A. D. 1087, in the sixty first Year of his Age, and the fifty second of his Dukedom, after a tumultuous and glorious Reign of twenty Years, ten Months, and twenty six Days, reckoning from the Battel of Hastings. His Body was ungratefully abandon'd by all his Servants, and with the utmost Privacy convey'd to his own Church at Caen, where the very Soil was challeng'd by a Country Gentleman, and a Sum of Money laid down, before it was permitted to be bury'd; so that he who was Lord of so many Territories, now wanted Ground enough for a single Grave.

His Character.

This was the End of this great Monarch William the First, commonly call'd the Conqueror, who tho' he had that Name given him in all Ages, yet he obtain'd and enjoy'd the Crown of England by such a Concurrence of various Circumstances, that it may in a great measure be said of him as was said of Augustus, that he came to the Empire neither by Conquest, nor Usurpation, nor Inheritance, nor Election, but by a strange Mixture of all these together. To determine the Matter nicely is very difficult, and not so material as some would have it; but which way soever we admit of his Accession to the Throne, we find, that being once possess'd of it, he acted as all wise Princes ever have done, that is labour'd by all Methods to continue himself in it. In which he illustriously display'd both his Wisdom and his Valour; having to encounter not only the Troubles rais'd by a discontented Kingdom and a rebellious Dukedom, but also the whole Power of France, Denmark, Scotland and Wales; all which he bravely surmounted with an uninterrupted Course of Prosperity; so that scarce any Prince ever made a greater Figure in History. As to his bodily Perfections, ^{Mant.} he was well proportion'd, of a vigorous and healthful Constitution, of a noble ⁸⁶⁶ Presence, sitting or standing; of a masculine Beauty, in which there was a Mixture of Majesty and Severity; and had so great a Strength, that few of his Court could draw his Bow. As to those of his Mind, he was both wise and active, penetrating in his Designs, daring in his Enterprizes, and steady in the Prosecution of them. All agree that he was chaste and temperate, pious, valiant and great in all his Actions, especially in such as exprest his Royal State and Dignity. His Pastimes were chiefly Hunting and Feasting, in the latter of which he always display'd his Grandeur, annually keeping the Feasts of Christmas at Glocester, that of Easter at Winchester, and that of Whitsuntide at Westminster; to which Places he summon'd all the great Men of the Kingdom, both Clergy and Laity, that Foreign Ambassadors might be Witnesses of his extraordinary Magnificence; at which Times he was more easie of Access, and shew'd great Instances of Bounty and Indulgence to all Men. Yet among his many Virtues, he is much accus'd of being of a covetous, rapacious and cruel Disposition, which produc'd innumerable Acts of Injustice and Oppression; which others think were rather the Effects of his Policy, the Necessity of his Affairs, and the Inconstancy and frequent Rebellions of those Subjects who had sworn Allegiance to him. But in the Prosecuting of such he oftentimes shew'd uncommon Generosity, pardoning the same Offenders two or three Times over; Earl Walthef being the only Nobleman that was put to Death in his Reign. He was of so brave and fearless a Temper, that contrary to the Policy of other Kings, he promoted his only Rival Edgar Etheling, after he had been twice twice in Arms against him, and gave him a Revenue suitable to his Quality. The rest of the English no doubt might have been happy under the Government of this Prince, who was really a Promoter of Piety, Learning, and all that was Great; but being degenerated in their Morality and Virtue, divided in their Interests, and impolitick in struggling for that Liberty they had actually given up, great Numbers of them brought themselves under the most extream Miseries and Oppressions. But England in general gain'd great Honour and Advantages by this Conquest, as will appear more plainly in the succeeding History.

The Reign of King WILLIAM the Second.

Containing 12 Years, 10 Months, and 22 Days.

I. KING William left three Sons behind him, Robert, William and Henry, of whom the two youngest obtain'd and possess'd the Crown of England. Before his Breath was departed, young William knowing his Father's Intentions, posted for England with Bloet the Household Chaplain, together with Earl Morchar and Wulnoth, who for a while he kept as Prisoners, 'till he had seiz'd all his Father's Treasure at Winchester, which amounted to sixty thousand Pounds in Mony, besides Gold, Jewels and Plate, an immense Sum in those Days. In obtaining of which he is said to have been much assisted by his Father's Steward Eudo, who before his Arrival had secur'd not only Winchester, but also Dover, Pevensey, Hastings, and other Castles on the Coasts. After which, still fearing his elder Brother's Interest, he apply'd himself with his Letters to Arch-Bishop Lanfranc, by whom he had been both educated and knighted; and to remove all Obstructions, he solemnly swore, 'To preserve Justice, Equity and Mercy throughout his Kingdom, and also to defend the Peace and Liberty of the Church, and in all Things to observe the Arch-Bishop's Directions. Upon which, and other Promises made to the Nobility, he soon procur'd so great an Interest, that upon Sunday the twenty seventh Day of September, he was crown'd King at Westminster, by the two Arch-Bishops of the Nation, in the Presence of most of the other Bishops, and many of the Nobility.

William Rufus comes over into England.

He is crown'd
King.

This Prince, who from his ruddy Complexion, or red Hair obtain'd the common Name of Rufus, was now about thirty one Years of Age, and in the Vigour of his Youth; being bred up to the Sword, he was naturally warm, rough and haughty, more courageous than pious, and more gallant than good. Yet in the former Part of his Reign, being in a great Measure govern'd by the wise Councils of Lanfranc, he acted in many Things worthily and honourably; and was very careful in the Distribution of his Father's Treasure to those pious Uses mention'd in his Will. But his Natural Temper, and his Want of Primogeniture, soon rais'd a great Faction in the Nation against him, who favouring the Pretensions, and liking the Person of his elder Brother Robert, occasion'd great Troubles and Disturbances. The chief of this Party was his Uncle Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, who tho' he had been lately restor'd to all his Honours and Dignities, yet envying the Power and Interest of Arch-Bishop Lanfranc, he made no better use of them, than to endeavour to ruin both him and his Sovereign. And drawing into this Conspiracy his Brother Robert, Earl of Hereford, with many others of the English Nobility, he wrote Letters to his Nephew in Normandy, urging him to hasten into England, and recover his Right, which he did not doubt but by his Means would be effectual. The Business thus forwarded, and the English daily resorting into Normandy, assur'd Duke Robert of a happy Success; but having before liv'd above his Fortunes, his greatest Obstruction was Want of Money. Therefore applying himself to his youngest Brother Henry, who had much Gold and no Land, he furnish'd himself by Mortgaging to him the County of Constantine, a Province in Normandy; and then 'ent to Odo, that he should expect his Landing in the West of England by a Day prefix'd. Upon this the Bishop assum'd more Courage, and shew'd himself first in the Action; and fortifying Rocheſter, began to disturb the County of Kent. urging his Accomplices to follow his Example, which was accordingly perform'd; For in the West Robert de Mowbray Earl of Northumberland, assisted by Geffrey Bishop of Constance, seiz'd upon Bath and Berkley, with a great Part of Wiltshire, and strongly fortify'd the Castle of Bristow against King William: In Norfolk, Roger Bigot, in Leiceſtershire, Hugh Grentemeſnil did extreamly waste those Counties: Roger Montgomery, with his Welſh Men, assisted by William Bishop of Durham, Barnard of Newmerch, Roger Lacie, and Ralph Mortimer, all Normans, with Fire and Sword paſſ'd the Country of Worceſter. And these Insurrections were so dangerous, and Duke Robert so favour'd, that in the Judgment of Gemetiſenſes, had he haſten'd his Arrival, and purſu'd the Opportunity, he might with no great Difficulty have obtain'd the Crown of England.

King William observing the Poſture of his Affairs, vigorously proceeded to the ſuppreſſing theſe Insurrections; and to that end he aſſembled many Biſhops, Earls, and natural English, with Lanfranc at the Head of them; and declaring his Intentions, with the Addition of many ſpecious Promiſes, they all aſſur'd him of their Aſſiſtance. Then ordering his Fleet to guard the Seas againſt his Brother Robert's intended Deſcent, he march'd in Perſon againſt his Uncle Odo, and in May beſieg'd him in Rocheſter, together with Euſtathius Earl of Bulſion, Robert de Beſefme, and many other Noblemen, and Perſons of inferior Rank, who in vain expected the Aſſiſtance of Duke Robert, who was detain'd only by Eaſe and Sloath from his promis'd Expedition. Theſe were at length forc'd out of the Town into the Caſtle, where many periſh'd by a raging Sickneſs, and being preſs'd with many other Neceſſities, they ſent a Meſſage to the King, That upon Condition they might enjoy their Lands and Eſtates, they would deliver up the Caſtle, and for the future ſerve him faithfully as their natural Lord. But the King, provok'd by their Behaviour and theſe Propoſals, ſolemnly ſwore, That he would take the perſidious Rebels by Force, and deſtroy them with all Kinds of Deaths; and when his Nobility, who had many Friends and Relations in the Caſtle, perſuaded him to Moderation, he return'd them this remarkable Answer, That whoſoever ſpar'd Perjur'd Men, Robbers, Plunderers and Traitors, depriv'd all good Men of their Peace and Quietneſs, and laid a Foundation of innumerable Miſchiefs to the Virtuous and Innocent. But at length, overcome by the Interceſſion of his faithful Friends the Biſhops, with the English Noblemen, and other loyal ancient Barons, he granted the Beſieg'd their Lives, pardon'd the Loſs of their Limbs, and gave them leave to paſs out of the Caſtle with their Horſes and Arms, but without Hopes of ever enjoying their Lands and Eſtates during his Reign. Whereupon they were all forc'd to quit the Kingdom, as was alſo Biſhop Odo, who now irrecoverably loſt all his Honours, and vaſt Eſtate in England.

After this King William beſtow'd the Eſtates of theſe baniſh'd Noblemen upon others, who had ſerv'd him faithfully during this War; which tho' it was now happily and unexpectedly finiſh'd, it was chiefly the Effect of ſome politick Methods which the King took at the Beginning of theſe Commotions. For it was not by open Force that he quell'd this great Deſection of the Normans, but by publiſhing, That he would eaſe all his Subjects, and eſpecially the Native English of their great Taxes, promiſing them better Laws, with the free Liberty of of Hunting in his Forest; as also by deluding some of the chief Norman Noblemen with large Promises, and specious Pretences. Thus he insinuated himself to Roger Montgomery, a Principal in the Insurrection, to whom he promis'd, That he would willingly quit the Government, if he and those his Father had design'd his Curators should think fit: Yet adding, He could not conceive why they should be so violent against him: For if they expected Money, or an Augmentation of their Lands, they should not be disappointed, provided they did not question his Father's Will and Judgment, which by despising would hazard their own Safety; for the same Man who made him King, made them Earls and Noblemen. With these and the like Insinuations the Earl was brought off from the Confederacy, which was then immediately broken, and the Nation reduc'd to quiet; all Parties concern'd either submitting or leaving the Kingdom.

^{msb.} But no sooner was the King freed from his Fears, and well establish'd in his Throne, but forgetting all Oaths and Promises, he took quite contrary Measures, and us'd many Extortions and Oppressions. And being mildly admonish'd of his Breach of Faith by Arch-Bishop Lanfranc, he in a Passion reply'd, Who can perform all that he has promis'd? and would never after afford him a kind Look. Yet still the Presence of this worthy Man was some Awe and Restraint upon his Actions; but that was remov'd in a short Time after: For upon the 24th Day of May the Arch-Bishop dy'd, to the unexpressible Grief of all good Men, as being the most eminent Instance of Learning and Wisdom, as well as Piety and Charity, that this Age had produc'd. After which the King more openly shew'd his rapacious Inclinations; always covetous, yet never frugal, and still grasping and gathering, yet never filling his Coffers. And now discovering what before lay conceal'd, he immediately seiz'd the whole Revenues of the Archbishoprick into his own Exchequer, allowing only necessary Maintenance to the Monks, and kept that See vacant for almost four Years. He did the same by the See of Lincoln, and all other Churches and Abbies, as soon as they became void, which were never bestow'd and fill'd up so long as he could squeeze any thing considerable out of them; and when he could get nothing more, as Eadmer tells us, he would then sell an Abby so pillag'd to some Monk who would bid most for it. In short he was the first King of England who shew'd his Successors the dangerous Precedent of keeping the Bishopricks and their Livings vacant, and receiving the Profits himself. Which Grievances were complain'd of to Pope Urban; but he being imploy'd in new and uncommon Designs, had not leisure to endeavour a Redress of them.

^{ales.} II. King William having sufficiently secur'd his own Dominions at home, now cast his Eyes upon those of his Brother Robert, and suddenly made a Descent into Normandy, as Scipio did into Africk, resolving to revenge all former Injuries. And first he surpriz'd the Castles of St. Valery and Albermarle, with others upon the Sea-Coast; then pressing forwards committed great Devastations in the Country. Robert, finding himself unprovided, and knowing the instable Fidelity of his Subjects, apply'd himself to Philip the French King, imploring his Assistance against his hostile Brother. Philip joining with him, was soon stopp'd in his Progress by a large Sum of Money from King William; and so he return'd into his Country, with more Riches, and less Honour than he had before. Upon which King William became more and more successful, and not only the Norman Nobility began to favour him, but also the Citizens of Rouen the Metropolis, being brib'd by his Gifts and Promises, treated with him to betray the City, together with their sloathful Duke, into his Hands. One Conon a rich Citizen was the chief Conspirator, and had bargain'd with King William to receive his Forces into the City; but the whole Design being discover'd to the Duke, he immediately join'd with his younger Brother Henry, who upon the Account of ill Usage from him, was now setting up an independent Interest, terest, and fortifying those Towns that had been mortgag'd to him. Henry and his Followers threw themselves into the City time enough to secure it, tho' with great Slaughter of the resisting Citizens; Conon the chief Traitor was taken, and for his Punishment by Henry's Order was carry'd up into a high Tower, and from thence by his own Hands thrown out of a Window.

A. D. This Conjunction put a stop to King William's Arms, but in the next Year he resolv'd upon a second Attempt, which being begun, was soon ended by a Reconciliation and a Peace between the two Brothers, upon these Conditions:

1091. Reg. 4. A Peace made between them.

' That the Duke should yield to the King the County of Eu, and the Towns of Fescamp and Cherburgh, with all those Castles which had revolted from him; in ' Consideration of which the King should reduce the Country of Maine to the ' Duke's Obedience, with other Castles in Normandy then in Rebellion: That ' the King should restore to the Norman Noblemen all those Lands they had ' lost for their Adherence to the Duke, and to the Duke himself so much Land ' in England as was then agreed between them. Lastly, if the Duke should ' die without lawful Issue, the King should be his Heir, as he also the King's, ' upon the same Terms. For the Performance of these Articles twelve Barons on both Sides took their Oaths in the Behalf of their respective Princes; and King William in this Affair shew'd many Marks of Bounty and Magnificence towards the Normans and Strangers that resorted to him. But by this Treaty Prince Henry was quite left out and deserted, who finding those Towns abandon him, which in Justice ought to have asserted his Cause, betook himself to St. Michael's Mount as his last Retreat, from whence with his Soldiers he ravag'd the adjacent Country. To put a stop to him, his two Elder Brothers, now Confederates, join'd their Forces, and besieg'd that strong Fortrefs all the Lent, and lost many Men with little Success. During this remarkable Siege, the King riding alone some Distance from his Camp, saw several of the Enemy's Soldiers coming up to him; and trusting to his own Strength and Valour, boldly engag'd them, but in the first Encounter his Horse was slain under him, and himself thrown upon the Ground, with his Foot intangled in the Stirrup. Upon which Danger, and finding the Enemy ready to strike, he cry'd out, Hold, Knave, I am the King of England! which so surpriz'd the Soldiers, that they immediately took him up with great Respect, and brought him another Horse. The King springing into the Saddle, briskly demanded Who was the Man that dismounted him? and upon the Man's boldly showing himself, he swore his usual Oath, That hereafter he should be his Knight, and he should receive the just Reward of his Valour. In the mean Time Prince Henry was much distress'd for want of Water, and knowing Duke Robert to be of the milder Disposition, sent a Messenger to him desiring That he might not be deny'd Water, but that he would subdue him by Force of Arms, and not by Thirst. Upon which the Duke gave him liberty to supply himself; and being blam'd by his Brother William as impolitick, he reply'd, What shall I suffer my Brother to die with Thirst; where shall we have another when he is gone? But the King deriding the Duke's easie Nature, quitted the Siege, and return'd into England.

The King in Danger.

His Generosity.

However the Fortrefs was at last surrender'd to the Duke, and Henry permitted to go where he thought fit, who for some Years wander'd from Place to Place with one Knight, a Chaplain, and three Servants or Esquires. About the same Time Robert banish'd Edgar Etheling out of his Country, and the King depriv'd him of all the Lands that had been given him, who thereupon went into Scotland to King Malcolm his Brother-in-Law.

Henry reduc'd.

Not long after, King William by Promises so far prevail'd with Duke Robert, that he brought him over into England, and had his Company in a new Expedition made against Malcolm King of Scotland, who taking Advantage of the King's Absence had invaded Northumberland. King William prepar'd both a great Fleet and a numerous Army, tho' much to the Loss of either; for his Fleet was much shatter'd by Tempests, and many Men and Horses perish'd by Cold and Hunger in the barren Mountains. At length both Kings came to an Interview, where by the means of Edgar Etheling a Peace was concluded upon these Conditions: 'First, That Malcolm should yield the King the same Obedience, as he had done to his Father King William: Secondly, That the King should restore to Malcolm twelve Mannors, which he formerly held under his Father, and should also pay him annually twelve Marks of Gold. In Consideration of this good Office, the King was again reconcil'd to Prince Edgar; and thereupon both the Kings return'd home in Peace. But as these two Princes were made Friends, so much about the same Time the two Brothers again became Enemies: For Duke Robert, well perceiving the Subtlety of his Brother, and that he delay'd to perform the Covenants of the Treaty between them, went aboard his Vessels two Days before Christmas, and taking Edgar Etheling along with him, in great Displeasure pass'd over into Normandy.

A Peace concluded.

During the King's Absence in the North there happen'd the total Conquest of all the Country of Glamorgan and Morgannie in South-Wales, upon this Occasion. One Eneon, a popular Man, raising a Rebellion against Rees the Prince of South-Wales, drew over to his Side Jestyn Lord of Glamorgan and the neighbouring Parts, promising him to marry his Daughter. Jestyn finding their Faction too weak without foreign Assistance, sent Eneon into England, where he had so much Interest as to procure Aid against Prince Rees; and conferring with Robert Fitz-Hamon, a valiant Knight of the King's Bed-Chamber, he so far wrought upon his Martial Temper, that for a fix'd Salary he undertook the Service; and with twelve Knights, and a competent Number of Soldiers march'd into Wales, where joining with Jestyn, he in Battel kill'd Prince Rees, with Conon his Son. Robert having perform'd his Service, and designing to return, demanded his Pay according to Covenants, which Jestyn in some part deny'd, alledging that Eneon had exceeded the Bounds of his Commission. Upon which such Discord arose between these Friends, that it occasion'd a total Breach, and Eneon thus touch'd in his Reputation, join'd with the English against his own Countrymen, and coming to a Battel, Jestyn, and most of his Welsh Followers were slain. Robert finding so great an Advantage, soon conquer'd and possess'd himself of the whole County of Glamorgan with its Appendages; of which he gave certain Castles and Mannors to the twelve Knights that assisted him in this Expedition, as a Reward of their Service; some of whose Posterity enjoy part of those Lands to this Day. And this shews that the Ruin of the Princes of Wales proceeded more from their unnatural Divisions, than from the Power of their Invaders.

A great Part of South-Wales conquer'd.

In the following Year Prince Henry, who in a manner had been abandoned, began to recover himself, and gather Strength in Normandy, where he had the strong Sea-Port Town of Damfront privately deliver'd into his Hands; and this he made a Place of Refuge 'till such Time as he was reconcil'd to his Brother William, and sent for into England. About the same Time King William march'd with an Army into the North, where he re-edify'd the ancient City and Castle of Carlisle, which had been destroy'd by the Danes, and lain in Ruins above two hundred Years; and also granted large Privileges to the Place, which it enjoys to this Day. In the same Year Remigius Bishop of Dorchester, having in the last Reign remov'd his See to Lincoln, and there built a magnificent Church, that City with the Country about it was challeng'd by Thomas Arch-Bishop of York, as lying within his Diocese; which Claim the King privately encourag'd, 'till at length upon Payment of a large Sum of Mony to the King, Remigius obtain'd of him to declare in his Favour, and to oblige all the Bishops in England to repair to the Consecration of the New Church. Also the same Year, John Bishop of Wells, for a Sum of Mony paid to the King, had his Licence to translate the Bishop's See from Wells to Bath, ever since which this Bishoprick has been known by both these Titles.

In the Beginning of the succeeding Year, the King fell dangerously sick in Glocestershire, so that most Persons expected his Death; upon which all the Bishops, Barons and Abbots, who came to wait on him, and take their last leaves, persuaded him to Repentance, and not to let the vacant Bishopricks out to Farm, as before, but to bestow them upon Men of Worth. To which he readily yielded, and further made a Vow to God, That if he recover'd, he would abrogate all unjust Laws, and ordain better in their stead. In performance of which, he bestow'd the Bishoprick of Lincoln upon Robert Bloet his Counsellor, and the Arch-Bishoprick of Canterbury upon Anselm a Norman Abbot of great Worth and Piety. But Anselm well knowing the Difference between the King's Disposition and his own, was extremely unwilling to accept of so great a Charge, till at length he was constrain'd by the Intreaties of the King, who seem'd very penitent, and the Persuasions of the Bishops and Noblemen, who had a high Opinion of his Sanctity. Before his Consecration he demanded several Things of the King, particularly to restore all the Lands belonging to the Church, which his Predecessor Lanfranc possess'd without Suit or Controversie. But as the King grew better in Health, he was more unwilling to restore all Lands, but would have reserv'd such of the Church Lands, as after the Death of Lanfranc he had given to his Courtiers, and expected Anselm's Consent to their holding of them by Hereditary Right. But this Arch-Bishop would by no means consent, that the Church should be in the least endamag'd in its Lands and Rights; from whence arose the first Difference between the King and him, about his Dignity, Bishoprick and Prelatship, which remain'd undetermin'd during this King's Life. And now the King being recover'd of his Sickness, relaps'd to his former Miscarriages, and wholly alter'd and demolish'd whatever Good he had already done: For he commanded the Prisoners not yet releas'd to be kept more closely than before, and those already discharg'd to be taken up: And all Things were reduc'd to the same or worse State than before, and brought under the Management of those who rather endeavour'd to subvert, than defend Justice, and who took more care to get Money, than to correct Offences. None were so rich as Treasurers and Collectors, none were so in favour as unconscionable Lawyers, and none so rewarded as scandalous Promoters; so that many were oblig'd to quit the Nation, and seek their Fortunes in Foreign Countries.

In these troublesom Times, Malcolm King of Scotland came to King William at Glocester, as before was appointed, for establishing a firm Friendship between them; but William refus'd to admit him into his Presence, unless he would do Homage to him in his own Court; which the other refusing in any Place, but in the Confines of both Kingdoms, according to Custom, a fatal War immediately broke out. Malcolm in a short Time invaded England, and made great Devastations as far as Alnewick; but Robert Mowbray Earl of Northumberland, with a powerful Force unexpectedly set upon him near that Town, and not only overthrew his Army, but also kill'd both him and his Son Edward. The Scotch Historians say he was slain by Treachery, and that the virtuous Queen Margaret, hearing of the Death of her Husband and Son, sunk down with Grief, and could not three Days survive so great a Loss. Tho' Malcolm left a Son behind him nam'd Edgar, yet the Nobility of that Kingdom assembling, unanimously elected his Brother Donald to be their King, and expell'd Edgar Etheling, with the English then settled in Scotland; who taking with them the Children of Malcolm, found a kind Reception in England. But Donald did not long enjoy his Kingdom; for Duncan, natural Son to the late King, being then in King William's Court as an Hostage, desir'd to obtain his Assistance to gain his Father's Kingdom; and being furnish'd with a powerful Army of English and Normans, he march'd against his Uncle Donald, who had newly invaded England. Coming to a Battel, he routed his Forces, and forc'd him to fly into the Western Isles; upon which he was crown'd King of Scotland. In the same Year Rees Prince of the Welshmen was slain in a Battel near Brecknock Castle; from which Time Princes ceas'd to rule in South-Wales, and the Kings of England accounted their chief Governors; but North-Wales enjoy'd its own Princes for above a hundred and fifty Years after.

III. King William, having settled all Things in the North and West to his Satisfaction, was now disturb'd by his Brother Robert from the South, who charging him with Non-performance of Articles and Breach of Faith, occasion'd a new War to break out between them. Upon which William in Mid-Lent pass'd over into Normandy, where he had an Enterview with his Brother, about a Treaty of Peace, but could by no means come to an Agreement. However a second Meeting was appointed by the Mediation of their common Friends in the Fields of Martius, where those Barons who had formerly sworn to see the Peace observ'd on both Sides, charg'd all the Blame upon the King, who yet would neither acknowledge his Fault, nor perform the Agreement; but instead of that committed new Acts of Hostility, and by the Power of Mony, Promises and the Sword, gain'd the Castle of Buers and several others, which he garrison'd with his own Men. On the other Side the Duke, having obtain'd Assistance of the King of France, besieg'd and took the Castle of Argenton, with eight hundred Men in it, whom he made Prisoners; and after that besieg'd the Castle of Holme, 'till he forc'd Peverel the Governor, with all his Men to surrender at Discretion. Upon this great Success, the King immediately sent into England, and commanded twenty thousand Men to be rais'd and transported to him with all Expedition; which being muster'd at Hastings, the King's Treasurer, by his Order, told the Men, That each, upon the Payment of Ten Shillings, might be dismiss'd from this bad Service. By which Artifice the King had a considerable Sum of Mony sent him into Normandy, which he most of all wanted; and with which he so far prevail'd upon the French King, as to cause him to withdraw his Troops; so that Duke Robert, who before was proceeding with great Success, was now oblig'd to retire with no less Disadvantage.

Brother Robert

In the mean Time the Welsh made great Ravages and Incursions in Cheshire, Shropshire, and other bordering Counties; insomuch that King William was constrain'd to leave Normandy, and that War unfinished. And reconciling himself to his Brother Henry, he return'd into England, and with a great Army enter'd Wales by Way of Montgomery, which Castle he re-edify'd; but the Inhabitants kept so close in the Straits of the Mountains, encompassed with Woods and Rivers, that the King could no ways molest them; so that losing his Labour, together with many of his best Soldiers, he return'd back with Dishonour. In the same Year he made a second Expedition into Wales, but with no better Success. And about the same Time he was disturb'd by a great Conspiracy form'd against him by Robert de Mowbray Earl of Northumberland, and many other Norman Noblemen; of which the King having Notice, rais'd an Army and march'd against them; who understanding which Way he was to pass, laid an Ambuscade for him in a Wood, which was discover'd to him, and the Design prevented, by Gilbert de Tonebridge one of the chief Conspirators. After which his Troops march'd on to Bambrough Castle which they besieg'd, till at length Robert fell into their Hands, who was kept a Prisoner almost thirty Years. Roger Lacy had his Lands taken from him, and given to his Brother Hugh, a faithful Adherent of the King's; Hugh Earl of Chester was privately reprimanded, and gave three thousand Pounds to be restor'd to Favour; as likewise the King receiv'd of many others great Sums of Mony, as Compositions for their Crimes. William Earl of Fu, being fully convicted, lost both his Eyes and Genetals, but many others, by the Advice of the Council, the King spar'd out of Policy.

In the same Year the King was both disturb'd and perplex'd by the Behavi-^{Endm.}our of Arch-Bishop Anselm, whose Person he hated, and whose Power he dreaded. For this Prelate would neither comply with his covetous nor ambitious Designs, but strenuously oppos'd him in all Things that might endamage the Power and Privileges of the Church; and when the Popedom was in Contest between Urban and Clement, he acknowledg'd the former, contrary to the King's Inclinations, and to a fix'd Ordinance in his Father's Reign, That no Subject in England should acknowledge any Pope without the King's Allowance. This occasion'd Matters of great Contest in the Nation, and many State Intreagues between the King and the Court of Rome, in which the latter by pure Management prevail'd. But afterwards the King proceeding to violent Methods, the Arch-Bishop became so uneasie, that he desir'd leave to repair to Rome, which at first was absolutely deny'd him, tho' at length with Difficulty obtain'd; but with this fatal Consequence, that all the Revenues of the Archbishoprick were seiz'd to the King's own Use. This and other Grievances being represented to Pope Urban, whom the King had now acknowledg'd, he openly in a Synod decreed that King William should be Excommunicated; which Sentence was immediately revok'd by the Intercession of Anselm himself. But the Pope afterwards finding King William obstinate, and still refusing to restore the Arch-Bishop, he became more resolute in his Intentions, and gave the King notice that he would spare him no longer than the next Council Day. Notwithstanding which, the King by secret Methods, Gifts and Promises, obtain'd so much Favour from the Pope, that Sentence never solemnly pass'd against him: So that Anselm having no Hopes of his Restoration, by the Consent of the Pope retir'd to Lions, where he continu'd 'till after King William's Death.

But Pope Urban in these Times had greater Concerns to manage than the<sup>Endr
Flor
&c.</sup> Excommunication of a single Prince, and now proceeded to vast and unheard of Designs. Having assembled a Council at Clermont in France, chiefly by the Remonstrances of a famous Hermit call'd Peter, who in the Holy-Land had been Witness of the Cruelties exercis'd by the Turks upon the Christians, he by a zealous Harangue animated the Prelates then present to excite the Faithful to take up Arms for the Recovery of God's Country out of the Hands of those barbarous Infidels. His Exhortations were so warm and moving, that they made strong Impressions on all their Minds, and this uncommon Fervor in a short Time so spread over all Europe, that incredible Numbers of all Qualities, and all Ages and Sexes, list'd themselves in this Sacred Militia, bearing the Marks of red Crosses upon their Garments, with this Motto, It is the Will of God. These Crusado's, and long Voyages, the Heat of which lasted for above two hundred Years, occasion'd an infinite Expence of Blood and Treasure, and prov'd the weakning of many Nations, the Ruin of the great Lords and Multitudes of the People, and the Establishment and Encrease of the Power of the Popes. The chief of these extraordinary Adventurers were the famous Godfrey Duke of Bouillon and Lorrain, Hugh Brother to the King of France, Raymond Count of St. Giles, Robert Earl of Flanders, Baldwin of Hainault, and above two hundred other Lords and Princes. Among these was also Robert Duke of Normandy, who being fired with the Prospect of this Expedition, sent over Ambassadors to his Brother King William, desiring that a firm Peace might be establish'd between them, and that he would immediately lend him ten thousand Marks of Silver, and take the Dutchy of Normandy for his Security for three Years, 'till the Mony should be repaid. The King was highly pleas'd with this Proposal, and finding the Nation already exhausted by grievous Taxes and Impositions, he sent to all the great Men of the Nation to furnish him with this Sum: Insomuch that the Bishops, Abbots and Abbesses broke in pieces the very Gold and Silver Plate and Ornaments of their Churches, and the Earls, Barons and Sheriffs oppress'd their Knights and Tenants to raise the Mony. By this Means the King took Possession of Normandy; and soon after claim'd the French-Veuxin of Philip King of France, with the chief Towns belonging to it; but after a Year's Contest, which occasion'd many Losses on both Sides, the two Kings came to make a firm Peace.

For King William was now more busily employ'd against the Welsh, to oppose whom he march'd a third Time with a powerful Army; and tho' he pass'd quite through the Country by the Guidance of some Deserters, who shew'd him the secret Passes, and stay'd there from Midsummer to the End of July, yet the People retiring into their usual Recesses, he lost more of his Men by Hunger and ill Diet, than he could kill or take of the Enemy. So that finding but little Prospect of Glory or Profit, he return'd back without performing any Thing besides the building of certain Castles in the Marches between England and Wales. About Michaelmas he sent Edgar Etheling with a great Army into Scotland, who in a short Time by his Valour expell'd Donald, who had again possess'd himself of the Throne, and plac'd his Nephew Edgar in his Room, who was the right Heir to the Crown, and accordingly did Homage to the King of England. All this Year the Nation suffer'd much by reason of the Scarcity of Provisions, the Badness of the Season, and the grievous Taxes for the rebuilding of London Bridge, which had lately been carry'd away by a strange Inundation, for the Building of the new Walls about the Tower, and the noble Hall at Westminster; which as they were Works of great Use, as well as Magnificence, requir'd immense Sums to finish them.

In part of this and the following Year King William continu'd in Normandy, where he reduc'd the City of Mans and a great Part of that Province to his Obedience. In the mean Time the Earls of Shrewsbury and Chester, with many of the Nobility, and a considerable Army, made a new Expedition into Wales, being encourag'd to it by some Lords of that Country. Their Forces and Correspondence were so great, that the two Princes Griffyth and Cadogan, their main Opposers, took the Mountains for their Defence; so that the Earls found an easie Passage to the Coasts over against the Isle of Anglesey; where they built the Castle of Aberlhiennawc. After which Owen, chief Counsellor to the Princes, and their Father-in-Law, discover'd his Treason by going over with all his Forces to the Earls, with which he march'd into the Isle of Anglesey, where the Earls joining with him, plunder'd the Isle, and us'd intolerable Cruelties to the poor Inhabitants. Griffyth and Cadogan fled into Ireland for Safety; but Magnus Son to the King of Norway, who had lately conquer'd the Orchades and the Isle of Man, coming thither with a few Ships, gave them no little Disturbance, and shot the Earl of Shrewsbury dead with an Arrow, which was look'd upon as a just Reward for his Cruelties in this Isle. At length Magnus retired, and the Earl of Chester with the English being sensible they could not keep the Island, left the Command of it to Owen, the Traitor who had invited them thither.

The King kept his Christmases in Normandy, and returning into England a little before Whitsontide, kept that Feast in the new Hall at Westminster, just finish'd; which when he first saw, and heard others admire it for its Grandeur, as being two hundred and seventy Foot long and seventy four in Breadth, he declar'd it scarce worthy the Name of a Bed-Chamber, in respect of what he intended to build. From thence he went down to hunt in the New Forest, where in the midst of his Sport, a Messenger from Normandy inform'd him that the City of Mans was surpriz'd by Count Elias, and that the Castle without speedy Succour was like to be surrender'd. Upon which News he with his usual Bravery bad the Messenger tell those in the Castle He would be with them in eight Days. And immediately turning his Horse's Head towards the Sea, he rod with the utmost Speed; and when some of his Attendants desir'd him to stay 'till his Army was got ready, he cry'd out, They who love me will follow me. Thus riding as far as Dartmouth with a small Retinue, and going to take Shipping, the Weather was so tempestuous, that the Master of the Vessel declar'd, They could not pass without the utmost Hazard of their Lives. But William reply'd, Did you ever hear of a King that was drown'd? and making what Sail he could, he arriv'd at Barfleur the next Morning, and order'd all his Officers and Soldiers immediately to attend him at Mans. Where the King not only rais'd the Siege, but took Elias Prisoner, who being brought before him, the King in a triumphing Manner said, Now, Sir, I have secur'd you: Yes, reply'd the other, you have, but it was by Chance more than Valour; if I were at Liberty, I would shew you what I could perform. The King answer'd, What could you perform! take your Liberty, and shew your Abilities, I expect no Return for this Favour; and so he generously dismiss'd him. The King having thus rescu'd Mans, and reduc'd the Country once more to his Obedience, return'd into England about Michael-mass.

In this Year the Christians, after many admirable Toils and Acts of Valour, took the City of Jerusalem by Storm, and put near forty thousand Saracens to the Sword. After which they agreed to elect Robert Duke of Normandy to be King of that City and all Palestine; but he refusing it out of a Prospect of the Crown of England, it is observ'd by our Historians, that he never after prosper'd in any thing he undertook; and upon his Denial, they elected the renowned Godfrey of Bouillon, who had done continual Wonders both by his Head and Arm. In the mean Time, as Vitales informs us, King William was forming vast Designs: For William Earl of Poictou, proposing to make War in the Holy-Land; now offer'd the King to mortgage to him his Dutchy of Aquitain, with his other Territories for a large Sum of Mony which he wanted for that Expedition. The Proposal being readily embrac'd by the King, he commanded a mighty Fleet to be prepared, and a great Army to accompany him out of England, that he might hinder his Brother Robert's Return into Normandy, take Possession of Aquitain, and extend the Bounds of his Empire as far as the River Garonne. In order to which, his Royal Navy which was to carry over vast Sums of Gold and Silver, was now almost ready to set Sail; but 'till then the King to divert himself went in the Beginning of August to hunt in the New Forest, where Death put an end to all his aspiring Projects; of which we have these Circumstances. A Monk the Night before dream'd that he saw a Crucifix spurn the King to the Ground, and caus'd Fire and Smoke to come out of his Mouth; which being related to him in the Morning, he made a Jest of it, saying, The Monk wants Mony for his Dream; go give him a hundred Shillings, but bid him dream better hereafter. The King would not be dissuaded from making Trial of it, but fortifying himself with Wine, he went to hunt in the Forest with his Brother Henry, and a few Followers; among whom was Walter Tyrrell, a French Knight, who was an expert Huntsman, and an excellent Archer. In the latter End of the Day the King shot at a Stag, and gave him a slight Wound; and while he was following him, with his Hand before his Eyes to defend them from the Sun, Walter shot in such a Manner, that the Arrow by glancing hit the King full upon the Breast, who with one Groan fell to the Ground, and soon after dy'd without uttering a Word. Upon the Sight of this Walter immediately took Horse and fled, without any to pursue him; for every Man's Thoughts were taken up with greater Matters. His Body was soon after thrown into a poor Collier's Cart, and through a Lane, where the Cart is said to have fallen in pieces, was convey'd to the Bishop's Palace at Winchester, where his Corps was the next Day bury'd in the Church under the Tower, in the Presence of many Noblemen, but no real Mourners. Thus fell King William the Second, commonly call'd Rufus, in the forty fourth Year of his Age, after an active and vigorous Reign of twelve Years, ten Months, and twenty two Days; his Death happening on the second Day of August.

It is observable that this Prince was the Third of this Race, who in a few Years met with their Deaths in this Forest; as if Heav'n design'd to revenge upon the Children their Father's Sins, in destroying so many Churches and Villages to make them a Receptacle for wild Beasts. But however it was, this Prince met with his Deserts for his imitating and exceeding his Father in those Actions which were most covetous, cruel and tyrannical; so that he may justly His Character. be rank'd among the worst Kings that England ever had. He wanted the Piety, Chastity, Humanity and Wisdom of his Father; yet several Qualities he possess'd were both valuable and admirable, as his Courage, Bravery, and Magnificence, in which he was so vigorous and daring, that he was never dejected in the greatest Extremity, and very rarely fail'd of Success. He was liberal to his Friends, and especially to Soldiers, magnificent in his Retinue and Buildings, and expensive in his Cloaths; as appears from the common Story of Breeches or Hose which he refus'd to wear because they cost but three Shillings, ordering his Chamberlain to bring those of a Mark Price, who sufficiently pleas'd him by bringing the same again, after the King's Price was set upon them. He was a Prince of little or no Faith, haughty, severe, covetous and prophane upon all Occasions. When fifty English Gentlemen, who had been accus'd of hunting and killing Deer, had by the Trial of Fire-Ordeal escap'd Condemnation, he passionately declar'd, That he could not believe that God was a just Judge in suffering it. Notwithstanding his severe and covetous Temper, there are Actions that shew he had sometimes a sense of Generosity, Justice and Good Nature, particularly when a great Abby became vacant, and two rich and ambitious Monks came to purchase it of him, according to his Simonaical Methods, he observ'd a third Monk at a Distance, and asking him What he would give, and receiving Answer, That he would give nothing, and that it was against his Conscience, he immediately swore his usual Oath, That he alone deserv'd it, and should have it for nothing. This King's Revenues were in all Probability the same with his Father's, yet his Expences being greater, he rais'd more unreasonable Taxes; and to augment his Revenues, he frequently kept several Bishopricks and Abbies vacant, and took the Profits to himself; and at the Time of his Death he had in his Hands the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, the Bishopricks of Winchester and Salisbury, and twelve rich Abbies. Yet he gave the new Church of St. Saviour's in Southwark to the Monks call'd Decharitate; and also founded an Hospital in York to the Honour of St. Peter.

Most Writers observe that several Disasters fell out in this Reign, as in Disasters in this Reign. the second Year a dreadful Earthquake happen'd; in the fourth a violent Lightning had strange Effects upon the Abby of Winscombe. Not long after a vast Tempest blew down six hundred Houses in London, and carry'd away the Roof of Bow Church after an unheard of manner. In the ninth Year a blazing Star appear'd with two Bushes, and other Stars seem'd to shoot Darts at each other, to the Amazement of all Spectators. In the eleventh, a Well of Blood for fifteen Days together rose out of the Ground at Finchamsted near Abington in Barkshire. In the last of his Reign, the Sea breaking over its Banks, drown'd an innumerable Multitude of People in many Counties, and in Kent over-ran the Lands which formerly belong'd to the famous Earl Godwin, which are still call'd Godwin's Sands, lying very dangerous for Sailors. Malmesbury and others also observe, That notwithstanding the warlike Genius of this Age, there began to be a Corruptions. great Corruption of Manners among the young Noblemen, Gentlemen and Clergy in those Times, who practis'd all the Luxury of Eating and Drinking, and shew'd so much Effeminacy in their Habits and Carriage, that they appear'd Men in nothing so much as their Attempts upon the Chastity of Women.

The Reign of King HENRY the First.Containing 35 Years, 3 Months, and 1 Day.

A. D. I. UPON the sudden Death of King William, his younger Brother 1100. Henry, who from his Learning then uncommon to Princes had the Reg. I. Sirname of Beau-Clerk, found it no great Difficulty to ascend the Throne of England, notwithstanding the fair Pretensions of his eldest Brother Robert. He was now about forty two Years of Age, of great and promising Abilities; and wanted not several Steps by which he might mount this high Station: Particularly, The general Dislike of King William's severe curbing of the Natives; The great Distance and Carelessness of his Brother Robert; His own English Birth, having both a King and a Queen to his Parents; His promising to abrogate all bad and rigorous Laws impos'd by his Father and Brother, the restoring the Clergy from Exile to their Livings; Remission of all unjust Taxes, and due Punishments to the chief Promoters of them, upon which Account to satisfy the People he committed Ralph Bishop of Durham, that exorbitant Oppressor, to the Tower. Then taking a solemn Oath, 'To keep all good and just Laws towards his People, and to remove all Oppressions and unjust Practices, both in Ecclesiastical and Secular Affairs, which had happen'd during his Brother's Reign, he was publicly crown'd by Maurice Bishop of London, upon Sunday the fifth Day of August. His first Business was to put in execution what he had promis'd, honourably and wisely beginning with the Regulation of his own Court, from whence he cashier'd many nice and effeminate Persons, making a Decree against his Courtiers Rapines and Adulteries, punishing the former with Death, and the latter with the Loss of Eyes and other criminal Parts. Then he restor'd to the English the Use of those Lights which his Father had prohibited, and confirm'd many Privileges to the Nation by a publick Charter under his broad Seal, which Matth. Paris has preserv'd in his History. The Substance of it is, 'First, He confirms the Liberty of the Church
 'from all Oppressions, or Reservation of any of its Revenues upon Vacancies.
 'Next, That the Heirs of the Nobility should inherit their Father's Lands
 'without Redemption from him, which Favour they were to afford to their 'Tenants. That the Gentry might have liberty to marry their Daughters and 'Kinswomen, without the King's Licence, to any but his Enemies. That 'Widows should have their Dowers, and not be compell'd to marry against their 'Will. That Mothers or nearest Relations should be Guardians to Minors.
 'Next he appoints the Punishment of Coiners to be with Loss of Limbs, and 'ordains a Measure the Length of his Arm to be the Standard of Commerce
 'among his People. Lastly he forgave all Debts due to the Crown, and all
 'Murthers committed before his Coronation, with some other like Indulgences.
 'But to the greatest Satisfaction of the People, he confirm'd the Laws of King
 'Edward. To this Charter all the chief Men of the Nation were Witnesses; and by the King's Command Copies were transmitted to every County, and or-der'd to be kept in particular Monasteries. Yet notwithstanding this Care, scarce any of them were to be found in the Reign of King John, when the Contest about this Charter commenc'd between that King and the Barons.

King Henry

Liberties.Anselm's Restoration.

Shortly after the Coronation, the King dispatch'd a Messenger to Arch-Bishop Anselm, then at Lyons, inviting him to return into England with all Speed, and in his Letters added his Prayers and Wishes for him, promising to subject himself and his Kingdom to his Council and Direction; and his Return prov'd highly to the Satisfaction of the Nation. To add to which, the King resolv'd to

to leave off his Mistresses, and became a Suter to Edgar King of Scotland for his excellent Sister Matilda, who was Daughter to Queen Margaret the Sister of Edgar Etheling; by which means his Issue might be both of the Blood of the English Nation, and the English Kings. But in this he met with one great Obstruction, which was her Education from her Infancy in a Monastery in Wilton among Nuns; and being veil'd like them, she was thought by her Parents to have been dedicated to the Service of God. This was left to the sole Determination of Arch-Bishop Anselm, but he declin'd that Office, without the Approbation of a Council; and accordingly he summon'd the Bishops, Abbots, the Clergy and certain Noblemen to Lambeth, where she acknowledg'd She had been veil'd, but against her Will, and took that Habit upon her to preserve her Chastity from the Lusts of the Normans, according to the Example of many Matrons and Virgins, since King William subdu'd the Nation. Upon which Allegations and Proofs, by the Judgment of the whole Council she had lawful Liberty of her Person allow'd her, and not long after, upon the Feast of St. Michael, the Marriage was solemniz'd between King Henry and this Lady, to the general Satisfaction of all Men.

The King marries Matilda of Scotland.

siles.*

In the mean Time Duke Robert, who had gain'd great Reputation in the Holy Land, and was newly return'd into his own Country, began to cast an envious Eye upon his Brother Henry, and resolv'd to attempt that Crown which he concluded to be his own Right. And being excited by Ralph Bishop of Durham, who had escap'd out of Prison into Normandy, and several others, who began to fear the vigorous and resolute Temper of King Henry, he made all necessary Preparations for so great an Enterprize. The Report of this intended Invasion, which disturb'd the whole Nation, had various Effects upon Mens Minds, and divided the Nobility and great Men into Parties, so that the King was driven to great Uncertainties. As he continually suspected their Constancy and Fidelity, so they no less dreaded his Authority and Power, being better satisfy'd with the more unactive Disposition of his Brother Robert. Upon mature Deliberation it was resolv'd that Security should be given on both Sides, and Arch-Bishop Anselm was made Mediator between the King and them, who giving them his Hand on the King's Behalf, solemnly promis'd, That he would govern the whole Kingdom as long as he liv'd, by pious and just Laws, which at present gave them full Satisfaction. Yet when Duke Robert had put to Sea, many of the English Nation revolted, as also a considerable Part of the Fleet, so that he soon found a safe Landing at Portsmouth, and he did not a little rejoice at this fortunate Beginning, threatening his Brother with Revenge for all Wrongs, and condemning the Nobility for suffering him to be thus injur'd, while he for the common Good of Christendom was imploy'd in the Holy War. On the other Side Henry us'd all Methods to defeat his Designs, and being sensible of the great Influence of the Arch-Bishop he made new Promises of Obedience to him and the Apostolick See. Upon which Anselm pathetically represented to the great Men and the whole Army the Scandal and Impiety of Mens violating their Faith once given to their Prince; which had such a happy Effect upon them that they resolv'd rather to part with their Lives than their Loyalty: And the Success and Safety of King Henry was chiefly owing to the Fidelity and Industry of this Arch-Bishop. For Robert being hereby defeated in the Confidence he repos'd in the Nobility, he by the Mediation of the chief Men of both Sides, concluded a Peace with his Brother, and made a fair Agreement. The Substance of which was, 'That in Consideration Henry was born after his Father's Acquisition of England, and was now unanimously crown'd King, he should enjoy the same during Life, paying to Robert three thousand Marks annually by way of Fealty, and restoring whatever he held in Normandy; and the Survivor should be Heir to the other, if he dy'd without a Son: That all offending Persons should have their Honours and Lands restor'd to them. For the Confirmation and Performance of which, twelve chief Noblemen of either and brought the King to a more compleat Authority. Robert de Belesme, Earl of Shrewsbury, Son to Roger Montgomery, an intrepid Youth, presuming upon the Power of his Friends and Fortunes, fortify'd the Castles of Shrewsbury, Bridgeworth, Tickhill and Arundel, and joining with the disaffected Welsh, made a formidable Insurrection. Upon which the King with great Vigour and Resolution march'd into those Parts; against Arundel Castle he rais'd another of Wood, and took it; besieg'd Bridgeworth, which immediately yielded, and Shrewsbury soon sent him their Keys and Pledges of their Obedience. So that in a short Time Belesme, with the two Earls his Brothers, Roger and Arnulph, were constrain'd to leave England and their Estates, and retire into Normandy; where they rais'd vast Disturbances for three Years together. Many Towns and Churches were burnt by their Means; and almost all Normandy stood up against this violent Earl of Shrewsbury; but they wanted a sufficient Commander to quell the Power of so furious a Ravager. He was a Man of Parts and Subtlety, had a considerable Strength about him, and supported himself by his great Wealth, which he had treasured up in thirty four strong Castles, built for rebellious Designs.

The marry'd
Clergy censur'd

These Men were not more active and busie abroad, than Arch-Bishop Anselm^{Exon.} was at home, who being a Man of a stiff Resolution, in a Synod at Westminster, incurr'd the Hatred both of the King and the Clergy. For first he proceeded to excommunicate all marry'd Priests, when half the Clergy of the Nation were either marry'd, or the Sons of marry'd Priests; and next he inhibited all Lay-Men from hearing of their Masses. Upon which Huntington makes this Reflection, 'That however it might seem laudable to some, to others it appear'd 'dangerous; lest while they affected a Purity above their Strength, they might 'fall into an Impurity of a greater Malignity. After this Success, the Arch-Bishop proceeded to censure and condemn those Prelates and Ecclesiasticks who had accepted their Investitures from the King, which usually was done by receiving a Pastoral Staff and a Ring, an ancient Rite, testifying their Donation was from their Sovereign: For which free Proceedings, and for refusing to consecrate certain Bishops advanc'd by the King, a great Contest arose between them; and the Arch-Bishop thinking himself injur'd by the present growing Power, appeal'd to Pope Paschall, and shortly after went in Person to Rome. The King also sent his Ambassadors to the same Place, Herbert Bishop of Norwich, with Robert Bishop of Lichfield, both of his Privy-Council, and William Warelwast his Procurator, a Clergy Man of great Courage and Elocution; who in debating his Sovereign's Cause before the Pope and Cardinals, with a threatening Countenance declar'd, That the King his Master would sooner part from his Kingdom, than lose the Right of Investiture of Churches. To whom the Pope sharply reply'd, If that be his Resolution, while Paschall lives, he shall never enjoy them without Punishment, tho' it were to save his Head. Yet he granted the King some of his Father's Usages, wholly prohibiting the Investiture of Churches. This Contest arose so high, that for a while Anselm, as in the last Reign, lost his Archbishoprick, and the King was in great Danger of Excommunication. But after three Years, Matters were brought to an Accommodation; and upon the Pope's allowing that the Clergy might do Homage to the King, which had been before deny'd, the King was perswaded to part with his Right of Investitures; and all Vacancies being fill'd, both Parties rested satisfy'd.

Great Contests
between the King and the Arch-Bishop.

At length they are accommodated.

During these Controversies, King Henry was more successful in relation to his Brother Robert; who coming into England, and being splendidly enter-^{Sax. Man}tain'd, tain'd, out of Generosity, or by the Persuasions of Queen Matilda, remitted the Pension of three thousand Marks, due to him by Articles; tho' he was far less able to forbear, than the King to pay such a Sum. But when his Wants made him sensible of his Error, he openly exclaim'd against King Henry, as tho' he had impos'd upon his Generosity; and giving Ear and Credit to such as sought their Disunion, he gave his Brother all Occasions for a Rupture, who wanted no great Incitement to any Thing of that Nature. Besides this present Displeasure, Duke Robert had profusely wasted the Inheritance his Father had left him, which was the Dukedom of Normandy, having now scarce any Place left in his Dominions, but the City of Rouen, with which also he would have parted, had not the Citizens deny'd their Consents. But the greatest Disobligation was the Duke's ready Receiving all the Traiterous Subjects of his Brother; for besides Robert Belesme and others, now William Earl of Mortaign in Normandy and of Cornwall in England, being deny'd the Earldom of Kent, which he claim'd as Heir to his Uncle Odo, in a great Discontent retir'd into Normandy, where besides his vigorous Assaults of the King's Castles and Soldiers, he much endanger'd the Possessions of Richard Earl of Chester, then a Child and the King's Ward. So that the Flames of War rais'd by these Seditions, seem to have been blown from England into Normandy, and to have set fire to the Territories of the English in that Country. Nor is it easie to declare, says Hoveden, what Miseries in the mean Time the Nation felt at home by the severe Taxes then laid upon it.

Normandy was now in a great Confusion, and suffer'd extreamly from the Carelessness and Profuseness of Robert and his Followers; so that Malmesbury says, That as well for his Brother's Reputation, as for the Sufferings of Normandy, Henry could no longer endure that wicked Men should maintain their own Luxury with the Estates of the Poor, therefore he first admonish'd his Brother by gentle Words, To act like a Prince, and not like a Monk, nor to encourage Traitors to their Sovereign. But this not having its Effect, the King proceeded to open Force, and by large Distributions of Money carry'd out of England, he won many of the Norman Nobility to revolt from their Lord, took the Town and Castle of Caen by Composition, and burnt Bayeux, with the beautiful Church of St. Mary's, whereupon the Priories of Normandy yielded themselves to his Protection; by whose Example the Britains and those of Anjou did the like; so that their Castles and Forts were fill'd with King Henry's Garrisons, without any great Resistance from Duke Robert. Which done, the King return'd in a triumphant Manner into England, in the End of Autumn, in order to renew the War the next Campaign, being not able to finish his Conquests as yet, for want of Money, which he went over to raise.

Duke Robert now finding himself in a declining Condition, resolv'd to become a Mediator himself; and coming over into England in Person, after a more humble Manner than was agreeable to his Birth or Nature, he desir'd a Peace: Which being refus'd him, he return'd more exasperated than ever, threatening to be reveng'd of all Injuries. Matth. Paris tells us that the King upon this Occasion felt some Remorse of Conscience for his unkind Usage to his Brother, and usurping of his Kingdom, and also apprehended some Rebellion of his Subjects. But to secure himself in the Affections of all Men, he summon'd a grand Council or Parliament to London, where in a solemn Speech he protested against Duke Robert his Brother, Who for his insolent refusing the Kingdom of Jerusalem, was now justly forsaken of God; setting forth his uneasie and arrogant Temper, and Contempt of the English Nation, as also his own humble and peaceable Disposition, and continu'd Resolution to maintain all their Liberties and Privileges, and particularly the Sacred Laws of King Edward; assuring them That if he had but the Hearts and Affections of his English Subjects, he fear'd not the utmost Power of his Brother, and all his Normans. tain'd, out of Generosity, or by the Persuasions of Queen Matilda, remitted the Pension of three thousand Marks, due to him by Articles; tho' he was far less able to forbear, than the King to pay such a Sum. But when his Wants made him sensible of his Error, he openly exclaim'd against King Henry, as tho' he had impos'd upon his Generosity; and giving Ear and Credit to such as sought their Disunion, he gave his Brother all Occasions for a Rupture, who wanted no great Incitement to any Thing of that Nature. Besides this present Displeasure, Duke Robert had profusely wasted the Inheritance his Father had left him, which was the Dukedom of Normandy, having now scarce any Place left in his Dominions, but the City of Rouen, with which also he would have parted, had not the Citizens deny'd their Consents. But the greatest Disobligation was the Duke's ready Receiving all the Traiterous Subjects of his Brother; for besides Robert Belesme and others, now William Earl of Mortaign in Normandy and of Cornwall in England, being deny'd the Earldom of Kent, which he claim'd as Heir to his Uncle Odo, in a great Discontent retir'd into Normandy, where besides his vigorous Assaults of the King's Castles and Soldiers, he much endanger'd the Possessions of Richard Earl of Chester, then a Child and the King's Ward. So that the Flames of War rais'd by these Seditions, seem to have been blown from England into Normandy, and to have set fire to the Territories of the English in that Country. Nor is it easie to declare, says Hoveden, what Miseries in the mean Time the Nation felt at home by the severe Taxes then laid upon it.

Normandy was now in a great Confusion, and suffer'd extreamly from the Carelessness and Profuseness of Robert and his Followers; so that Malmesbury says, That as well for his Brother's Reputation, as for the Sufferings of Normandy, Henry could no longer endure that wicked Men should maintain their own Luxury with the Estates of the Poor, therefore he first admonish'd his Brother by gentle Words, To act like a Prince, and not like a Monk, nor to encourage Traitors to their Sovereign. But this not having its Effect, the King proceeded to open Force, and by large Distributions of Money carry'd out of England, he won many of the Norman Nobility to revolt from their Lord, took the Town and Castle of Caen by Composition, and burnt Bayeux, with the beautiful Church of St. Mary's, whereupon the Priories of Normandy yielded themselves to his Protection; by whose Example the Britains and those of Anjou did the like; so that their Castles and Forts were fill'd with King Henry's Garrisons, without any great Resistance from Duke Robert. Which done, the King return'd in a triumphant Manner into England, in the End of Autumn, in order to renew the War the next Campaign, being not able to finish his Conquests as yet, for want of Money, which he went over to raise.

Duke Robert now finding himself in a declining Condition, resolv'd to become a Mediator himself; and coming over into England in Person, after a more humble Manner than was agreeable to his Birth or Nature, he desir'd a Peace: Which being refus'd him, he return'd more exasperated than ever, threatening to be reveng'd of all Injuries. Matth. Paris tells us that the King upon this Occasion felt some Remorse of Conscience for his unkind Usage to his Brother, and usurping of his Kingdom, and also apprehended some Rebellion of his Subjects. But to secure himself in the Affections of all Men, he summon'd a grand Council or Parliament to London, where in a solemn Speech he protested against Duke Robert his Brother, Who for his insolent refusing the Kingdom of Jerusalem, was now justly forsaken of God; setting forth his uneasie and arrogant Temper, and Contempt of the English Nation, as also his own humble and peaceable Disposition, and continu'd Resolution to maintain all their Liberties and Privileges, and particularly the Sacred Laws of King Edward; assuring them That if he had but the Hearts and Affections of his English Subjects, he fear'd not the utmost Power of his Brother, and all his Normans. With these specious Promises he so gain'd upon their Inclinations,

The King having obtain'd this Point, about the End of July pass'd over into Normandy, with a powerful Army, and the principal Nobility of the Kingdom; and piercing into the Country he built a Fort near the Town of Tinchebray, with an Intention to streighten it, and force it to surrender. But the Earl of Mortaign with some Forces in a short Time reliev'd it, at which the King highly incens'd laid Siege to the Town; which oblig'd that Earl to beg of Duke Robert to come down to his Assistance, to which he readily yielded, and march'd with several Noblemen, and all the Forces he could possibly gather together. Tho' the King was more powerful in Horse, yet the Duke had a greater Number of Foot, so that both Parties were willing to come to a general Battel, which was fought before this Town, with great Obstinacy for a while, 'till at length the King's Horse prevail'd, and the Duke's Army was totally routed, with no great Loss to the Victors. In this Battel the King took the Duke Prisoner, the Earl of Mortaign, William Crispin, William Ferrars, Robert Stuteville the Elder, with many other Norman Barons, as also four hundred Knights or Horsemen, and ten thousand Foot; so that upon this great Victory all Normandy submitted to the King, which verify'd his Father William's Prediction, That he should exceed both his Brothers in Riches and Greatness. This memorable Battel was fought on Michaelmas's Eve, about forty Years after that at Hastings; and as the Norman Duke then subdu'd an English King, and gain'd his Kingdom, so now an English King, by the Assistance of his English Subjects, conquer'd Normandy, which for many Years after was held by the Kings of England. In this Battel Edgar Etheling was also taken Prisoner, who was immediately set at Liberty by the King; and having been often made the Sport and Pastime of Fortune, he pass'd the rest of his Life in Peace and Retirement. As for Duke Robert and the Earl of Mortaign, the King sent them Prisoners into England, the former to Cardiff Castle in Wales, and the latter to the Tower of London. The Duke continu'd a Prisoner for twenty six Years, all the rest of his Life; but as for the Story of the King's ordering his Eyes to be put out, the Silence of the best Authors, and the Improbability of several Circumstances in it, renders it of too little Credit to be rely'd on.

Reg. 8.

He becomes

II. King Henry having establish'd his Power, and finish'd all Foreign Contests, turn'd his Thoughts to the Regulation of Domestick Inconveniencies: And by the Advice of Arch-Bishop Anselm, and the Noblemen of his Kingdom, he redress'd several evil Practices, and began with his own Court. It was usual in his Brother's Reign, for the Multitude which follow'd the Court to commit great Disorders and Ravages without Control, and to behave themselves rudely towards the Wives and Daughters of the Country People, so that they fled from their Habitations upon the Approach of the Court. For the Remedy of which, the King ordain'd by a publick Edict, That whoever was found guilty of these and the like Practices, should lose his Eyes, his Hands, Feet or other Members; which being executed upon some, deterr'd others from such Offences. He also took notice of the great Mischiefs arising from false and corrupt Mony, and decreed, That every false Coiner should suffer Castration or the Loss of his Eyes. And now being free from all Fear of Rivals, King Henry growing disdainful, says M. Paris, refus'd to perform what he had so often promis'd to his Nobility, using haughty Words and Threats; for God had bestow'd upon him three Blessings, Wisdom, Victory and Riches, above any of his Predecessors: Yet, adds he, he shew'd himself unthankful to God; and, as others say, too regardless of his Clergy, in suffering Anselm, newly reconcil'd to him, to tyrannize over them, and in a Synod to lay heavy Punishments upon the marry'd Priests, making no Difference between Matrimony and Fornication, and putting many from their Benefices, because they refus'd to put put away their lawful Wives; from whence great Contests were rais'd, and grievous Sins committed both against God and Nature. In this Synod a Debate arose concerning the Largeness of the Diocese of Lincoln, and it was unanimously agreed to make another Bishoprick out of it, and to fix the See at Ely. But tho' Anselm wrot to the Pope concerning it, the Design was not finish'd in his Life-Time; yet not long after it was compleated, and Henry Bishop of Bangor was made the first Bishop of that Place.

In the mean Time, Philip King of France dying, was succeeded by Lewis his Son, who soon shew'd himself no Friend to King Henry; for which Reason the King sail'd into Normandy, where he made what Preparations were convenient against a suspected Man. Here upon some fresh Jealousie he commanded his Nephew William, Son to his Brother Robert, to be taken into Custody; but the young Prince by means of his Tutor Elias made his Escape, and was carry'd to the Court of France, and to divers other Princes, who were solicited for Aid and Assistance in his Behalf, but all in vain; for tho' many of the Normans favour'd him, as a handsom Person and of good natural Parts, and were earnest for his Advancement, yet neither Prince nor Subject dare presume at that Time to make War against the Power of King Henry. The King having pass'd his Winter in Normandy, return'd into England a little before Whitsontide, and held his Court with extraordinary Splendor at Westminster; where the Ambassadors of the Emperor Henry the Fourth waited on him with a noble and magnificent Retinue, to desire his Daughter Matilda in Marriage. The King consented to the Proposal, and the Articles were soon sign'd; but the Princess her self being very young, continu'd in England 'till the Year following, when she was sent over into Germany with the highest Pomp, and a vast Portion of ready Mony; for which three Shillings were laid upon every Hide of Land in England, which according to Dr. Brady's Computation amounted to 824850 Pounds of our present Mony. Before the Marriage was celebrated Arch-Bishop Anselm dy'd; a Prelate of great Learning and Strictness of Life, and so inviolable a Friend to Rome, that that See in Gratitude Canoniz'd him for a Saint. King Henry took the Archbishoprick and all its Appendages into his own Hands, and according to the evil Example of his Brother William, kept it vacant five Years. Upon his Death the Clergy had hopes of enjoying the Liberty of Matrimonial Society, but the King took Care to put that Ecclesiastical Ordinance in Execution; upon which, out of Fear, and in the Sight of Men, they behav'd themselves accordingly; 'but, says Eadmer, if in secret they acted otherwise, the Charge must fall on their own Heads; for, adds he, 'if God will judge Fornicators and Adulterers, certainly the Abusers of their own Consens, not to say their own Sisters and Daughters, shall never escape his Vengeance.

About this Time happen'd the Restoration of Learning in the University of Cambridge, which was by the Means of Joffred Abbot of Croyland, who sent over to his Mannor of Cotenham near Cambridge, Gislebert his Fellow Monk, and Professor of Divinity, with three other Monks, who had follow'd him into England, who being thoroughly furnish'd with Philosophical Theorems, and other ancient Sciences, repair'd daily to Cambridge; where they hired a publick Barn, made open Profession of their Sciences, and in a short Time drew a great Number of Scholars together. In less than two Years Time their Numbers were so increas'd, from the Country as well as the Town, that there was never a House, Barn or Church large enough to contain them all. Upon which these Monks dividing themselves into several Places, and taking the University of Orleans for their Pattern, read to their Scholars apart in several Companies, using the best Authors in Grammar, Rhetorick and Logick; whilst Gislebert the principal Master preach'd to the People upon all Sundays and Holy Days. That the Study of ancient Learning then flourish'd at Oxford as well as Cambridge, and that there were publick Schools for teach-

For Fulk Earl of Anjou both threaten'd Revenge, and by corrupting the Inhabitants, won the City of Constance from the King's Obedience. To stop whose Career Henry pass'd over into Normandy, where he us'd great Severities, and put to Death Elias Earl of Maine, who held that Country against him; which so disoblig'd Godfrey Earl of Gaunt, that he afterwards enter'd into that Earldom, and marrying the Daughter of Elias, kept that Country against all the Power of King Henry. But in the mean Time the King was imploy'd in a politick Project at home, in relation to many poor Flemmings, who came over into England both in his Father's and his own Reign, being forc'd hither by vast Inundations of the Sea in Flanders. By their coming in such numerous Swarms, they became a Burthen to the Nation, upon which the King at first planted them in the waste Parts of Northumberland; but finding they might be more servicable for the restraining of the Welsh, whom he had lately subdu'd, he transplanted them with their Families into Wales, giving them all the Country of Rhos, lying about Pembroke and Haverford-West, which before had been conquer'd from the Welsh Princes. The Descendents of these Flemmings have continu'd to this Day, being quite different from the native Britains or Welshmen, both in Language and Manners; and being an industrious stout People, afterwards prov'd a sure Defence against the Insurrections of the Welsh, manifesting the Excellency of the Roman Policy, in preserving all new Conquests by Colonies.

But having got Robert de Belesme into his Power, he sent him into England to be kept close Prisoner in Warham Castle, where he contiue'd all his Life; without being pity'd, as being a turbulent, faithless and cruel Man, as appears by his thrusting out the Eyes of his Godson, a Child who was deliver'd to him as an Hostage by his Father. Thus King Henry having at last totally subdu'd Normandy, and made Peace with all his Neighbours beyond the Seas, return'd victorious into England, and govern'd this Kingdom and that Dukedom in great Tranquility for five Years ensuing.

 Church Vacancies fill'd up. the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, which had been vacant five Years. Accordingly he summon'd the Bishops and chief Men to meet at Windsor, where upon the twenty fifth Day of April, Ralph Bishop of Rocheſter was chosen Arch-Bishop; and being so declar'd to the Multitude, they receiv'd it with the utmost Demonstrations of Joy and Triumph. He was highly belov'd for his Affability and good Humour, and his Consecration was celebrated with exceeding Pomp and Splendor; and afterwards when he was invested with his Pall from Rome, that Solemnity was attended by the Bishops, Abbots and Nobility besides infinite Throngs of People from all Parts. In the same Year Thurstan, the King's Chaplain was made Arch-Bishop of York, in the Room of Thomas deceas'd, and several other Vacancies in the Church were fill'd up; but, as Eadmer complains, with too great Partiality to the Normans, and Neglect to the English Nation. Tho' the King had Peace at home, yet this Year he met with great Provocations from the Welsh, by their Incursions they made upon the Territories of Gilbert Strongbow Earl of Striguil, and Hugh Earl of Chester, ster, who had been settled in those Parts. Their Outrages were so great, that the King swore he would utterly destroy all the Men of North-Wales and Pow-issland, and plant them with new Inhabitants; and immediately march'd towards the Country with a powerful Army, which he divided into three Parts. The first was led by Earl Gilbert against South-Wales; the second by Alexander King of Scotland and the Earl of Chester, against North-Wales; and the third by the King himself, under whose Standard was the Flower of the Mid-land Counties. But the Welsh finding themselves unable to withstand so great a Power, had recourse to their old Security the Woods and Mountains, where being follow'd with great Difficulty, many of them were slain, and the rest submitted to Terms to King Henry, who now as a Victor return'd in Triumph to London: Where his Satisfaction was heighten'd by the News of the Consummation of the Marriage between the Emperor and his Daughter Matilda, who was likewise solemnly crown'd Empress at Ments, at the Age of fourteen.

Not long after the King took shipping and went into Normandy, where after a long Stay, he caus'd all the chief Men of that Dukedom to swear Fealty to his Son William, as his lawful Successor, being then about twelve Years of Age: From whence it became a Custom afterwards for the Kings of England to make their Eldest Sons Dukes of Normandy. But this did not satisfy the King, who resolving to secure the Succession of the Crown to his own Family, in the following Year summon'd a great Council of all the Bishops, Abbots and Nobility of the Kingdom at Salisbury on the twentieth Day of March; where all the chief Men, knowing the King's Intentions, readily did Homage, and swore Fealty to young William, 'That if he should outlive his Father, they would lay aside all other Claims, and put him in Possession of the Crown and Kingdom, and faithfully serve him as King of England. From this Assembly several Writers have dated the Original of the high Court of Parliament in England: Some believe that there was nothing of that Nature before; Others that this was the Beginning of the House of Commons; and others think that this Assembly was the first that had the Name of PARLIAMENT given to it. The first of these Opinions is undoubtedly false, the second improbable, and the third uncertain.

About the same Time King Henry gave Assistance to his Nephew Theobald Earl of Blessis, who upon some Displeasure had taken up Arms against the King of France; which so irrag'd that Prince, that having join'd with Baldwin Earl of Flanders, and Fulk Earl of Anjou, he solemnly swore to dispossess King Henry of all Normandy, and set up William, the Son of Duke Robert, in his room; who being nearest of Right, many of the Norman Nobility, pitying the Misfortunes of the Father, join'd in the Design. King Henry was no less active and vigilant on the other Side, and levying a great Tax in the Nation, and joining with Theobald and the Earl of Britaign, he made a notable Appearance in the Field. At which Time King Lewis, with the Earls of Flanders and Anjou, being enter'd Normandy, and hearing of the Approach and Power of King Henry, scarcely staid one Night, but as Men without Heart or Courage return'd, and left the Country free to the Victor. So that all things seem'd well quieted for a Year, and now nothing disturb'd the King's Peace but some little Troubles in Wales, and the uneasy Expectation of the Pope's Legate, whom the King had expressly prohibited to enter England; and likewise the Death of his excellent Queen Matilda, which happen'd in the eighteenth Year of his Reign to the great Grief of the Nation, who highly esteem'd her as well for her Family, as her Piety, Charity and Munificence.

by Patience and Policy; and that a good King should not be prodigal of the Blood of such Subjects as his. In a short Time after he found an Opportunity to signalize his Valour in a general Battel with the French, which was fought with great Obstinacy for several Hours together. In the Beginning of which the first Battalion of the French broke the Ranks of the Norman Nobility, and pressing forwards towards the King, put his Troops in Disorder. But being now rous'd, he soon rally'd his Men, and began a most bloody Conflict with Sword in Hand; in which, Crispin a valiant Nobleman, assaulted the King, and struck him twice upon the Head with such Fury, that the impenetrable Helmet was beaten into his Head, with the Loss of much Blood. But Henry feeling himself wounded, gather'd Strength with his Rage, and fasten'd so weighty a Blow upon his Adversary, that he overthrew both him and his Horse, and then took him Prisoner. By which brave Example his Soldiers fell on like Lions and Furies, and treated the French so rudely, that they soon betook themselves to Flight. Many of the French Nobility were taken Prisoners, as likewise King Lewis's Standard was taken, which King Henry bought for twenty Marks, and kept it as a Token of the Victory, returning in Triumph to Roven.

Before this War was finish'd, the Pope call'd a Council at Rheims, where the English Bishops were permitted by the King to be present, but all Complaints were prohibited, and this Charge given them, Go ye, salute the Pope in my Name, and only bear his Apostolical Precepts, but bring none of his new Inventions into my Kingdom. In this Council great Complaints were made against King Henry, for the unjust Treatment of his Brother Robert and others. In order to accommodate all Matters, not long after, the Pope came into Normandy, and met the King at Gisors; where his Holiness told him, That by the Law of God every Man ought to enjoy his own Right, and that it was his Desire and that of the whole Council, that he should set his Brother Robert at Liberty, and restore him and his Son William to their Dukedom. To which the King answer'd, That he did not take Normandy from his Brother, but only secur'd his Father's Inheritance, then given up to dissolute Men and Robbers: That he was call'd into that Country by the Bishops and Clergy, to prevent the Desolation of the Church; and that what he did was not the Effect of Choice, but of the Persuasions and Invitations of the Inhabitants, to preserve their Country from utter Ruin. With this Answer the Pope was satisfy'd, and approv'd of what had been done, declaring, That he had heard enough of the Duke and his Son. Malmesbury adds, that at this Interview the King was so liberal of his Presents to the Pope and his Cardinals, that ever after they esteem'd him as a most eloquent Orator, and all his Actions very justifiable: So that abandoning these unfortunate Princes, the Pope imploy'd his Abilities in making up a Peace between the two Kings, which was concluded in the following Year without any Exception or Difficulty, all Forts and Castles taken in the Wars being deliver'd up, and Prisoners on both Sides set at Liberty.

Upon the finishing the War, the King resolv'd to return into England, from whence he had been absent above four Years; and with a numerous Fleet and a noble Retinue, set Sail from Barfleur on the 26th Day of November, and landed in England the Day following. But Prince William, who now only wanted the Name of a King, commanded a new Ship to be prepar'd for himself, his Brothers and Sisters, with many of the young gay Nobility his Companions, who plying the Sailors with Wine, made them boast that they would out sail the King's Ship, which had weigh'd Anchor before: And in the Night putting to Sea with a brisk and delightful Gale, they flew over the dancing Waves, with all the Testimonies of Mirth and Jollity. But Heaven designing to check the too great Felicity of King Henry, in the midst of all their Pleasures, the Ship suddenly struck on the Rock not far from the Shore, which turn'd their Songs into dismal Cries, and condemn'd every one to shift for his Life. Prince William immediately got into the Long Boat with a few others, and might have escap'd, had not his Tenderneſs to his natural Siſter Matilda occaſion'd him to hearken to her Cries and turn back to ſave her; which gave Opportunity to others to leap into the Boat in ſuch Numbers, that it preſently ſunk, ſo that not one of this noble Train eſcap'd but the meaneſt of the Company, who were ſav'd by ſwimming upon the Main-Maſt, and gave a full Relation of this Tragical Story. This was the moſt unfortunate Shipwreck that ever happen'd in our Seas, bringing an inconceivable Sorrow to the King and the whole Nation: For in it perilh'd William the Joy of his Father, and the Hope of the Nation; Richard his natural Brother, his Siſter Matilda Counteſs of Perche, Richard Earl of Cheſter, with his Lady Lucy, the King's Niece by his Siſter Adela, Otwell the Earl's Brother, the young Duke's Governor, divers of the King's great Officers of State, and ſeveral of the chief Nobility, to the Number of a hundred and ſixty Perſons; many of whom had made themſelves infamous by unnatural Impurities. As this was a terrible Inſtance of Divine Vengeance upon theſe Enemies to true Piety, ſo it was no leſs upon the great Norman Family; in which we find Oppreſſion puniſh'd with Diſappointment and Extinction, and its maſculine Line, which was rais'd by ſuch vaſt Care, Expence and Bloodſhed, now expiring in the third Inheritor. Which Judgment was ſuch a ſenſible Affliction to the King, that it occaſion'd ſome to report, That he was never ſeen to laugh after it.

New Deſigns ſet on foot in Normandy.

The Normans ſtill repining at the Captivity of Robert their late Sovereign, and being well affected to his Son William, they reſolv'd to ſet him up in his Room. Robert had lately ſtrengthen'd his Intereſt by marrying Sybil the other Daughter of Fulk Earl of Anjou, with whom he receiv'd the Earldom of Main, upon Diſpleaſure conceiv'd for that King Henry had ſtopt the other Siſter's Dowry in England. The chief in this Action was Robert Earl of Meſſent, who had lately made a Deſection; wherefore the King haſtning into Normandy, ſuſtaining his

In the mean Time, Earl Mellent, to be reveng'd on the King, join'd with Hugh Earl of Montfort and others of Power, who entering Normandy with Fire and Sword, by their Ravages expected to make all submit. To put a stop to these Outrages, William Tankerville the King's Chamberlain, and Lieutenant in those Parts, march'd against them, and drawing them into an Ambuscade, after a long Fight took both the Earls Prisoners, and presented them to his Master, which put a Stop to the Wars for some Time. At the same Time England was extreamly troubled with Thieves, Robbers and False Coiners; which together with the severe Taxes, and a great Famine, prov'd highly calamitous to the Nation. To remedy some of these Troubles, the King's Justiciary in a publick Council order'd forty four Robbers to be hang'd up, and punish'd others with Loss of Members: And afterwards at another Meeting at Winchester, many of the Corrupters of the Coin suffer'd by Castration and the Loss of their right Hands; which Punishment did for the future more deter Men from committing that Crime, than the Fear of Death it self.

The Celebacy of the Clergy establish'd.

In the King's Absence, but not without his Licence, John de Crema, Cardinal and a Legate from Pope Honorius, came into England, to redress the great Abuse, as it was term'd, of the Clergy's retaining the Society of their Wives. He was receiv'd with great Pomp and Magnificence, but with no great Satisfaction; and Gervase of Canterbury complains, That it was a Thing never heard of since the Time of Augustin, that it was an Innovation, a Scandal to England, and a Retrenchment of the Liberty of this ancient Kingdom, which had never been subject to a Legantine Power. However he held a general Synod at London, where he severely envighed against the Marriage of Priests, declaring, That it was a horrid Sin for a Priest to rise from the Bed of Lust, and then to touch the Sacrament of the Body of Christ; yet the Night following, after he himself had celebrated Mass, he was taken in Bed with a common Strumpet: Which, says Huntington, was too notorious to be deny'd, and too wicked to be conceal'd. So this hypocritical Cardinal was oblig'd to return with much more Shame than he came hither with Honour; and tho' by the Consent of the Synod he made several Canons for the Reformation and Celebacy of the Clergy, they were not much regarded. 'Till some few Years after, in 1129, the King desirous to settle the Celebacy of the Clergy, in a Synod call'd on purpose, through the Weakness of the Arch-Bishop, as Paris expresses it, obtain'd Power to have the sole Execution of this Law himself. But instead of wholly restraining the pretended Abuse, he punish'd them in their Purfes, and receiving Sums from a great many of them, he permitted 'em to enjoy their Wives as formerly.

Reg. ²⁶/₂₇.

The chief of the Nation swear Fealty to the King's Daughter, the Emperess Matilda.

V. King Henry having enjoy'd his second Queen near six Years with little Prospect of Issue, became extreamly desirous to leave the Crown to the Emperess ^{Ma.} ^{San} ^{Al.} ^{Sec} his Daughter Matilda, now lately a Widow, and so much belov'd by the Ger-mans, that she was desir'd to reign over them, but was prevented by her Father in Hopes of the Crown of England. In order to effect this great Work, the King took his Daughter into England, and at Windsor summon'd a Grand Council or Parliament, consisting of all the chief Men of the Nation, besides David King of Scotland. Here he persuaded all the Bishops, Abbots, Earls and Barons, to take a solemn Oath, 'That if he should die without Issue Male, 'they would receive his Daughter Matilda for their Queen; as being his only 'lawful Heir, by whom they should again be govern'd by the ancient English 'Royal Blood, from which he shew'd her to be descended. The Arch-Bishops, Bishops and Abbots first swore to this Succession, then David King of Scotland; and and the first of Lay Lords was Stephen Earl of Mortaign and Boloign, King Henry's Nephew by his Sister Adela, who was the first that violated his Oath. Then that he might strengthen her Interest by Foreign Alliances, he shortly after caus'd her to be marry'd to Jeoffry surnam'd Plantagenet, Earl of Anjou, in the Room of his Father Fulk, who was now made King of Jerusalem. This Marriage was not highly pleasing to the Empress, and much less to several of the Nobility both of England and Normandy, who were disoblig'd for not being made privy to this Affair, and gave just Occasion for some to prognosticate that after the King's Death they would fall off from the Oath they had sworn to her. But the King did it out of a politick Design, to secure his Interest with the Earl of Anjou, against the growing Power of his Nephew William, who by the Assistance of the French King, had lately been put into Possession of the Earldom of Flanders; and being so nearly ally'd to the Crown, began to be formidable to King Henry.

The King by his Daughter's Marriage having made Anjou his own, to put a Stop to the Greatness of William, and the French King who supported him, from Normandy invaded France as far as Esparne, where for eight Days he remain'd as secure as in his own Dominions; and partly by Threats, and partly by Promises, he procur'd King Lewis to withdraw his Assistance from young William. Nor did he stop here, but taking Advantage of the cruel and covetous Temper of his Nephew, he caus'd many of his Subjects in Flanders to set up Theodorick Lantgrave of Alsatia against him, pretending a Title to the Earldom, so many Towns revolted, among which Alost was one, which William besieg'd; and having bravely routed the Forces of the Lantgrave who came to relieve it, and when the Castle was just ready to be surrendr'd to him, he was by a Lance wounded near the Wrist, which immediately turning to a Gangrene, kill'd him within five Days after. He was a Man of great Courage, but to avoid his Father's Vice Prodigality, fell so far into the other Extream, that in the Belgick Histories he is surnam'd Miser. In him expir'd all the Legitimate Issue of Duke Robert; but he had two natural Sons, Richard who was long before kill'd hunting in the New Forest, and William who was afterwards slain in the Holy-Land.

After this we find no considerable Action of King Henry: In the thirtieth Year of his Reign, he took another Journey into Normandy, and met Pope Innocent at Chartres, where he acknowledg'd him for lawful Pope, notwithstanding he was then shut out of Rome, and Anacletus possess'd of that See; and at Roven he and his great Men made him many Presents. Having stay'd about a Year in Normandy the King return'd into England, and with him the Empress his Daughter, who had been lately parted from her Husband by reason of some private Contests that had happen'd between them. Not long after the King summon'd a grand Council or Parliament at Northampton, where the Clergy and Nobility all renew'd the Oath of Fealty which they had formerly taken to her; and then by their Advice, she was sent back to her Husband, who now desir'd her Company, and being joyfully receiv'd by him, she within less than two Years bore him a Son. In the thirty second Year of this Reign the King founded a Church and an Episcopal See at Carlisle, to which he laid the Counties of Cumberland, Westmorland and Part of Northumberland, and appointed Athulf his Confessor, then Abbot of St. Oswald's Abby, to be the first Bishop of it. The same Year was remarkable for nothing so much as the Burning down the greatest Part of London, which being then built almost all of Wood, was a Calamity very incident to that great City. As this was a Year of Sorrow to many, so the next was a Year of Joy to a great Part of the Nation, but especially to the King himself; and this was the Birth of a Son by the Empress Matilda, whose Name was Henry, which so pleas'd the King, that he summon'd the chief Men of his Kingdom with great Pomp, and again appointed his said Daughter and her Heirs to be his Successors, causing them them all to take an Oath to observe this Ordinance; so that the People of England were twice sworn to the Succession.

In the latter End of this Summer, the King having fill'd up several Vacancies in the Church, made his last Passage into Normandy. Upon the same Day he took Shipping, which was the third of August, there happen'd such an extraordinary Eclipse of the Sun, that Malmesbury tells us he himself saw many Stars near that Planet, which prov'd very frightful to most People; and that two Days after there was such a dreadful Earthquake, that the House where the Author sat was lifted up by a treble Remove; to which others add, That out of the Clefts of the Earth arose Flames of Fire that could not be quench'd: Which divers judg'd to be the fatal Presages of the Deaths of those two Princes that not long after ensu'd. The first was that of Robert, the King's eldest Brother, who at a great Age dy'd in Caerdiff Castle in Wales, after twenty six Years Imprisonment; a Prince sometime of great Courage and Reputation, who refus'd to receive a Kingdom gain'd partly by his own Sword; yet having been rebellious to his Father, and perfidious to his Brothers, as well as prodigal and careless, he lost the Benefit of his Birth-Right, and met with a Reward but answerable to his Crimes. His Body was bury'd at Glocester, in the Cathedral Church, and in the Middle of the Quire; where his Tomb remains to this Day, with a carved Image of his Shape, as the Monument of a most unfortunate Man.

The King's last Sickness.

In the next Year he was follow'd by the King his Brother, who being a hunting in Normandy, and returning to the Castle of Lyons near Roven with a strong Appetite, took a Surfeit by eating of Lampreys, which he much lov'd, but never could recover. Finding himself very sick and declining, he sent for Hugh Arch-Bishop of Roven, being also attended by his natural Son Robert Earl of Glocester, William Earl of Warren, and several other Noblemen and great Commanders, who desiring him to name his Successor, he made answer, That he left all his Dominions whatsoever to his Daughter Matilda, by a lawful and perpetual Succession; without mentioning her Husband, having been lately much disoblig'd by several Affronts receiv'd from him. Then he commanded his Debts, and all Servants Wages to be paid; all Forfeitures and Fines to be remitted; all Exiles and seiz'd Estates to be restor'd; and directed his Son Robert, who had the Custody of his Treasury at Falais, to distribute no less than sixty thousand Pounds among his Servants and stipendiary Knights and Horsemen. And now having made his Will, and done all Things necessary for a Christian Prince, after seven Days Sickness, he deceased on the second Day of December, and in the seventy eighth Year of his Age; after a tumultuous, vigorous and prosperous Reign of thirty five Years, three Months, and one Day. His Body was embalm'd after a strange and barbarous Manner, peculiar to those Times, and carry'd into England, where it was honourably bury'd on Christmas Day, in the Abby of Reading in Barkshire, which he himself had founded and endow'd with large Revenues.

His Death.

Character.

This was the End of the great Henry the First, under whose long Reign, the Nation scarcely felt any Foreign Invasion or Domestick Insurrection, except some inconsiderable Incursions of the Welsh; by which continu'd Peace, during three Reigns, England became a Place of Refuge and a Sanctuary to the Afflicted and Distressed of Foreign Nations. This King added much to its Strength and Glory, notwithstanding several severe Oppressions; defending the Land by numerous Garrisons, and building many Forts and Castles, besides twenty five Towns and Cities; in all which he manifested his extraordinary Parts and Abilities. He has been celebrated by some for the three glorious Felicities of Wisdom, Victory and Riches, and condemn'd by others for three notorious Vices, Avarice, Cruelty and Lust; the first three being manifested in his obtaining, keeping and improving the Kingdom; and the last by his hard Taxes, his Severity to his Brother and others, and his numerous illegitimate Issue. As to his Person, he was of a middle Stature, strong and well jointed, corpulent, of fine Eyes, and an amiable Countenance: In his Humour he was affable, and of a pleasant Conversation; and his Mind was enrich'd with many Virtues, being a Follower of Justice, a Lover of Religion, severe against Robbers, temperate in eating, and never drinking but for Thirst, vigorous and valiant in Battle, yet very circumspect, chusing rather to win by Conduct than Effusion of Blood; and by the Report of most Writers he exceeded all the Princes of his Age in Greatness and Magnificence. Whatsoever was wisely and virtuously perform'd in his Government, is by these Writers chiefly attributed to his Education and Learning; in which his renowned Father was very careful, often declaring, That an unlearned King was but a crown'd Ass. Upon which Account he often resided at his new Palace at Oxford, both for the Conversation of learned Men, and the Vicinity of a Park he made at Woodstock, which was the first known in England. His Works of Devotion appear from his Erection of the two Churches and Bishopricks of Ely and Carlisle, the Abbies of Hide, Circester, Reading, and the Priory of Dunstable. His Queen Matilda founded the Priory of the Holy Trinity within Algate in London, and the Hospital of St. Giles in the Fields; so that by himself, his Queen, and other devout Persons, above twenty four religious Foundations were erected in this Reign. The Laws of this Prince, besides his great Charter already mention'd, are publish'd by Lambert; tho' they are not accounted of any great Certainty. For the Price of Provisions and the like in this Reign, Dr. Brady tells us, That Wheat for one Day's Subsistence of a hundred Men was valu'd at one Shilling; a Ram or Sheep at four Pence; and an Allowance of Hay and Provender for twenty Horses one Day, four Pence; so that according to that Computation Money was then near twenty Times the real Value, that it has been of late Years.

Containing 18 Years, 9 Months, and 17 Days.

I. THO' the Empress Matilda had Fealty sworn to her during the Life of her Father, and Her and her Heirs ordain'd to be his Successors in the Crown of England; yet so prevalent are the Charms of Ambition, and so weak the Assurances of the People, that all King Henry's Precautions were soon defeated; and principally by one who had appear'd most forward in taking the Oath, namely Stephen Earl of Boloign, Nephew to the late King by Adela his fourth Sister, who was the third Son of Stephen Earl of Blois, who by the Favour of the King his Uncle was made Earl of Mortaign in Normandy. This Man having also many Lands and Honours in England, a great Interest upon the Account of his Personal Merit and his affable Behaviour, and a long Acquaintance with the Bishops and Nobility, resolv'd to take the Advantage of Matilda's Absence, and set up his own Title. Accordingly he hasten'd with the utmost Expedition into England, where his Landing was attended by a most dreadful Tempest of Thunder, which was thought to portend those Storms and Troubles it afterwards brought upon the Nation. The Inhabitants of Dover and Canterbury fortify'd themselves against him, but London receiv'd him; where his Designs were much facilitated by his younger Brother Henry then Bishop of Winchester, and a powerful Man in the State, who by his Interest prevail'd upon William Arch-Bishop of Canter- bury, the first Man who had sworn to the Empress: By whose Example many others were brought into the same dangerous Design, not fearing to affirm, That it was Baseness for so many noble Peers to be subject to a Woman. And to forward these bold Beginnings, Roger Bishop of Salisbury, the late King's Treasurer, protested, That they were all free from the Oath sworn to the Empress, because without the Consent of the Barons she had marry'd out of the Nation. But that which had the greatest Effect was the Testimony of Hugh Bigot, Steward to King Henry, who took a solemn Oath, That the King on his Death-Bed, upon some Displeasure to his Daughter, had disinherited her, and appointed his Nephew Stephen to be his Successor. These colourable Pretences so prevail'd upon the too credulous Arch-Bishop, and the Peers, that they consented to yield Allegiance to him; and upon the 26th of December, being St. Stephen's Day, he was crown'd at Westminster by the Arch-Bishop, with a small Appearance, being now about thirty one Years of Age.

He is crown'd
King.

But since his Title was so precarious, before he was crown'd he made large Promises of reforming whatever was amiss in his Uncle's Reign, for which his Brother engag'd his Faith; and at his Coronation he took an unusual Oath, chiefly consisting of these three Articles, 'First that he would never keep Bishopricks vacant for his own Advantage, but immediately consent to a Canonical Election, and invest new Bishops in them. Secondly he would not retain the Woods of any Clerk or Lay Man in his Hands, upon the Account of their Hunting, as King Henry had done, to the great Vexation of many. Thirdly he would for ever remit the Tribute of Danegelt, which his Predecessors had often rais'd.' On the other side the Bishops took their Oath of Allegiance conditionally to obey him as King, so long as he should preserve the Church's Liberties, and the exact Discipline of it: Which Policy was also observ'd by the Lay Lords, as appears from Robert Earl of Gloucester, the late King's natural Son, who swore to be the true Liege Man of Stephen, so long as the King should preserve to him his Dignities, and keep all Covenants; upon which the King promis'd to reform all the hard Laws of his Predecessors, and give it under his Seal and Charter. Then seizing upon the vast Treasure his Uncle had amass'd in the Castle of Winchester, which amounted to more than 100000 Marks, besides Plate and Jewels, he hasten'd to meet his Corps, now brought into England, and made a pompous Funeral at Reading, being attended by many of the Nobility. Shortly after he repaired to Oxford, where he sign'd and seal'd the Charter of Privileges he before promis'd; in the Preface of which he declares, 'That he obtain'd the Crown by the Election of the Clergy and People of England, and was confirm'd in the same by the present Pope Innocent.' The Tenor of the rest was, That all Liberties, Customs, and Possessions granted to the Church, should be in full Force: That all Persons and Causes Ecclesiastical should belong only to Ecclesiastical Judicature: That none but Clergy-Men should intermeddle with the Vacancies of Churches, or any Church-Man's Goods: That all bad Usages in the Land touching Forests, Exactions, and the like, should be abolish'd, and the ancient Laws restored. As Stephen well knew, that they had chosen him their King to obtain their own Designs; so Malmesbury observes, that he granted these Immunities rather to blind their Eyes, than to bind up his own Hands by such Parchment Chains.

This appeared in the second Year of his Reign, when William Arch-Bishop of Canterbury dy'd; at which Time he did not only keep the Archbishoprick vacant for above two Years, but finding that he had left vast Sums of Money, and that he dy'd without a Will, he seiz'd all to his own Use, which tho' too customary, was contrary to his Charter. However the Beginnings of his Government were very peaceable; but by several Steps civil Discord began and increas'd to the infinite Damage of the whole Nation. And what in a great measure gave Birth to these Mischiefs was the King's own Indulgence, who tho' tho' he was advanc'd only by a Party of Men, unadvisedly gave leave to all the Nobility, many of whom were his Enemies, to build Castles upon their own Lands, infomuch that above eleven hundred Places of Strength were erected in a short Time; by which means they were put into a Condition to renounce their Obedience, when ever they thought it to their Advantage. The first Man who openly declar'd against him was Baldwin de Redvers, who fortify'd the City and Castle of Exeter; and at the same Time the Welshmen, resenting the Damages done by King Henry, began to revenge themselves by the Slaughter of many of the English. To quell these Mischiefs King Stephen march'd with a Body of English and Flemmings, and after a long and chargeable Siege, by Famine he reduc'd Baldwin and his Adherents; after which he banish'd him and his Family, but us'd such Lenity towards the rest, that it gave great Encouragement to all future Insurrections. But in Wales his Affairs appear'd with another Fate, for at Cardigan a great Battel was fought, with such Loss and Slaughter of the English, that the Men were taken Prisoners by Women, and so many drown'd by the Fall of a Bridge over the Temd, that another Passage was made over the River by dead Carcasses. Nor was this all the Trouble King Stephen had; for about the same Time, many of the English out of Hatred to him, secretly invited David King of Scotland to revenge the Injuries done to the Empress Matilda; upon which he suddenly invaded the Frontiers, and took both Carlisle and Newcastle, which he fill'd with Garrisons. Against these King Stephen march'd with a powerful Army, and concerning this War there are divers Reports; yet all agree that in no long Time a Peace was concluded, by which David still enjoy'd Carlisle, and his Son Henry the Earldom of Huntington, for which he did Homage to King Stephen; but his Father refus'd to do the same, alledging, That he had already given his Faith to the Empress Matilda.

King Stephen returning in Peace, not long after fell into such a dangerous Fit of a Lethargy, that his Death was commonly believ'd and reported, which occasion'd great Troubles both in England and abroad; for by this his Friends were dishearten'd with Fears, and his Opposers grew more bold in declaring for the Empress. Hugh Bigot, one of the first Promoters of his Interest, now fortify'd himself in the Castle of Norwich, and himself refus'd to deliver it to any but the King, and with great Unwillingness to him: In Wales, Owen and Cadwalader, the Sons of Prince Gryffith, made furious Ravages, and carry'd great Booties from the English: Likewise in Normandy there began new Insurrections; for Geoffry Earl of Anjou, who in the Right of his Wife the Empress laid Claim to all, easily gain'd the Hearts and Endeavours of many to adhere to the true Heir, and possess'd himself of several Castles. But proceeding further, and entering upon the Territories of Talevaz, a Person of Note proscrib'd by King Stephen, the Normans so dislik'd that and some other of his Actions, that they sent for Theobald Earl of Bevis, King Stephen's Elder Brother, offering him both their Dukedom, and their Swords and Lives to defend him in it. Theobald coming to Luxonia, Robert Earl of Glocester, who was always ready to diminish King Stephen's Power, deliver'd the County of Falaise to him upon Composition; having himself carry'd no small Sums from thence out of King Henry's Treasury, and carefully and secretly watching all Opportunities to advance the Title and Designs of the Empress.

gland; but notwithstanding his Rage and Threats, he at length came to a Composition, and renounc'd his Claim for a Pension of two Thousand Marks per Annum. Likewise Earl Geoffry, whose Title by his Wife was better than both, finding himself over-match'd by the King's Power, Wealth and Confederates, submitted to Necessity, and for a Pension of five thousand Marks per Annum, suffer'd Stephen quietly to enjoy the Crown. Having remov'd these two great Obstacles, he hop'd to enjoy a peaceable Reign, when unexpected News was brought him, That England was in a Tumult, and that the factious Peers taking Advantage of his Absence, were up in Arms against him. Upon this, with the utmost Expedition he took Shipping for England in the midst of Winter, and even upon the Eve of Christ's Nativity besieg'd, and afterwards took the Castle of Bedford, garrison'd against him upon the Account of the Scots: About which Time David their King having enter'd Northumberland in the Behalf of Matilda, the ruder Sort of the Army too tragically reveng'd the Injuries of that Princess, by ripping up the Wombs of big-belly'd Women, and tossing their Infants upon the Points of Spears, slaying the Priests at the Altar, and dismembering the dead Bodies after a most inhuman manner.

King Stephen us'd all Expedition against these Barbarians, declaring, That it was no Policy to give an Hour's Rest to such Enemies, and accordingly he march'd directly into Scotland, from whence, after a small Revenge, he was hastily recall'd into England, by a great Defection of the Nobility, who by his Example and Proceedings had been sufficiently taught the Arts of Perjury. For these alledg'd that the King had violated his Oath concerning their Forests, and other Immunities of the Church and Common-wealth; but, as Malmesbury observes, these were but colourable Pretensions to cover their private Resentments for missing of such Castles, Commands and Preferments as they expected; looking upon the King as so much oblig'd to them, as not to deny them any Thing. To put a stop to these endless Importunities, he sometimes us'd Arguments, and at other times Promises and Rewards; but their Loyalty being built upon such ignoble Foundations, could not be of any long Continuance. The chief of their Party was Robert Earl of Glocester, now chief Counsellor to the Empress, who finding these particular Dislikes, and being excited by religious Men with the Fear of hazarding both his Reputation and future Happiness by his Neglect, he sent threatening Messages to King Stephen, charging him with the Breach of his Oath to his Sovereign Lady Matilda, and with drawing him and others into the like Perjury and Treason; upon which he declar'd Stephen an open Enemy to the State, and himself an open Enemy to Stephen. He soon strengthen'd his Party by the Conjunction of many Noblemen, among whom Milo, High Constable to the King, revolted and became a great Assistant to his Proceedings. Robert took in the Castle of Bristol, and secur'd that of Stede, and his Associates did the like in other Places; for William Talbot garrison'd the Castle of Hereford, William Lovel that of Carie, Paganell the Castle of Ludlow, William de Mount that of Dunestor, Robert de Nichol the Castle of Warram, Eustace Fitz-John the Castle of Meltune, William Fitz-Alain the Castle of Shrewsbury, and Wakelin the Castle of Doure. And thus those Forts which were erected to defend the Crown, first offended the King. Some few of which as he recover'd he demolish'd; often swearing He would not so easily lose his Crown, and admiring, What should induce them, who had so readily advanc'd him, so speedily to dethrone him. One fresh Motive to their Discontents was the King's seising on the Persons and Lands of some great Men, on a bare Suspicion of their Loyalty, and the extraordinary Favour he shew'd to William de Ypres and his Flemmings, whose Counsels he wholly follow'd. This last they interpreted as a Contempt of themselves and their Nation; therefore out of Anger and Disdain they sent to the Empress, declaring, That within five Months she should have the Kingdom at Command, according to their Oaths made to her Father.

These

These Commotions working in the Bowels of the Kingdom, gave David of Scotland a fair Opportunity to attack the Borders of it, which he did with great Ravages and Desolation in Northumberland: Against whom a considerable Army was sent, under the Command of Thurstan Arch-Bishop of York, whom the King had made his Lieutenant in the North; but being detain'd by Sick-ness from the Field, he appointed Ralph Bishop of the Orchades for his General, whose invective Oration had an extraordinary Effect upon the Army; and absolving all who should die in the Battel, the English became absolutely fearless, and press'd forwards with so much Force and Fury, that the Scots soon abandon'd their King, who still stood bravely to his Arms, 'till his best Friends urg'd him to desist. But his Son Henry esteeming Honour more than Life and Safety, rush'd in among his retiring Soldiers, and with undaunted Courage persuading them to regard themselves and his Person restor'd the Battel for a while; 'till at length being overpower'd by the main Body of the English, he was constrain'd to quit the Field with great Loss and Damage. With the like happy Success King Stephen proceeded against his disobedient Barons, and won from them the Castles of Hereford, Glocester, Webley, Bristol, Dudley and Shrewsbury; by which he so much weaken'd the Power of Earl Robert, that he was oblig'd to fly into France, resolving to procure his Sister the Empress to come over into England. These Domestick Obstacles being remov'd, the King resolv'd to prosecute the War in the North which Thurstan had happily begun; and first gaining the Castle of Leids, he march'd into Scotland, where in a short Time a Peace was concluded between the two Kings: And Stephen returning thence, brought the valiant Prince Henry with him into England, and at the Siege of Ludlow Castle, that adventurous Youth was by the Besieg'd pluck'd from his Horse with an Iron Grapple, and had been taken, had not King Stephen with extraordinary Valour and Honour, recover'd him, and won the Castle. In the same Year, a Synod was call'd at Westminster by Alberic the Pope's Legate; where, by all the Bishops in England, Theobald, Abbot of Bec in Normandy, was elected and consecrated Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, to the general Satisfaction of the Nation, since that Archbishoprick had been vacant above two Years.

II. King Stephen had now by his Valour and Vigilance rais'd himself to a high Pitch of Grandeur, and seem'd well establish'd in his Kingdom; but upon the Report of the Empress designing to come into England in Person, his Jealousie occasion'd him to commit an Error which gave him great Disturbance, and vastly weaken'd his Interest; and this was an unseasonable Breach between him and those Bishops who had set the Crown upon his Head, who were now too powerful to be crush'd at once. About this Time Roger Bishop of Salisbury had built two magnificent Castles, one at the Devises, another at Sherburn, beginning a third at Malmesbury, and a fourth at Salisbury; and likewise his Nephew Alexander Bishop of Lincoln had built a Castle at Newark, as he alledg'd, for the Safety and Dignity of his Bishoprick. Nigel Bishop of Ely, another Nephew of Bishop Roger, also imitated these in their Grandeur and Magnificence; so that these three seldom appear'd at the King's Court without vast Trains of armed Followers. All this rais'd great Envy among the Earls and Barons, who took occasion to infuse such jealous Thoughts into the King, that he judg'd himself unsafe 'till he had stripp'd them of their Power and Grandeur. He soon found an Opportunity in a grand Council held at Oxford, where the Retainers and Servants of the Bishop of Salisbury happen'd to contend with those of Alan Earl of Bretaign about securing of Lodgings, in which Contest many were wounded, and one Knight kill'd, but the Bishop's Men were Superior in the Conflict. The King taking advantage of this Riot, commanded the fore-mention'd Bishops to be conven'd, that they might satisfy the Court for their Servants Breach of the Peace, and the Satisfaction he requir'd, was no less than than the Delivering up their Castles into his Hands as a Security for their future Fidelity. They were willing to give Satisfaction; but upon debating whether they should yield up their Castles, he commanded that they should be kept close Prisoners, to prevent their Escape. The Bishop of Salisbury was carry'd unbound, and his Son Roger, the Chancellor of England whom he had by a Concubine, was carry'd in Fetters before the Castle of Devizes, which Nigel Bishop of Ely, who had escap'd thither from Oxford, held out against the King. By this severe Treatment the Castles of Sherburn, Salisbury and Malmesbury were surrender'd upon the first Summons; as was that of the Devizes, after three Days Siege. His other Nephew the Bishop of Lincoln purchas'd his Liberty by a speedy surrender of Sleaford Castle into the King's Hands. In the Castles of Sherburn and the Devizes the King found such vast Quantities of ready Money, that by sending a great Part of it to Lewis King of France, he not only obtain'd his Friendship, but also his Sister Constantia for his Son Prince Eustace, tho' the Marriage was not consummated 'till the following Year.

Upon which a Synod is call'd.

This Act of the King's occasion'd great Debates; Hugh Arch-Bishop of Rome, and his Advocate, was of Opinion, That Bishops might justly be depriv'd of those Castles which were not built by the Allowance of the Canons; that they ought to be Evangelists of Peace, not Creators of such Places as were Sanctuaries for their disloyal Practices. The King's Brother, the Bishop of Winchester and now the Pope's Legate, affirm'd, That if Bishops transgress'd, they were not to be try'd in the King's Court, but to be judg'd by the Canons, nor to be depriv'd of any Thing but in a publick Synod; and immediately summon'd the King his Brother to appear in the Council he intended to hold at Winchester on the 29th Day of August. At which Day appear'd most of the Bishops of England, with Theobald Arch-Bishop of Canterbury; where the Legate, after producing the Pope's Commission, in a Latin Speech aggravated the Fact of his Brother, in that he had seiz'd on the Persons of the Bishops, even under the Protection of his own Court; exhorting all present to consult what was needful to be done in this Exigency, and declaring, that he would put the Decree of the Council in Execution, tho' it was with the Loss of his Brother's Friendship, his own Estate, or his Life. The King not distrusting his Cause, sent some of the Earls into the Synod, to know why he was conven'd thither, to whom the Legate answer'd, That he was guilty of such a Crime as that Age never saw; and being himself a Christian, he ought not to take it amiss, if he was call'd by the Ministers of Christ to make Satisfaction; therefore if his Brother would take his Advice, he would do wisely to give an immediate Reason for this Action, or submit to the Judgment of the Canons. Upon which Alberic de Ver, a great Lawyer, soon after carry'd the King's Answer, and in Defence of his Master, urg'd many Things against the Bishops, as being Movers of Sedition, and Corresponders with the King's Enemies; That they were not seiz'd as Bishops, but as the King's Servants; and that they themselves surrender'd their Castles as a Composition for the Crimes they had committed. The Bishop of Salisbury deny'd that he was the King's Servant, and threaten'd, That if he could not find Justice in this Synod, he would seek it in a higher Court. The Legate said, That the Crimes of which the Bishops stood accus'd, ought to be prov'd in the Synod, before they could be sentenc'd; therefore the King ought first to reinvest them in their Possessions, otherwise whilst remaining disseiz'd, by the Law of Nations, they were not to plead. After many Allegations on both Sides, at the King's Request, the Cause was adjourn'd to the next Day, and to the next after that, 'till the Arrival of the Arch-Bishop of Rome; who granted, That the Bishops might have Castles, if the Canons allow'd them; but still urg'd the Necessity of the Times. To which Alberic de Ver added, That if they presum'd to send any Bishops or other Persons, to the Court of Rome, contrary to the King's Will, and the Dignity of the Kingdom, their Return would be very difficult. By this they understood that the

the King would not abide by the Censure of the Canons, and therefore the Bishops thought it best to forbear pronouncing it; first because it would be a rash Thing to excommunicate their Prince without the Knowledge of the Pope; secondly because they found that the Soldiers were ready to revenge it: Upon which the Synod was dissolv'd within three Days after it was call'd. Yet the Legate and Arch-Bishop, according to their Duty, threw themselves at the King's Feet, beseeching him to be merciful to the Church and his own Soul, and to consult his Reputation so as not to suffer a Breach to be made between the Secular and Ecclesiastical Governments. But comes to no Determination.

Malmsh. tales. &c. These Divisions between the King and the Bishops occasion'd many to rebel, and encourag'd the Empress to come over in Person, who with her Brother Robert landed at Arundel in September, with an inconsiderable Party of an hundred and forty Men; which Attempt is by Malmesbury compared to that of Julius Caesar, who with one Legion began the Conquest of the Roman Empire. They were kindly receiv'd by Adelisa the Queen Dowager, to whose Husband the Castle belong'd, and after a short Refreshment the Earl committing his Sister to the Care of her Mother-in-Law, march'd through the Enemy's Country as far as Bristol with only twelve Knights and Attendants. King Stephen was then employ'd in the Siege of Marlburgh Castle, but hearing of a more dangerous Enemy, he soon remov'd, and march'd towards Arundel; upon whose Approach Queen Adelisa, fearing her Castle should be taken and her self made a Prisoner, by a Message to the King, declar'd, That she was ready to take her Oath, That she was not the Occasion of the Landing of the Empress or her Adherents, nor had entertain'd them as his Enemies, but only as her near Relations and ancient Acquaintance. Upon which Message Stephen by an uncommon Strain of Generosity, caus'd the Empress, his great Rival, to be safely and honourably conducted to Bristol; where she remain'd for the Space of two Months, and then remov'd to Glocester; so that all those Parts, even to the Borders of Wales, partly by Force, and partly through Inclination, before the End of this Year submitted to the Empress. The Empress Matilda arrives in England.

Malmsh. &c. And now began all the Miseries of a Civil War, and we find nothing but taking and retaking of Towns and Castles, Plundering and Burning of Houses and Churches, and all the Marks of Trouble and Desolation. If any Earl or great Man injur'd or affronted another, both Parties frequently got together all their Knights that held of them, their other Tenants and poor Dependants, with all the Assistance of their Friends and Confederates, and burnt each others Castles and Houses, destroy'd their Lands and Territories, and carry'd away the Inhabitants Prisoners. And now there were in England so many Tyrants, as there were Lords of Castles, every one pretending to coin Money, and to exercise the Rights of Sovereignty; and to add to these Calamities, the King had with him great Numbers of Flemmings and Britains, who being accusom'd to live by Plundering, came into England to devour the Riches of the Land. In the mean Time Stephen perform'd all the Parts of a vigilant Commander, and closely besieg'd Matilda and her Brother in Wallingford Castle; but finding great Difficulties, and little Prospect of Success, he caus'd a remarkable Tower of Wood to be there erected, which he well furnish'd with Men and Ammunition, and then remov'd to the Siege of Malmesbury. At the same Time his Brother of Winchester, a valiant and politick Prelate, was no less industrious in his Behalf; for inviting several Noblemen to his Palace at Winchester, he detain'd them Prisoners, till he compell'd them to surrender their Forts and Castles to the King. In the mean Time Earl Robert took and plunder'd Worcester; Ralph Paine, in favour of the Empress, took and burnt the Town of Nottingham; and Ranulph Earl of Chester, joining with Robert, whose Daughter he had marry'd, gave continual Annoyance to the King, tho' he had receiv'd great Honours from his Hands. The Empress her self, the better to secure her own Person, and to give Access to her Friends, took up her Quarters A. D. 1140. Reg. 5. 6. A Civil War breaks out, with great Calamities.

But abandons King Stephen, as vigilant as the other was politick, march'd directly and be-sieg'd the City, where he had surpriz'd his greatest Enemy, had she not found Means to escape; so possessing himself of that Place, he reduc'd the whole Country to a peaceable Condition. Shortly after his Departure, Ranulph Earl of Chester with his Countess and Brother, coming to Lincoln to keep their Christ- mas, the Citizens knowing the King's Jealousies, sent secret Intelligence to him, That if he would surprize both these Brothers, he had now a fair Op- portunity. Upon which the King immediately after Christmas march'd thither with great Expedition; and while they, thus circumvented, stood on their Guard in the Castle, the Earl escap'd, and begg'd the Assistance of the Empress to rescue his Wife and Brother, who were now closely besieg'd. Earl Robert upon this Intelligence immediately join'd with Ranulph, and gather'd all their Forces to relieve their Friends in Lincoln; where resolutely wading through the River, upon Candlemas Day they appear'd in Order of Battel near the King's Camp. The King, tho' he was not strong in Numbers, was ready to receive them, and divided his Army, which consisted much of Flemmings, Britains and Normans, into three Bodies; which Method was also observ'd by the Earl of Glocester. Before this fatal Battel began, both Ranulph and Ro- bert made severe Invective Orations against the Nobility on the King's Side; which was answer'd by Baldwin-fitz-Gilbert, who was as severe upon those of the Empress's Party. Upon which a dreadful Contest began on both Sides, and for a while with equal Success; 'till in a short Time the Flemmings and the King's Cavalry fled; whereupon the Earl of Chester charg'd the King's Body of Foot, in whose Strength he repos'd his greatest Trust; but they being over-power'd by the Horse, began also to faint and fly, leaving the King inrag'd both at his Friends Cowardice and his Foes Success. It was a very strange Sight, says M. Paris, there to behold King Stephen, left almost alone in the Field, yet no Man daring to approach him, while grinding his Teeth and foaming like a furious Wild-Boar, with his Battel-Ax he drove whole Troops before him, to the eternal Renown of his Courage; so that if a hundred such had been with him, a whole Army had been unable to have taken him Prisoner. Yet as he was single, he held out, 'till first his Battel-Ax broke, and then his Sword flew in Pieces with the Force of his irresistible Strokes; and being weaponless, he was beaten down upon his Knees by a large Stone from an unknown Hand, which being seen by a valiant Knight call'd William de Kains, he ran in and took hold on the King's Helmet; yet he refus'd to surrender himself to any but the Earl of Glocester, who being near was call'd to take him Prisoner. The Earl preserv'd him from all Violence to his Person, and shortly after sent him Prisoner to the Empress at Glocester; from whence he was sent to Bristol Castle; where for a while he was kept in honourable Custody, but afterwards, either through Suspicion or Hatred, he was ingloriously fetter'd with Irons.

A great Bat-
tel at Lincoln,

The Empress
governs.

III. King Stephen now for a while lost all the Marks of Sovereignty and Grandeur, and the Empress having secur'd her most formidable Opposer, tri-umph'd in her Fortune, and as the sole Monarch of the Nation commanded in all Affairs, and dispos'd of all Dignities and Offices according to her own Pleasure.
Yet still she did not alter her Title of Empress, or Queen of the Romans, as appears from her Broad-Seal; under which she granted the Custody of the Tower of London to Geoffry de Mandevil and his Heirs, making Covenants with him, That she would not make Peace with the Citizens of London, without his Consent, because they were his mortal Enemies: But this Earl being afterwards accidentally apprehended in St. Albans, for his Liberty was oblig'd to surrender both the Tower of London and his other Castles to King Stephen.
Upon this great Success of the Empress, the State Men stood no longer for Ste- phen,

phen, but their Faiths turning with their Fortunes, they all paid Allegiance to her; the Kentish Men only excepted, where Stephen's Queen Matilda, and William de Ypres, maintain'd his Cause to the utmost of their Powers. Nor was King Stephen disappointed only of England, but also Normandy cast off his Subjection; for Geoffry of Anjou, Husband to the Empress, having Intelligence of the late Victory, induc'd the Normans to join in his Party, by publishing the Captivity of Stephen, now unable to relieve them or himself; and David King of Scotland was not backwards in setting forth the Claim of the Empress, and under that Pretence seiz'd upon the County of Northumberland.

Stephen declines.

During these Transactions the Empress to establish her Power repair'd to Winchester, where she swore to the Bishop, That if he and the Holy Church would receive her as their lawful Queen, he should order and direct all the great Affairs of the Nation, and dispose of all Bishopricks and Abbies. This was also promis'd by the Earl of Glocester and several of the Nobility; upon which the Bishop readily acknowledg'd her Queen of England, and with some of his Friends took an Oath, That as long as she made good her Promises, they would be faithful to her. And the next Day she was receiv'd into the Cathedral with a pompous Procession, in Company with many Bishops, Abbots, Barons and Knights; where the Legate curs'd those who curs'd Her, and bless'd those who bless'd Her; absolving the Obedient, and excommunicating the rest. From Winchester she went with the Court to Wilton, where she kept her Easter with a mighty Conflux of People; and was recogniz'd by Theobald Arch-Bishop of Canterbury. Shortly after a General Synod of the Clergy was summon'd at Winchester under the Legate, who after private and separate Conferences with the Bishops, Abbots and Arch-Deacons, made a publick Speech, setting forth the Cause of this Assembly, which was to consult of the Peace of the Country, insisting upon the flourishing State of the Kingdom under King Henry; who many Years since had receiv'd an Oath of England and Normandy, for the Succession of his Daughter and her Issue: That she delaying her Coming into England at the Time of his Death; for the Peace of the Nation his Brother was admitted to the Throne. Tho' he had been a Pledge between God and him That he should honour the Church, and maintain righteous Laws; yet with Grief and Shame he could but mention his Misbehaviour: The Peace of the Nation was destroy'd, and no Punishment inflicted upon Criminals; Bishops were imprison'd, and oblig'd to surrender their Possessions; Abbies were sold, and Churches pillag'd; the Counsel of Ill Men was follow'd, and the Advice of Good Men despis'd. That he had conven'd him before a Synod, but had gain'd nothing but Hatred; He ought indeed to love his Mortal Brother, but much more his Immortal Father: Therefore, added he, seeing God has exercis'd his Judgments, by letting him fall into the Hands of powerful Men, lest the Kingdom should be lost for want of a Governor, I have call'd you hither by my Legantine Power. Yesterday the Cause was propounded in private to the greatest Part of the Clergy of England, to whom of Right it belongs to Elect and Ordain a King; and therefore, after invoking the Divine Assistance, we Elect Matilda Queen of England, the Daughter of the peaceable, glorious and incomparable King Henry.

in which the Empress is declar'd Queen.

All that were present assented, or by their Silence would not contradict what was done. The Legate also told them, That he had summon'd the Citizens of London, and expected them the next Day. Accordingly they came, and being brought into the Council, declar'd That they came from the Community of London, not to raise any Debates or Contests, but to petition that their Lord the King might be releas'd out of Prison; which was the earnest Desire of all the Barons, and great Men lately receiv'd into their Community. The Legate answer'd at large, and with a Grace, That it became not the Londoners, who were esteem'd as Noblemen in England, to join with such Barons as had forsaken their King in Battel, render'd the holy Church contempti- ble, and favour'd them only for their own Advantage. Upon which a Chaplain of King Stephen's Queen, offer'd a Letter from her to the Legate, which because he refus'd to communicate to the Assembly, the Chaplain with great Confidence read it himself, in which the Queen earnestly begg'd of the Clergy, particularly the Bishop of Winchester, her Lord's Brother, to restore him to the Kingdom, whom his wicked Subjects had cast into Prison. To which the Legate gave such an Answer as he had given to the Londoners; who after a Consultation, said, They would communicate the Resolution of the Council to their Fellow-Citizens, and comply with it as far as they could. This done, many of the King's Party were excommunicated, particularly William Martel, his Steward, whose Advice he had follow'd in many Things; and so after three Days Session only, the Council was dissolv'd. From Wilton the Empress went to Reading, where with a great Multitude, Robert D'oyly came and offer'd her the Castle of Oxford; which she receiv'd with the Homage of that City, and the Country round about. From thence she went to the famous Monastery of St. Albans, where many of the London Citizens met her, and treated about delivering the City to her; to which Place she repaired, thinking her self safe in the Company of so many Bishops and Barons. At Westminster he was receiv'd with a magnificent Procession, and stay'd there some Days to give Directions and Orders about the State and Affairs of the Kingdom.

She comes to London.

The Empress thus establish'd, all now esteem'd her as Fortune's Darling, and beheld her as their only rising Sun; and had her Discretion been equal to her Resolution, she might have reign'd many Years in Prosperity. For now the Prison Walls had obscur'd and defac'd all the Virtues and Favours of the unfortunate Stephen, whose sorrowful Queen Matilda incessantly solicited the Empress in her Husband's Favour, desiring his Liberty, but not his Crown, which she should freely enjoy; and thereupon offer'd many great Persons for Pledges, who gave their Faith for him, That from thenceforward he should devote himself to a religious Solitude, becoming either a Monk or a Pilgrim. All which she rejected with great Haughtiness, and with but little better Grace refus'd the Legate Bishop of Winchester, when he only desir'd that his Nephew Eustace might enjoy his Father's Honours and Lands in Normandy. The Londoners likewise having lately acknowledg'd her for Queen, thought they might have whatever they desired, and became Petitioners to her, That she would mitigate the over hard Laws of her Father, and put those of King Edward in full Force. This she absolutely deny'd; which being in an unsettled State, prov'd very impolitick and pernicious. For first Stephen's Queen Matilda sent to her Son Eustace, That their Suits must be obtain'd only by War; urging him to strengthen his Party by the Assistance of the Kentish Men: Several of the Nobility also repin'd, that they were so slightly regarded, or rather rejected; and the Londoners inrag'd at this last Repulse, endeavour'd to make the Empress their Prisoner, and so redeem Stephen, who had chiefly their Affections; but she hearing of the Design, fled secretly in the Night, and retired to Oxford, which in all her Difficulties she ever found true to her, out of Love both to her Cause, and the Memory of her Father. At the same Time the Bishop of Winchester's high Mind not bearing the Denial of his Suit, upon secret Conferences with Stephen's Queen, by her sorrowful Entreaties began to melt in his Affection towards the distressed King his Brother; and at length resolv'd to assist him to the utmost, and absolv'd all those whom before he had excommunicated, alledging, That the Barons had kept their Faith with the Empress, but she had done otherwise with them: And thinking it now Time to stand up for his Brother, he solicited the discontented Londoners in his favour, and stored the Castles of Waltham, Fernham and Winchester with Men and Ammunition.

She disoblige the Citizens and others.

She retires to Oxford.

In the mean Time the Empress hasten'd to Gloucester to confer with her great Friend Milo, and soon after returning to Oxford, was there solely maintain'd

at his Charge, having no Subſiſtance of her own; to requite which Fidelity and other Services, ſhe there created him Earl of Hereford. Having gather'd a conſiderable Force together, ſhe march'd directly to Wincheſter, accompany'd with her Uncle David King of Scotland, her Brother Robert, and many of the Nobility; and arriving at the City, ſhe ſent for the Biſhop, whoſe Intereſt ſhe much deſired, to come to her with all Speed. But he thinking it not ſafe, return'd an equivocal Answer, That he would prepare himſelf, as if he deſign'd to follow them; and ſo iſſuing privately out of the City immediately prepar'd himſelf to work her Ruin: For getting the Aſſiſtance of Queen Matilda and her Son Euſtace, the Londoners and William de Ypres, he made good his Party; himſelf and Friends remaining in the City, while the Empreſs and her Nobility defended themſelves in the Caſtle, without daring to go forth among ſo many Enemies. And ſhortly after, knowing the Citizens to be better affected to the Empreſs than himſelf, to gratifie his revengeful Temper, he commanded the City to be ſet on Fire, by which the great Nunnery, the Convent of St. Grimbald, above twenty Churches, and the greateſt Part of the City was conſum'd to Aſhes. Seven Weeks being ſpent in the Siege and Counter-Siege of the City and Caſtle, the Empreſs under great Troubles and Reſtraints, deſir'd to change her Quarters; and with no ſmall Difficulty march'd out with her Brother Earl Reginald, and many other Friends, beſides Earl Robert, who brought up the Rear with two hundred undaunted Followers. She was immediately follow'd by the King's Forces, and many of her Men ſlain and taken Priſoners; but ſhe by good Fortune eſcap'd to the Caſtle of Lutgurſhal, and from thence to the Deviſes; where finding that ſhe was ſtill in Danger, according to Brompton and others, ſhe was oblig'd to be carry'd to Gloceſter in a common Coffin or Heſe, like a dead Corps; in which ſhe had good Occaſion to reflect upon the Chains ſhe had put upon her Rival Stephen. But her Brother Earl Robert met with worſe Fortune, who while he was more careful in providing for her Safety than his own, was taken Priſoner, and brought back to Wincheſter, where he was preſented by the Biſhop to Queen Matilda, who committed him to the Cuſtody of William de Ypres, and for more Security ſent him to Rockeſter: But others taking Sanctuary in the Nunnery of Warwell, were burnt, together with the Place. Robert, ſtill undaunted in his Miſfortunes, tho' he was tempted by Promiſes and urg'd by Threats to deſert his Siſter's Cauſe, yet nothing would prevail with him; nor would he enter into any Treaty for his own Release, without her Conſent, or to her Prejudice. But within the Space of ſix Months, the King and he were both exchange'd upon equal Terms; ſo that each Party was left at liberty to purſue the War with as great Eagerneſs as ever.

Not long after the Biſhop of Wincheſter proceeded in his Deſign to ruin the Empreſs, and by his Legantine Authority ſummon'd a Synod to meet at Weſtmiſter; where the Pope's Letters to him were openly read, in which he blam'd him for ſo little endeavouring to reſtore his Brother, exhorting him to uſe all Power both Eccleſiaſtical and Secular to effect it. King Stephen alſo in this Council complain'd, That his Subjects, to whom he had never deny'd Juſtice, had imprisond, and reproachfully treated him to his great Affliction. Upon which the Legate by his Rhetorick endeavour'd to juſtifie his own Proceedings, alledging, That he had receiv'd the Empreſs by Compulſion, not Choice; and when the King's Army was routed, and his Nobility fled, ſhe with her Adherents came to Wincheſter; and whatever Promiſes ſhe made there, ſhe had wilfully broke. He further urg'd, That ſhe and her Friends had contriv'd to deprive him both of his Dignity and Life, but God had defeated her Deſigns; and the King his Brother being now freed from his Imprisonment, he commanded them on the behalf of God and the Pope, that they would aſſiſt him with their whole Power, Who was anointed by the Will of the People, and Aſſent of the Apoſtolick See; and that he would excommunicate all Diſturbers of the publick Peace, that favour'd the Cauſe of the Empreſs. gate's Words were not very grateful to all the Clergy, tho' none reply'd, but out of Fear and Reverence kept silence; only one Lay-Messenger from the Empress boldly forbid the Legate, by the Fealty he had sworn to the Empress, to act any Thing contrary to her Honour or Interest, adding, That she came into England by his Invitation, and that her imprisoning the King was by his Approbation. All this, and much more, which he urg'd against the Legate with great Sharpness, could not move him to return any Answer, or to shew any Passion, much less to desist from his late Designs.

A. D. In the following Year Earl Robert, fearing the King's Power and his Sister's Declension, went into Normandy to solicit her Husband Geoffry for her Assistance. But that Earl having Troubles with his own Nobility, and the Normans being scarcely brought to Subjection, thought it not convenient to leave his Country; therefore he only sent some Forces with Robert, and with them his young Son Prince Henry into England. The Empress in his Absence had strongly fortify'd her self in Oxford, whom King Stephen follow'd with an eager Pursuit, and won the Suburbs to the City Gates; and resolving not to desist till he had got her in his Possession, he so closely besieg'd her, that for two Months whatsoever Strength or Stratagem could perform on either Side was there put in practice. Till at length Want made the Besieg'd think of a Surrender; upon which the Empress was once more forc'd to make use of Policy, and to take Advantage of the Sharpness of the Winter, when the River Thames was cover'd with Ice and Snow. Being reduc'd to Extremity, she undertook a dangerous Attempt; for cloathing her self, and a select Company with white Linnen Garments, to deceive the Eyes of the Sentinels, she issu'd secretly by Night out of a Postern Gate, and passing the frozen River ran on Foot through Ice, Snow, Ditches and Vallies for five Miles, as far as Abington, with the Snow still driving in their Faces; and there taking Horse, the same Night recover'd the Castle of Wallingford, to the great Joy and Admiration of that Garrison. In the mean Time Earl Robert, and Prince Henry had besieg'd and taken the Castle of Warham, hoping to divert the King from the Siege of Oxford; but soon after hearing of the strange Escape of the Empress, he came with young Henry to his Mother, whose Sight made her forget the many Troubles she had endur'd. Here Malmesbury, the most judicious and considerable of the Monkish Writers, concludes his History, being patroniz'd by Robert Earl of Glocester.

A. D. In the Beginning of the next Year, King Stephen was present at a Synod in London, which was held by the Legate Bishop of Winchester, in which it was ordain'd, 'That whoever laid violent Hands upon one in Holy Orders, should not be absolv'd, but by the Pope himself, and then only in his Presence. Which last Clause to a former Decree made in the Reign of King Henry, render'd the Persons of all Ecclesiasticks for the future inviolable. This was a most seasonable Ordinance for the Clergy, for now daily Devastations and Outrages were committed in all Parts, and a dismal Civil War was carry'd on for several Years in this Nation. Of this we have but a short and slender Account: We find that Oxford was surrender'd to the King upon Conditions, and that Wilton was fired by Earl Robert. Then the Tower of London, with the Castles of Walden and Pleeses, and afterwards that of Lincoln were yielded to Stephen; the Castles of Warham and Portland submitted to the Empress: The Earls of Chester and Essex were surpriz'd by the King; and his Favourite William Martel was taken and imprison'd by Robert. Thus about four Years pass'd with Variety of Success, and every Year on each Side produc'd fresh Calamities, to the infinite Damage of the whole Kingdom, and mostly to the strengthening and encreasing King Stephen's Interest. For during this Time, the two famous Earls, Robert of Glocester, and Milo of Hereford, Men of great Abilities and unshaken Fidelity to the Empress, both lost their Lives, one by a Distemper, and the other by an Accident. IV. Upon the Departure of the Empress, King Stephen began to take fresh Courage, and caus'd several of the Barons to swear Allegiance to his Son Eustace; by which Compliment he suppos'd all Things had been secure on his Side. In the same Year he repair'd to Lincoln, and for a while kept his Court there; and to shew his Grandeur, wore his Crown at the Christmass Solemnity, which no King before him durst undertake to do in that City, being deterr'd by a certain superstitious Prophecie, foretelling Death, or some extraordinary Misfortune to any Prince who attempted it, which the King not regarding, is therefore by our Historians commended for his Courage. In this Year also, or the next, Pope Eugene in a Council held at Rheims, without the Consent of the greatest Part of his Cardinals, solemnly depriv'd William Arch-Bishop of York, because he had been nominated by the King before he was canonically elected, and the Chapter of York commanded to make a new Election, which fell upon Henry Murdac Abbot of the Monastery of Fountains; and William was oblig'd to retire to Henry Bishop of Winchester, who maintain'd him 'till the Death of the said Pope.

While King Stephen thought himself secure in his Throne, Prince Henry, now about sixteen Years of Age, resolv'd to make one Attempt more for a Crown, and accordingly came over into England with a small but select Army; to whom were join'd the discontented Earl of Chesler, Roger Son of the deceas'd Milo, with many Knights and valiant Men of the English. Henry soon march'd into the North, and met with his Coten David King of Scotland, by whom he was most honourably receiv'd, and solemnly knighted. From that Time he sought all Occasion to provoke both Stephen and his Son Eustace; and having settled some Affairs with his chief Counsellors for the Pursuit of his Designs in England, he return'd into Normandy, to transact some other Business that might be available to these Ends. Where he stay'd not long before his Father Geoffry dy'd, and left him in Possession both of the Dukedom of Normandy and the Earldom of Anjou. And to add to his growing Greatness, in the eighteenth Year of his Age, he marry'd the fam'd Eleanor, Dutches of Guienne and Aquitain, who had lately been divorc'd from Lewis King of France for Consanguinity and Suspicion of Adultery, after she had born him two Daughters. Lewis now fearing Issue made by this Marriage, to the disinheriting of his said Daughters, was highly incens'd with Duke Henry; and Stephen also fearing his Greatness, having now the Provinces of Normandy, Anjou, Guienne, Aquitain and Poitou, both of them sought all Methods to diminish his Power. Lewis with Prince Eustace oppos'd him in foreign Parts, and Stephen in England; where to secure the Succession, he endeavour'd to invest Prince Eustace with the English Diadem, in order to cut off all Hopes from Duke Henry. And calling a grand Council at London, King Stephen commanded Theobald Arch-Bishop of Canterbury to crown his Son Eustace, which he absolutely refus'd, alledging, That the Pope had forbidden him to crown him, whose Father had contrary to his Oath usurp'd the Kingdom. At which Repulse, the King shut up all the Bishops with their Primate in one House; but the latter made his Escape, and fled into Normandy, which intirely defeated the King's Designs. But to be reveng'd on him for this Disappointment, he seiz'd on all his Lands and Possessions.

King Stephen, finding his Title now question'd by the Church, who had before establish'd it, resolv'd to make it good by the Sword; and winning the Castle of Newberry, fortify'd Malmesbury, and laid close Siege to Wallingford; against which he erected the Castle of Cranmerse, to hinder all Communication. King Stephen hastning to their Succour, encamp'd near the Enemy, and being ready to give Battel, the Winter Storms prevented him; but soon after, while the King at the Head of his Army was giving Orders for a Battel, his Horse mounted thrice with his fore Legs, 'till at last he fell down backwards, to the great Hazard of the King's Person. Upon which William Earl of Arundel, a brave and eloquent Man, took occasion to exhort the King To be warn'd by these ill Omens, and not to expect any Success against the juster Cause; and that there were so many near Relations and Friends set against each other, that they could not engage without a great and unnatural Effusion of Blood; therefore he ought to send Messengers to the Duke to treat of a Peace. Upon which Advice it was resolv'd to come to a Parly, which was signify'd to Duke Henry; who being warm and ready for Battel, could hardly moderate his youthful Ardour; yet by the Importunity of his Friends he yielded to an Interview with the King near Wallingford, where the River Thames being narrow, they could discourse together from the opposite Banks. After a long and private Conference, they both return'd to their Camps, and soon after agreed to a Cessation of all Hostilities.

The Duke goes into Normandy.

But Eustace the King's Son was highly disoblig'd by this Treaty, which he knew would end to his Prejudice, and leaving the Court in a Passion, march'd into Cambridgeshire, and then into Suffolk; where coming to the Abby of St. Edmund's-Bury, he was treated with all Respect, but not receiving Mony which he demanded for his Soldiers, he order'd them to seize upon all the Corn belonging to the Abby; but sitting down to Dinner, upon the first Bit he eat, he fell into a Frenzy, and expir'd in a little Time. He was eighteen Years of Age, born to be never out of the Calamities of War, and was bury'd at Fever-sham with his Mother Matilda, who deceas'd a little before, without any real Injoyment of a Crown. Stephen began to find the Punishments of Heav'n in these great Losses, and upon the expiring of the Truce, many fell from him, and many Castles were lost, as Bertnell, Reading, Warwick, Stamford and others. And under these Afflictions he was more inclinable to a Peace, which was much promoted by Arch-Bishop Theobald; and also Henry of Winchester, who by making his Brother King had brought such Miseries upon the Nation, now stricken with Remorse, contributed his utmost Assistance to this great Work. Upon which a grand Council was summon'd both by the King and Duke to meet at Winchester, consisting of all the great Men of either Party, who were joyfully receiv'd with a solemn Procession; and there in the Presence of infinite Multitudes the King led the Duke by the Hand, and then a Peace was concluded on these Conditions: 'First that Stephen should enjoy the Crown of England during Life: Secondly, upon his Decease, Henry should succeed him as his Lawful Heir. Then the King adopted the Duke for his Son, and at the same time pay'd him Reverence, and acknowledg'd him as a Father and Lord; and Earl William, the King's only surviving lawful Son, at his Father's Command did Homage to the Duke. After these Things were solemnly perform'd, and ratify'd by the mutual Oaths of the King, Bishops and Temporal Lords, a firm Peace, which for many Years had been banish'd from the Nation, was happily restor'd. The Duke was receiv'd, with the King, at London, at Oxford, at Canterbury, and other Places, with all Demonstrations of Joy; but the Duke's Pleasures were interrupted by a Conspiracy against his Person by certain Flemings; but just upon the Execution, William the King's Son, who was concern'd in it, falling from his Horse upon Burham Down, broke his Leg, and for Want of a Leader the Design fail'd. However it occasion'd the Duke to take his final Leave of the King, and pass over into Normandy, where after a Year's Absence he was joyfully receiv'd by his Mother, Wife and all his Subjects.

King Stephen now had a fair Prospect of reaping all the Pleasures that a Crown in Peace could afford him, and accordingly us'd all laudable Methods for the repairing the Ruins of the Kingdom; but God thought fit to allow him but a short Enjoyment of that Crown he so unjustly acquired, and after he had punish'd him with the Loss of all Hopes of the Succession in his Family, he took him out of this World upon the 25th Day of October, after a calamitous Reign of eighteen Years, nine Months, and seventeen Days. He was near fifty Years of Age, and dy'd of his old Distemper the Emroids, accompany'd with Iliack Pains, being bury'd by his Wife and Son at Feverham in the Abby Church of that Monastery which he himself had founded. As to his Character he had undoubtedly many princely Qualities, as Valour, Affability, and Generosity both to his Friends and Enemies; but at the same Time he was unmeasurably ambitious, resolving to be no Slave to his Word or Oath, which brought vast Calamities upon him and others. Yet he shew'd signal Marks of Devotion, particularly in the Founding the Abbies of Cogshall in Essex, of Furness in Lancashire, Feverham in Kent, and the Nunneries of Carew and Higham. Setting aside his Ambition and unjust Title, he was an excellent Prince; none burthening their Subjects with fewer Taxes, nor governing with greater Clemency; and notwithstanding the many Insurrections, he is said never to have put one Man to Death. The Custom of holding the splendid Assemblies or Curia at the three great Festivals, which in the former Reign began to languish, by reason of the unsettled Times was now wholly laid aside. These Times of Confusion also gave the Pope and Clergy great Opportunities to encroach upon the Regal Power, and to introduce new Laws, Usages and Customs. Particularly the Pope's Canon Law was now first brought into the Nation; which was compil'd into a Code or Body by Gratian, and publish'd by Pope Engene in the Year 1151. The Occasion of bringing it hither was a great Contest between the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Winchester; which brought over Lawyers from Rome, together with their Law, Vacarius being the first Professor of it in Oxford.

I. THE Miseries of the late Civil Wars had so conquer'd the Spirit of ^{M.} Ambition in the Land, that tho' Stephen left a Son behind him, ^{&c.} who wanted not a considerable Interest, Duke Henry found an easy and uninterrupted Accession to the Throne of England. 'Tho' he was a French Man by Birth, he came to the Crown neither unexpected, nor undesired; for the Opinion of the Nation, and the Hopes conceiv'd of his future Government, had the Force to keep England in an intire Obedience above six Weeks without the Presence of a King; whose Entrance, like that of the Soul into the Body, did immediately invigorate the whole Kingdom. He was soon after his Arrival solemnly crown'd King at Westminster, together with Eleanor his Queen, by Theobald Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, on the nineteenth Day of December, with the loud Acclamations of all the People, being now about twenty one Years of Age. He was surnam'd Plantagenet, that is Planta Genesta, or Broom Plant; and being Son of the Empress, who was Grand-Daughter to Queen Margaret the Sister of Edgar Etheling, in him the Royal Line of the old English Saxons was restored. He was not only the nearest Heir to the Crown, after his Mother's Decease, but was also the most powerful Monarch that had hitherto sat upon the English Throne; being, besides England and Normandy, possess'd of a great Part of France before recited.

In order to restore a ruinous and wasted Country, he began with demolishing several Castles, which had been the Nests of Rebellion, and resum'd others to his own Use, and likewise such Lands and Estates as had been alienated from the Crown, as the unjust Reward of those who withstood his Title. Others write, that he promiscuously resum'd all such Lands, as were by a set Number of Jurors found at any Time to have belong'd to the Crown. He reduc'd some Noblemen unduly created to a private Condition, and clear'd the Nation of Foreign Soldiers; especially from the Flemmings, whose mercenary Swarms had been most burdensome to the Land, and pernicious to his Cause. Then to preserve good Government, he chose a Body of Counsellors out of the most eminent of the Clergy and Laity; as Theobald Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, Thomas Becket, Arch-Deacon of the same See, whom he made Chancellor of England, as also John of Oxford, with divers other Prelates; of the Laity he had Robert Earl of Leicester, chief Justiciary of England, Richard de Lucie, Jocelin de Bailull, Alan de Nevile, and others; but in his Cabinet Council, he had his Mother the Empress, now one of the most experienc'd Ladies of the Age. Thus furnish'd, he assembled a Council or Parliament at Wallingford, where he caus'd the whole Kingdom to swear to the Succession of his two young Sons William and Henry, the former dying not long after; and here he confirm'd the Laws of St. Edward, and the ancient Customs of the Kingdom, and likewise granted a short Charter of Liberties, which in Substance is a bare Confirmation of all that his Grand-father Henry I. had granted. These hopeful Beginnings of so young a King were as grateful to the Quiet and Peaceable, as they were unpleasant to the Wicked and Rapacious; who were now either forc'd to leave the Country, or put on the Appearance of Honesty; by which Means all Men quietly enjoy'd the Fruits of a long desired Peace.

King Henry having settled his Affairs in England to his Satisfaction, hasten'd into France to King Lewis, where he did Homage to him for Normandy, Aquitain, Anjou, Main and Tourain; which were partly his own Patrimony, and partly the Inheritance of Eleanor his Queen. But his Brother Geoffry having a just Title to the Earldom of Anjou, by his Father's Will, held out that Country against him. Yet Henry, tho' he himself had sworn to obey his Father's Will, never regarded it; but procuring Pope Adrian to dispense with his Oath, by Force he unjustly dispossest his Brother of all his Territories, and oblig'd him to accept of an Annuity of a thousand Pounds English, and two thousand more of Anjouvin Mony; which in the third Year was ended by the Death of Geoffry. After this Success King Henry return'd into England, and at Chester he contracted a Friendship with Malcolm King of Scotland, upon the same Terms with his Grand-father Henry; upon which Malcolm surrender'd the City of Carlisle, Newcastle upon Tine, and that of Bamborough, and King Henry restored to him the Earldom of Huntington in England.

In the following Year he and his Queen were again crown'd at Worcester upon Easter Sunday; and coming to the Oblation, they there devoutly offer'd up their Crowns at the High-Altar, vowing never to wear them after, which they strictly observ'd. The Rise of Thomas Becket.

He is made Arch-Bishop of Canterbury.

II. King Henry, in the midst of his Prosperity and Grandeur, began now to be exceedingly disturb'd and perplex'd, by a famous Contelt between him and Thomas Becket; a Man of an aspiring Temper, and invincible Resolution, who by Birth was a Londoner, and by Profession a Civilian. Being in holy Orders, he was made Arch-Deacon of Canterbury, and then advanc'd to be Lord Chancellor of England, in which high Station he carry'd himself like a Sovereign King; and in the late Wars between the Kings of England and France, besides his own Retinue, he maintain'd seven hundred Knights or Horse-men, and also twelve thousand others of less Quality, with four thousand mercenary Footmen for one Month; and tho' he was a Clerk, he tilted with a French Knight, dismounted him, and gain'd his Horse. Upon the Death of Theobald Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, tho' the Monks objected against Becket, as being a Courtier and a Soldier, yet in the Year 1162 the King gave him that Arch-Bishoprick, partly in Reward of former Services, and partly in Hopes of greater to come. But immediately after his Consecration, he not only resign'd his Office of Chancellor, returning his Seal to the King, but also wholly chang'd his former Course of Life, put on a severe rigid Monk's Habit, liv'd an austere Life, alter'd and order'd his Family accordingly; and contrary to the King's Expectations, withdrew himself from his Obedience and Service

Service, and oppos'd him in many Things. The grand Contest was concerning the Regal and Pontifical Authority, and was first disputed upon the Account of the numerous Abuses and Corruptions of the Church Men, who were then grown to a dangerous Height; of which Newburg, who liv'd in these Times, gives us this Account. It was declar'd in the King's Presence, That the Clergy had committed above a hundred Murthers during his Reign, which highly provoking the King, he was somewhat too violent in punishing them; for which the Prelates ought to be blam'd, in giving so great an Occasion. For whereas the Canons ordain'd that Clerks for inferior, as well as heinous Offences, should be degraded, and thousands of such were then in the Church, like much Chaff among a little good Corn; yet very few for many Years had been depriv'd. The Prelates, while they rather strove to support the Liberties and Dignities of the Clerks, than to punish and exterminate their Vices, thought they were serviceable to God and the Church, in protecting such heinous Offenders from publick Punishment, whom by the Duty of their Places they ought to correct; by which Liberty and Impunity, they fear'd not God, whose Judgments they thought far distant, nor Men in Authority; since on the one Side their Prelates neglected to reform them, and on the other, they were by their Order exempt from Temporal Jurisdiction.

The Corruptions of the Church-Men.

Not seen. Hoveden.

This being the State of the Church and Kingdom, in which some were so injur'd without Remedy, and others so injurious without Restraint, as if neither Sort were in the Condition of Subjects; the King, out of his Wisdom and Zeal, took particular Care to revive the publick Discipline, and the Power of the ancient Laws, which thus lay neglected. To which End he had settled select Ministers of Justice in all Parts of the Land; and upon Complaints brought him of the Remissness, and other Defects of his Judges, he by his Princely Care apply'd Remedies, and punish'd the Delinquents. The like Remissness was complain'd of in his Ecclesiastical Judges; occasion'd by a Murther, committed by a Priest of Sarum Diocese, whom the Arch-Bishop order'd to be depriv'd and shut up in a Monastery, by which he was freed from a more deserv'd Punishment, design'd by the King's Justiciaries. With which, and some other like Affronts from the Arch-Bishop, the King was highly displeas'd, as seeing all Things tend to the Ruin of Regal Government, which he desired might be employ'd to the Impartial Administration of Justice to all his Subjects.

The King endeavours to reform them.

The Arch-Bishop on the other Side, shew'd himself no less violent for the Immunities of his Clergy and See; and proceeded so far as to challenge from the Crown the Custody of Rockester Castle and other Forts, which the King for the Security of his Kingdom had resum'd into his own Hands. The Sum of the Controversie between the Crown and the Mitre is thus deliver'd by Hoveden: The King expected That all such of the Clergy as were taken in Robbery, Murther, Felony, and the like Crimes, should be try'd and adjudg'd in his Temporal Courts, as Lay-Men were: Against which the Arch-Bishop's Resolution was, That all Clergy-Men so offending should be try'd only in the Spiritual Courts, by Men of their own Order, and upon Conviction, should at first only be depriv'd of their Office and Benefice; but after they were thus degraded, upon a fresh Offence, they should be judg'd at the King's Pleasure.

Becket opposes him.

The Sum of the Controversie.

Not seen. Hoveden.

The King finding himself thus depriv'd of one Half of his Sovereignty, and that Becket could not be mollify'd either by the remembrance of old Favours, or the Power of fresh Persuasions; notwithstanding he resolv'd to put nothing in Execution, but what was first ratify'd and confirm'd by his Bishops, of whose ready Assent to all just Demands, he had no Reason to doubt. Therefore at an Assembly at Westminster the King shew'd his Resentments against the Arch-Bishop's Behaviour, and took an Occasion to establish several Articles, which he call'd his Grand-father's Customs, much to the Detriment of the Papal and Ecclesiastical Authority. The Points in those Ordinances, which the Arch-Bishop condemn'd, and set down in his Letters to the Pope, and his own Suffragan Bishops, were principally these: 1. That none should appeal to the See of Rome for any Cause whatsoever, without the King's Licence. 2. That it should not be lawful for any Arch-Bishop or Bishop to leave the Nation and go to the Pope, upon his Summons, without the King's Licence. 3. That no Bishops should excommunicate any one holding of the King in chief, or put any other of his Officers under Interdict, without his Licence. 4. That all criminal Clerks should be try'd before secular Judges. 5. That the Laity, whether the King or others, should hold Pleas of Churches, and Tithes, &c. These Ordinances were peremptorily urg'd to the Arch-Bishop and all the Bishops, who answer'd; That they willingly consented to them, saving in all Things their Order, and the Rights of the Church. This Answer highly displeasing the King, caus'd him to remove suddenly to Woodstock, to which Place the Bishops follow'd him, earnestly persuading the Arch-Bishop to comply, as they already had done. At first he was immoveable, but at length overcome by the Importunities of the Bishops of Chichester and Hereford, he assented to acknowledge the King's Laws without that Saving Clause, which had given so much Offence. At which the King seem'd satisfy'd for the present; however he resolv'd to have all their Consents ratify'd in a grand Council of the whole Kingdom.

Opposition.

To this End, that he might better assert the Rights of the Crown, he call'd a Parliament at Clarendon in Wiltshire, where he propounded to the Bishops and Secular Barons many ancient Regular Customs and Laws, which he expected the Bishops to recognize, as the ancient Rights of the Crown; which Laws, being the same with those before-mention'd, have commonly been call'd The Constitutions of Clarendon. All the Prelates gave a verbal Consent to these, but being requir'd to put their Seals to them, the Arch-Bishop utterly refus'd; yet at length the Earls of Cornwall and Leicester, with other Persons of Quality by Tears, Importunities and Arguments persuaded him to comply with the King's Pleasure. So that both the Arch-Bishop, and all the Bishops consented to these Laws, and recogniz'd them under their Seals; and the King afterwards sent them to the Pope to be confirm'd, who not only rejected them, but utterly condemn'd them. Shortly after the Arch-Bishop began to be severely afflicted, and repented of this Act, making his Body suffer a hard Penance for it; and he thought it so heinous an Offence, and so great a Pollution, that he was not fit to say Mass, or appear before the Altar; and therefore he suspended himself from that Service, till by Confession and Penance he obtain'd the Pope's Absolution. During the Controversie, the Pope being in France, sent over Rotred Arch-Bishop of Raven to compose these Differences; but the King would not hearken to him, unless the Pope would first consent to confirm his Laws by his Bull. And when he saw he could not obtain it, he sent two of his Chaplains to prevail with the Pope to constitute Roger Arch-Bishop of York his Legate throughout England, so that he might confound and mortifie Becket. But neither did this Project succeed; for the Pope knowing that Becket's Cause was his own, would not be the Author of any Damage to so faithful a Servant; yet to gratifie the King, he granted by his Bull a slight Authority, which when the King saw was only superficial and not effectual, he sent it back again to the Pope by the same Person who brought it.

Many Troubles
fall upon him.

When these Methods fail'd others were attempted, and the Arch-Bishop having many Enemies, several Troubles were brought upon him in a short Time. First, he was condemn'd in Damages for a Mannor, which John de Marshall claim'd, notwithstanding the Arch-Bishop had enjoy'd it a long Time without Molestation. Next he was prosecuted at the King's Suit for five hundred Marks, which had been lent him in the Army at Thraloufe, and for another like Sum, which he borrow'd of a Jew upon the King's Security: Then he was prosecuted for all the Profits of the Archbishoprick of York, and other Bishopricks and Abbies vacant during his Chancellorship: Besides all he was in Parliament call'd call'd to an Account for thirty thousand Pounds of the King's Mony formerly in his Hands. To these he reply'd, That since he had formerly accounted, and that the King's eldest Son, the Justiciary of England, and all the Barons of the Exchequer had acquitted him of all Accounts, and that he should come free from all Actions to the Archbishoprick, he therefore now would not answer as a Lay-Man. Which peremptory Refusal of his was highly aggravated with divers Accusations, particularly of Contempt towards the King, in denying to come to his Presence, when commanded to appear before him; and tho' he made several Excuses and Pretences, yet the Peers and the Bishops condemn'd all his moveable Goods to the King's Mercy. And the Prelates perceiving that the King's Displeasure tended to a further Severity, premonish'd him to submit himself, Otherwise the Court intended to adjudge him a perjur'd Person, and a Traitor, for refusing Temporal Allegiance to his Temporal Sovereign, according to his Oath. Still finding him immoveable, the Bishops by joint Consent adjudg'd him guilty of Perjury, and by the Mouth of the Bishop of Chichester disclaim'd all future Obedience to him as their Arch-Bishop. The following Day, while the Bishops and Peers were consulting about some further Expedient, Becket, undaunted in his Designs, caus'd to be sung before him at the Altar, The Princes sit and speak against me, and the Ungodly persecute me, &c. And immediately taking his Silver Crosier in his Hands, he enter'd arm'd with it into the King's Presence. At which the Arch-Bishop of York severely reprov'd him for this unpresidented Action, declaring, That the King carry'd much the sharper Weapon of the two, and advis'd him to lay down the Cross. The Arch-Bishop made Answer, That tho' the King's Weapon might kill the Body, yet his own could destroy the Soul, and send it to Hell. The King in a great Rage commanded his Peers to sit in Judgment upon him, as a perjur'd Traitor; and accordingly they order'd him to be apprehended, and thrown into Prison. The Earls of Cornwall and Leicester, citing him to hear his Sentence pronounc'd, he immediately appeal'd to the See of Rome, declaring them Incompetent Judges: Whereupon all reviling him with the Name of Traitor, he reply'd, That were it not for his Function, he would enter a Combat with them in the Field, and acquit himself both of Treason and Perjury; and upon that fled from the Court, and disguising himself under the Name of Dereman, pass'd over into Flanders. He is declar'd a Traitor.

Hoveden.
Gervase.

The King on the other Side, to leave nothing unfinish'd, immediately dispatch'd Gilbert Bishop of London, and William Earl of Arundell to the French King, urging him Not to harbour one who had fled as a Traitor, but prevail'd not: For he on the contrary begg'd of the Pope, That as he lov'd the Roman Church, and the Happiness of France, he would favour and support the Cause of Thomas against King Henry. To this the Pope readily comply'd, upon which the King sent an Ambassy to him of many great Persons, as the Arch-Bishop of York, the Bishops of London, Winchester, and Chichester, John of Oxford, the Earl of Arundell, and others, whose sole Employment being by any Means to procure Disgrace to Becket, their final Suit was, That his Holiness would be pleas'd to send two Cardinals into England, fully to end the Controversie: But the Pope deny'd it, holding it derogatory to his own absolute Authority, declaring like God's Vice-gerent, It was his own Glory, which he would not give to another; but when the Arch-Bishop was to be judged, he would judge him himself. But the great Reason, as Hoveden observes, was that he knew the King of England was rich and powerful, and that Legates might easily be corrupted, as being greater Lovers of Gold and Silver, than Justice and Equity. To which Gervase adds, That the Pope and Cardinals wisely foresaw, That if the Arch-Bishop was supported in his Cause it would be a President for others in the like Case to oppose Kings; but if it sunk, no Bishop for the future would dare to withstand their Sovereign's Pleasure, so that the Power of the Church would be shaken, and the Authority of the Pope crush'd. He leaves the Nation.

A. D. 1165. The King being thus disappointed, and impatient of a Repulse, where his own Subject was a Party, thought the Indignity offer'd by the Pope insufferable, and to let him understand how he resented it, he directed his Writs to all the Sheriffs of England, commanding them to attach all such as offer'd to appeal to the Roman Court; together with the Fathers, Mothers, Brothers, Sisters, Nephews and Neices of all such of the Clergy as were with the Arch-Bishop, and to put them under Sureties; as also to seize the Revenues, Goods and Chattels of the said Clergy-Men. Again by other Letters to Gilbert Bishop of London he sequester'd all the Livings and Benefices, which within his Province belong'd to any of the Clergy who fled over to the Arch-Bishop; so that without his Leave, they might receive no Part of the Profits. Lastly he gave strict Orders to all his Justices, That if they found any Person with Letters or Mandates from the Pope or Arch-Bishop, containing any Interdict or Excommunication against the Nation, speedy Justice should be executed upon him, as a Traitor to the Kingdom. He also caus'd the Church of Canterbury and all the Arch-Bishop's Goods to be confiscated, grounding himself, as it is believ'd, upon the Judgment given against Becket at Northampton, notwithstanding that Sentence had been expressly null'd by the Pope's Bull. Nor was this all, for he banish'd all the Kindred of the Arch-Bishop, Men, Women, Children and Infants; and forbad that he should be any longer publicly mention'd, and pray'd for in the Church as Arch-Bishop of Canterbury.

and uses many Severities.

A. D. 1166. On the contrary Side, the Arch-Bishop, now in France, solemnly excommunicated all such as obey'd, promoted or defended the Regal Laws of Clarendon, and Richard de Lucie, Richard of Poictou, Jocelin de Bailleol, Alan de Nevil, and some others by Name; but being neither cited nor convicted, they appeal'd to the Pope. The King having notice, that Becket, after his publick Sermon on a great Festival, had threaten'd the like Sentence against his Royal Person, either to terrifie his Adversaries, or to revenge himself, got a powerful Army in Readiness, under a Pretence of subduing Wales. In the mean Time, John of Oxford, the King's great Advocate, so far prevail'd with the Pope as to send two Legates a latere to reconcile the King and the Arch-Bishop; but after their Departure, the Pope fearing the Power and Riches of King Henry, sent Letters after them to put new Limits to their Authority. Upon the Appearance of these two Cardinals, Thomas refus'd to put his Cause to them, unless there was first plenary Restitution made to him and his Friends: But being advis'd by them to submit himself to the King, his Answer was, he would, Saving God's Honour, and the Churches Liberty; Saving his own Honour, and the Churches Possessions; and saving his own and his Friends Rights. Being afterwards demanded by them, Whether, for the Peace of God's Church, he would renounce the Archbishoprick, if the King would renounce his Ordinances; he answer'd, That the Proposal was unequal; since he could not renounce his Archbishoprick, without betraying the Honour of his Church; but the King was oblig'd both in Honour and Conscience to renounce those Ordinances. King Henry being inrag'd at so many Salvos, resolv'd to create new Troubles to the Arch-Bishop, who having been near two Years well maintain'd in the Abby of Pontigny, the King threaten'd that Abbot, That if he any longer shelter'd Becket, he would immediately banish all the Monks of his Order out of England. Upon which he was dismiss'd from the Monastery, and the French King took him to Sens with himself, under whose particular Protection he continu'd for about four Years; and prov'd a great Infligator of that King and the Earl of Flanders against the King of England. In which Year the King's youngest Son John was born, whom in Raillery his Father call'd Sans-Terre, as having no Lands settled upon him; tho' he afterwards obtain'd the Crown of England.

Soul. Still the Pope forgot not his faithful Servant Becket, but honour'd him with a Confirmation of all the Privileges and Powers, that any of his Predecessors ever enjoy'd, in Defiance, as it were, of the King's utmost Indignation. On the other Side the King sent Letters into Germany, declaring his Intentions to renounce the present Pope Alexander, and join with the Emperor and the Anti-Pope, which still made the Breach wider and more dangerous. In the mean Time Gilbert Bishop of London, being commanded by the Pope to admonish the King to lay aside all Customs and Ordinances prejudicial to the Church, and to restore the Arch-Bishop, he obey'd him, and in his Answer he endeavour'd to persuade his Holiness to Moderation and a Connivance, not forgetting to justify his Sovereign, particularly, 'That the King was ready to obey the sacred Decrees of the Church, saving his own and his Kingdom's Dignity: 'That as to Appeals, he claim'd that Honour by the ancient Institution of his Kingdom, namely, That no Clerk should for a civil Action leave the same, 'till Justice could not be found in his Courts at home, and then he would hinder no Man. That he never banish'd the Arch-Bishop, who might return at his Pleasure, provided he observ'd those ancient Customs, to which he bound himself by Oath. That the King thinks himself fully justify'd, in being willing to abide by the concurrent Judgment of the Church in his own Kingdom. Yet after great Heats and Factions, and several Acts of Hostility between the Kings of England and France, a Peace being concluded, Thomas presented himself before the two Kings, where he was urg'd in the Presence of both to submit himself to King Henry without any further Reservations; to which he seem'd ready to comply, only with this Restriction, Saving the Honour due to God. With which the King being exasperated, declar'd to the French King, That such were the subtle Evasions of the Man, that whatsoever displeas'd him, he was wont to say was against the Honour of God: Adding further, That as there had been several Kings of England of less Power than My self, and several Arch-Bishops of Canterbury, Great and Holy Men; let him do what the greatest and most holy of his Predecessors did to the least of mine, and I will acquiesce. Upon which all agreed that the King had sufficiently yielded; and King Lewis offended at Becket, ask'd him Whether he thought himself greater, or holier than St. Peter? And the Peers of both Nations accus'd him of great Arrogance, declaring, That he himself was the wilful Obstacle of his own, and the Holy Church's Tranquility.

Becket appears before the Kings of France and England:

But in vain.

Grasse, L. Paris,

When neither Mediations, Letters, Messages, or other Means would end the Controversie, the Pope signify'd to the King, That he would no longer restrain the Arch-Bishop from revenging his own and the Church's Injuries by the Sword of Censure; upon which the Arch-Bishop excommunicated the Bishop of London, and proceeded so far with others, that there were scarce enough left in the King's own Chappel and Presence, to perform the usual Service. The King highly offended at these Proceedings, encourag'd Bishop Gilbert with most friendly Offers, to bear the Charges of prosecuting his Appeal against Becket; and likewise urg'd the Pope to send Legates to absolve his excommunicated Subjects, and settle a Peace, or else he should be compell'd to provide otherwise for his own Security and Honour. Thereupon two Cardinals were sent to the King in France, in order to an Accommodation, but to little or no Effect. After that, by the Pope's Mediation, the two Kings of England and France met at Paris, whither the Arch-Bishop repair'd, and yet no Peace ensu'd; because the King refus'd Becket the Ceremony of the Kiss of Peace, and would not satistie any Thing under the Name of Restitution, as being against his Honour, since all Restitution imply'd an Injury committed. Yet as to the Matter of the Regal Customs, he freely offer'd to stand to the Judgment, not only of his own Divines, but also of those of the Church of France; which being refus'd by the other, the King came off with much Advantage in the Opinion of the Auditors. And now seeing no Issue of his tedious Disturbances, and understanding that the Arch-Bishop of Sens in Person had solicited the Pope to put the Kingdom of England under a general Interdict, he immediately sent out his Edicts from Normandy into England, declaring, That whoever brought any Letters of Interdict from the Pope or Becket, should immediately suffer as a Traitor to his King and Country. That no Clerk should go out of the Land without a Passport from his Justiciaries, and none return again without a Licence from the King himself. That none receive any Message from the Pope, or Becket, nor make any Appeal to them, or hold any Plea by their Mandates. That if any Prelate, Clerk or Lay-Man obey a Sentence of Interdict, he and all his Relations shall be banish'd, and his Goods forfeited to the Crown. That all Clerks having Rents in England, shall return home within three Months, or lose all their Revenues. That Peter-Pence be not paid to Rome, but reserv'd. Thus, as Gervase laments, all from the Eldest to the Youngest, were forc'd to abjure Obedience to Pope Alexander, and Arch-Bishop Becket.

He makes a grand Inquisition in the Nation

Son Henry.

After four Years Continuance in France, the King took Shipping for En-^{Great}land, in which he narrowly escap'd a violent Storm, that destroy'd several ^{Hibern} of his best Vessels, in one of which his chief Physician, and about four hun- ^{Part} dred Persons were drowned. Shortly after Easter he held his Court at Wind- ^{for}, where William King of the Scots, and David his Brother, and all the Bishops and great Men of the Nation were present; when the King also appointed certain Earls, Abbots, Knights and Clerks to go as Commissioners throughout the Kingdom, to inquire into all sorts of Frauds, Extortions, Mis-carriages and other Failures of Sheriffs their Bailiffs, and other of the King's Officers. Which Inquisition being finish'd, all Parties concern'd in it were com-manded to appear before the King at London on the fourteenth Day of June, where at the same Time he held a grand Council of all the Bishops, Abbots, Earls, Barons, Sheriffs, Bailiffs and Aldermen of England, who appear'd with their Sureties in no little Fear, not imagining the King's Designs. But when all were present, the King proceeded to an Act unknown to England, and to the Surprise of all Men, commanded his Son Henry to be anointed and crow-ned King, by the Consent of the whole Assembly. The Ceremony was per-form'd by the Arch-Bishop of York, assisted by the Bishops of London and Durham; and the next Day he receiv'd the Fealties of the King of the Scots and his Brother, and of all the other Earls and Barons of the Kingdom. This Transaction was a Contempt of the Authority of Arch-Bishop Becket, and like-wise a Strengthening of the Regal Customs; but most of all it was the greatest Security to the Succession of the King's Issue, who was sensible that for want of this, the Nation could not be kept in their Duty to his Mother Matilda. Yet this new King Henry was far from being sensible of his Father's great Kindness and Trust; tho' he in Honour to his Son, at the Coronation-Feast vouchsaf'd to carry up the first Dish, congratulating him for having a greater Servitor than any Prince in the World. For when the Arch-Bishop of York gravely told him, How much he was oblig'd to his Father for so signal a Favour; he haughtily reply'd, That it was no great Condescension in his Fa-ther, who was only the Son of an Earl, to perform that Service to Him, who was the Son of a King.

The King of France was highly disoblig'd because his Daughter Margaret was not crown'd with the young King her Husband; but that Matter was soon accommodated by the King's Passage into Normandy shortly after. Where, being weary'd out by the Pope's repeated Threatnings, which might have pro-ved fatal to him, he resolv'd to be reconcil'd to Arch-Bishop Becket, who now had been punish'd with above six Years Exile. To that End he repair'd to Am-boise near Tours, where he was met by most of the Bishops and Noblemen of France; and on the second Day, by the Mediation of King Lewis, and the Admonitions of Pope Alexander, the King receiv'd the Arch-Bishop into his Grace and Favour, as well as all those who were with him in Exile; promising entirely to restore to him all the Rights and Possessions of the Church of Canterbury, as he held them the Year before he left England. Which Conclusion the King signify'd to his Son in England; so that the great Controversie between the King and the Arch-Bishop seem'd to have been happily ended. But in a short Time another great Mischief arose; for the Arch-Bishop being implacably inrag'd against those Bishops that had crown'd the new King, procur'd Letters from the Pope for the Suspension of the Arch-Bishop of York, and Bishop of Durham; and for the Excommunication of the Bishops of London, Exeter and Salisbury, who assisted in the Coronation; and at his first Arrival he publish'd these Letters, to the great Disturbance of the Nation; nor would he, at the young King's Request, absolve them but upon very hard Conditions.

Grace

The King and Becket reconcil'd.

Becket raises new Disturbances.

Immediately upon this Publication, the suspended and excommunicated Bishops went over into Normandy to the King, and throwing themselves at his Feet, complain'd, That he had made an unhappy Peace for them, since they and his most faithful Friends were thus unreasonably treated: To which the Arch-Bishop of York added, That as long as Thomas Becket was alive, it was impossible he should enjoy happy Days, or a peaceable Kingdom. At which Words, the King, transported with Rage and Passion, inconsiderately cry'd out, I am a miserable Man, who have fed so many ungrateful cowardly Servants, none of whom durst vindicate me from the Injuries I suffer at the Hands of one Priest. Upon which unhappy Expression, four of the King's Domestick Servants, remarkable for their Birth and Valour, Raynold Fitz-Urse, William Tracy, Richard Brito and Hugh Morville, bound themselves by a solemn Oath to revenge the King's Quarrel, and destroy the Arch-Bishop. To that End they privately withdrew from the Court; and finding an easie Passage into England, they soon arriv'd at Canterbury. And coming into the Presence of the Arch-Bishop, who had lately shown himself with the utmost Pomp and Grandeur, they upbraided him with Obstinacy and Arrogancy, and finding him immovably resolute as to his former Actions and Opinions, without the Warrant and Privacy of their Master, they proceeded first to threaten Force, and then to commit it; and that after an execrable Manner. Having put on Armor, to make themselves more formidable, they enter'd the Arch-Bishop's own Church, whither he had withdrawn himself to the High-Altar, while the Monks were at Divine Service; and there calling him Traitor and other opprobrious Names, they gave him many Wounds, and at length beat out his Brains, so that the Altar it self was shamefully polluted with Blood and Gore. His passionate Behaviour in these last Moments; his courageous Meeting of Death; his devout committing the Cause of the Church and his own Soul to God and the Saints; the Place, the Time, the Manner, and all Things aggravate the Horror of the Fact, and cause Compassion and Opinion to be on his Side. The Assassins having effected this audacious Design, afterwards considering the Hainousness of their Crime, and doubting whether the King, tho' secretly pleas'd, would openly countenance so odious an Act, retired to the North of England; and being driven from thence, in a few Years dy'd miserable Fugitives in Foreign Countries.

The King is inrag'd.

Becket murder'd.

This was the fatal Period of the famous Thomas Becket; a Person of a capacious Genius and singular Abilities, and of strict Morals and great Austerities; yet unhappily allay'd with exceeding Haughtiness, Ostentation and Popularity, which caus'd great Mischiefs to the Nation. And tho' several have exalted him among the greatest Saints and Martyrs, yet others have doubted whether he deserv'd the Name of a good Man; and about fifty Years after a celebrated Question was debated among the learned Doctors of the University of Paris, Whether Thomas was sav'd or damn'd; the one Party declaring That he

His Character.

he deserv'd Death and Damnation for his Contumacy against the Minister of God his Sovereign, and the other asserting, That his many Miracles were a Sign of his Salvation; which was fairly alledg'd, had the Truth of them been as well prov'd, as reported. And indeed the Fame of them was exceeding great; which occasion'd for him one of the richest and noblest Shrines in the World. He was not only canoniz'd, but also several Solemnities were ever after observ'd in his Memory, and a famous Jubilee kept every fifty Years at Canterbury. It is almost incredible what Multitudes of People flock'd to that City, upon the Time of the Solemnity; particularly in the Year 1420, Mr. Somner informs us that there were by Estimation a hundred thousand Persons, as English, Irish, Welsh, Scots, French, Normans, and other Foreigners, who came thither to procure the Health or Salvation of their Souls; for whom the Bailiffs of the City commanded the Citizens, Victuallers and Inn-keepers, to provide sufficient Lodgings, and all other Conveniencies.

The King's Designs upon Ireland.

III. King Henry was now freed from the greatest Disturber of his Repose, yet the News of this barbarous Murther, with all its heightning Circumstances, gave him fresh Disquiets, and new Troubles. For the King of France, the Earl of Blois, and the Arch-Bishop of Sens sent such inflaming Letters to the Pope concerning this Parricide, that Henry found it extraordinary difficult to preserve his Kingdom from a general Interdict, tho' he made use of his Power, Mony, and Protections to submit to the Judgement of such Legates and Cardinals as his Holiness should send to inquire into the Fact. To divert himself in these melancholy Perplexities, the King resolv'd to display his Sovereignty, and more vigorously carry on that great Design of subduing the Kingdom of Ireland, which in part had been begun a Year or two before, and had been protected, and sanctify'd by the English Pope Adrian in the Beginning of this Reign. It is very observable at this Time, that not only the Manners of that Nation were extreamly corrupted, but the Christian Faith it self was decay'd; Barbarism over-running the one, and more than Superstition the other: So that there were then all the usual Forerunners of great Revolutions and Conquests. King Henry's Pretensions to this Kingdom were an ancient Title, as well as the continu'd Injuries the Irish had committed by their Piracies, buying and selling English Captives, and using them like the worst of Slaves: Which made the Irish Clergy confess, That it was nothing but their Deserts, that their Land should be transferr'd to that Nation which they had so cruelly treated. But the particular Occasion of that Kingdom's Invasion proceeded from those constant Effects of Looseness and Immorality, Factions and Divisions among themselves; which in no long Time ruin'd them, and brought them under the Subjection of other Masters.

The State of that Island.

Ireland, besides inferior Governors, was now under the Subjection of five Rulers, which our ancient Historians often call by the Name of Kings; one of whom was Dermot Prince of Leinster, who from his Youth, and first Accession to his Kingdom, had been a Tyrant and great Oppressor of his Subjects. To add to his Crimes, he took occasion to corrupt and steal away the Wife of Orocic Prince of Meath; who being justly provok'd with this Indignity, gather'd what Forces he could procure, and gain'd the Assistance of Roderick Prince of Connaught, then chief Monarch of Ireland; by whose Power, and the Conjunction of many of his injur'd Subjects, after several Conflicts, he was dispossessed, and driven from his Dominions. Upon which, Dermot fled to King Henry, then in Aquitain, imploring his Protection and Assistance, and swearing to be his Vassal and Subject. The King, glad to find his former Designs thus promoted, entertain'd him very kindly; and tho' he could not as then furnish him, being engag'd in other great Affairs, yet he permitted such of his Subjects as pleas'd to venture their Fortunes with him. With this Permission Dermot repair'd to Wales, where he first prevail'd with Robert Fitz-Stephen, a King Henry's Assistance desired.

Man

Man of great Interest tho' of desperate Fortunes; and soon after with Richard Strongbow, Earl of Pembroke, a Lord of great Courage and Worth, which produc'd him many Followers, and of large Possessions in England and Normandy, which gave him Means to entertain them. Fitz-Stephen was persuaded by the Promise of great Rewards, and the Earl by the Hopes of Eva the Daughter of Dermot, and the Succession of the Kingdom of Leinster.

Cambrenf. Dermot having thus succeeded in his Affairs, while his Friends in England prepar'd themselves and their Forces, he sail'd into his own Country, carrying with him the Promises of Confederates, and using all Methods to facilitate the Entrance of the English, by extolling their Civility and Piety, their Valour and Riches, and all other Qualifications that might move either their Love or their Fear. Not long after Fitz-Stephen with his Half Brother Fitz-Gerard, pass'd the Sea with a small Number of Soldiers, and landed at a Place near Waterford call'd by the Irish Bagg and Bunn, which signifies Holy, and therefore was interpreted as a happy Presage of good Success, of which this Time retains the Memory, At the Head of Bagg and Bunn, Ireland was lost and won. The next Day Maurice de Pendergast, with other Soldiers and some Archers, in two Ships, arriv'd at the same Place; and joining with Fitz-Stephen's Forces, march'd to the City of Wexford, with Colours display'd, and in such a peculiar Form and Order, that tho' they were not above four hundred in Number, yet the Irish, unacquainted with such unusual Bravery, and overcome with Fear, soon surrender'd themselves and the City of Wexford; which with the neighbouring Country was given by Dermot to Fitz-Stephen, as an Earnest of greater Rewards. And here was planted the first Colony of the English, which, according to Speed and Daniel, has ever since continu'd, retaining a Sort of our ancient Attire, and much of our Language, proper only to that City and the neighbouring Parts, and by a distinct Denomination call'd Wexford Speech. The next Year new Supplies were sent out of Wales, and upon Intelligence of good Success, the Earl of Pembroke sail'd to the Bay of Waterford, and landing with twelve hundred Men, soon took the Town, which was then call'd Portblarge, and put all the Inhabitants to the Sword, partly to revenge their Infidelity to Dermot, but chiefly to give Terror to his Arms, and make Way for future Conquests. Here Dermot gave him his Daughter Eva in Marriage, with the Dowry of his Country, which, after his Wickedness had ruin'd, he liv'd not to see much longer, but dy'd miserably; leaving the Stile of Ningal, signifying the Strangers Friend, added to his Name in Memory of his unnatural abandoning his own Country. The Earl, after he had secur'd the new acquired Places, march'd with his small Body of Forces into the Bowels of the Kingdom with no Opposition; and Roderick, who had assum'd the Title of the great Monarch of Ireland, confin'd himself to the Wilds and Fastnesses of Connaught. So that passing through the Country at his Pleasure, he took what Pledges of Security he thought fit from the Inhabitants, and with a little Difficulty possess'd himself of the City of Dublin, the Metropolis of the whole Island. Thus Wales first gain'd us the Kingdom of Ireland, with a small Force, and without a general Battel; a Thing almost incredible that a Country so populous, and of that Disposition, should do so little in its own Defence, and be so languid and remiss, when their All was at stake: But this must be attributed to their great Disuse of military Discipline, their dispirited Minds, and those general Corruptions before-mention'd.

Great Successes of the English.

Ibid. But King Henry being advis'd of the extraordinary Successes of these Adventurers, and the true State of the Country, now became jealous of them, thinking they presum'd further than their Subjection would allow, and that they thought to carry away that Glory which ought to be his; and therefore by Proclamation commanded, That no Vessel should transport any Thing out of his Dominions into Ireland, and that all his Subjects should return from thence, and abandon their Designs, otherwise they should forfeit their Estates at home. By which Edict the Affairs of the Adventurers were reduc'd to the lowest Ebb, but were soon brought to a better Condition, by certain Mediators sent to the King, who found him in Glocestershire with an Army ready to accompany him into Ireland; where it was agreed, 'That the King should have Dublin, with all the Sea-Coast Towns and 'Castles, and the rest to remain in the Conquerors, to hold of the King and 'his Successors, and so to continue under his Protection as Subjects; which Subjection the King thought they design'd to have renounc'd. Shortly after Michaelmas the King pass'd over the Sea with a great Fleet and Army, and landed near Waterford upon the Eve of St. Luke; where a white Hart starting out of a Bush being immediately taken and presented to him, it was interpreted as a happy Prefage of certain Success. The next Day he march'd to Waterford, where he continu'd fifteen Days; to which Place came the Kings of Cork, Limerick, Ossery, Meath, and all of any Power in Ireland, except Roderick, and voluntarily submitted themselves with all the Clergy, and took their Oaths of Fealty to him and the young King, and their Successors for ever. So these divided Princes, holding no publick Council for the common Safety, rather than join those Hands which had so often injur'd each other, fell all from themselves, and with the same Emulation they had express'd in Liberty, strove who should first receive the Yoke of Servitude from a Foreign Master.

From Waterford the King march'd to Dublin, where he receiv'd the Homage of Roderick the chief Monarch, and kept his Christmases with great Pomp and Splendor, magnificently feasting all his Kings and great Men of the Country, and settling the great Affairs of the Nation. And being mindful of his Duty to God, whilst the Island was calm and silent by the Presence of so great a Monarch, he caus'd all the Bishops and the Clergy to assemble at Cassel, and appointed a special Chaplain of his own, with the Arch-Deacon of Llandaff to be Assistants and Advisers to them in the Reformation of Church Affairs, which were as much disorder'd as the People. For tho' the Irish had been long since Christians, it was now after a wild and mix'd Fashion; and therefore according to his Promise made to the late Pope, and to do a pleasing Work to him now in the Chair, it was decreed, 'That all Church Lands should be free from the Ex-
'action of secular Men; and that thenceforward, all Divine Things should be 'order'd and us'd in every Part of Ireland, according to the Manner of the 'Church of England. For, says the Constitution, as Ireland has by God's Mercy obtain'd a Lord and King out of England, so it is fit that they should receive from thence a better Form of Life and Manners than they had before. After this the King planted Garrisons in all convenient Places; and made Hugh Lacy Justice of all Ireland, giving him the Keeping of Dublin, confirming besides by Charter to him and his Heirs the County of Meath to hold the same in Fee, for the Service of a hundred Knights. He made Robert Fitz-Bernard Governor of the Towns of Waterford and Wexford, which he took from Fitz-Stephen, the first Invader, with a Charge to build Castles in them; and to humble the Earl of Pembroke, and to level him with the rest of his Subjects, he took all his Dependants from him, which by his Bounty he made his own.
Thus it was but one Winter's Work to gain a Kingdom; which tho' thus easily won, it prov'd more difficult and chargeable to keep, because the Prosecution of a full Establishment, by reason of other Diversions, was not for several Ages thoroughly accomplish'd.

On Easter Monday the King set sail for England, and from thence hasten'd into Normandy to meet the two Legates sent by the Pope to enquire into the Murder of the late Arch-Bishop Becket. Four Months were spent in debating the Matter, and at length, the King by his solemn Oath taken upon the Relicks of Saints, and the Holy Evangelists, in the Presence of all the great Men of the Country, purg'd himself, of either commanding, or consenting to the Mur-ther; and declaring withal his infinite Sorrow for having by rash Words in his Passion given occasion for others to commit that Fact, and giving a further Oath to perform enjoin'd Penances, he was by the Legates absolv'd. The Conditions were these: 'First, That he should never oppose the Pope's Authority, so long as he was us'd as a Catholick King: Secondly, That all Appeals should be freely made to the Pope in all Ecclesiastical Causes: Thirdly, That he should undertake the Crusado, and go to Jerusalem for three Years; and if diverted by the Saracens in Spain, maintain two hundred Soldiers for a Year in the Holy Land: Fourthly he should freely restore all that were Exiles upon the late Arch-Bishop's Account: And fifthly abolish all Customs introduc'd in his Time to the Prejudice of the Church of Canterbury, or of any other Church in his Kingdom. And thus ended this vexatious Controversie, by which the Pope establish'd and enlarg'd his Ecclesiastical Power to a high Degree; so that the King's long Opposition, and the Murder of the Arch-Bishop, as much added to his growing Authority, as unsuccessful Rebellions do to the Power of Temporal Princes.

IV. When King Henry had, as he imagin'd, surmounted all Difficulties and Troubles, an unnatural Rebellion and Conspiracy began to disclose new Mischiefs, which were ordain'd to exercise this wise and warlike Prince; being first begun in England during his Absence in Ireland, and in a short Time encreas'd to a dangerous Degree. One of the chief Fomenters of it was Queen Elcanor his Wife, violently inrag'd at the Injuries done to her Bed by her Husband, who was immoderately addicted to Variety of Loves; more particularly he was captivated by the Charms of the beautiful Lady Rosamund Clifford, whom he kept at Woodstock, some say in a Labyrinth, where the Queen found Means to end her Life. Besides his Queen, his own Son Henry was another great Actor, whose Ambition transported him beyond all Reason and Duty; so that as M. Paris expresses it, God stirr'd up the King's own Bowels against himself. This Conspiracy was justly formidable; for to these were added the King's two younger Sons Richard and Geoffry, whom their Mother persuaded to join with the young King, the two Kings of France and Scotland, Philip Earl of Flanders, Matthew Earl of Bulloign, Theobald Earl of Blois, Hugh Earl of Chester, Robert Earl of Leicester, Hugh Bigot Earl of Norfolk, Roger Mowbray, and other Noblemen in great Numbers: So that they seem'd to want nothing but a good Cause; however they gave the most plausible Turn to their Designs, and were pleas'd to repute the Father no King, because he had crown'd his Son.

Tho' nothing could be more afflicting than this unnatural War, yet the King proceeded with his usual Vigour and Dexterity, and found great Numbers whose Hearts were inflam'd with Indignation at so much Injustice. The Particulars of the Wars would fill a Volume: At one Time Normandy, Guienne and Bretaigne were invaded by the Confederates in France, and at the same Time Cumberland by the Scots. But the King of England had Friends in all those Parts, and hearing that Vernvil was besieg'd by the French King in Person, and that the Place had agreed to surrender if not reliev'd by a certain Day, he began to exert his Power, and sent a Message to King Lewis, That if he did not leave Normandy immediately, he would come and visit him at the appointed Day. Upon which, Lewis, who meant more to weaken him by Factions, than overpower him by Force, immediately rais'd the Siege, and abandon'd the Place with such Precipitation, that he left all his Tents and warlike Provisions behind him. And now King Henry beginning to shake his dreadful Sword, had many successful Encounters, mixt with some Losses, tho' not great nor many, in respect of the Overthrows given to the Enemy. In Bretaign his Forces worsted Hugh Earl of Chester and Ralph de Foulgiers, and slew above fifteen hundred upon the Spot, taking these two Persons Prisoners, with many others; and in England, Reynold Earl of Cornwall, and Richard de Lucie in a bloody Battel overthrew the insolent Earl of Leicester, and enter'd the Town of Leicester by Force, Force. Yet after these Advantages, the French King moving for a Parly, Henry the Father desirous to use the good Fortune of War only to reclaim his Rebels, was so willing to make Peace, that he seem'd to have out-gone Expectations in the Freeness of his Offers; but through the wicked Persuasions of some Persons, it prov'd ineffectual. Among these Incendiaries the Earl of Leicester was chief, who having match'd with a Lady no less haughty and ambitious than himself, proceeded so far as to affront the King in his Presence, in behalf of his young Master the Son, and likewise laid his Hand upon his Sword to have stricken him, but was stopp'd in that audacious Attempt. This Man with all Heat and Violence join'd with the young King the Son, not that he thought his Cause more just, but, as Walsingham tells us, because his Father, labouring to enlarge the Sovereign Power, sought to set his Foot upon the Necks of the Proud and Haughty.

The King's
Ground.

But God, who thought fit to chastise the King, without delivering him into his Enemy's Hands, destroy'd those Hopes that mov'd the Sons to their unnatural Attempts; for not long after News was brought into Normandy, that his faithful Friends and Servants Richard de Lucie, and Humphrey de Bohun High-Constable of England, being assisted by the Earls of Cornwall, Glocester and Arundell, near St. Edmund's Bury bravely engag'd with the Earl of Leicester and his Flemmings, of whom above five thousand were slain, or taken; and among the Prisoners was the Earl himself and his Masculine Countess, who were shortly after sent over to the King in Normandy. Upon this great Victory, and other Advantages, King Lewis, apprehensive of Success, sought for six Months Truce and had it granted. But because two great Men in England, the Earl of Norfolk and Roger Mowbray, still held out, and kept Leicester and other Places; tho' Geoffry, the King's natural Son and Bishop Elect of Lincoln, had taken two of Mowbray's Castles, and done great Service for his Lord and Father, the Enemy made no better use of the Truce than to breath, and repair their Losses. In the mean Time the King recover'd Xaintes from his violent Son Richard, and proceeded with that Expedition, that the French King said He seem'd not to go, but to fly. Yet before he could finish all in those Parts, the News from England oblig'd him to hasten into Normandy; where he met with Richard the Elect of Winchester, sent over by his Justiciaries of England, to lay before him the present dangerous State of the Nation. For Philip Earl of Flanders having sworn to invade England, in favour of young Henry, several Forces joining with the Earl of Norfolk, had taken and plunder'd the City of Norwich, and done other Damage, which gave great Incouragement to the young King and his Faction, and he and the Earl of Flanders were ready to come over with fresh Forces into England. Moreover, Robert Earl of Ferrars had suddenly enter'd Nottingham, burnt the Town, drove out the King's Garrison, and slew the Inhabitants; and being enrich'd with the Plunder, he retir'd to Leicester, to which Place Anketill Malorie had also brought two hundred Prisoners, taken at Northampton, which he had suddenly surpriz'd and taken with the Slaughter of a considerable Number of the Townsmen. So that the whole Kingdom stood wavering and in extrem Peril; to add to which, William King of Scotland, a Principal in the Confederacy, invaded England, dividing his Forces into two Parts, himself wasting the Province of Northumberland, and Duncan a cruel Commander, destroying the Western Borders.

Yet still the King's Affairs are in an ill Condition.

A. D. King Henry highly exasperated at these Transactions, left Normandy in as good a Condition as the Time would permit; and sending his own Queen Eleanor, and his Son's Queen Margaret, his Son John, the Earl of Leicester with his Countess, and many other Prisoners, and a powerful Army on board, he took shipping at Barfleur; where being detain'd by the Wind, he is said to have publicly pray'd, That if this Voyage was for the Peace of the Clergy and People of England, he might have a prosperous Wind, but if otherwise, he desir'd never never to set a Foot upon that Shore again. Which Prayer was succeeded by a fresh Gale of Wind, which in the same Day carry'd him safe to Southampton. From whence he took his Journey towards Canterbury, where the Remainder of his Penance enjoin'd him at his Absolution was to be perform'd. For besides the Conditions formerly mention'd, the Author of Becket's Life says, the Legates enjoin'd him some other Things secretly, which came not to our Knowledge; and the Legates in their own Letters write that he promis'd to do some Things voluntarily which were not fit for them to commit to Writing. And what they were Hoveden has told us: The King coming towards the Church where the late Arch-Bishop was bury'd, cloath'd all in Woollen, went three Miles bare-footed, infomuch that the very Ground where he walk'd was distain'd with the Quantity of Blood running from his tender Feet cut by the hard Stones. Nor was this the worst, for after this, coming to the Sepulchre, and there prostrating himself, he receiv'd Discipline by Rods on his bare Flesh, at the Hands of the Bishops, Priests, Abbots and Monks there present; so that we may easily believe Baronius and his Author, who acknowledge that he receiv'd eighty Lashes. So he who in his Life-Time could only make him bow, after his Death brought him upon his Knees; and tho' he had then prosecuted him as a Traitor, he now ador'd him as a Saint and Martyr.

The King finishes his Penance for Becket's Murther.

M. Paris, Walsingham, &c.

Some of the Monks of that Age attribute the happy Success which ensu'd, to the Reconciliation which King Henry thus made with God, for the Blood of his Servant Thomas; for it pleas'd Him to deliver his Enemy William King of the Scots into his Hand, about the very same Time, and also to drive back his disobedient Son, the young King, into France; who being under Sail for England, his whole Fleet was dispers'd, and a great Part of it lost by a Storm. The King's other Actions till his next Return into Normandy, which was not long after, are by Walsingham comprehended in these few Words; he tam'd his Rebels, put his Enemies to Flight, and seiz'd on their Forts. And thus having in a manner miraculously quieted the Nation, he took with him the King of Scotland, the Earls of Leicester and Chester, with his other chief Prisoners, but leaving his seditious Wife behind him under strict Custody, he arriv'd with his Forces at Normandy. This being understood in the French and Confederate Army, which had besieg'd Roven, King Lewis immediately broke up, and setting fire to all his Engines of War retreated in such Haste into France, that the English Soldiers took great Quantities of Baggage and Ammunition. Hoveden assures us, that as soon as Lewis heard the victorious Henry was near Roven, he first sent away the weak and worst of his Army, and then deceiving the English with a solemn Promise of returning the next Day, to negotiate a Peace with the King, departed with all the rest; so that this Author aggravated the Dishonour of the Retreat, with an open Breach of Faith.

His great Successes after it.

Ibid.

And here if we look upon the Grandeur and Felicity of this King, it will appear, That no Prince in those Times was so oblig'd to Heav'n for the numerous Favours bestow'd upon him. The King and all the Power of France were now flying at his Presence, without one Blow given; the valiant King of Scotland was his Prisoner, and the chiefest of his Rebels under his Feet; England was secured, Scotland dismay'd, Ireland retain'd, Wales subservient to his Arms, Normandy in Possession, and all the coasting Regions of Bretaigne, Guienne, Gascony and others as far as the Borders of Spain, under his Dominions; and the Blessing of Peace shortly after ensuing upon his own Terms, made him like another Solomon to be sought to by others. His Wisdom and Magnificence being in such high Credit through the Christian World, that afterwards the Kings of Castile and Navarre chose him sole Arbitrator in a Contest between them, which he wisely determin'd to both their Satisfaction; and then at one Time in his Palace at Westminster were seen together the Ambassadors of the Emperor of Constantinople, the Emperor of Germany, the Arch-

His Grandeur.

Arch-Bishop of Triers, the Duke of Saxony, and the Earl of Flanders, all in great Pomp and Splendor. Moreover he had the Government of France for a Time, the Kingdom of Jerusalem offer'd to him but refus'd, and two of his Daughters marry'd to the two Kings of Castile and Sicily.

A Peace concluded.

But to return, a Truce was first made between the three Kings, Lewis and the two Henry's; in which Richard, who stood out, was left to his Father's Prosecution, who after some Shows of Resistances, and great Conflicts with himself, threw himself upon his Father's Mercy and Affection, and obtain'd full Pardon and Favour. A most fatherly and fortunate Act; for Richard, melted with this unexpected Goodness, never desisted 'till he had brought the young King to a final Atonement; and Arms being laid aside, the chief Heads of the desired Peace were these: 'That Henry the young King, with Richard and ' Geoffry his Brothers, freed from all Oaths of Confederation, should return to ' a full Obedience of the King their Father. That the Prisoners on all sides should ' be set at Liberty without Ransom; except the King of Scotland, the Earls of ' Leicester and Chester, and such others as had compounded for their Ransoms ' before the Beginning of this Treaty. That King Henry the Father should take ' Security of Loyalty, either by Hostage or Oath of such as were enlarg'd; and ' that King Henry the Son should ratifie that Grant which his Father had made ' to his Son John, of some Castles and annual Revenues in England. As to the King of Scotland's Ransom our Historians differ, but Hector Boetius, a Writer of that Nation, says it was an hundred thousand Pounds Sterling, one Moiety in ready Coin, and the other at an appointed Time. Besides which he was oblig'd to do Homage for all his Dominions, to the King of England. And for the Performance of all Articles, King Henry had a double Security; on the one Side the Scotch Bishops swore to put their King and his Land under an Interdict, if he broke them; and on the other the King of Scotland deliver'd up the Castles of Edenborough, Rokesburgh, Berwick, Gedworth and Sterling. In the mean Time King Henry freed nine hundred sixty nine Prisoners of War, and his Son above an hundred; and having happily establish'd all Things, they prepar'd for England, where the joyful Letters concerning their Return had produc'd a longing Expectation in the Subjects. In their Journey homewards, their Confidence was such upon this new Reconciliation, that one Room and one Table serv'd both, for whom before a whole Kingdom was not large enough. They landed at Portsmouth upon Friday the twenty sixth Day of May, 1175.

Reg. 21.
The King makes many Regulations.

V. At this present Time the State and Face of England was like that of a serene Sky, and a calm Sea, no Blasts, no raging Waves, no appearing Sign^{ci} of Discontent; the better to continue which, King Henry the Father, accompany'd with the King his Son, omitted no Office of a just and prudent Governor, visiting a great Part of his Kingdom in Person, consulting, ordering and enacting such Laws and Courses, as might best establish a lasting Peace. Upon which Account, at Westminster, both the Kings were present at a Synod, in which Richard, lately chosen Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, publish'd several Canons and Decrees for the better Government of the Church of England. Among which, this laudable Order was especially enacted both by the Authority of the King and Synod, ' That every Patron of a Benefice taking a Reward for ' any Presentation, should for ever lose the Right of Patronage. And the same Kings not long after being at Woodstock, in Accomplishment of such Holy Purposes, by the Advice of the Clergy provided Men to such Bishopricks, Abbies and principal Cures as were vacant; where King Henry the Father forgot not his faithful Friend John of Oxford, whom he prefer'd to the See of Norwich. From hence coming to York, he establish'd the Affairs of the North, and meeting with William King of Scotland, several Matters of Importance were treated between the two Kings: As likewise afterwards at Windsor, where the King had call'd a grand Council or Parliament; where, at the Suit of the Arch

Arch-Bishop of Tuam and other Ambassadors from Ireland, the chief Monarch Roderick, King of Connaught was receiv'd into Protection and Favour, and became a faithful Tributary. This King Henry chose, rather than to fish with a Hook of Gold; for so a War against Ireland was accounted.

In the following Year, the King held another Parliament at Northampton, where by the Advice of all, he divided the Kingdom into six Parts or Circuits, and for every Circuit constituted three Itinerant Justices, either Barons or Knights, causing them to swear upon the Holy Evangelists, to oblige all the King's Subjects inviolably to observe the Assizes or Ordinances of Clarendon, and renew'd at Northampton; which were principally against Murther, Theft, Robbery, Burnings of Houses, and Cheats; which Facts if found by the Verdict of twelve Men, the Accused were to pass the Trial of Water Ordeal, and if not acquitted, they were punish'd with Loss of Limbs or Banishment, that Age holding the miserable Life of a Malefactor of a greater Example than Death it self. These six Circuits were almost the same as they are at this Day, only Essex then belong'd to that of Norfolk, which Circuit also consisted of more Counties than at present, having the Addition of Hampshire, Barkshire and Oxfordshire, which are now join'd with Herefordshire, and the rest of the Western Counties. Yet about two or three Years after, for another Design, the King divided the whole Nation into four Circuits, assigning five Justices to each; not long after which, he appointed the famous Glanville to be chief Justiciary of England, by whose Wisdom and Advice the Laws of King Edward, which had been before confirm'd by King William the First, were again renew'd. As this King took Care for the Security of his Subjects, so he took Care of his own, by causing the Walls and Castles of Leicester to be demolish'd, as likewise the Castles of Groby, Thresk, Malest, and the new Castle at Alverton, with those of Framingham and Bungey in Suffolk, and indeed almost all the Castles of England and Normandy, that had been fortify'd against him in the late War.

Not long after, King Henry in a grand Council made his youngest Son John King of Ireland, by Virtue of the Bull formerly granted him by Pope Adrian; by which Title no more was meant than Vice-Roy, or Feudatory King at the most, since King Henry himself was never otherwise stil'd than Lord of Ireland. In the same Year, the King enlarg'd his Dominions by a Purchase of the Province and Earldom of Marche in France; for which he gave fifteen thousand Pounds of Anjou Mony, twenty Mules, and as many Palfreys. For four or five Years after, we find not many Transactions of Moment, besides some few Regulations concerning the Coin, and some other Ordinances. Only in the Year 1179 the Fame of Thomas Becket became so celebrated abroad, that when the French King's Son fell dangerously sick upon the Day of his design'd Coronation, his Father resolv'd to come over into England on Pilgrimage to the Tomb of this new Saint, to implore his Assistance for the Recovery of his Health; or, as our Writers relate, was commanded by St. Thomas in a Dream so to do. However it was, it is certain that he came into England, attended by the Earl of Flanders, and divers other Princes and Noblemen; and was met by King Henry at Dover, and conducted to Canterbury, where he spent two Days in Prayers at Becket's Tomb, and offer'd a weighty Golden Cup, bestowing also upon the Monks of that Church an annual Portion of an hundred Measures of Wine, to be deliver'd without Charge or Duty, and granting that whatever those Monks should buy for their own Use in his Kingdom, it should be free from all Tolls and Customs. Upon his Return home he found his Son perfectly recover'd, by the Mediation of St. Thomas, as he and many others believ'd.

At length, after a considerable Calm, the young King discover'd fresh Ali- nations in his Mind against his Father; who dissembling all, notwithstanding arm'd himself upon the Defensive, and encreas'd his Garrisons both in England and and Normandy, which the sooner reduc'd the Son within Bounds. But the old King, fearing an Union among his four warlike Sons might prove no better than a Conspiracy against himself, is said to have daily promoted Contention between them. However to divert the War from himself, he satisfy'd his Royal Son Henry with an Augmentation of a Maintenance of an hundred Pounds Anjouen per Diem for himself, and ten for his Wife the Queen. And whereas Alice, the French King's Daughter, who had been espous'd at three Years of Age to his second Son Richard, and was now demanded from King Henry that Richard might enjoy her, the old King, who was justly suspected to have deflower'd her, at that Time shifted off the Delivery of her Person, in such a manner that a Peace was intirely hinder'd by it. But while the young King by his Father's Instigation endeavour'd to force his Brother Richard to do Homage to him for Aquitain, and the Father for the same Cause commanded his third Son Geoffry to be assisting to his eldest Brother; while also the jealous Father out of his Sons Contentions fought his own Safety, and in nourishing it had by the Treachery of the Sons been twice endanger'd, and at both Times miraculously preserv'd; and while the young King by profound Disimulations plotted to reduce both his Father and Brother Richard to Subjection, at length the Hand of God, by taking away the young King at Martell, put an end to this infamous and intricate Contention. Tho' the Life of this Prince had been rebellious, yet his Death was not inglorious: For finding himself past Recovery, he desir'd to see his Father, to obtain his Pardon, which his Father freely sent, with a Ring as a Token of it, not thinking it safe to come in Person. Upon which he call'd the Bishops, and other religious Men present, and first in private, and then in publick confess'd his heinous Sin in rebelling against so indulgent a Father; and after Absolution, putting on Sackcloth, and a Rope about his Neck, he begg'd of the Bishops to pull him out of the Bed on to a Couch made of Asbes, where being laid, and receiving the Eucharist, he expired, to the exceeding Grief of his Father, who mourn'd for him like David for his rebellious Son Absolon. He dy'd in the twenty eighth Year of his Age, after he had born the Name and Title of King about thirteen; being a Prince of excellent natural Qualifications, but first ruin'd by his Father's Indulgence, and afterwards by his Severity; not allowing him to be what he himself had made him: So that this Prince tho' he was solemnly crown'd, yet he never actually reign'd; and his Name was never inserted in the Catalogue of our English Kings. After his Death, his Wife Queen Margaret was sent back into France, and the present King's surviving Sons were once again reduc'd to Obedience and Reconciliation, not any Enemy daring to appear against him.

Heraclius implors the King's Assistance in the Holy War.

VI. It might reasonably have been imagin'd, That this active Prince should have had Opportunity to end his Days in Peace and Glory; but it was otherwise ordain'd by Providence; and several Writers are of Opinion, that he was principally scourg'd, for being drawn by seeming Reasons of State to lay aside a holy Enterprize, which he had more than once oblig'd himself to undertake, and had now a fresh Occasion offer'd. For Heraclius Patriarch of Jerusalem, induc'd by the resounding Fame of King Henry's Wisdom, Riches and Valour, travell'd from thence into England; where at Clerkenwel by London, in a grand Assembly of the States purposely call'd, the King made known to them, That Pope Lucius had by pathetic Letters recommended to him the deplorable State of the Holy-Land, together with Heraclius the Patriarch. At the same Time Heraclius, there present, mov'd Compassion and Tears at the Relation of the tragical Afflictions of the Eastern World, and brought with him the Keys of the Places of Christ's Nativity, Passion and Resurrection, of David's Tower and the Holy Sepulchre, together with the humble Offer of the Kingdom of Jerusalem, as rightfully belonging to him, who was the Son of Geoffry Ear of Anjou, whose Brother Fulk was King of Jerusalem. Nevertheless, the King

King, having formally adjured the Lords to advise him to what was most for his Soul's Health, it was thought fit to aid and promote the Cause with Mony, but not to employ his Person, nor the Person of any of his Sons, which was the Patriarch's last Request; thereupon he utterly refus'd the said Kingdom, and, according to our Authors, abandon'd as noble an Occasion of immortal Renown, as ever any King of England had been offer'd. The Patriarch declar'd, That he had rather have such a Man without the Mony, than the Mony without such a Man; and so departed with great Sorrow and Concern, and not without some Imprecations against the King's Person. However the King gave leave to all his Subjects whatsoever to take the Cross; upon which the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, several Bishops, with many Earls, Barons and Knights of England, and the rest of the King's Dominions, undertook the Crusado.

But King Henry's Mind was more fix'd upon settling the Estate of his already possess'd Kingdoms, and therefore sent his Ambassadors to Pope Lucius, of whom he desired many Grants; but the Pope being displeas'd at his Behaviour, deny'd all except one, which gave him leave to crown which of his Sons he pleas'd King of Ireland. This he not only confirm'd by his Bull, but as a Token of his Approbation and Satisfaction, he sent the King a Crown of Peacock's Feathers interwoven with Gold; reserving to the Roman See the Peter-Pence, and all other Rights and Privileges. Accordingly the King solemnly knighted his beloved Son John at Windsor, but deferring his Coronation, he sent him over into Ireland, under the chief Directorship of our Author Giraldus Cambrensis, being then near twenty Years of Age. He was solemnly receiv'd by the Arch-Bishop of Dublin, and the chief of the State; but by reason of his Parsimony towards his Soldiers, he found it convenient to return the same Year without performing much, but not without wasting the greatest Part of his Army by Skirmishes with the Irish. Tho' his Father gave him the Title of King, yet he was but Vice-Roy to him, and in his great Seal for that Kingdom, he is only stil'd Lord of Ireland.

The King sends his Son John into Ireland.

After a short Calm, King Henry was again disturb'd by his undutiful Sons, particularly the furious Earl Richard, who fortify'd himself against him in Poitou, and defeated Geoffry Earl of Bretaign; upon which he prepar'd a powerful Army against him, the Fame and Terror of which soon reduc'd Richard to Subjection, and by the Order of his Father he surrender'd the Earldom of Poitou to his Mother Eleanor, whose Inheritance it was. Not long after Heaven's Vengeance pursu'd the Disobedience of the second surviving Brother Geoffry, who in a publick Tournament at Paris, was trodden under the Horses Feet, and miserably crush'd to Death in the twenty eighth Year of his Age. So that the King saw half of his rebellious Male Issue extinct before him, and by Deaths as violent as their Dispositions: The other two who surviv'd him, were no less miserable in their Ends. About these Times, all Affairs between the French and English stood in an unsetled Posture, sometimes War, sometimes Peace, and then War again; occasion'd chiefly by King Philip's challenging the Guardianhip of Arthur, the posthumous Son and Heir of Geoffry Earl of Bretaign, which would by no Means agree with the Ambitious Temper of our King Henry. At length a two Years Truce was concluded, after which Earl Richard, contrary to his Father's Will, remain'd with the King of France; and such a great Intimacy grew between them, that one Table and one Bed usually serv'd for both. This extraordinary Amity rais'd the Jealousie of King Henry, who several Times sent for his Son out of France; but Richard pretending many Grievances, as the unjust Detention of Alice his Spouse, the Fear of being disinherited, and other Matters, again stood out against his Father, and after some Time again submitted to him. Upon which King Philip again broke out into Arms: And while Affairs stood thus, the Western World was fill'd with the afflicting News of the Loss of Jerusalem, and the Captivity of Guido the King of it, with an innumerable Number of Christians besides, whom Sultan Saladin had vanquish'd, to the great Grief and Dishonour of all Christendom.

A. D. 1188. Upon this News, King Henry and King Philip met, for the Honour of God, ^{Horatius &c.} and laying aside their former Displeasure, in the Presence of William Archbishop of Tyre, took upon them the Badge of the Cross as Soldiers of Christ; and the better to distinguish themselves, it was agreed that the French should wear red Crosses, the English white, and the Flemish green. And this Determination was seconded by all warlike Preparations, Levies of Money, Institution of martial Discipline, with great Privileges and Indulgences to all who should undertake the War; notwithstanding which all prov'd of little Effect. For a Breach of this honourable Confederacy arose through Richard's Means, who revenging himself upon some Rebels in Poitou, that could not bear his severe Government, it rais'd such new Disturbances, that at length both the Kings of England and France became Parties to the Contest; much against the Inclination of King Henry who seem'd now firmly resolv'd to revenge the Cause of Christ upon Sultan Saladin; as appears from his Answer to the Petitioning Letter of the Patriarch of Antioch, in which he told him, That among other Princes, Himself and his Son, rejecting all the Pleasures and Glories of this World, would by the Favour of God, speedily visit him in Person, with their whole Forces. And now the State of those Parts requir'd it, Saladin having slain many of the Knights Templars, and Nobility, and above thirty thousand Soldiers, besides innumerable others in Cities and Towns by him subdu'd. Which so affected the Earls of Flanders, Blois, and other Princes, that when they were desir'd to join with one of the two contending Kings, they made answer, That they would not, contrary to their Promise made to God, put on Armour against any Christian, 'till they had discharg'd their Duties against Saladin. In the Treaties therefore between Henry and Philip, the Demands of the latter on the behalf of Richard were such as Henry thought unsafe, which was that the Marriage between Richard and the Princess should be consummated, and all Subjects swear Fealty to him, while his Father was alive. Which Propositions being rejected by Henry, his Son immediately fell from him, and became a Homager to the King of France for Normandy and other Places. At a second Treaty, set on foot by the Mediation of a Cardinal Legate, King Philip's Demands were harder than before, as that King Henry should not only settle his Kingdom upon Richard, but likewise take his Son John with him into the Holy-Land; otherwise Richard should stay behind, being jealous of his Brother's Favour with the Father. King Henry thought himself affronted at these Propositions, and disdaining to be compell'd by any Man, both Parties betook themselves to their Arms.

A. D. 1189. The unhappy Effect of this Contest was, that the mighty Monarch King ^{Ho &c.} Henry, being abandon'd by his former good Fortunes, was now disgrac'd in his declining Age, sustain'd many Losses by the Armies of King Philip and Richard, was driven out of Mans, his beloved Birth-Place, with the Burning of that City, and at length was constrain'd to yield to such dishonourable Conditions as Philip thought fit to propose, one of which was That he should pay him twenty thousand Marks in Silver. Hoveden tells us that at the Meeting of these two Kings, when the Sky was clear, a dreadful Flash of Lightning fell between them and parted them, and coming together again, it thunder'd more terribly, so that the old King had fallen off his Horse, had not his Followers sustain'd him; upon which he durst not retard the Peace one Moment, but immediately submitted; but to his unspeakable Affliction, who had been so often us'd to give, and not to take Conditions. At his leaving of Mans, he in a violent Passion declar'd, That since Richard had taken that Place from him which he most lov'd in this World, he would deprive him of what ought to be most dear to a Child, which was his Heart. But after the Conclusion of the Peace, another another Thing touch'd him more nearly; for finding the Name of his beloved Son John in the Catalogue of the Confederates against him in that Action, overcome with Rage and Grief, he bitterly curs'd the Hour of his Birth, and solemnly laid God's Imprecations and his own upon both his Sons; which no Persuasions of the Bishops could cause him to revoke: But falling dangerously sick at Chinon, finding the Approaches of Death, he caus'd himself to be carry'd into the Church before the Altar, where after an humble Confession and Sorrow for his Sins, and an Acknowledgment of the Justness of this last Misfortune, he expired. It is observable, that immediately after his Death, his Domesticks, contrary to Decency and Humanity, rifled him of his Cloaths, and left him stript and naked. Nor must it be forgotten, That the violent Richard, now Heir of all, coming to meet his Father's Body, royally adorn'd for the Funeral, the Corps gush'd forth Blood, as it were accusing him of his unnatural Behaviour; at which Richard, touch'd with Remorse, melted into Floods of Tears, in a most penitent Manner attending the Remains of his unfortunate Father to the Grave, which was at Fontevrand. He dy'd on the sixth Day of July, and in the fifty sixth Year of his Age, after a troublesom and pompous Reign of thirty four Years, eight Months, and twelve Days.

He dies with Grief.

This was the End of the greatest Potentate that had hitherto sat upon the English Throne, and perhaps the greatest that was then in the Christian World; a Prince highly celebrated for his Abilities and Qualifications. He was of a robust sound Constitution, of a sanguin Complexion, and of a warm martial Disposition. He had a strong and penetrating Understanding, which he daily improv'd by Conversation and Study; was valiant and vigorous in War, and prudent and politick in Peace; magnificent in publick, frugal in private, generous to Strangers, and sparing to his Domesticks, severe to Opposers, and mild to all Compliers. But tho' he had many shining Virtues, yet he knew not how to set Bounds either to his Ambition or his Lusts; as to the former, he was wont to say, That the whole World was but sufficient for one great Man; and the latter were so exorbitant as to occasion the greatest Calamities in his Reign. He was likewise covetous, and no strict Observer of his Word; so that upon the whole, he had such a Stock of Vices as well as Virtues, natural Perfections and Imperfections, so blended together, that he can neither be said to be an exceeding good, nor an exceeding bad Prince; all which were accompany'd with the like Measures of good and ill Fortune. Vices in Princes, being more contagious than in private Persons, seldom escape God's Vengeance in this World; so the Adulteries, and perhaps Incests, of this Prince met with their natural Punishment from the Fruit of his own Body, whose Disobedience brought him in his latter Years to see the Reverse of his former Fortunes, and all his Laurels to wither on a sudden. Whereby we find that neither the Number of his Children, the Extent of his Dominions, nor all his eminent Qualities, could make his Prosperity durable; but for want of a Conquest over his Passions, and a Command over himself, he lost that Empire he had obtain'd over others. Tho' this King never impos'd many Taxes, yet he is said to have left behind him more than ninety thousand Pounds in ready Coin, besides Plate, Jewels, Household Goods, and an ample Provision for a War. In this Reign the unhappy Distinction between the Names of Normans and English was in a great measure ended. And Doctor Hody tells us that in these Times, the King's Court of Justice was where the King himself resided; and since the Courts were fix'd in Westminster Hall, our Kings have sometimes sat there in Person, and not incognito, but openly, with their Crowns on their Heads, as they us'd formerly to sit in the Curie held on the three great Festivals.

*The Reign of King RICHARD the First.Containing nine Years, and nine Months.*A. D. I.

Reg. I.

Richard succeeds in the Throne.

KING Henry left two Sons behind him, Richard and John; and both these succeeded him in the Throne of England. The former was now about thirty one Years of Age, and obtain'd the Sirname of Coeur de Lion, or Lion's Heart; a violent and valiant Prince, who from his Father's Death, seem'd to have set his whole Heart upon the Re-advancement of the Cross of Christ, lately so much dishonour'd by the Infidels in Asia. But first he took care to establish his Affairs in Normandy, and his other Dominions in France; and then sent Letters into England to set his Mother Queen Eleanor at Liberty, whom her Husband had made a Prisoner for twelve, or as others say, sixteen Years; who now sensible of others Misfortunes by her own, perform'd many Acts of Mercy and Bounty to those in the like Circumstances. Yet Richard honourably banish'd all those from his Presence and Acquaintance who had abandon'd his Father, and rewarded many others who loyally stood for him against himself in the former Contests. And having in a short Time settled all transmarine Affairs, he pass'd over into England, intending to make a short Stay there; as well to receive all the Rights of Sovereignty, as to take all proper Means and Methods to carry on his intended holy Expedition, together with Philip King of France, and several other Christian Pontentates.

The Manner of his Coronation.

Being safely arriv'd in England, he was by universal Consent crown'd at Westminster by Baldwin Arch-Bishop of Canterbury; the Particulars of which Solemnity we have from Hoveden and Diceto, and which in Substance were thus. First the Arch-Bishops of Canterbury, Roven, Triers, and Dublin, with the other Bishops, Abbots and Clergy, cloath'd in rich Copes and Habits, with the Cross, Holy-Water and Censers born before them, came to fetch Duke Richard at the Door of his Privy-Chamber, from whence they led him to the Abby-Church of Westminster in a solemn Procession. In the middle of the Bishops and Clergy were four Barons, bearing golden Candlesticks and Tapers; and after them came Geoffry de Lucy with the Royal Cap, John the Marshall with a massie Pair of golden Spurs, William Earl of Pembroke with the Royal Scepter and a golden Cross at the End of it, and William Earl of Salisbury with the golden Rod and a Dove on the Top. Then came three other Earls, David Earl of Huntington, Brother to the King of the Scots, John Earl of Mortaign, Duke Richard's Brother, in the middle, and Robert Earl of Leicester; each bearing a large Sword upright in his Hand, with the Scabbards richly adorn'd with Gold. These were follow'd by six Earls and Barons bearing a checker'd Table, with the Regalia upon it; and those by William Mandevel Earl of Albermarle, bearing a large and rich Crown of Gold; after whom came Richard himself, between the Bishops of Durham and Bath, under a Canopy of State born by four Barons. Then follow'd a noble Train of Earls, Barons, Knights and others as well of the Clergy as Laity, who in a pompous manner accompany'd him to the High-Altar, where solemnly laying his Hands upon the Holy Evangelists, and the Relicks of divers Saints, he took a formal Oath, 'To observe Peace, Honour and Reverence to Almighty God, his Church, and Ministers, all the Days of his Life; That he would exercise Justice and Equity towards the People committed to his Charge; and that he would abrogate all evil Laws and unjust Customs, and make, keep and sincerely maintain those that were good and laudable. Then the Arch-Bishop proceeded to anoint him in three Places, the Head, Breast and Arms, signifying by those Unctions Glory, Fortitude, itude, and Wisdom; and before he gave him the Crown he solemnly adjur'd him in the Name of the High God, Not to presume to take this Dignity upon him, unless he resolv'd inviolably to keep those Vows and Oaths, he had just then made; to which the King answer'd, That by God's Grace he would faithfully perform them all. Upon which the Arch-Bishop set the Crown upon his Head, deliver'd the Scepter into his right Hand, and plac'd the Rod-Royal in his left; in which manner he was led to his Throne, and after Mass and the Offertory was over, to his Lodgings, in the same solemn Procession. This in short was the Form of the King's Coronation, which Solemnity was unfortunately polluted with the Blood of many Jews, tho' utterly against the King's Will, who pressing into the Abby Church to see the Ceremony, were in a Tumult barbarously murder'd by the People.

Shortly after his Coronation, King Richard proceeded to all Kind of Methods for the Prosecution of the Holy-War, for which all his Father's vast Treasure, and those great Sums he extorted from Stephen Turnham his Treasurer, were not thought sufficient. Therefore he sold many of his Manors and Castles to divers Persons; as to Hugh Bishop of Durham the Manor of Sadbery for six hundred Marks, and soon after the Earldom of Northumberland to be held with his Bishoprick, with this Piece of Rallery upon it, He had made a young Earl of an old Bishop; and this not satisfying his ambitious Temper, he besides gave the King one thousand Marks more to be one of his chief Justiciaries in his Absence. Besides these the King sold many other Manors and Lands to such Bishops and Abbots as would purchase them, they being then the chief mony'd Men in England; by which means he rais'd immense Sums towards his intended Expedition. He granted to William King of the Scots the Castles of Berwick and Roxborough for ten thousand Marks, and releas'd him of those Covenants made to his Father, as extorted from him when a Prisoner, only reserving to himself such Rights as had been allow'd by his Brother Malcolm to the former Kings of England. Moreover upon some Displeasure he imprison'd the great Lawyer Glanville, and forc'd him to purchase his Liberty at no less Sum than fifteen thousand Pounds; and even his Favourite William Longchamp pay'd three thousand Pounds to have the great Seal continu'd in his Custody during the King's Absence; and when he was question'd why he sold so many Places and Manors, he made Answer, That he would sell London it self, if he could find a good Chapman; so earnestly intent he was upon this plausible Enterprize. As for Men and Soldiers, the Prelates, Friars and other Preachers excited great Numbers by their various Exhortations in Pulpits and private Conferences, resounding nothing but the Cross and Passion of Jesus Christ, calling upon the World to revenge his glorious Cause against all Pagans and Infidels.

The King prepares for the Holy War.

*Howden.
M. Paris.*

The main Danger of the State in the King's Absence was in his Brother John, of whose Ambition he had reason to be jealous, as knowing that his Father, not long before his Death, had design'd him his Successor; therefore to conquer his aspiring Thoughts with Bounty and Munificence, and to remove all Occasions of Complaint, King Richard did in some Degree share his Kingdom with him, investing him with six Earldoms, Cornwall, Dorset, Somerset, Nottingham, Derby and Lancaster, besides Castles, Honours, Manors, Forests, and Bounties, and finally with the Earldom of Glocester, and the Heiress of that County for his Wife; tho' the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury forbade the Nuptials, alledging she was within the Degrees of Consanguinity. But lest through ill Nature or Advice, Earl John should make a wrong Use of these great Donations, he laid several Restraints upon him, and intrusted him with no Part of the Regal Power; but laid the main Burthen of the Government upon his Chancellor Longchamp, Bishop of Ely, chief Justiciary, and Legate to the See of Rome, who was now invested with whatsoever either King or Pope could grant for the Completion of his Authority. So that, as Paris says, he might well be call'd Prince and Priest of England, as being the most powerful Subject for the

the Time, that had been known in the Nation; for tho' the King had join'd Hugh Bishop of Durham with him in Commission, for all the Parts beyond the Humber, yet Longchamp in a short Time easily made himself sole Justiciary, and by his Authority silenc'd the Name and Endeavours of his Collegue. Thus the chief Command, and the Sovereign Power it self was in the Chancellor as Vice-Roy, but for the Defence and Execution of his Justice, the King prudently associated with his Justiciaries, William Earl of Arundell, Hugh Bardolfe, William Marshall, Geoffry Fitz-Peter, William Brimere, Robert de Whitfield, and Robert Fitz-Reinfield, all Men of Honour, Wisdom and Authority. To compleat all, King Richard took care to provide for the Neighbourhood of Wales and Scotland; but tho' he did not so well succeed with Rees Prince of the former, yet William King of Scotland came to the King in England, and concluded a firm Alliance with him, which he religiously kept, in the greatest Troubles of King Richard, to His and his Nation's Honour; and, as some write, sent his Brother David with five thousand Scots to serve him in the Holy War.

The two Kings

They meet at Messina.

The Affairs of England being thus establish'd, King Richard cross'd the Seas to meet King Philip in France, according to Appointment, that from thence, with Minds and Forces united, they might set forwards under the Banner of the Cross; which after some Stay, occasion'd by the Death of Philip's Queen, they undertook upon these Christian and Friendly Terms: 'That each should preserve the other's Honour, and bear Faith to him as to Life, Member and wordly Dignity: That neither should fail the other in their Affairs; but the King of France should help the King of England to defend his Land, as he would defend the City of Paris if besieg'd; and the latter should help the former to defend his, as he would defend the City of Roven if besieg'd. This being committed to Writing, and then ratify'd by Oath, the two Kings sent it to their Earls and Barons, who solemnly swore not to trespass against their Fealty, nor stir up any War in either of the King's Dominions, during the Time of this extraordinary Pilgrimage; and on the other side the Arch-Bishops and Bishops firmly promis'd to execrate and excommunicate all such as should transgress this Agreement. Thus, after some necessary Delays, these two, the greatest Monarchs of the Western World, set forwards by Land, to the reputed publick Service of Christianity, with such Numbers as they themselves thought most proper; which were so great, that having pass'd the Rhone at Lions, and receiv'd some Loss by the Breaking of the Bridge, they parted Company for meer Conveniency of travelling. Philip pass'd over the Alps into Italy, and Richard to the Sea-Coast at Marseilles, there to meet with his Royal Navy, which consisting of all the capital Ships of England and Normandy, and his other French Dominions, was appointed to attend at that Port. But the Fleet being not arriv'd, King Richard, impatient of Delays, after eight Days Continuance there, embark'd with the Attendance of twenty hired Gallies, and ten great Busses, and set Sail for Messina in Sicily, the Rendezvous of both the Kings and their Armies. In which Passage, occasionally lying at Anchor at the Mouth of the Tiber, he was desired by the Bishop of Ostia in the Pope's Name to make a Visit to his Holiness; but the King freely charg'd the Pope with Avarice and Simony in relation to some new advanc'd Bishops in his Dominions, and therefore utterly refus'd to see Rome. Thus after several Accidents and Landings, hearing that his Navy was safe, he tarry'd for all, and after that, upon the twenty third Day of September, came to Anchor before the City of Messina, with so great a Shew of Power, and Noise of Warlike Instruments, and other Marks of Grandeur and Majesty, in the Sight of Philip and his French, and of many other Nations there assembled, that it caus'd a Terror to the Inhabitants, and no small Envy to his Confederates.

Tancred was at that Time King, or rather Usurper of Sicily, after the Death of William, who had marry'd Joan the Sister of King Richard, and out of Hatred or Policy had imprison'd that Queen; but upon the Appearance of her Brother, he honourably sent her to him, and yielded to several Articles, and to the Payment of large Sums of Mony. And now Fear wrought on both Sides; and Richard being among Strangers, and not fully sure of the French, seiz'd upon a Fortrefs in the Island of a valiant People call'd Griffons, and after that by means of an extraordinary Tumult took the City of Messina it self. From which Time the Spirit of Discord seems to have been sown between the two Royal Adventurers; for King Richard, flush'd with Victory, display'd his Banners, even in those Parts of the City appointed for King Philip's Quarters, which gave great Offence to the other, and occasion'd many warm Expressions. Yet at length by the Mediation of great Men on both Sides, the Contest was for the present adjusted; and Richard order'd his Ensigns to be taken down, and then deliver'd the Custody of the City to the Knights Hospitallers, and Templars, 'till all Things required from the King of Sicily were perform'd. After much Deliberation, in answer to King Richard's Demands, Tancred insisted That he had already paid to his Sister, late Queen of the Island, large Sums of Mony in lieu of her Dowry or Jointure; and concerning the Legacies intended by his Predecessor King William, to the Father of King Richard, he was ready to satisfy him, as far as he ought according to the Customs of his Kingdom. But to appease that Power he could not resist, he gave to King Richard twenty thousand Ounces of Gold, in Consideration of his Sister's Jointure; and further to be acquitted of all other Claims and Pretences, and likewise in Consideration that Arthur Duke of Bretaign, Nephew and next Heir to King Richard, should marry the Daughter of King Tancred, he paid a second Sum of twenty thousand Ounces more: After which, to purchase the Amity of King Richard and the Love of the English Nation, as also for the greater Assurance of Performance of Articles, he voluntarily added a third Sum of twenty thousand Ounces, and afterwards four great Ships call'd Urfers, and fifteen Gallies. On the other Side King Richard, that he might not be wanting in any Thing which in Honour and Equity might be expected from him, besides Letters Patents, he chose unexceptionable Sureties upon Oath, as two Arch-Bishops, two Bishops, and no less than twenty Lords and great Men, whose Names are upon Record in Hoveden. And for a final Confirmation, he offer'd that Pope Clement should undertake for the Performance of his Part of the said Agreement; and accordingly wrot Letters to him upon that Subject, freely giving him leave, upon any Failure in him, to put all his Dominions under the severest Censures.

King Richard gains Advantages in Sicily.

Tancred King of Sicily gives him large Sums

The Peace being happily concluded, Tancred before he took leave of King Richard, discover'd to him a foul and dishonourable Design of the French King, against his Person and Safety; which shortly after coming to be warmly debated between the two Kings, Philip charg'd Richard with inventing and promoting of Contests; and further added That unless Richard marry'd his Sister Alice, according to the ancient Contract, he would be his irreconcilable Enemy. To which King Richard, being urg'd, return'd in Answer, That the Princess during her Abode in England, had a Child by his Father Henry, which he was ready to prove by many Witnesses then present; so that he had far more Cause than a bare Suspicion of Incontinency, to refuse the Marriage. Upon this ungrateful Discovery, and upon certain new Conditions between the two Kings, Philip left the other at liberty to chuse a Wife where he thought fit, and seem'd to be reconcil'd to him; yet still Tancred's late Information rais'd such a Distrust and Jealousie between 'em, that from thence forward they were never true Friends. Not long after, they both parted for the intended holy Expedition. But because Examples of true Christian Humility are too rare among Princes and Potentates, we must not pass by that of this famous General King Richard, who about this Time, as Hoveden expresses it, being inspir'd with Divine Grace and studying to fit himself for this great Enterprize, felt such a Compunction for his Sins, that he made a solemn Confession of all his Excesses before his Bishops, humbly imploring the Mercy of God, and the Absolution of his subordinate Ministers. Our Author adds that God respected him with the Eyes of Mercy, and gave him a penitent Heart, so that from thenceforward he prov'd a Man fearing God, and eschewing Evil. And now addicting his Mind to Contemplation, and the Honour of the Christian Church, whose Champion he was, he desir'd the Conference of a famous Visionary Abbot in Italy call'd Joachim, celebrated for his profound Knowledge of the Scriptures, and his prophetic Revelations. This Man preaching before the King upon the Apocalypse of St. John, concerning the coming of Antichrist, freely declar'd That Antichrist was then born, and in the City of Rome should be advanc'd to the Apostolick See, of whom the Apostle said, he should exalt himself above all that is call'd God; and that the seven Crowns were the Kings and Princes of the Earth who obey'd him. This, tho' accidental, administer'd sufficient Occasion for Reflexions; by reason Kings and Princes were suppos'd to be those Gods over whom Antichrist should exalt himself: For shortly after, Henry the Emperor together with his Empress Constantia, at their Coronation in St. Peter's Church stooping down to the Ground, receiv'd their Imperial Crowns from between the Feet of the Pope, with which he immediately struck them off their Heads; signifying by that Action, That he had Power to throw them out of their Dominions whenever he thought fit.

He removes from Sicily.

The same Day that Philip and the French Forces set Sail from Messina, Ele- nor King Richard's Mother arriv'd with Berengaria his new intended Spouse, Daughter to Sanctius King of Navarre, whom he afterwards marry'd in Cy- prus; but his Mother after a short Stay return'd by Rome into England, leaving the young Lady with Joan Queen Dowager of Sicily, both which ac-company'd the King towards the Holy-Land, his whole Navy consisting of an hundred and fifty large Ships and fifty three Gallies, besides thirteen Busses, and many Tenders; but we do not find what Number of Soldiers were in the English Army. This Royal Navy, sailing between the Isles of Rhodes and Cyprus, was dispers'd by a terrible Storm, which turn'd much to the Honour and Advantage of King Richard, as giving him an Occasion of new Conquests. For two of the Vessels being cast away upon the Coasts of Cyprus, near the Port of Limezun, and the Ship that carry'd the Princess in great Danger; Isaac the King, or, as he was call'd, Emperor of that Island, barbarously rifled and imprison'd those Persons that escap'd, and would not permit the Ladies to enter the Harbour, tho' in great Distress: Which uncommon Inhumanity, neither Heav'n nor King Richard would forgive. For the said inhospitable Prince, having thrice refus'd to make Restitution of his unlawful Seizures and Prisoners, was soon after enter'd upon and invaded by the English, driven from the Coasts with great Dishonour and Slaughter, the City of Limezun left a Prey to the Victors, and himself beaten out of his Camp, and taken Prisoner.
 After an Escape made by him, his only Daughter and Heiress was forc'd to yield her self Prisoner, and lastly himself, despairing to be conceal'd, came of his own Accord, and was put into Fetters of Silver; upon which the whole Island, with all its People, Strength and Riches, became Subject to the King of England, and both Father and Daughter were led into Captivity. In this Island King Richard was honour'd by the Attendance of Guido King of Jeru-

 and many other Princes, who offer'd him their Service; and here he finish'd the Nuptials of his beloved Lady Berengaria. Isaac was sent to Tripolis in Syria, his Daughter committed to the King's Sister and Queen, and the Island intrus-

 Forces and Provisions; and the Islanders were suffer'd to enjoy all such Laws and Liberties, as they held in the Reign of Manuel the Emperor of Constantinople.

II. During these prosperous Transactions abroad, the State of England suffer'd extreamly at home under the Government of Bishop Longchamp the Chancellor, who arrogating to himself that Authority which belong'd to the rest of the Commissioners in common, acted as he thought fit, and with that Insolence deputed himself, that he incurr'd the Hatred of the whole Kingdom, both Clergy and Laity. His Train was said to be so great, and his Attendance so numerous, that whenever he lay in any religious House but one Night, three Years Revenues would scarce recover the Charge. Besides, being a Foreigner himself, and employing only Frenchmen about him, he render'd his Actions more insupportable to the English: Insomuch that the whole Clergy and Nobility oppos'd his Proceedings; and the King's Brother John taking Advantage of their Discontents, to render himself popular, and to make way for his design'd Usurpation, join'd with the State against the Bishop, as being the Person who had ever defeated his aspiring Attempts; having a particular Eye upon him, as a most dangerous Man, in respect of the King's Charge and his own Safety. In a short Time he found a fair Opportunity to ruin the Chancellor by means of Geoffry the Elect Arch-Bishop of York, natural Son to the late King Henry, to whose Preferment in England King Richard was averse, and therefore had confin'd him to Normandy during his Absence, where after much Difficulty, he had obtain'd Power of the present Pope to be invested in the said See. Longchamp being inform'd of this Person's Arrival, order'd him to be apprehended at Dover, where he was forcibly drawn out of the Church to which he had retir'd, and ignominiously dragg'd from the Altar to the Castle in his Pontifical Habit. Upon this Violence, Earl John commanded the Chancellor not only to release him, but immediately to answer the Matter before the Assembly of the Bishops and Nobility at St. Paul's; where they urg'd against him many heinous Actions, committed contrary to his Commission, and the Good of the King and Kingdom. The Arch-Bishop of Roven, and the Earl of Pembroke openly shew'd the King's Letters Patents, dated at Messina, by which they were made equal Commissioners with him in the Government of the Kingdom; in which notwithstanding he would not suffer them to be concern'd, but according to his violent Methods govern all himself. Upon which he was by the Assembly formally depos'd from his Office, and the Arch-Bishop of Roven put in his Place; as also the Tower of London, and Castle of Windsor were taken from him, and deliver'd to the Arch-Bishop. Thus this great Officer, presuming too much upon his own Power, was thrown down from his Seat, and forc'd to resign his Legantine Cross at Canterbury, and take up that for the Holy War; and endeavouring to escape privately over the Sea, he was in the Habit of a Woman, with a Web of Linnen Cloath under his Arm, taken upon the Shore at Dover, and opprobriously made a Spectacle to the People, and conducted with all Derision to the Castle. Whence after eight Days he was releas'd by Earl John, and permitted to pursue his intended Voyage; in which, being the Messenger of his own Usage, he had the Advantage of his Adversaries, and prevail'd against them with the Pope, who was highly displeas'd to find the Legantine Power so vilify'd. In the mean Time Earl John, with the Commissioners, confirm'd to the City of London their common Liberties, and caus'd the Citizens to swear Fealty to King Richard and his Heir; and if he dy'd without Issue, they were then to maintain Earl John as their Lord and King, against all Men whatsoever.

Thus forward was Earl John in his Attempts upon the Crown of his Brother King Richard, while he was passing into the Holy-Land with the Spoils and Treasure of three noble Islands, England, Sicily and Cyprus, besides Normandy, and other Parts of France; in which distant Country almost all was consum'd, tho' to the great Renown of himself and Nation. And here, for the Reader's clearer Understanding of these Affairs, it will not be amiss to take notice, That about ninety two Years since, Godfrey of Bouillon and his Assistants recover'd the City of Jerusalem, with the Country of Palestine, and a great Part of Syria, out of the Hands of the Saracens, obtain'd the Kingdom, and reigning one Year dy'd, and left his Brother Baldwin to succeed him; who governing eighteen Years, left the Crown to another of that Name Baldwin de Borgo, who reign'd thirteen Years, and left a Daughter, and the Kingdom in Dispute. Fulk Earl of Anjou marrying this Daughter, enjoy'd the Kingdom eleven Years, and left two young Sons, Baldwin, who reign'd twenty four Years, and Almerick twelve; which last left the Kingdom to his Son Baldwin, who being sickly and despairing of Issue, made his Sister Sibill's Son Baldwin his Successor, and committed the Charge of him, with the Administration of the Kingdom to Raynmond Earl of Tripoly, whom Guido de Lusignan, having marry'd the Widow Sibill, put from that Charge, usurp'd the Government, and at length the Kingdom, not without Suspicion of poisoning the young King. Raynmond making War upon him, Guido imprudently drew in Sultan Saladin of Egypt to his Assistance, who improving this Opportunity of enlarging his Dominions, soon destroy'd them both, with their Kingdom, and won the Cities of Acon, Azotus, Berytus, Ascalon, and after one Months Siege, the City of Jerusalem it self, eighty eight Years after it had been conquer'd by the famous Godfrey of Bouillon.

To recover this ruinous State, the two great Kings of England and France came from far distant Countries, with Armies compos'd of different Nations and several Inclinations, as English, French, Italians, Germans, and others, against a mighty Prince of an united Power, within his own Territories, acquainted with the Manner of the Fights and the Nature of the Forces of the Christians, and possess'd of the best Parts of the Country. And here they successively sat down before Acon or Ptolomais, defended by the Power of Saladin, which had been before besieged by the Christians for the Space of three Years, and had cost the Lives of many worthy Princes and great Men of several Nations, whose Names are still in the Records of Fame. And notwithstanding all the Forces of those two Kings, the Garrison held out four Months after, and then surrender'd upon these Articles. 1. That Saladin should by a certain Day restore the Holy Cross. 2. That he should set free fifteen hundred Christian Captives. 3. That the City, and all Things contain'd in it, should remain to the Christians. 4. That the Garrison should only have their Lives sav'd, if these Conditions were perform'd. 5. That they should pay twenty thousand Pieces of Gold, towards the Charges of the two Kings. At their Entrance into the City, the Banners of Leopold Duke of Austria, being planted on the Walls, were with great Disgrace taken down by the Command of King Richard, and those of the two Kings erected; which highly incens'd the Duke, who immediately quitted the Service, and afterwards found Means to revenge himself. Besides this, during the Siege, divers Marks of Jealousie and Displeasure appear'd between the Kings themselves; and the Competition of Honour made the least Disproportion of it a Wound beyond Cure. And now that Article formerly concluded of equally dividing their Profits in the Expedition, came to be question'd: The King of France claim'd half the Isle of Cyprus, and the King of England half the Treasure and Goods of the Earl of Flanders, which the other had lately seiz'd; and in this neither were satisfy'd. Then appear'd the two Pretenders to the Crown of Jerusalem, Guido of Lusignan, and Conrade of Montferrat; the former pleading Possession in right of his Wife Sibill, the King of England espous'd his Cause; and the King of France join'd with Conrade. These Differences created continual Heart-burnings between 'em, and they were so much distemper'd by their own violent Heats, and the hot Contagion of the Country, that they fell into a most dangerous Sicknefs, which occasion'd the intire Loss of their Hair. But being recover'd, the French King resolv'd to stay no longer, where he saw so little Probability of Honour or Advantage, and the rather because by the Death of the Earl of Flanders he had an Opportunity of enlarging his his Dominions at home; therefore he sent to King Richard for his Consent to return home. Richard fearing to let an offended Lion loose, would not grant it, 'till he had taken a solemn Oath, That he would protect his Dominions and People 'till his Return, and would do no Damage to them, nor suffer any to be done by others.

The King of France thus leaving Acon, in the Castle of which King Richard's Queen and Sister were lodg'd, and the Duke of Burgundy remaining behind with the French Army, and a great Part of his Master's Treasure, King Richard the same Day set forwards upon a new Enterprize: For before, by reason of the Dissention between the Kings which should be greatest, scarce any Thing prosper'd; and Richard had just Cause to complain in his Letters, That Philip to the great Reproach of himself and Kingdom, had dishonourably forsaken his Purpose and Vow to God. When Saladin could by no Means obtain a longer Day for the Performance of the said Articles of Composition, he barbarously cut off the Heads of all his Christian Captives; in Revenge of which King Richard brought out his Mahometan Captives, to the Number of two thousand seven hundred, and in the sight of Saladin's Camp, caus'd them all to be beheaded; the Duke of Burgundy doing the same to near the same Number, by the Walls of Acon, only seven of the chief being preserv'd alive by the Christian Generals. King Richard vigorously proceeding in his new design'd Enterprize, march'd towards Joppa, in which he was furiously set upon by Saladin, who had just before put the Duke of Burgundy to flight, and slain the valiant Jaques de Avennes, who made a noble Resistance with only a few in the Reer; but Richard encounter'd him with so much Courage and Bravery, that he constrain'd him to fly dishonourably, with the Loss of three thousand of his choicest Soldiers. About this Time the King met with a remarkable Deliverance from the Hands of the Saracens: For one Day diverting himself with Hawking, attended by a small Retinue, and being tired with the Exercise, he laid himself under a Tree to sleep; of which a Party of the Enemy having notice, they laid an Ambuscade, and sent some of their Men to set upon the King, and provoke him to fight; which when they had done, by a feign'd Flight they drew him into their Ambush, and suddenly surrounded him and his Company. Here he had certainly been taken Prisoner, had not one of his Gentlemen nam'd William de Pratellis, out of an uncommon Piece of Generosity, sav'd him by causing himself to be taken in his stead, and crying out in the Saracen's Tongue, I am the King; upon which they all seiz'd upon him, while the King and divers of his Followers made their Escapes. Afterwards, the King in Consideration of this noble Act, gave in Exchange for him ten of the greatest Noblemen among his Prisoners; manifesting the Esteem he had for this brave Man, whom alone he valu'd at the Rate of ten Princes.

King Richard defeats Saladin.

Insanif. f. v. d. m. 16.

Still King Richard vigorously pursu'd his Designs, and after several brave and important Actions, march'd up within sight of Jerusalem, where he skirmish'd with the Enemy, and overthrew the Convoy or Caravan of Saladin, which camerichly laden from Babylon, and was guarded by ten thousand Men; whom Richard valiantly attack'd with five thousand select Soldiers, put most of them to the Sword, took three thousand Camels and four thousand Horses and Mules, and recover'd a noble Booty. After this, and many other great Exploits, as the Relief of Joppa, and the Repulse of Saladin from that Place, the King, indefatigable in his brave Attempts, endeavouring to regain Jerusalem and the City of Baruck, was abandon'd in that Enterprize by the Duke of Burgundy, who is vehemently suspected to have been brib'd by Saladin: Upon which he began to hearken to the Knights Templars, and the chief of the Christian Army, who perswaded him not to refuse Saladin's Offers for a Cessation of Arms, especially considering that he design'd to return with greater Forces and Treasure; that his present Power, by Divisions, by Sickness and Encounters was much wasted and weaken'd; and that the dangerous State of his own Dominions, by reason of undue Practices at home, and the Designs of King Philip abroad, did now require his own Presence. At length after some Struggles of Honour and Conscience, the King concluded a Truce with Saladin for three Years upon these Conditions: 'First that Ascalon should be demolish'd, and not fortify'd 'by either Party during the Truce; yet Joppa might be possess'd by the Christians, and all the Country then in the Christians Hands, without Molestation 'from the Saracens. And then the Christians should have free Liberty to go 'in Pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre without Charge, and likewise have free 'Commerce through Saladin's Dominions. Upon Conclusion of the Treaty, King Richard let Saladin know, That when the Truce was ended, he would return again, and once more endeavour to recover the Holy-Land from his Domi- nions. To which Saladin is said to have return'd this generous Answer, That he had so great an Esteem for King Richard's Worth, that if it must be his Fate to lose his Country, he had rather it should be to him, than to any other Prince whatsoever. Thus this great Crusade ended with little more Advantage than the taking of one single City; and King Richard departed with the Displeasure of having on one Side concluded a dishonourable Truce, and on the other, with the Satisfaction of having bestow'd two Kingdoms at his Departure, that of Jerusalem upon the Count de Champagne his Nephew, and that of Cyprus, which he had conquer'd by his own Arms, upon Guido de Lusignan, in whose House it continu'd two hundred and eighty Years.

He leaves the Holy-Land.

He goes into Austria:

Thus Richard having settled the Affairs of the East, and sent away his Queen and Sister, with the King of Cyprus's Daughter, under the Conduct of Stephen Turnham, he went on board a large Buss at Acon, and set sail in the Beginning of October for Corfu; where arriving in less than a Month, he continu'd his Voyage to Ragusa in the Gulf of Venice, and landing near that City, resolv'd to go by Land through Sclavonia into Austria. Where when he arriv'd, tho' he and his Attendants, endeavouring to be unknown, had disguis'd themselves like Pilgrims with long Hair and Beards, yet they could not be long conceal'd, by reason of their extraordinary Expences; which was also confirm'd by the Rumours of the King's being somewhere in those Parts. Richard had now reason to fear the Duke of Austria whom he had affronted at Acon, and because he knew he had a secret Hatred towards him, by reason of the League he had made with Tancred King of Sicily, the Emperor's Competitor for that Kingdom; as also because of the Assassination of Conrade Marquess of Montferrat his Kinsman, in which he suspected King Richard to have been concern'd. Wherefore fearing to be taken Prisoner, Richard privately withdrew from his Retinue, committing the Charge of them to one of his principal Gentlemen that waited on him; and so taking Horse with one single Servant, he travell'd Day and Night 'till he arriv'd near the City of Vienna. But coming to a small Village, and lying down on a Bed to repose himself, while his Servant went out to buy Provisions, the Man was known by one belonging to the Duke of Austria; and being seiz'd and brought before him, after many Enquiries he was constrain'd to reveal where the King was. Upon which the Duke immediately sent thither, and took him Prisoner as he lay asleep; of which Prize the Duke was not a little joyful, having now an Opportunity not only of revenging himself for the Affront put upon him at the taking of Acon, but also of enriching himself by an extraordinary Ransom, which he resolv'd to have for him, before he gave him his Liberty. But shortly after the Emperor Henry VI. sent to demand him, allodging, That the Duke being his Vassal, it belong'd to him to have the Custody of the King's Person; whereupon the Duke, being promis'd a large share of his Ransom, deliver'd him into the Emperor's Hand, who kept him Prisoner about a Year. And thus this great Prince's unfortunate Expedition to the Holy-Land ended as ingloriously, as it was at first magnanimously undertaken: having consum'd therein all that mighty Treasure left him by his Father, and all that he could draw from his Subjects, and others, by violent Extortions, plausible Promises, or subtle Practices.

III. The strange News of King Richard's Imprisonment, after so much Valour shewn, flying through Europe, soon disclos'd who were faithful or perfidious. His careful Mother and best Friends, overcome with Grief and Sorrow, put new Oaths to the Nation to be true to him, watch'd the Coasts, provided for the Security of the State, and fortify'd all the Cities and chief Towns of the Kingdom. On the contrary Earl John, being by the cunning Insinuations of his Brother's Foes, not only put in Hopes of his perpetual Bondage, but also incens'd against him for designing the Crown to his Nephew Arthur Duke of Bretaign, enter'd into an unbrotherly Attempt against his Sovereign; and after he had allur'd many Persons by Promises, and fortify'd many Places in England, pass'd the Sea, and enter'd into a League with the King of France, utterly to put his Nephew Arthur from the Hopes the Britains had conceiv'd of his Promotion. The Normans giving way to his disloyal Practices, he swore Fealty to Philip King of France, and promis'd to marry his Sister Alice, tho' dishonour'd by his own Father, and for that Cause rejected by King Richard. Out of Normandy he posted into England, soliciting both Peers and People, but met with a very loyal Resistance; yet not so discourag'd, he labour'd to excite the Scots and Welsh to join in an Invasion with him, for which end the French and Flemmings assur'd them that King Richard would never be set at Liberty: But still William King of the Scots would never give Consent or Countenance to such dishonourable Practices. In this dangerous Time the Valour and Loyalty of the City of Roven appear'd in a most exemplary Manner: For Philip coming before it with a powerful Army, solicited the Citizens by the most alluring Promises to revolt; upon which, setting open their Gates, they return'd no other Answer but That he might enter if he pleas'd. But this vain-glorious King, finding that the very Women and Virgins had poll'd their Heads like Men, and with the rest of the Inhabitants pour'd melted Pitch and such like Materials upon the Heads of the Besiegers, he march'd away in great Confusion.

During these Disturbances King Richard, formerly a Conqueror now a Prisoner, was brought into the Presence of the Emperor in a publick Assembly of the Nobility; where the Emperor to terrifie him charg'd him with many Crimes, especially the Assassination of the Marquess Conrade his Cousen. But the King knowing his own Innocency, answer'd all the Emperor's Allegations with so much Eloquence and Courage, that he not only gave full Satisfaction to all present, but mov'd the covetous Emperor to compassionate his Misfortunes, and to reverence his Person; but not to that Degree as to make him willing to discharge him without a great Ransom. Not long after the King sent Letters to the Arch-Bishops, Bishops, Earls, Barons, Clerks and Free-Tenants of England, wherein he desired all the Clergy and Laity to raise such a Sum as might procure him his Liberty. The Emperor wrot to the same Purpose, and the Pope, who threaten'd the Kingdom with an Interdict, unless the King were speedily set free, also wrot to the King of France that he would anathematize his Kingdom, unless he forbore disturbing Richard's Territories while he was a Prisoner. Upon the Receipt of the King's Letters, and upon their Authority, the Queen-Mother and the Lords Justices determined that all Clerks and Laicks should contribute the fourth Part of their Revenues that Year for the Redemption of the King; and that they should add so much more out of their moveable Goods, as their Sovereign might at his Return own it as an Obligation. To this they added twenty Shillings upon every Knight's Fee, and order'd That the Abbies of the Cisterciens, and Houses of the Order of Templengham, should contribute all their Wool of that Year, and that all the Gold and Silver in the Churches should be brought out and deliver'd to that purpose. Thus a vast Sum was rais'd in England, and receiv'd by the Emperor's Envoys at London, in part of the King's Ransom; and not long after the Emperor and King came to a final Agreement upon these Conditions. 1. 'That the King should pay an hundred thousand Marks to the Emperor, and fifty thousand more to the Duke of Austria. 2. That the King should marry his Nephew Arthur's Sister to the Duke's Son, and deliver up the Captive King of Cyprus and his Daughter. 3. That the hundred thousand Marks should be brought into the Empire at the Peril of the King of England, and Hostages to be given for the rest. But to colour over this unprincely Extortion, the Emperor by a particular Charter gave to King Richard the Country of Provence in France with several other large Territories, containing five Archbishopricks, and thirty three Bishopricks, which had been long out of the Emperor's Possession; and crown'd him King of them all, and wrote magnificent Letters into England upon that Occasion.

A. D. 1194. Reg. 5. Still King Philip us'd all Methods to hinder Richard of his Liberty, and finding that the Emperor and he were agreed, he sent Messengers to Earl John, advising him To look to himself, for the Devil was now let loose, and urg'd him to usurp the Kingdom of England. Now when King Richard expected his Liberty at a general Diet held at Spire, where were present the three Arch-Bishops of Mentz, Cologne and Saltzburg, the three Bishops of Worms, Spire and Liege, the three Dukes of Suabia, Austria and Lovain, the Count Palatine of the Rhine, and several others, who had undertaken for the Emperor, whose Officers had already receiv'd the greatest Part of the Ransom; his Business was unfortunately obstructed by the Arrival of Envoys from King Philip and Earl John, who offer'd fifty thousand Marks from the King, and thirty thousand from the Earl to the Emperor to keep Richard Prisoner 'till Michaelmas following; or if the Emperor thought fit, they would give him a thousand Pounds a Month, as long as he should keep him Prisoner; or else the King of France would give him an hundred thousand Marks, and Earl John fifty thousand to deliver him Prisoner into their Hands, or at least to keep him one whole Year. These great Proffers had such an Effect upon the Emperor's corrupt Disposition, that he immediately deferr'd the Day of setting Richard at Liberty, which almost reduc'd that Prince to Despair; but the above-nam'd Heads of the Empire, freely reprov'd the Emperor for his excessive Avarice, and his dishonourable Treatment of a crown'd Head, and so far prevail'd, that upon the fourth Day of February, he was by the Arch-Bishops of Mentz and Cologne restor'd after fifteen Months Imprisonment into the Hands of his Mother Queen Eleanor, who with all there present receiv'd him with Tears as well as Transports of Joy. Yet so prevalent is the Power of Money, that some Writers report, that after this the Emperor repented of his Release, and sent Messengers after in order to seize him; but the King being inform'd of this Design, hasten'd on Shipboard, and happily landed at Sandwich on the thirteenth Day of March. In England he was receiv'd in a triumphant Manner; and coming near Rocheſter, Hubert the new Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, who had been with him at the Siege of Acon, met him in a pompous Solemnity; whom when the King saw, he immediately dismounted, and having bow'd his Knee, fell upon the Earth, which in like Manner was done by the Arch-Bishop, 'till at length both rising up, run into each others Arms, with the highest Marks of Pleasure and Satisfaction.

And here most Writers take Notice of the Vengeance of Heav'n upon the covetous Duke of Austria and the Emperor; that the former was punish'd with several Plagues and Calamities in his Country, of which he was so far from being sensible, that he press'd more earnestly for the Payment of the rest of King Richard's Ransom, threatening the Hostages with Death, if it was not speedily discharg'd. Upon which one of them call'd Baldwin de Betune, was by Consent sent over into England, to remind the King of his Articles; and he compassionating the Case of his Hostages, immediately dispatch'd this Baldwin with his Niece Eleanor, to be marry'd to the Duke of Austria's Son; but before their Arrival the Duke by a Fall from his Horse, broke his Leg, and brought himself to a tedious and miserable End. Finding his Death certain, in a penitent Manner he commanded the Hostages to be discharg'd, and the Remainder of the Money to be remitted; to which his Son not being willing to comply, the Clergy of that Country would not permit the Duke's Body to be bury'd, till he had perform'd his Father's Will. As to the Emperor, he to carry on an evil Design, did afterwards remit some Part of the Ransom; yet he was pursu'd by many Troubles, and by the Pope excommunicated upon King Richard's Account. At length falling into a great Fit of Sickness in Sicily, he sent his Chancellor a Bishop to King Richard, to desire his Pardon, promising Restitution of what he had taken for his Ransom: But before he could arrive and deliver his Message, the Emperor dy'd under that Sentence at Messina. Nor were the King of England's Afflictions unprofitable to him; for they gave him Occasion to reform his Life, taking home his Queen Berengaria, whose Society he had a long Time neglected, tho' she was a virtuous, wise and beautiful Lady, who for the Love of him had ventur'd her Person with him through the World.

Arrival

IV. King Richard having happily recover'd both his Liberty and Kingdom, repair'd to the great Abby of St. Edmund's Bury, where in performance of his Vow he offer'd up the rich Imperial Standard, taken from Isaac King of Cyprus. From thence he march'd into several Parts of the Nation, and took in by Surrender such Castles as the Adherents of his Brother John had held out against him; but for Henry de Pomeroy, who had fortify'd St. Michael's Mount against him, finding that the King was certainly return'd, he dy'd with Grief and Fear. And now the forty Days of Summons being expired, which were allow'd to Earl John, Hugh Bishop of Coventry, and others, for making their Appearance, to answer to such hainous Crimes as were alledg'd against them; and they not appearing, John in particular was cast by the Peers and States of England, and not only disinherited of all his Lands he then held in England, but also of all Honours which he expected to enjoy after the King's Decease: The Bishop of Coventry and others met with Censures according to their Offences, and the Usage of those Times. After which King Richard proceeded to draw in Money more voraciously than was agreeable to so great a Man; particularly by resuming those Crown Lands he had formerly sold to others, pretending that they were only mortgag'd and not sold outright; in which, says M. Paris, he is rather to be pardon'd than accus'd, since he then wanted a powerful Army against the French. But first of all to wipe away the Sorrow and Contumely of his late Restraint, he caus'd himself to be crown'd again at the City of Winchester, which Solemnity was honour'd by the Presence of William King of the Scots, who bore the Sword before the King of England. From whence arose a great Affection between these two Princes; and Richard granted to the other, and his Successors of Scotland, a fix'd Pension, and several other Allowances and Princely Attendants, from the first Day of their Friendly Entrance into England till their Return. The King likewise caus'd a new Broad Seal to be made, requiring that all Charters granted under his former should be confirm'd by this, which rais'd great Sums to the Exchequer; subscribing such renew'd Charters thus, This was the Tenor of our Charter under our first Seal, which because it was lost, and in the Time of our Captivity in the Power of another, we cause to be chang'd, &c. Some have observ'd, as Richard was the first English King who bore Arms on his Seals; so he was the first who carry'd in his Shield three Lions passant, born ever after for the Royal Arms of England.

Nor was this King's Clemency less than his Courage, as appears from his ready receiving Earl John into Favour, thorough the Mediation of his Mother Eleanor, and his generous saying to him, I wish I may as easily forget your Offence, as I doubt you will my Pardon of it. Afterwards he restor'd him to all his Honours and Possessions; and John was so mindful of the King's Admonition, that he ever after serv'd him faithfully and valiantly in all his Wars against the King of France.

After several Skirmishes, Burnings of Towns, Taking of Prisoners, and inferior Acts of Hostility, the two main Armies drew near to each other at Vendosme; where early in a Morning King Philip sent a Message to our King, That he would give him a Visit with his Army that Day; to which Richard return'd Answer He would expect him, and if he did not perform his Promise, he would the next Morning return his kind Intentions, and make the Visit to him. Notwithstanding this Overture, the French King thought fit to retire, which he did with such Precipitation and Fear, that great Numbers of his Men were kill'd and taken Prisoners by the English, and all the Waggons and Baggage, with a great Treasure fell into their Hands. The King's portable Chappel was also taken, and the Charters of all those Vassals of the King of England who had confederated with King Philip and Earl John; to which Mezeray adds, that this Prince carrying with him the ancient Records of the Crown, they were all taken by the English, and lost, to the great Damage of the King's Affairs, as well as the History of those Times. This Victory produc'd a Year's Truce; before the Expiration of which, King Philip, to save the Effusion of Blood, by Ambassadors propos'd To decide the Controversie between them by five select Combatants on each Side, and the vanquish'd Party to submit to the Terms agreed on before they began. To which Proposal King Richard reply'd, That he well approv'd of it, provided the King of France would be the fifth Man on one Side, and he himself would be so on the other: Which Message being carry'd to King Philip, he would not agree to it, so the Proposal became ineffectual. As these Passages shew the Courage, so another shews the Piety of this Prince: About this Time he was admonish'd by a poor Hermit to remember the Subversion of Sodom, and to abstain from unlawful Lusts; which at first the King slighted, as coming from a despicable Person, but at length being visited with a great Sickness, he sent for several Religious Men, and freely confess'd himself guilty of that unnatural Impurity. And after his Recovery he betook himself to his Queen, became very charitable, and bountifully reliev'd the Poor at his Court, and restor'd all the Gold and Silver Vessels which for his Ransom had been taken from the Churches.

In the mean Time England was extremely infested by Robbers, Thieves and Outlaws; for the suppressing of whom, Hubert Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and chief Justiciary of the Nation, was very diligent and serviceable. Among these we are told of a famous Man call'd Robin Hood, accompany'd with another call'd Little John, and a hundred strong Bow-Men, who in Yorkshire molested all Passengers upon the High-Way. Some say he was of a great Family, and made no less noble than an Earl for some considerable Service; but having wasted his Estate in riotous Courses, Penury forc'd him to serve his Necessities in robbing others: Yet in this he was generously rapacious; for he never hurt either Man or Woman; spar'd the Poor, and made a Prey only of the Rich; 'till Proclamations being issu'd out against him, he fell sick at a Nunnery in Yorkshire call'd Birkleys, and desiring to be let Blood, was betray'd and bled to Death. About the same Time the City of London was exceedingly afflicted by the seditious Behaviour of a Citizen, vulgarly call'd William Longbeard, who by his natural Eloquence, his popular Arts, and his Undertaking the Cause of the Poor, had procur'd a mighty Veneration from great Numbers of the ordinary Sort. After several turbulent Practices, he rais'd such a Tumult about a Tax, which he pretended was unequally laid, that in St. Paul's Church-Yard many were slain, and the whole City was in great Danger; 'till at length by the Care and Management of Arch-Bishop Hubert, William and his chief Accomplices were forc'd to fly into Bow-Church, where they fortify'd themselves for some time; but being driven out by Fire and Smoke, he and eight of his Companions were executed at Tyburn, and hung up in Chains, which put an end to the Sedition.

But to return to King Richard, and his Affairs beyond Sea, there pass'd several Interchanges between the English and French, sometimes of Wars with Plunderings and Devastations, and sometimes of Truces with Interviews and Parlies; in one of which the Lady Alice, King Philip's Sister, was restor'd according to the Treaty of Messina to her Brother, who immediately marry'd her to John Earl of Pontif. In the mean Time both the Kings sought to augment the Number of their Friends; but King Richard by his Munificence, and other Methods, drew from the French King a great Party of his nearest Neighbours, as Baldwin Earl of Flanders, Raimund Earl of Tholouse, to whom King Richard gave his Sister Joan Queen of Sicily. So that King Philip was oblig'd to trust wholly to his own Power and Interest; for tho' he had lately marry'd the Sister of the King of Denmark, purposely to use the Danish Shipping against the English, yet immediately after his Marriage, upon Pretence of Consanguinity, she was divorc'd, and the Benefit of the Alliance lost. In one of these military Actions the Bishop of Beauvais, who was also an Earl and of Royal Blood, was taken Prisoner by King Richard's Party; and being long detain'd in that Condition, he sent Letters to the Pope complaining, That he was made Prisoner by the King of England, and loaded with Irons, contrary to his Order and Dignity. Upon which the Pope wrote to King Richard, expostulating with him, Why he detain'd his dear Brother and Son the Bishop? The other in answer immediately sent to the Pope the Bishop's Armour in which he was taken, and likewise a Letter with this Passage in it, Holy Father, will you be pleas'd to see whether this is your Son's Coat, or not? Upon this the Pope return'd the Bishop a long Letter to this Effect; 'That he had put on the Armour of a Soldier, instead of the Habit of a Priest: And tho' the King of France had been bound by Oath to do no Damage to the King of England's Dominions during his Pilgrimage, yet he had shamefully, against his Faith and Oath, taken his Towns and wasted his Territories; the Equity of whose Cause fought for him against the Arrogance and Injuries of the French King. That he, the Bishop, was not only a imprudent Adviser, but an insolent Actor in this unlawful Contest: Concluding thus, That he could only supplicate the King of England in his Behalf, for in such a Case he neither could, nor ought to command.' The Bishop finding no Assistance from the Pope, was constrain'd in the following Year to give ten thousand Marks for his Liberty.

While these several Hostilities pass'd between the English and the French, the King of England increas'd his Party by new Confederates, as Arthur Duke of Bretaign, the Duke of Lovain, with the Earls of Guienne, Bulloign, Perche and Blois, and several others; and Hoveden tells us of the French King's being three several Times in a short Space repuls'd with Loss and Dishonour by King Richard; having also the Misfortune to lose St. Omers, Air, and other Towns taken by Baldwin Earl of Flanders, besides the Waste of the French Dominions by several invasions. But the greatest of the three Victories was the second, which King Richard gain'd between Curcel and Gisors, where the King of France himself in great Hazard of his Life fell into the River Ept, the Bridge breaking under him with the Weight of the Multitudes that fled before the English Lion. This was a glorious Victory; for besides a long Catalogue of great Names extant in Authors, there were taken above a hundred Knights with their Horses, Footmen without Number and other inferior Soldiers, two hundred great Horse, of which one hundred and forty had Barbs and Caparisons arm'd with Iron. King Richard in his own Person did Wonders, and by the Force of his own Lance overthrew three valiant Knights, Matthew Monmorancy, Alan de Rufci, and Fulk de Gibervail, and took them Prisoners. The ancient Motto of DIEU ET MON DROIT is attributed first to this King, who in his Letters ascrib'd this Victory not to himself but to God and his Right. The War continuing still, many virtuous Men labour'd to make a final Agreement; and the new Pope Innocent, having proclaim'd a new Crusado, sent a Cardinal to reconcile the two mighty Kings of France and England. At length Articles of Peace were drawn up; but Richard, having the Advantage in the Field, was not in haste to conclude them; therefore deferr'd it 'till his Return from Poitou, whither he went to chastise some Rebel Subjects, tho' some say he did then conclude the Peace. At this Enterview or Treaty, King Philip, the perpetual Sower of Discord, shew'd a Writing to King Richard, implying That his Brother John had come over to the French Party; upon which Richard in a great Passion, order'd him to be disseiz'd of all his Territories. Which when Earl John understood, and the Reason of it, he immediately sent two Knights to the French Court, who bravely undertook to defend his Honour and Innocence against all Accusers; but when neither that King, nor any other would undertake the Cause, King Richard for the future put more Confidence in his Brother, and gave less Credit to the French King's Insinuations.

Not long after this Treaty the King's Avarice was the Occasion of his Death; ^{Horrid} for Vidomar Vicount of Limosin, having found a great Treasure of Gold in his Land, sent a large Part of it to the King; but not being content with that, he demanded the whole as Treasure Trove, and his Prerogative. The Vicount not yielding, the King in a Rage march'd with a strong Army, and besieg'd his Castle of Chaluz, in which he suppos'd the Treasure was hid: But tho' the Knights and others in the Castle went out to him, and offer'd to surrender it, provided they might have their Lives, Limbs and Arms, yet the King would not consent, but swore he would take the Castle and hang every Man; at which the Knights return'd much confounded, resolving to defend themselves to the utmost. Upon the same Day, the King taking a view of the Castle, a certain Cross-Bow Man shot at him from the Wall, and gave him a desperate Wound in the Shoulder, joining to the Neck; upon which he immediately return'd to his Quarters, and order'd Marchade and his Army never to leave storming the Castle 'till they took it, and then to hang up every Man, except him who had wounded him. The King was put into the Hands of an unskilful Surgeon, who as he strove to pull out the Arrow, left the Head in the Fleth, which he so grievously mangled, that it turn'd to a Gangreen; and lying thus eleven Days in great Torment, and finding no Hopes of Recovery, he by his Will bequeath'd England and all his other Dominions to Earl John his Brother; leaving him three Parts of his Treasure, and the fourth to be divided between his Servants and the Poor. A little before his Death, after great Devotion, he caus'd Bertram, who had given him his Death's Wound, to be brought before him, demanding of him What Injury he had done him, that he should kill him? To whom the other roughly reply'd, That he had kill'd his Father and his two Brothers with his own Hand, and was endeavouring to kill him, therefore he might take what Revenge he pleas'd; He was willing to endure any Torments, since he had slain him who had done so much Mischief in the World. The King, notwithstanding this desperate Answer, caus'd him to be set free, and not only gave him his Life, but a hundred Shillings besides; but Marchade, after the King's Death, caus'd him to be flead alive, and hang'd. The King deceas'd upon the sixth Day of April, and the forty first Year of his Age, after a magnificent and tumultuous Reign of nine Years and nine Months. His Body was interr'd at Fonteverard at the Feet of his Father, his Heart at Roven, and his Bowels

Bowels at Charron in Poitou, as he had appointed himself, declaring That he had dispos'd of the first to testifie his Repentance, for offending his Father; by the second he shew'd his Esteem for his valiant and loyal Normans; and by the third, the small Value he had for the inconstant and disaffected Poictovins.

This was the fatal End of the bold and magnanimous Richard, from his Qualities surnam'd Cœur-de-Lion; a Prince who had somewhat of the Fierceness and Brutality, as well as Courage and Bravery of that Creature; whose Disloyalty to his Father was punish'd with innumerable Troubles in his Reign, and whose voracious Temper met with Death it self. As to his Person he was very tall, of a fair and comely Visage, his Eyes blue and sparkling with Fire, his Hair between red and yellow, his Limbs strait, of a noble and majestick Mein, that seem'd worthy of Empire. His Courage and Prowess was great beyond Exception; and so formidable to the Saracens, that it is said they were wont to still their crying Children, by telling them, That King Richard was coming for them; but withal he was fearless, violent and impetuous. He was very witty and eloquent, but with too great a Mixture of Pride and Arrogance; magnificent and liberal to excess, which occasion'd him at other times to be as covetous and rapacious. He was noted for Pride, Avarice and Luxury, which were call'd his three Daughters; and being once urg'd to part with them, he in Rallery declar'd, He would dispose of the first to the Templars, the second to the Monks, and the third to the Prelates. Tho' he had many noble Qualifications, yet England suffer'd severely under his Government, through the constant Occasions he had for Mony, and the great Rapacity of his Justiciaries, during his Absence from England, where he never spent above eight Months of his whole Reign; so that his Subjects felt all the Inconveniences of his Courage, without being much the better for that, or his other good Qualities in Time of Peace. It is observable, that he who had reviv'd the Use of that fatal Engine, the Cross-Bow, and had himself dispatch'd so many with it, now himself perish'd by the same Instrument. In this King's Reign the City of London began first to receive the Form and State of a Common-wealth, and to be divided into Companies and Corporations as at this Day.

Containing 17 Years, 7 Months, and 13 Days.

I. THE valiant King Richard being thus suddenly remov'd, Earl John his sole surviving Brother, now about thirty three Years of Age, immediately us'd all his Interest with Hubert Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and others of the Nobility, to preserve the Peace of England till he could come over; and with all Expedition went to Chinon in Tourain to secure his Brother's Treasure, then in Custody of Robert de Turnham, who upon his Arrival deliver'd it up to him, together with the strong Castles of Chinon and Saumur. But his Affairs did not so well succeed in other Parts; for the Provinces of Anjou, Tourain and Main, in a general Assembly of their chief Men firmly adher'd to his Nephew Arthur, Duke of Bretaign, as their Sovereign Lord, declaring it to be the Custom of those Territories to prefer the Elder Brother's Son before the Younger Brother. In Compliance to which Determination, all the Towns in those Provinces were surrender'd to Arthur's Use, except some few which Earl John had secur'd at first: Upon which the Lady Constance, stance, Mother to young Arthur, carry'd him to the City of Tours, and deliver'd him in the thirteenth Year of his Age to the Custody of the French King, who sent him to be educated with his Son Lewis at Paris; and at the same Time possess'd himself of all his strong Places and Castles, resolving to make the young Heir subservient to his ambitious Designs. Which unwelcome News caus'd Earl John immediately to march with a strong Force into the Province of Main; where he soon took the City of Mans, and to show his Revenge, and to be a Terror to other Places, he demolish'd the Walls of the City and Castle, with all the Store-Houses, and carry'd away the Citizens Prisoners, because contrary to their Fealty sworn to him, they had receiv'd Arthur for their Lord. From thence he went to Roven in Normandy, where on the twenty fifth Day of April, in the Cathedral Church he was girt with the Sword of the Dutchy of Normandy, and a Coronet adorn'd with golden Roses was put upon his Head by the Arch-Bishop of that City; after which, in the Presence of the Clergy and Laity, he took an Oath upon the Holy Gospels and Relicks of the Saints, 'To preserve the Holy Church, with all her Privileges, and Dignities, to administer true Justice, to abrogate evil Laws, and to ordain such as were good.

While these Affairs were transacting beyond Sea, Hubert Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and William the Earl-Marshal, caus'd all the Free-Men of the Kingdom of England, both of Cities and Boroughs, as also the Earls, Barons and Free-Tenants, to swear Fealty to John the Son of King Henry against all Men: Yet still all the Bishops, Earls and Barons who had Castles, fortify'd and stor'd them with Victuals and Ammunition; being either not well satisfy'd with Earl John's Title, or else suspecting the Effects of his changeable and imperious Humour. Upon Notice of this, the Arch-Bishop, with the Earl-Marshal and chief Justiciary met at Northampton, and there summon'd those of the Nobility they most suspected, whom they satisfy'd by assuring them, That Earl John would certainly restore to every one their Right; upon which Condition or Agreement, the Earls and Barons renew'd their Oaths of Fealty to John, and engag'd to serve him faithfully against all Opposers. In the mean Time the Earl, now lately become a Duke, resolv'd to take Possession of the Crown of England, and landing in Sussex on the twenty fifth Day of May, he immediately came up to London in order to his Coronation, where appear'd a noble Concourse of Bishops, Earls and Barons, who in most solemn Procession attended him to the Abby Church in Westminster. Here before the Solemnity was perform'd, Hubert Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, having requir'd the Attention of his Audience, according to M. Paris made this Speech. No Man has a Right to succeed in this Kingdom, unless, after seeking the Holy Spirit, he be first unanimously elected for the Excellency of his Manners by the general Body of the Kingdom, and anointed King after the Example of Saul, whom God set over his People, tho' he was neither a King's Son, nor descended of Royal Blood; and after him David the Son of Jesse; the one because he was valiant and brave, the other because he was pious and humble; so that he who surpass'd others in Valour and Virtue, might exceed them in Dignity and Power. Therefore if any one of the Family of the deceas'd King excels the rest, we ought most readily to consent to his Election; and this we speak in favour of the noble Duke John here present, Brother to our illustrious King Richard, who dy'd without Issue of his Body: This Duke being prudent and valiant, as well in respect of his Merits as of his Royal Blood, with the Invocation of the Holy Spirit, we do unanimously elect King.

King.

Here our Author observes, that the Arch-Bishop was a Man of a deep Foresight, and so eminent for Constancy and Wisdom, that none durst dispute what he said, knowing that he had not without good Cause thus determin'd the Matter; with which Speech Duke John and the rest acquiesc'd, and all unanimously electing and receiving him for their King, cry'd out, Long may the King live!

But

But the Arch-Bishop being afterwards ask'd why he made such a Speech, answer'd, That he was fully assur'd by certain remarkable Presages, that King John would bring the Kingdom and Crown into great Confusion; therefore to put some Restraint upon his Temper, he had affirm'd, That he ought to come in by Election, and not by Hereditary Succession. This Election being over, the Arch-Bishop plac'd the Crown upon the King's Head with the usual Ceremonies, notwithstanding the Bishop of Durham appeal'd against it, because of the Absence of the Arch-Bishop of York. Then the Coronation Oath was administer'd, consisting of these three Heads, 'That he would cherish the Holy Church, and all the Clergy, and preserve her from the Violence of her Enemies; That all evil Laws being abrogated, he would establish such as were good; That he would exercise true Justice throughout the Kingdom of England: And he was further adjured by the Arch-Bishop, That he should not presume to undertake this Dignity, unless he resolv'd to fulfil what he had now sworn; to which he answer'd, That he would by the Assistance of God observe all those Things he had promis'd; and on the next Day, having receiv'd the Homage and Fealties of the Nobility, he went to pay his Devotion at St. Alban's Shrine. On the same Day, to reward those who had lifted him into the Throne, he made William Marechal and Geoffry Fitz-Peter, Earls of Pembroke and Essex, and the Arch-Bishop Lord High Chancellor of England; who seeming to glory in this Addition of Honour, was told by the Lord Bardulf, That the Height of the Archiepiscopal Dignity was such, that it was ever reputed a great Advancement for a Chancellor to be made an Arch-Bishop, but none for an Arch-Bishop to be made a Chancellor.

The King's Enemies now found Opportunities to disturb his Affairs abroad, while he was settling those at home; for the French King easily surpriz'd the City of Eureux in Normandy, and recover'd the County of Main, while the Britains regain'd the City of Angiers, with many other strong Places. The News of which caus'd King John, after settling some Preliminaries with the Scotch King, to hasten into Normandy, where his Army was so much encreas'd by Friends and Volunteers, that King Philip was content to accept of a Truce for fifty Days; upon the expiring of which an Interview was agreed on to establish a lasting Peace. But for securing his Designs, Philip the very Day before the Meeting, knighted Earl Arthur, and receiving his Homage for Bretagne, Normandy, Anjou, Poictou, Tourain, and Main, faithfully promis'd to yield him all Assistance for the acquiring those Territories. On the other side King John strengthen'd himself with the Alliance and Homage of Philip Earl of Flanders; and after the sixteenth Day of August treated with the French King two Days by Commissioners, and on the third in Person, between the Towns of Butivant and Gaillon. At this Treaty Philip demanded all the Norman Veuxin for himself, alledging, That Geoffry, Father to King Henry II. had given it to Lewis the late King of France, for his Assistance in gaining Normandy from King Stephen; and further demanded, that Poictou, Anjou, Tourain and Main might be deliver'd to Earl Arthur; and made divers other unreasonable Demands, to which the King of England could not in Honour condescend, so that their intended Amities ended in more hostile Defiances. But Philip's Demands for young Arthur were only Compliments to that Earl, as his own Words discover'd, when being afterwards ask'd Why he entertain'd such an Aversion to King John, who had never injur'd him, his Answer was, Because he had possess'd himself of Normandy, and the other Territories, without first asking him Leave, or offering Homage to him: So much did King Philip now assume to himself, above what any of his Predecessors had done before.

The Flames on both Sides breaking out the stronger for being so much stifled, many Earls and Barons of France who formerly adhered to King Richard, now became Homagers to King John, swearing never to return to King Philip without his Consent, and he swearing never to make Peace without including them in the Articles. In the Heat of the Contests, a chief Adherent of the Earl of Flanders, being Bishop Elect of Cambray, fell into the Hands of the French King, and at the same Time Philip Bishop of Beauvois was detain'd Prisoner by King John; and neither of these Kings being willing to release their miter'd Champions, Peter of Capua the Pope's Legate interdicted France for the one, and Normandy for the other. Yet King John obtain'd the Favour of the Pope to require six thousand Marks from his Prize, with an Oath never to bear Arms against Christians. In October the King of France seiz'd the Castle of Balun, and demolish'd it; which was highly resent'd by Earl Arthur's General William de la Roche, who expostulating with him, as being contrary to Covenants with his Master, Philip scornfully reply'd, That his Lord Arthur's Dislike should not hinder him from doing what he thought fit with such Places as he had taken; and then went and besieg'd Lavardin: But hearing the King of England was coming to relieve it, he left the Siege, and march'd to Mans; King John follow'd him, and he also quitted that Place. In the mean Time, Earl Arthur's General finding that his Master was only made a Mask for Philip's Ambition, by Subtelty got him out of his Custody, and reconcil'd him to his Uncle King John, to whom he also deliver'd the City of Mans, of which he was Governor. Yet still this Design prov'd unsuccessful, for some of Philip's Party infus'd such needless Terrors of Imprisonment into Arthur and his Mother, that being overcome with jealous Apprehensions, they fled together with many other Noblemen, to the City of Angiers, and from thence return'd again to the King of France, so that Arthur being neither sure to John nor Philip, was now in danger of being crush'd between both those powerful Monarchs.

A Treaty between them.

The Breach between these two Kings seem'd the more dangerous, because King John's Nephew Otho, just now advanc'd to the Empire, promis'd him great Assistance, if he would defer making Peace with the French King. Yet still Peter, the Pope's Legate, who had formerly procur'd a five Years Truce between King Richard and Philip, by his assiduous Mediation so far prevail'd, that the same Truce should continue 'till the Feast of St. Hillary. After which King John through his Weakness was led into a disadvantageous and dishonourable Treaty, in which it was agreed, That Lewis the French King's Son should marry King John's Niece Blanche, Daughter to Alphonso King of Castile; that King John should give for her Dowry the City and County of Eureux, with several strong Places in Normandy, besides thirty thousand Marks of Silver; swearing also not to assist his Nephew Otho either with Men or Money towards his Establishment in the Empire; and further promising, if he dy'd without Issue, to leave to Lewis all the Territories he held in France. All which Articles were formally engross'd, and afterwards finally concluded about Midsummer, between Butavant and Gulatum, two Castles belonging to either King; when the Places were actually surrender'd to King Philip, the Lady Blanche marry'd to his Son Lewis, and Earl Arthur yielded up, and made a Servant and Homager to King John for his own Dominions, whom yet his Uncle was satisfy'd to leave with King Philip, who had only supported him for his own Advantage. In these Matters King John prov'd more firm to King Philip, than either Philip to him, or he himself to Otho the Emperor, who sending his two Brothers Henry and William, to demand some Territories, with such Treasure and Jewels as King Richard had given him by Will, King John deny'd all, only in Regard of his Oath he had sworn to Philip, that he would yield no Assistance to the Emperor. And further, to preserve a most intire Amity with Philip, by his Advice he divorc'd his Wife Avise, upon Pretence of Consanguinity, and marry'd Isabell, Heiress to Aymer Earl of Engolesme, a beautiful young Lady, but contracted to the Earl of Marche, who afterwards prov'd a dangerous and implacable Enemy to him.

II. This

II. This Agreement with Philip, who now acknowledg'd King John right-ful Heir to his Brother Richard, gave him Leave and Opportunity to reduce all Opposers in his transmarine Dominions, and soon after to return and inspect the Affairs of his Kingdom of England, from which he had been somewhat too long absent. Yet in the Heat of the foreign Employments, he on occasion had recourse thither to settle his State Affairs and Crown Revenues, to enact Laws for Trade and Commerce, to raise a Tax for his Niece's great Dowry, and mi-Taxes rais'd.litary Occasions; which Tax, being three Shillings upon every Plough-Land, occasion'd great Heats and Prejudices, tho' it was the only Subsidy since his coming to the Crown: And this chiefly by the Means of his natural Brother Geoffrey Arch-Bishop of York, who being swell'd with the Greatness of his Family and Preferment, directly forbid the Collectors to come within his Pre-cincts; and being also requir'd by the King to attend him in France, to conclude the Peace and celebrate the Nuptials of his Niece, he undutifully deny'd his Service. The King justly mov'd with these disloyal Actions, caus'd all his Temporalties to be seiz'd by his Sheriff, whom the Arch-Bishop solemnly excommunicated, offer'd Violence to the King's Officers, and proceeded so far as to interdict the whole Province of York. Notwithstanding this, not long after, upon the King's Return, and Geoffrey's Submission, he was restor'd to Fa-vour at a very solemn Time, which was at the Coronation of King John's Queen Isabella, with whom the King himself was a second Time formally crow-

This Solemnity being over the King resolv'd to end a depending Controversie between him and William King of Scotland, who had claim'd the Counties of Northumberland and Cumberland as his ancient Right of Inheritance; and ac-cordingly he sent an honourable Embassie of several of the Nobility to conduct him safely to the City of Lincoln, where both Kings met upon the twenty first Day of November, with all the Marks of Civility and Courtesie. King of Scotland.and faithful Alliance upon the Crozier of Arch-Bishop Hubert, in the Presence of three Arch-Bishops, thirteen Bishops, the King of South-Wales, with a Mul-titude of English, Scotch, French and Irish Nobility. This Spectacle so splen-did to the Beholders was succeeded by another no less honourable to King John, occasion'd by the Arrival of the Corps of the pious Prelate Hugh Bishop of Lincoln, a Person so justly honour'd by his Majesty, that when his Body was brought to the Gates of Lincoln, he and all his Regal Train went forth to meet it: And to show his Respect and Humility, he with the two Kings and their Allies bore the Coffin upon their Shoulders, from whom the great Peers receiv'd it, and carry'd it to the Entrance of the Cathedral, whence the three Arch-Bi-shops and Bishops convey'd it to the Quire, and interr'd it the next Day with all answerable Solemnities. Nor did the King rest here in showing his Respect and Kindness to Ecclesiasticks; when twelve Abbots of the Cistercian Order, whose whole Society had highly offended him in refusing the late Tax, now came to Lincoln, and all prostrate at his Feet begg'd his Mercy and the Remo-val of the Punishments laid upon them; this Sight of these venerable Suppli-ants so affected his Heart, that he fell at their Feet, desir'd their Forgiveness, restor'd them to his Favour, and after that founded an Abby for their Order in Hampshire call'd Beaulieu, designing to be enthrin'd there himself, and making it a Refuge and Asylum for the greatest Offenders.

Time.

The first Breaches between the King and the Lay Peers.

Notwithstanding all outward Kindness and Obligations, a dangerous Breach M. Paris, Henry II. Sec. now began to be open'd between the King and the Clergy, occasion'd by the increasing Power of the latter, who being supported by the mighty Authority of the Pope, insisted upon Exemption from Regal Commands, and daily retrench'd the Royal Prerogative. This he found in a short Time; for when he came to nominate a Successor to Hugh Bishop of Lincoln, according to the Usage of his Ancestors, he was with peremptory Affronts withstood by the Canons of that Church, who as long as they had the Pope in their Interest, little regarded the Commands of their Prince. Likewise Hubert Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, being now disappointed, and repenting that he had advanc'd John to the Crown, as Legate to the Pope held a general Synod of all the Bishops and Clergy at Westminster, notwithstanding the positive Prohibition of the King's chief Justiciary; which is one of the first Examples of that independant Power, the Arch-Bishops and other Legates from the Pope, ever after usurp'd 'till the Reformation, of holding Ecclesiastical Synods, and making Canons by their sole Authority, without the King's Licence or Confirmation. Nor did Hubert cease here, but shortly after endeavour'd to outvy with his Sovereign in Magnificence; for understanding that the King design'd to keep the Feast of Christmas with his Queen at Guildford with great Pomp and Solemnity; he, whose Palace usually for Splendor, Attendants, and Entertainments exceeded that of some Princes, thought this a proper Time to manifest his great State and small Regard to his King's Favour, by equalling his own Sumptuous Preparations to his, with his rich Habits and munificent Gifts bestow'd upon his Attendants at Canterbury. The King mov'd with no small Indignation, concluded this Prelate had too much Riches, or too little Discretion; and therefore to diminish the one, and add to the other, after a Journey into the North to raise Money, he resolv'd to go to Canterbury, and keep his Easter at the Charge of Hubert the Rich. Here he increas'd that great Expence with a greater, which was his and his Queen's solemn crowning again on Easter Day, in the Cathedral Church; where in lieu of the Expence Hubert had the Honour to set the Crown upon the King's Head, but not the Favour to sit near his Heart.

Such were the first Contests between the King and the Clergy, which afterwards broke out into a more dangerous Flame; which the Lay Peers were so far from extinguishing, that they made it fiercer than before. For mistaking either his Title or his Temper, they resolv'd upon the first Opportunity to shew their Resentments; which happen'd in a short Time after his last Coronation, when the King had occasion for their Service against the Poictouins in France, who had rebell'd and besieg'd their Governors in their Castles. The King having summon'd them to appear with their Arms at Portsmouth by Whitsonside, the whole Body of the Nobility held a solemn Assembly at Leicester, and after a formal Consultation, sent this Message to the King, That they would not go over with him, unless he would first restore to them their ancient Rights. Which so provok'd the King, that instead of complying with their Demands, by the precipitate Advice of some, he impolitickly demanded of them their Castles as Pledges of their Fidelity, particularly he took the Castle Beavoir into his Hands, with the Children of some of them. Yet it appears that most of them were at last prevail'd upon to go with him, and being assembled at Portsmouth, he took Money of the greatest Part of them to be excus'd, and permitted them to return home; M. Paris says it was two Marks out of each Knight's Fee. In the mean Time the King sent William Earl of Pembroke, and Roger Lacy, with two distinct Bodies of Men into Normandy, to repel the Enemy on the Borders of that Province; and also intrusted Hubert de Burgh his Chamberlain with another Body to defend the Borders of England and Wales. And that he might give no Cause of Discontent to the Clergy, and prevent all Obstructions in raising of Money, he fully reconcil'd himself to Geoffrey Arch-Bishop of York, restor'd all his Manors, and by a Charter confirm'd all the Privileges and Immunities

nities of that Church. Having settled his Affairs in England, he pass'd over into France, where King Philip agreed to a personal but private Parly; in which each gave and receiv'd such reciprocal Marks of Satisfaction, that not only the former Bonds of Amity seem'd inviolable, but were also more strengthen'd with a new Association, wherein several great Peers were made Sureties under Hand and Seal, with this Condition, that when either of the Kings broke the Articles, all his cautionary Lords should be freed from their Allegiance, and join with the other. And that the World might take notice of their combin'd Friendship, they both agreed to contribute the fortieth Part of their whole Crown Revenues to the Holy Wars; sending their Letters throughout their Dominions, to encourage all their Nobles and People to follow their Examples. With these Intercourses and other Compliments, three Days were spent between them; and King Philip the further to insinuate himself into the other's good Opinion, desir'd the Favour of his Company, first to St. Denis's Palace, where he enter'd with a pompous Procession of the Clergy, and was royally lodg'd by King Philip; and the next Day he enter'd Paris, where he was receiv'd with very noble Presents from the City, and great Applauses of all Sorts, to see such Marks of Affection between two such great Princes, so lately mortal Enemies. Here the French King betaking himself to a more private Mansion, left his own Palace to honour and accommodate the King of England; and after some Days Continuance in magnificent Diversions and Entertainments, King John royally attended out of the City, took his leave of King Philip, with such Signs of mutual Satisfaction, that nothing could have appear'd more lasting than their Alliance and Amity.

A new Treaty between the Kings of England and France.

*Historien.

M. Paris.*

But these fair Prospects prov'd but of a short Continuance; for while King John was passing his Christmass at Argenton, in the beloved Company of his fair Isabell, Hugh Earl of Marche, to whom that Lady was first promis'd, inflam'd with Love and Revenge, perswaded several of the Norman Nobility, That he was unworthy to be a King, who had thus injur'd him, and was ready to do the like by any of them. Upon which young Arthur's Hopes, which were grown cold, were now rekindled by these Incendiaries; the Britans, then fascinated with his ominous Name, resolv'd to raise him to the highest Pitch of Grandeur; and King Philip who secretly hated King John, and continually grasp'd at his French Territories, design'd not to be backwards in their Assistance. Thus Earl Hugh out of Love, Duke Arthur out of Ambition, King Philip out of Avarice, and all out of Hatred, were conspiring King John's Ruin; while he himself was furthest from Suspicion, when nearest the Danger. But the Mischiefs were soon disclos'd in a second Interview between the two Kings, near the Castle of Guleton; where Philip forgetting all former Compacts, and pretending some imaginary Wrongs, peremptorily requir'd John immediately to restore all his transmarine Dominions to Arthur Duke of Britaign; otherwise, as Sovereign Lord of those Countries, which John held by Homage, he expressly cited him to appear personally at Paris fifteen Days after Easter, there to answer what should be laid to his Charge, and to abide the Judgment of the Court. King John, amaz'd at this strange Proposal and Alteration, disdain'd both his Citation and Commands, as unworthy for England's King to accept, or the French to offer. After this, we are told that King John for his Non-appearance was actually adjudg'd by the Peers of France to lose his Territories in the Continent; however it is certain that upon his Refusal of the French King's Demands, that Prince immediately invaded the King of England's Territories, first levelling the strong Castle of Buttant, and then taking the Town of Onges, with the Castle of Lymis, and many other Places. He also besieg'd the Castle of Radford eight Days, but hearing of King John's Approach, he retir'd, and turn'd all his Forces against Gorner, where breaking down the Head of a large Pool above the Town, a great Part of the Walls were overthrown by the violent Fall of the Water, so that the Garrison retiring, the King took the Town without any considerable Opposition.

After these Advantages, Philip returning to Paris, appointed certain Tutors M. Paris, &c. or Governors for Duke Arthur, and assign'd him two hundred Horsemen for his Guard, who were order'd to march with him into Poitou, to reduce those Parts; but as he was marching thither in a mighty military Pomp, he was inform'd that the old Queen Eleanor was in Mirabel, which was but a weak Garrison. Therefore knowing the Advantage of such a Prize, he turn'd all his Forces thither, and invested the Place, soon forcing the outward Castle to surrender: But the Queen and some of the principal Soldiers retiring into a strong inward Tower, there made a valiant Defence. This occasion'd almost all the Noblemen and Knights of Poitou, and principally the Earl of Marche, King John's inveterate Enemy, to come to Duke Arthur's Assistance; so that they all together made a powerful Army, and reduc'd the Queen to great Straits. This being understood by her Son King John, he march'd with the utmost Expedition, Day and Night, and arriv'd sooner than could be expected. The Effect of his Appearance was, that the French and Poitouvins left the Siege to give him Battel, which prov'd highly successful to King John, who after a great Slaughter put them to flight, and so closely press'd upon them, that he enter'd the outward Castle with them, where the Conflict was soon ended by the Valour and Bravery of the English. This was a glorious Victory, by the gaining of which two hundred French Knights were taken Prisoners, with Duke Arthur himself, the Earl of Marche, and most of the Nobility of Poitou and Anjou; who being put into Fetters, were ignominiously sent away in Carts, some into Normandy, and others into England, there to be kept close Prisoners. Duke Arthur was sent to Falaise, and kept under a strong Guard; and his Sister Eleanor, call'd the Beauty of Bretain, was committed to Bristol Castle, where she liv'd near forty Years with very honourable Usage. King John returning his Thanks to Heav'n, sent his Letters to all his Nobility in England, inciting them to render all Praise to God for so wonderful a Work, and so gracious Assistance; and the French King who had for fifteen Days batter'd the Walls of the Castle of Arches, was so confounded at this News, that he immediately rais'd the Siege, and return'd to Paris, without any further Action that Year.

King John obtains a great Victory.

Duke Arthur made Prisoner.

He is supposed to be privately murder'd.

Shortly after this Victory, King John going to Falaise, caus'd his Nephew Arthur to be brought before him, us'd many kind Expressions to him, and promis'd him great Honours, if he would totally relinquish the King of France, and adhere to him as his Lord and Uncle. But notwithstanding he now lay at his Mercy, he answer'd him disdainfully, and with plain Threats demanded the Kingdom of England, and all the Dominions enjoy'd by King Richard, as his Right by Inheritance, adding by an Oath, That he should never enjoy Peace 'till he had restor'd them. King John inrag'd at these high and unexpected Demands, immediately sent him to Roven to be kept in stricter Custody than before in the new Tower, under the Care of Robert de Viepont. Some Writers affirm, that before he was brought to Roven, the Nobility of Bretain and Anjou shew'd so much Zeal for him, that the King's Friends advis'd him to deprive him of his Eyes and Genitals, to render him incapable of Government or Procreation, to which cruel Proposal he consented, but was disappointed by the three Persons design'd to be Agents in it: One of whom, out of a publick Experiment spread a Report of his Death, which instead of appeasing, rais'd new and greater Exasperations among the Inhabitants of Bretain and Anjou. Upon which the King, to prevent future Disturbances, remov'd him to a safer Prison at Roven; where in a short Time he quite disappear'd, and was never seen after; but by what Means, there is still a great Uncertainty. All suppose and believe it was by a violent Death; and the King's Friends reported, that endeavouring to make his escape out of the Prison, he was accidentally drown'd in the River Seyne, upon which the Castle stood: But most Writers press hard upon the Memory of John, and say that by his Orders he was privately and basely basely murder'd; and some more expressly tell us, that he himself came secretly in a Boat by Night, and causing his Nephew to be brought before him, without all Pity slew him with his own Sword, and caus'd his Body to be thrown into the Seyne some Leagues below the Town. But of this black and difficult Affair, we can say nothing positively.

*M. Paris,
Emilius,*

III. King John being now freed from his Rival, for his better Security, caus'd himself to be a fourth Time crown'd at Canterbury, on the fourteenth Day of April, by Hubert the Arch-Bishop; but upon his Return into Normandy, he soon found that it was but an Introduction to greater Troubles than ever. For the Report of the Murder was soon spread in all Parts, to the great blackning of the King's Name; for tho' very few could know how the young Prince came by his Death, yet all had too much reason to conclude that it could not have been brought about without the King's Orders. Upon which the Lady Constance, Mother to the Deceas'd, repair'd to King Philip, and made violent Complaints of the unheard of Barbarity of King John; which caus'd Philip to assemble all his Peers and Nobility, who immediately summon'd King John, as Duke of Normandy, to appear before them, and answer this Accusation, at an appointed Day. King John readily sent Eustace Bishop of Ely and Hubert de Burgh, as his Ambassadors, to let that King know, That he would willingly appear at his Court, provided he might have safe Conduct for his Going and Returning; to which Philip answer'd with a stern Look, He may come in Peace; but when the Bishop ask'd, Whether he might return so, his only Answer was, Yes, if the Sentence of his Peers would permit him. The Ambassadors still insisting upon a safe Conduct for their Master, King Philip in a Rage swore by all the Saints of France, That it should not be otherwise than the Judgment of his Court. Then the Bishop began to lay open the Dangers that might happen to his Master by his Appearance, and now urg'd, That the Duke of Normandy could not attend his Court, since the same Person was also King of England; and the Baronage of that Nation would not permit it, tho' he himself should consent to it, since there was so much Danger either of his Death or Imprisonment. To which the King reply'd, Pray, my Lord Bishop, what is that to me? It is well known that the Duke of Normandy is my Vassal, and if he thought fit to conquer England, and so acquire a higher Title, ought his Sovereign Lord to lose any Thing by that? No Answer being given to this, and King John not appearing at the appointed Time, the Court proceeded to condemn him for Treason and Murther, and P. Emilius has recorded the Sentence to this Effect, 'That John Duke of Normandy, being unmindful of his Oath to Philip his Lord, had murder'd his elder Brother's Son, an Homager to that Crown, within the Sovereignty of France; whereupon he is judg'd a Traitor, and as an Enemy to the Crown of France, to forfeit all his Dominions which he held by Homage, and that Re-entry be made by Force of Arms. Thus by a partial and undue Sentence, the King and Peers of France, at a Time whilst they were in open Hostility with King John, condemn'd him, tho' absent, unheard, without either confessing, or being convicted of the Crime, and without any legal or equitable Cognizance of it.

However the French being then very powerful, soon began to put this Sentence in Execution, while King John, free from the Noise and Thoughts of War, feasted magnificently with his Queen at Caen, and lay in Bed with her every Day 'till Noon. At the same Time the French King took many of his Castles, kept the strongest, and demolish'd the rest; and when King John was told what the Enemy had done, he only reply'd, Let him alone, whatever he takes now, I will soon recover again. But when the English Barls and Noblemen heard this, and observ'd his insuperable Sloath, they begg'd leave to return home; and so left but a very few Knights or military Men to tarry with him in Normandy. In the mean Time, Hugh de Gourney surrender'd the strong Castle of Montfort to the French King, with the entire Honour belonging to it, while King John continu'd securely at Roven; insomuch that the People said, Sure he was enchanted, being still as pleasant and unconcern'd as if nothing had befallen him. The French King still proceeded further, and with a powerful Army sat down before the strong Fortrefs of Ruil, within the Territory of Roven; and Fitz-Water and De Quincy, in whose Custody it was, shamefully deliver'd up that important Place, as soon as he appear'd before it. But King Philip abhorring their Cowardice, generously commanded them to be kept close Prisoners, and to be loaded with Fetters, 'till they could pay their Ransoms. Normandy, and the King's other Dominions being thus left naked and defenceless, the French King pass'd through divers Provinces without any Opposition, and reduc'd several Castles to his Obedience. He also about that Time besieg'd that strong Castle on the Rock of Andeli on Seyne, which King Richard had built from the Ground, and call'd it Castle Galliard; but that being defended by the admirable Valour and Fidelity of Roger de Lacy, King Philip could gain so little Advantage against it, that he was forc'd to turn his Siege into a Blockade: In which Juncture some Normans revolted from the King of England, while others outwardly adher'd to him.

He returns into England.

King John at length seeing his own Weakness, and that he was left without any Forces, took shipping, and landed at Portsmouth on the sixth Day of December; and immediately after his Arrival he turn'd his Resentments against his Earls and Barons, alledging, That they had deserted, and left him among his Enemies beyond Sea, and through their Neglect he had lost his Castles and Territories there; wherefore by way of Punishment he forcibly took from them the seventh Part of their Moveables. Neither did he spare in this Tax even the Conventual or Parochial Churches, for, as Paris tells us, he had such as severely executed his Rapines, viz. Hubert Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, upon the Clergy, and Fitz-Peter the Justiciary, upon the Laity, who spared no Person in this Imposition. At the same Time the French King taking advantage of King John's Absence, march'd with a strong Force before several other Cities and Castles of his Dominions, politickly declaring to the Inhabitants, That King John had cowardly deserted them, and he being chief Lord over those Countries, stood oblig'd in that case to preserve the Fee from Injury and Damage; therefore he amicably requir'd them to receive him for their Sovereign, since they had no other: But if they refus'd this fair Proposal, and after Resistance were subdu'd, he declar'd by an Oath, he would either hang or flea them all alive. At length, after many Disputes and Consultations, they unanimously consented to give Hostages for one Year's Truce; and if the King of England reliev'd them not within that Time, they would recognize him for their Lord, and surrender their Cities and Castles to him. Yet, as Trivet better informs us, many of the chief Cities of Normandy, as Falaise, Constance, Bayeux, and others, being by Force or Treachery soon reduc'd to the French King's Power, King John had nothing left there, besides the City of Roven.

Reg. 1.

Upon the second of January, King John and all the great Men of England met in a grand Council or Parliament at Oxford; where was granted to the King a military Aid of two Marks and a half of every Knight's Fee; nor did Bishops, Abbots, or Ecclesiasticks depart without promising the same. But notwithstanding this great Aid, we do not find that he made any better use of it than to spend it in an unactive and luxurious Life. However he found it convenient after Midlent to send the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, with the Bishops of Ely and Norwich, and the Earl-Marshal and the Earl of Leicester, as Ambassadors to the King of France, to sound his Inclinations to a Peace, and to propose some new Terms of Agreement, if he would receive them. But King Philip, swell'd with his former Successes, would agree to none of them; but finding that Duke Arthur was really dead, he demanded Eleanor his Sister to be given in Marriage to his younger Son, with all the Territories in France, designing pos'd. but in-

designing to make a further Advantage of her, as the true Heiress to the Crown of England. But this being thought an unreasonable Demand, the Embassie became ineffectual. About the same Time King Philip sent a valiant Champion to justify by Combate before the States of England, what his Master had done in France against their King; and tho' it was not thought fit to hazard a Title of that Moment on the Arms and Fortune of one Man, yet it was resolv'd that this bold Challenger should not pass unanswer'd. Accordingly the King fix'd on John Curvy, Earl of Ulster, now a Prisoner in the Tower, a Man of a Gigantick Body and undaunted Fierceness, who when the King ask'd him Whether he would combat in his Cause, answer'd No, not in thy Cause, nor for thy Sake, but for the Kingdom's Right I will fight to the last Moment of Life. While with vast Eating he repair'd his decay'd Limbs and Nerves, the French Champion hearing of his excessive Feeding, and his proportionable Strength, and dreading him as a Monster of Nature, he retir'd secretly into Spain, not daring to visit France again. Of this Earl Curvy we are further assur'd, that afterwards when the two Kings met upon a Truce in France, King Philip hearing he was in the English Camp, desir'd King John to let him see some Experiment of his fam'd Strength. Whereupon an Helmet of excellent Proof, full fac'd with Mail, was set upon a wooden Block; when the Earl first looking round with a most dreadful Aspect, lift up his mighty Sword, and cleft so deep through the Steel into the knotty Wood, that none present but himself could draw it out again, which he did with Ease. Then being ask'd by the King, Why he look'd so fiercely before he struck, he answer'd, That if he had fail'd of his Blow, he then resolv'd to have kill'd them all, both Kings, and other Spectators. Both Kings made him large Presents, and John freely restor'd him to his Earldom of Ulster.

The French King sends a Champion to justify him.

who privately retires.

M. Paris, &c.

But what King Philip could not perform by one Champion in England, he effected in Normandy by many, where after great Success he took the chief City of Roven, by the Surrender of the Citizens, and that after a long Siege, and merely for want of sending them timely Assistance. It was surrender'd upon honourable Terms and divers advantageous Articles, the chief of which were, That the City should enjoy all its ancient Franchises and Privileges; but as Mezeray well observes, This Precaution prov'd as feeble against absolute Power, as Paper is against Iron; for as soon as he became Master of it, he utterly demolish'd all its noble Walls, and forbad them ever to be built again. After this the Castle on the Rock of Andeli was taken, partly by undermining, and partly by Famine, after it had been besieg'd almost a Year; but before the Enemy could enter, when they had scarce Provisions left for one Meal, the valiant Governor Roger Lacy, scorning to make Conditions for himself, and resolving to make the Prize as dear as possible to the Enemy, he courageously with Sword in Hand, together with divers of his brave Companions mounting their Horses, fall'd out, and killing great Numbers of the French, maintain'd a noble Fight, before they were taken. After the Surrender of the Castle, Roger was carry'd into France; yet for the great Courage and Bravery he shew'd in the Defence of it, the King commanded that he should be Prisoner at large; this Prince having so much Generosity as to make a wide Distinction between this gallant Man, and such Cowards as Fitz-Water and De Quincy, before-mention'd; and indeed this unfortunate Gentleman was worthy to have serv'd a better and more vigilant Master. Not long after, the French King having taken the Castles of Arches and Vernevil, became compleat Master of all Normandy. And thus was that Dukedom, the noblest Jewel in the English Diadem, which had been dismember'd from France for three hundred and twenty Years, and govern'd by twelve successive Dukes of the Norman Race, now torn from it, and made subject to another Master; ingloriously to him who lost it, unjustly by him who got it, and in a great Measure perfidiously by such as should, and might have kept it.

Roven surrender'd to the French.

All Normandy lost from England.

Nor-

Normandy was not the only Country that was lost, for almost all the rest of the transmarine Dominions sustain'd the same Fate: And the Cities and Castles subject to the King of England, being now reduc'd to great Streights, sent over to let him know their Condition, That the Time of the Truce was almost expir'd, and that they must either deliver up their Fortresses, or suffer their Hostages to be destroy'd. Whereupon the King answer'd their Messengers, That they must expect no Assistance from him, and therefore they might act as they thought fit. Thus for want of Relief, likewise all Main, Tourain, Anjou and Poictou, came under the Dominion of the French King, except Rochel, Toarx and Niors; and thus was King John treated by the same Person, with whom he had so perfidiously join'd against his own Father and Brother. Yet still the King spent his Time with his Queen wholly in Pleasures, as if in her he had enjoy'd all the World; only Trivet does in some degree excuse him, alledging, That King John discourag'd by so many Disasters, could not raise an Army sufficient either to defend his Territories, or to recover what was lost; for his own Subjects being now generally discontented, refus'd to fight for him, and so he learnt by unhappy Experience, That all the real Power of Princes consists in the Love of their People. About this Time the King's Mother, Queen Eleanor, dy'd very aged, a Princess of an high and active Spirit, who had been Wife to two mighty Kings, and Mother to three; who after she had met with all the Vicissitudes of Fortune, liv'd just long enough to see most of her own hereditary Dominions lost to a prevailing Conqueror.

Reg. 6.

IV. King John, being reduc'd to smaller Dominions than any of his Predecessors since the Norman Conquest, began now to be sensible of his Foreign Dishonours, and his Domestick Affronts; and by the Advice of his best Friends, he gather'd together a powerful Army and a mighty Navy, resolving to revenge his Wrongs, and repair his Losses. But all his Designs were suddenly blasted, chiefly by the means of the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury and the Earl of Pembroke, who, when he was ready to take Shipping at Portsmouth, came to him and dissuaded him from this Expedition; alledging many Inconveniencies and Mischiefs, using many Intreaties, and likewise threatening to detain him by Force. At length being overcome by their Importunities, he by their Advice sent his Brother the Earl of Salisbury with a considerable Force to Rockelle, whither his natural Son Geoffry had been sent before, and so dismiss'd the greatest Part of his Noblemen and Knights; who having been put to vast Charges, in Expectation of an honourable Campaign, solemnly curs'd the Authors of this Advice; and more especially the Mariners, who to the Number of fourteen thousand, for this Design brought their Ships from the utmost Parts of the Kingdom. As this prov'd a severe Disappointment to many, so most of all to the King himself, who being restless and uneasie, put to Sea with a small Force; but after two or three Days waiving backwards and forwards, he found it convenient to return and land at Warham in Dorsetshire. Immediately after he extorted a vast Sum of Money from his Earls, Barons, Knights and Clergy, for refusing to follow him beyond Sea to recover his lost Dominions: Which was the second Time he had rais'd Money upon the Nation without the People's Consent; and was one of those Grievances which afterwards caus'd the Barons to take up Arms against him, and one of the particular Heads provided against by his great Charter.

The King defeated in his Designs.

Arch-Bishop Hubert's Design.

About the same Time Arch-Bishop Hubert dy'd, and the King in Person at Canterbury seiz'd upon all his Wealth and Possessions, shewing himself highly satisfy'd, That he was freed from him whom he suspected to have held private Intelligence with the French King, declaring, That he was never a King till now, by reason of Hubert's presumptuous crossing his Royal Resolutions, as of late he did. But this Joy and Expectation of happier Days, was soon stilled and bury'd in the same Tomb with the Arch-Bishop, out of whose Ashes such a Fire-

Fire-brand was produc'd, as exceedingly inflam'd and embroil'd the Affairs of King John, and the whole Nation. For immediately after his Death, the junior Monks of Canterbury, too little valuing a declining King, and too much esteeming a rewarding Pope, proceeded to an unprecedented Action, and at Midnight chose Reginald, the Sub-Prior of their Convent, for their Arch-Bishop, without the least Knowledge of the King. And obliging of him to the strictest Secrecy, they sent him away to Rome with the utmost Expedition, not doubting but his Holiness out of Interest would confirm their Election. But this vain-glorious Monk, being got into Flanders, divulg'd the Secret in all Parts, declar'd himself Arch-Bishop, and shew'd the Instrument of the Convent under their Seal: Of which when the rest had notice, and that he had broke his Oath of Secrecy, they were highly incens'd, and to prevent the King's just Displeasure, they now submitted themselves to his Majesty, humbly desiring his Licence to chuse a new Arch-Bishop. This was freely granted by the King, but with this Intimation, That if they would chuse John Gray, Bishop of Norwich, they would do him an acceptable Piece of Service; upon which the Monks unanimously chose him in due Form, and the King and he went immediately to Canterbury, where the next Day the Prior in the Presence of them and the Convent, declar'd the said John duly elected Arch-Bishop of Canterbury. After which the Monks plac'd him with great Solemnity in the Archiepiscopal Throne; and the King with no less Ceremony put him in Possession of the Temporalities belonging to the Archbishoprick, to the general Satisfaction of all Men.

which was the Beginning of King John's Troubles.

M. Paris. Thus the King's Affairs seem'd to succeed well in England, and not worse in France, where his Majesty landed with a powerful Army at Roche. Upon which the Poictovins, glad of his Arrival, came in chearfully to him, and promis'd their Assistance; and after he had subdu'd a considerable Part of Poictou, he sat down before the strong Castle of Mont-Auban, and battering it fifteen Days with his Engines, took it on the first of August, which Place Charles the Great could not take with a seven Years Siege. Upon this Success the King wrote to his Justices, Bishops and Nobility of England, how many great illustrious Prisoners, and what Horse and Arms, and what innumerable Spoils he had taken. But the religious Persons of those Parts mediating between the two Kings, they procur'd a two Years Truce; and so King John return'd into England, soon losing all the Advantages he had gain'd. And now his Troubles began to fall heavy upon him from the Pope, who by his Artifices endeavour'd to make both the late Elections void; misliking the Abilities of Reginald, as well as the Principles of Gray. When the King sent some of the Monks of Canterbury to Rome, to obtain the Pope's Confirmation of Gray, at the same Time the Suffragan Bishops of that Province, also sent their Proctors to Rome, who highly complain'd to the Pope, That the Monks had presum'd to chuse an Arch-Bishop without them, when they of common Right and ancient Custom ought to have been present, and have join'd to the Election; for which they alledg'd divers Decrees and Precedents, produc'd Witnesses and Testimonials, That the Bishops together with the Monks had chosen three Arch-Bishops. The Monks on the other side affirm'd, That by ancient and allow'd Custom, and by special Privilege of divers Popes, they us'd to make Elections without the Bishops, which they offer'd to prove by sufficient Witnesses: And thus the Process continu'd till the following Year.

M. Paris. under. In the mean Time King John proceeded by his grand Council to raise a new Tax of the thirteenth Part of all Mens Moveables; but while he endeavour'd for these Sinews of War, he more and more lost the Bands of Peace, the Hearts of his People. And hence arose the Beginnings of a miserable Breach between the King and his Subjects, being both out of Proportion, and disjointed in those just Ligaments of Command and Obedience that should hold them together; the reducing of which into due Form and Order, cost many Years Toil, and more noble Blood, than all the foreign Wars since the Conquest. One of the greatest Incendiaries was Geoffry Arch-Bishop of York, who solemnly execrating all the King's Receivers within his Province, fled secretly out of the Land. In these violent Proceedings the Clergy have been blam'd by some Writers who were even Enemies to King John; especially since they patiently permitted Florentinus the Pope's Legate, not long before to carry away vast Sums from them to his Master's Coffers at Rome. Yet still these Domestick Troubles took away nothing from the King's Care, nor his good Hopes, which were much encreas'd by the Presence of his Nephew the Emperor Otho; who in Person arriving in England to project for his own and his Uncle's Wars, was with great Joy met by the King, and conducted through London by Night, where all the City was seen in her Glory, and the Streets adorn'd with the richest Hangings, beautified with the Lustre of pendant Crowns, and shining Lamps. After some Days Continuance, and magnificent Entertainments, the Emperor departed, not unfurnish'd with Helps to carry on his Wars.

In the mean Time the Troubles and Mischiefs began now to show themselves from the See of Rome; where at length there was a solemn Hearing before the Pope concerning the double Election at Canterbury. After which, those who stood for Reginald the Sub-Prior, presented him to his Holiness, as being first and duly elected, while the other Party offer'd to prove the first Election void, as being made by Night without the King's Consent, and chief Part of the Convent; so that after long Disputes, the Pope proceeded to an unprecedented Action, and publicly judg'd both these Persons Uncanonical; and by the Advice of his Cardinals null'd them both, absolutely forbidding either Party to enter upon the Archiepiscopal Dignity. And to establish his Interest and Power at once, he nominated Stephen Langton, an Englishman and Cardinal, for their Arch-Bishop, urging the Monks to chuse him: At first they alledg'd, That they could make no Canonical Election, without the Consent of the King and their Convent; but the Pope reply'd, That they had in themselves the full Power of the Church of Canterbury; and that in Elections at the Apostolick See, the Consent of Princes was not expected; and then he commanded all present, by vertue of their Obedience, and upon pain of a Curse, to chuse him Arch-Bishop, whom he had appointed for their Father and Pastor. Upon this positive Command, the Monks, dreading the Pope's unbounded Power, all except one Elias de Brantfield, with great Reluctance gave their Consents; and so Cardinal Langton was consecrated Arch-Bishop by the Pope himself at Viterbo, on the seventeenth Day of June, contrary to common Law and Equity.

The Pope nominates a new Arch-Bishop of Canterbury.

He endeavours to pacify the King.

The Pope being sensible that King John would deeply resent this arbitrary Proceeding, sent over his Nuntio with four extraordinary Rings, set with rich Stones of four different Colours; and also a subtle insinuating Letter, setting forth the wonderful Mysterics contain'd in the Roundness of the Rings, and their various Colours, which signify'd, as he said, the four cardinal Virtues, with several Divine Graces; and concluding with an earnest Exhortation to follow each of those Virtues thus signify'd. Yet the Pope would not rely upon the King's good Pleasure, but also politickly wrot other Letters, in which he exhorted the King to receive and acknowledge Stephen Langton, a Native of his own Kingdom, and a Cardinal well skill'd in all Sorts of Learning, since his exemplary Life and Conversation would be of great Advantage both to his Body and Soul. But still to secure all, he also sent his peremptory Command to the Prior and Monks, to receive and obey him as their Arch-Bishop, as well in Temporals as Spirituals. The King receiving his Letters, and hearing of all Proceedings, in a great Rage charg'd the Monks of Canterbury with Treason; remonstrating, That in Prejudice to his Prerogative, they had first chosen their Sub-Prior without a Licence, and then to make some feign'd Amends, elected the Bishop of Norwich; and that tho' their Journey to Rome was at his own Expence, yet, as an Aggravation to their first Offence, they had presum'd to chuse Stephen Langton his declared Enemy, and had caus'd him to be consecrated Arch-Bishop. For which cause the King, in the Heat of his Fury, sent two cruel and ill-natur'd Knights, with some other Officers, to drive the Monks of Canterbury out of England, as Criminals of the highest Nature: And these, in pursuance of the King's Orders, entering the Monastery with drawn Swords, commanded the Prior and Monks, in the Name of the King, immediately to depart out of the Nation, or else they would certainly burn them, and their Monastery together. The Monks being greatly terrify'd, without further Consideration left their Monastery, and all their Goods to be confiscated; and passing into Flanders, were kindly receiv'd in the Abby of St. Bertin, and in other adjoining Monasteries.

M. Paris.

King John, not thus satisfy'd, sent Messengers to the Pope with expostulatory Letters, setting forth, the Injury done him in vacating the Election of the Bishop of Norwich, and consecrating Stephen Langton without his Consent; a Person wholly unknown to him, educated in France, and a Correspondent of his open Enemies; all this to the Prejudice and Subversion of the Rights and Prerogatives of his Crown: Declaring he would immutably stand by the Election of the Bishop of Norwich; remembring him, That Rome receiv'd more Profit from England, than from all the Transalpine Regions; and threatning, if he could not have a favourable Hearing at Rome, he would preclude all Persons from passing thither, by shutting up his Ports: For since he had Arch-Bishops, Bishops and Prelates, abounding in Learning, in his own Dominions, if he were forc'd to it, he would neither seek for Justice nor Judgment in foreign Countries. To which the Pope, after some Respite, return'd a cunning and plausible Answer, in which he first mildly blam'd the King for giving so rough an Answer to his humble and obliging Letters, and next justify'd the Election of Cardinal Langton, as one who had long study'd in the University of Paris, and had merited to be made a Doctor both in the liberal Arts, and Theology: Further assuring him, That tho' at Elections made at the Apostolick See, the Consent of Princes was not requisite, yet notwithstanding, two Monks had been specially deputed to gain his Assent; but being detain'd at Dover, they were not able to perform what was enjoin'd them. Then justifying the Election as agreeable to the Canons of the ancient Fathers, he concluded with a threatning Advice, That since his Father and Brother had abjur'd that evil Custom, he ought to submit to his good Pleasure, which would be much for his Honour, and not to resist God and the Church in this Cause, for which that blessed Martyr and glorious Arch-Bishop Thomas Becket had shed his Blood.

The King expostulates with the Pope, who returns him a subtle Answer.

A. D.

These last were terrible Words to a King whose Father had been so great a Sufferer; which were succeeded by a new Command from the Pope to the Bishops of London, Ely and Worcester, to argue the Affair with the King, and if they found him contumacious, to declare that his Kingdom should be interdicted; and if he still persisted, that his Holiness would lay a heavier Hand upon him. Upon which these Bishops immediately repairing to the King, entreated him with Tears to recall the Arch-Bishop and Monks to their Church, and honour and love them with perfect Charity, that he might avoid the Scandal of the Interdict; but while they were proceeding in their Speech, the King, sensible of these numerous Indignities, fell into a violent Passion, and by a solemn Oath declar'd, That if any should presume to interdict his Territories, he would send all the Prelates and Clergy of England to the Pope, and confiscate their Goods; and if he found any Romans within his Dominions, he would deprive them of their Eyes and Noses, and send them to Rome, that they might be distinguish'd from those of other Nations: And he further commanded the Bishops immediately to depart his Presence, as they valu'd their present Safeties. The King was further provok'd by the Behaviour of Simon Langton, who about the same Time, before divers Bishops, advis'd him to receive his Brother Stephen as Arch-Bishop of Canterbury; and when the King spoke to him of preserving his Royal Dignity in this Affair, he insolently re-ply'd, That he could do nothing in his Majesty's Behalf, unless he would wholly throw himself upon his Brother's Mercy. The above-mention'd Bishops, finding no Signs of Compliance, abandon'd the King, and on the twenty second Day of March, they solemnly interdicted the whole Kingdom of England and Dominion of Wales, in Obedience to the Pope's Commands; upon which there was a Cessation of all Divine Service, except Confession, Baptism of Infants, and Administration of the Eucharist to dying Persons; so that the Bodies of the Dead were carry'd out of the Cities and Towns, and without any Ceremony like Beasts were tumbled into Pits and Ditches.

For which the King proceeds against the Clergy to the utmost Violence.

The King fearing the Consequence of the Interdict, and his Subjects Hatred, proceeded to violent Methods, sent to his Sheriffs and other Ministers, and commanded with dreadful Threats all Prelates and their inferior Clergy forthwith to depart the Kingdom, and repair to the Pope, requiring him to do the King Justice for this Injury. He also put all Bishopricks, Abbies and Priories under the Custody of Lay-Men, commanding all the Church Rents to be confiscated, and their Goods to be seiz'd: The Concubines of the Priests and Clerks throughout England were imprison'd by the King's Officers, and forc'd to pay great Compositions for their Liberty: The Monks and Men in Orders, while travelling upon the Road, were thrown off their Horses, and robb'd and abus'd by the King's Soldiers: Also the Relations of the Arch-Bishop and those Bishops who pronounc'd the Interdict, were by the King's Command rifled of their Goods, and cast into Prison. Yet notwithstanding all these Evils, M. Paris tells us, 'That the foresaid Bishops remain'd beyond Sea, living in all manner 'of Delights, not opposing themselves as a Wall of Defence for the Lord's 'House; but when they saw the Wolf coming, they left their Sheep and fled. After these general Seisures, the King in a short Time restor'd the Lands and Goods of all such Ecclesiasticks as celebrated Divine Service, administer'd the Sacraments, and refus'd to obey the Interdict; but retain'd the Estates of all the rest. And for the Security of such as obey'd him, he issu'd out his Precept, that no Man against his Peace should abuse them either in Word or Deed; which if they did, they should if pursu'd be hang'd upon the next Tree. But these were all immediately condemn'd by the See of Rome: And this was the present State of the Clergy of England; such as oblig'd the King were suspended by the Pope, and such as obey'd the Pope were depriv'd by the King.

Such irregular Proceedings in the King, and such Perplexities in the People could not but occasion great Hatred and Murmurings; therefore to prevent the Effects of such Discontents, the King requir'd of his Nobility new Oaths of Allegiance, and Pledges of such as he most suspected, as also Homage of all Freeholders, even from twelve Years of Age, all whom he dismiss'd with the Ceremony of a Kiss of Peace. Misdoubting also the Pope's further Intent to absolve his Subjects from their due Allegiance, after the Example of his Father Henry, he gather'd together a powerful Army for all Exigencies. The Terror of which he first display'd in the North, being disoblig'd at William King of Scotland, for receiving some Out-laws fled out of England, and for marrying his Daughter to the Earl of Boloigne without his Consent. But upon his Approach to the Borders of Scotland, King William desir'd Peace, and by the Mediation of Friends to both Nations, they made up the Breach upon these Terms, 'That the King of the Scots should pay King John eleven thousand Marks of Silver, and that his two Daughters should be deliver'd as Pledges for the Security of the Peace between them. The Dread of the King's Power pass'd so swiftly out of the North into the West, that upon his Return, the Princes of Wales, and others, rich and poor, came to him at Woodstock to do him Homage. But all these Ties of Allegiance were in Danger of being dissolv'd by a new Sentence from Rome of an Excommunication of the King's Person, with strict Injunction for all Men to abandon his Presence: Which being sent to be pronounc'd by the Bishops and Prelates in England, all of them for Fear or Favour of the King,

The King excommunicated by the Pope.

King, neglected the Pope's Commands, and let the Apostolick Process escape without Execution. However the Sentence was so well known, that it became the Subject of all Mens Discourse; particularly of Geoffry Arch-Deacon of Norwich, who in the Exchequer declar'd to his Associate, That it was not safe for benefic'd Men to continue in the Service of an excommunicated King, and so retir'd without leave. For which the King commanded him to be put in Irons in a close Prison, and a leaden Cope to be put upon him, the Pressure of which much hasten'd his Death: But the greater and wiser Sort, both of the Nobility and others, continu'd their Attendance on the King's Court and Person, without Regard of the Censure.

M. Paris.

In the mean Time the King, raising great Sums of Money, to show his Power, with a mighty Army pass'd over into Ireland, which Country had been too long neglected; and arriving at Dublin, he was there met with more than twenty petty Kings and Princes of that Country, who dreading his Arms, paid him Homage and Fealty. All the neighbouring Parts readily submitted; but to the rest, the King march'd with his Forces, took many strong Places from the Enemy, subdu'd the Province of Connaught, and took Cuthol the King Prisoner. Having reduc'd all Parts, he imprison'd the English Fugitives, took Pledges both of the English and Irish Inhabitants, punish'd Malefactors with Death, turbulent Persons with Ransoms, establish'd all their Laws, Coin and Officers according to the English Form, and deputed a wise and upright Governor over them, the Bishop of Norwich, Competitor to Cardinal Langton. Thus he establish'd on that barbarous Island such an exact and well order'd Face of Government, as was its Stay in those tumultuous Times, and a Pattern for more peaceful Ages to imitate; by which speedy Conquest and Reformation, he justly merited the Title given him of Lord of Ireland. As he was successful in these Parts, so was he no less in Wales, both in this and the following Year: For after he return'd from Ireland, and laid such vast Fines upon the Ecclesiasticks as amounted to a hundred thousand Pounds Sterling, he with a powerful Army march'd into the farthestmost Parts of Wales, as far as Snow-dun; so that the petty Princes, and Nobles submitted without any Opposition. Then to secure their future Subjection, he took twenty eight Hostages of them, and so return'd in Triumph, as Conqueror of Wales.

V. The Nation had now laid under an Interdict near three Years and an half, which prov'd highly dangerous to the King, as well as intolerably grievous to the People. So that at length the King finding the Pope inflexible, and insensible of the Burden of so many Christians, he began to relent and recede from his former Resolutions, hoping to settle his own and Subjects Tranquility, tho' with great Indignity to himself. In his Return from Wales, he was met at Northampton by two Nuntio's from the Pope, Pandolf a Sub-Deacon, and Durand a Knight Templar, who were sent purposely into England to make Peace between the King and the Ecclesiasticks. Being met together, after a long Debate, the King freely assur'd them, That the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and the Monks, and all the proscrib'd Bishops might return in Peace and Security to their own Palaces; and that the Holy Church should have all the Franchises it enjoy'd in the Reign of Edward the Confessor. But because the King would not, or indeed could not, make full Satisfaction for the Goods of the Arch-Bishop and Bishops formerly confiscated, and for the Damages they had sustain'd, the Treaty became wholly ineffectual, and the Nuntio's return'd into France. But before they departed, they denounc'd that Execration against the King's Person, which the Bishops had wholly declin'd, and so incens'd the Pope against him, that in the latter end of the Year, he proceeded to greater Contumelies than ever, and absolv'd all his Subjects, High and Low, from their Faith and Obedience to him; strictly enjoining all Persons under pain of Excommunication, to avoid him in Private and Publick, at his Table, Council, and common Conversation. For, as our Author tells us, the King had at the Time of the Interdict, divers Councillors about him, as well of the Clergy as Laity, whom he names; who striving to please him in all Things, were suppos'd not to advise him according to Law or Reason, but his own Humour.

Notwithstanding these strict Prohibitions, in Lent following the King had a noble Feast in Clarkenwell, where he knighted Prince Alexander, only Son and Heir to the King of the Scots, who return'd home with the Applause and Congratulations of both Kingdoms. Not long after, the Welsh having made several hostile Incurfions and Devastations in England, the King highly provok'd, levy'd a great Army, resolving to ravage all Wales, and extirpate the Inhabitants; and for a present Revenge he hang'd up all the twenty eight Hostages deliver'd to him the Year before. But in this, as in most other Actions, he met with unexpected Obstructions; for being ready for his Expedition, he receiv'd Letters from the King of the Scots and others of a Traiterous Conspiracy form'd against him, which at first he slighted, and march'd forward to Chester. But there receiving Letters again to the same Effect, that he should either be slain by his Noblemen, or deliver'd up to his Enemies, and now understanding that the great Men of England thought themselves discharg'd from their Obedience to him, he disbanded his Army and return'd to London. From whence he dispatch'd Commissioners to all suspected Persons of Quality, obliging them to send Pledges of their Fidelity; upon which many out of Fear sent their Sons, Nephews and nearest Relations, to appease his Indignation; but Eustace de Vescie, and Robert Fitz-Walter, being accus'd of Treason, fled one into Scotland, and the other into France. These Defections were much promoted by the pretended Predictions of one Peter a Hermite of Wakefield in Yorkshire, who prophesy'd that by the next Ascention Day, John should no longer be King. As the King took care to secure this Person, so he was not backwards in any severe Methods with others: And here our Author M. Paris adds, That being a Prince of insatiable Lust and Cruelty, he had now highly provok'd divers of the Nobility by debauching of their Wives and Daughters, by banishing their Relations, or by reducing them to Poverty by his illegal Exactions; so that he had made himself almost as many Enemies as there were Noblemen in the Kingdom. He further adds, That when they knew themselves to be absolv'd from their Fidelity by the Pope, they rejoic'd exceedingly; and if common Fame might be credited, they had each of them sign'd and seal'd a certain Charter which they had sent to the French King, assuring him he might safely come into England, obtain the Kingdom, and be crown'd with Honour.

The King marches towards Wales, but in vain.

The Nobility highly oblig'd by him.

The King depos'd by the Pope.

England given to the French King.

These were proper Times for the Pope to make his utmost Advantage; who being both inflexible and insatiable, now resolv'd to effect his Designs, tho' with the Confusion of Christendom. A fair Opportunity was now offer'd him by the humble Supplications of Arch-Bishop Langton, the Bishops of London and Ely, That he would vouchsafe, out of his pious Compassion, to support the English Church, then at the Point of Ruin. Upon which Pope Innocent by the Advice of his Cardinals and others, resolv'd to display his utmost Power, and by a solemn Sentence decreed, That King John should be intirely depos'd from his Kingdom, and that his Holiness should provide a more worthy Person to succeed him. Accordingly he wrote to Philip King of France, requiring him To put this Sentence in Execution; promising him, To grant him Remission of all his Sins, together with the Kingdom of England in perpetual Right, when once he had dethron'd the present Possessor. That he might not be wanting in any Thing, he wrote to the Potentates, Knights and Warriors of divers Nations, exciting them To sign themselves with the Cross, to follow the King of France as their General in this Expedition against King John, and endeavour to vindicate the Injury done to the Catholick Church: Decreeing further, That whoever contributed either Mony, or other Assistance, towards the subduing of this contumacious King, should be secure not only in their Goods and Persons, but also also as to their Souls, through the Prayers of the Church; and they should enjoy the same Privileges with those who visited the Sepulchre of our Lord. With this ample Commission, the Pope sent Pandolf his Nuntio with the English Bishops for England; first giving them Instructions, that every Thing should be punctually put in Execution, according to his Order. The Legate having ask'd him privately, What he should do, if King John repented and made Satisfaction to God and the Romish Church; the Pope thereupon prescribed certain Conditions of Peace, to which if the King would assent, he might yet obtain the Favour of the Apostolick See.

M. Paris. The French King likewise receiving from the Arch-Bishop and his Associates the Apostolick Sentence, became very fond of that Employment, to which his own ancient Malignity, and the Disloyalty of the English Barons had prompted him; both which he was now willing to mask with the specious Pretext of Justice and Devotion. Under which Colours he summon'd all his Dukes, Earls, Barons, Knights and Soldiers to appear at Roven upon pain of the highest Punishments; so that in a short Time he had a mighty Army at that City, as well as a powerful Navy at the Mouth of the River Seyne. A Preparation so formidable could not be long hidden from King John, who meeting with an Opposition both domestick and foreign, redoubled his Care, and immediately commanded all his Officers both for Sea and Land, under the severest Penalties, to prepare both a Navy and an Army sufficient to give a check to such a powerful Invasion. By which Means such infinite Multitudes throng'd to Dover, and other Harbours, that the Commanders, for want of Provisions, dismissing the rest, encamp'd at Barham-Downs only with sixty thousand select and valiant Men; who, as our Author observes, had they been hearty and unanimous, no Prince in the World could have withstood the King of England; so well appointed were his Forces by Land, and so well prepared were his Fleets by Sea. But the great Misfortune was, That the Clergy were incens'd against him by reason of the Interdict, and the Power he exercis'd over them; and the Laity no less, for his Taxes, and Arbitrary Proceedings.

M. Paris. continu. While both Shores of the Sea were overspread with the Armies of the two great Kings, the one waiting for the Enemy, and the other for fair Winds and more Forces, Pandolf the Pope's Legate, obtaining a safe Conduct from King John, arriv'd at Dover to put those secret Instructions in execution, which his Master had expressly prescribed. He there represented to the uneasie King the great Mischiefs he was to expect from that vast Fleet and Army the King of France had compleatly furnish'd for the entire Conquest of his Kingdom; in which all the Bishops, Clergy and others, unjustly banish'd the Land, were resolv'd to come over; and which was still more dangerous, the French King had receiv'd Charters and Assurances from most of the great Men of England, that they were ready to become his Subjects: Therefore his only Security remaining was penitently to submit to the Apostolick See, under which Shelter, he might be safe from this impending Storm. These Straits and Difficulties were undoubtedly very dreadful to a dishearten'd Prince, who saw so many mortal Enemies abroad to attack him, and so few faithful Friends at Home to defend him; which drove him into this melancholy Apprehension, that his wavering Nobility would either abandon him in the Field, or betray him to the Sword of his Enemies. Thus thinking it better to yield to the Times, with an Assurance of his Crown and the Pope's Favour, than desperately to hazard the Loss of all, he resolv'd to redeem his Safety on such Conditions as Necessity and the Pope now laid upon him; and at length with a bleeding Heart, and a Flood of Tears, he submitted to the Form of Peace as it was ready drawn up by the Pope, in which he took a solemn Oath, 'To obey the Commands of his Holiness in all Things for which he had been excommunicated, and to make full Restitution, for all Things which had been taken from the Clergy or Laity by reason of the Interdict or depending Contest, for which he was to lay down

‘ eight thousand Pounds in part; and to pardon and receive into Favour not ‘ only the proscribed Bishops, but also the Prior and Monks of Canterbury, and ‘ all other Clerks or Laicks concern’d in it. That he would confirm these ‘ Things by his Letters Patents, and cause as many Bishops and Barons, as ‘ should be chosen by the Arch-Bishop and Bishops, to swear, and give their

 ‘ by his Order should violate this Agreement, then those Bishops or Barons, on ‘ behalf of the Church, should adhere to the Pope’s Commands against them, ‘ and that he would for ever lose the Custody of vacant Churches. Next that ‘ he would send all these Letters of Security, for the Performance of all, to the ‘ Arch-Bishop and Bishops before their Return into England. Finally that he ‘ would utterly disclaim his Right to out-law any Clergy-Man, or any Lay-Man, ‘ so far as it related to this Matter.

As the King swore to obey the Commands of the Pope in all Things relating ^{to} to this Contest, so he soon found with a more afflicting Dejection of Mind what these Commands were; for his Crimes were accounted so great against God and the Church, that there could be no Expiation without a Resignation of his Crown. Accordingly two Days after, which was the Period of the Hermit’s Prophecy, King John at Dover, by the Commands of the Pope preordain’d at Rome, taking off his Crown from his Head, humbly surrender’d it into the Pope’s Hands by his Attorney Pandolf; at whose Feet he also laid his Scepter, Robe, Sword, Ring, and all the Royal Ensigns. After which he subscrib’d to another Charter, Whereby he resign’d his Kingdoms to the Pope, professing he did it neither out of Fear, or Constraint, but of his own free Will, and in the Common Council of his Barons, as having no other Way to make Satisfaction to God and the Church for his Offence; and that thenceforward he would hold his Crown as a Feudatary of the Church of Rome paying an annual Pension of a Thousand Marks for both the Kingdoms of England and Ireland. And if he or any of his Successors deny’d Submission, without Repentance, he should forfeit his Right to the Kingdom. Whereupon the King in the Presence of all did Homage to the Pope, as his supreme Lord, represented by Pandolf, in the most submissive and abject Manner; and delivering some Money as an earnest of his Subjection, the Legate proudly trod it under his Feet, to manifest his Master’s Greatness. That these Things were transacted in the Presence of some Peers, who gave no Consent to them, appears by Henry Arch-Bishop of Dublin, the chief Man in that Assembly, who both inwardly griev’d at it, and openly disclaim’d against it.

The Pope dissuades the French King
 from his Expedition.

V. King John had now debas’d himself to a lower Degree than any King ^μ before him, which render’d him the Object of the Nation’s Contempt, as well as Hatred: And while he was parting with his Crown to the Pope, King Philip was busily preparing his Head to wear it, and his Fleets and Armies to win it. Upon which the Legate, after five Days Possession, re-deliver’d the Crown, but not releas’d the Censures till all Conditions were perform’d, and then hastned into France; where he immediately exhorted King Philip to disband his Forces and desist from the design’d Expedition against King John, who was now an obedient and reconcil’d Son to the Church. King Philip, who like the Pope regarded John’s Kingdom more than his Repentance, was highly incens’d at this Proposal, alleging, That he had already expended more than sixty thousand Pounds in his Preparations, and had undertaken the Enterprize by the special Commands of his Holiness, and for the Remission of his Sins; therefore no new Censures should deter him from his Designs. In which Resolution calling a Council of his Nobles and Feudataries, all join’d with him except Ferrand Earl of Flanders, who freely declar’d That the Expedition was both unjust and impracticable, and that the King ought rather to think of restoring the transmarine Countries he unjustly detain’d, than of invading a Country to which which he had no Right at all; and therefore he absolutely refus'd his Assistance. This occasion'd the French King to direct the Course of his Arms, first against this Earl, to prevent future Inconveniencies from him; and accordingly commanded his grand Fleet to sail towards Flanders; whilst he by Land endeavour'd to subdue that Country. King John having Intelligence of his Friend's Distress, immediately sent out his Navy under the Conduct of three brave Commanders, his natural Brother the Earl of Salisbury, the Duke of Holland, and the Earl of Bulloign; who happily surprizing the French Fleet at the Port of Damme, took three hundred of them loaden with Provisions, Arms and other valuable Things, and burnt and sunk above a hundred more; so that the French King was so greatly disappointed, that he shortly after return'd to Paris.

*His Fleet is worsted at Sea
by the English.*

King John swoln with this Success, was now elevated with the Hopes of regaining all his lost Countries, and the more because he had the Promise of Assistance both from the Emperor and the Earl of Flanders; and to this End he gather'd a powerful Army to Portsmouth. But in the midst of this hopeful Prospect, he met with his usual Disappointment; for being ready to take Shipping, the great Men and Barons directly deny'd their Attendance, unless he was first absolv'd from his Excommunication; which had been deferr'd 'till the Arrival of the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury. Upon which the King immediately sent over an honourable Embassie, and Letters of safe Conduct to the Arch-Bishop and the rest of the Exiles, to return and receive Satisfaction according to the Articles with the Legate. Accordingly the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Ely, Lincoln and Hereford, with the other Clerks and Laicks then in Banishment by reason of the Interdict, arriv'd at Dover on the sixteenth Day of July, and went to wait on the King at Winchester; who hearing of their Coming, went forth to meet them, and throwing himself at the Feet of the Bishops, with a Flood of Tears beseech'd them to have pity on him and the Kingdom of England. Upon which, seeing his great Humility, they lifted him from the Ground, and with Tears likewise led him to the Chapter-House at Winchester, where before he was absolv'd, he took an Oath, 'That he would to the utmost of his Power love, defend and maintain the Holy Church; That he would re-establish the good Laws of his Ancestors, especially those of King Edward, and destroy such as were wicked; That he would judge all his Subjects according to the just Judgment of his Court, and restore to every Man his Right. He also swore, That he would make full Satisfaction to all concern'd in the Interdict, for what had been taken from them, and that before next Easter; or else his Sentence of Excommunication was to be renew'd. Moreover he swore Fealty and Obedience to Pope Innocent, and his Catholick Successors, as it was contain'd in his late Charter. Then the Arch-Bishop, absolving him, carry'd him into the Church, and there celebrated Mass; from whence the Prelate went and din'd at the same Table with the King, to the general Joy and Satisfaction of the People.

Excommunication.*

The King now began to entertain fresh Hopes of Success abroad, and accordingly repair'd again to Portsmouth in order to pass into France; but as ill Fortune generally attended him, so he was again disappointed by his great Men, Knights, and such as held by Military Tenure, who complain'd That they had attended so long for this Expedition, that all their Money was spent; and unless he would furnish them out of his own Treasury, they could not go with him. The King refusing this, took Shipping himself with his private Family, and after three Days arriv'd at Jersey, while his Lords and great Men return'd home; so that seeing himself deserted, he sail'd back to England, without any further Progress in this Design. But being highly incens'd, at his Return he rais'd a powerful Force to chastize them whom he accounted as Rebels to the Performance of their wonted Duty and Service; but while he was marching to reduce them, the new Arch-Bishop stopp'd him at Northampton, declaring

He is disappointed by his Nobility.

That to make War against any Person, without the Judgment of his Court, was a Violation of his late Oath. Upon which the King answer'd in a violent Tone That he would not lay aside the Business of his Kingdom for one Clerk, who had nothing to do with Lay-Matters; and the next Morning march'd towards Nottingham. The Arch-Bishop follow'd him, and threatned, That unless he immediately desisted, he would anathematize all those, besides himself, that took up Arms against any Man before the Relaxation of the Interdict; by which means he caus'd the King to give over prosecuting the Barons by Force, and by his Assiduity obtain'd a competent Day for them to answer in his Court.

The Nobility stand up for the Privilege of the Nation.

Upon the twenty fifth Day of August, a Council or Synod met at London to compose all Differences between the King and the Barons; at which Time the Bishops, Abbots, Deans, and several Barons, being assembled in St. Paul's Church, Arch-Bishop Stephen, after an Indulgence granted to Churches to chant over their publick Prayers with a low Voice, drew some of the chief Men aside, and reminded them, That when he absolv'd the King, he caus'd him to swear 'That he would abolish all unjust Laws, and establish such as were good 'throughout the Kingdom: And further inform'd them, He had found a Charter of King Henry the First, by which, if they thought fit, they might assert their ancient Liberties so long lost. Then producing the Charter it self, which we have already mention'd in the first Year of that King's Reign, he caus'd it to be read publickly before them, where it was receiv'd with great Joy and Satisfaction; and all swore in the Presence of the Arch-Bishop, That upon a convenient Opportunity, They would contend even to Death it self for those Liberties. On the other side the Arch-Bishop promis'd them his faithful and utmost Assistance; and so the Confederacy being firmly concluded, the Conference or Parliament was dissolved: This being the first League or Confederacy made by the Barons of England of the Norman Extract against the King, in Defence of their ancient Rights and Liberties. This was shortly after succeeded by the Death of Geoffry Fitz-Peter, Justiciary of England, who had been the chief Stay and Support of the Kingdom; yet his Death was so pleasing to his Sovereign, that upon the News of it he swore That now at length he was King of England, and with great Joy said to some Lords about him, When this Man comes to Hell let him salute the Arch-Bishop Hubert, whom certainly he will find there. And from this Time he took upon him a more absolute Power of contradicting his Oaths and Contracts, and of setting himself free from the Agreement he had lately made.

The King seeks for Shelter from the Pope,

And now finding his Nobility and others to bear hard upon him, he began to take Shelter under the Power of the See of Rome, whose Interest it was at present to vindicate all his Actions. To put an end to his Troubles, he was now visited by a Legate from his Holiness of a higher Form than Pandolf, which was Nicolas Bishop of Tusculum, and a Cardinal, who arriv'd at London about Michaelmas in a solemn and pompous Manner. The open and profess'd Design of his Coming was to relax the Interdict, in order to which he first endeavour'd to reconcile the King and Prelates upon Covenants of Restitution; towards which, tho' the King offer'd a hundred thousand Marks, yet the Prelates, condemning the Legate of Partiality for approving it, chose rather to suffer the whole Land to groan under the Burden of the Interdict, than to recede from any Part of their covetous Demands. This gave a fair Occasion to the Pope's Agent to discover to the King the more secret and principal Cause of his Embassie, which was for effecting a more valid and unexceptionable Conveyance of his Kingdoms to the Roman See; for which he alledg'd, That the King could never be secure and easie, but under the powerful Protection of the Apostolick Wings. King John finding himself surrounded with Difficulties, and that he had created many Enemies, at length servily comply'd; and having a solemn Assembly in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul's, he before the great Altar, tar, in the Sight of the Clergy and Laity, renew'd his infamous Subjection of the Crown and Kingdom of England, with the Lordship or Dominion of Ireland to the Pope; and the King's Charter, which was formerly seal'd with Wax, and deliver'd to Pandolf, was now seal'd with Gold, and deliver'd to the Legate, for the Use of the Pope and the Roman Church. At the same Time; we are told That the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury stept forth, and in the Name of the whole Clergy and Kingdom, boldly and solemnly presented at the same Altar his Appeal and Protestation against that Charter, as execrable to the whole World.

and confirms his Resignation to him.

As the Arch-Bishop now began to set himself against the Interest of the Pope, formerly his great Benefactor, so the Pope easily found Means to revenge himself, by ordering his Legate to fill up all the Vacancies in the Church, contrary to his Will and Consent. And when he made a formal Appeal to the See of Rome against his Legate, for not only disposing of all Spiritual Dignities to such as were Favourites to the King, but also to his own Italians, and Kinsmen, tho' absent, unknown, insufficient, unworthy, yea and to some unborn; he could meet with no Redress. For the Legate had before sent Pandolf to Rome, where he did not a little blast the Credit of the Arch-Bishop with the Pope, and so much extoll'd the King that he affirm'd, That he never heard of a more humble and modest Prince, so that he obtain'd great Favour with his Holiness: And tho' Simon Langton, Brother to the Arch-Bishop, was purposely sent to oppose Pandolf, yet since he now brought over the King's Charters, containing the Subjection and Tribute of his Kingdoms, Simon could not be heard in what he offer'd against him. Pandolf also affirm'd, That the Arch-Bishop and Bishops were too rigid and covetous in their exacting Restitution; and that they had beyond all Equity depress'd the King himself, and the Liberties of the Kingdom. All which Allegations occasion'd the Pope to hasten the Relaxation of the Interdict, contrary to the Desire and Expectations of some Men; and the Conditions were that the King only should pay forty thousand Marks in all, and by several Portions, in lieu of all Restitution whatsoever. Which being agreed and establish'd, the Legate on the twenty ninth Day of June publicly releas'd the Sentence of Interdict, after it had continu'd six Years, three Months, and fourteen Days. For this extraordinary Benefit Te Deum was solemnly sung by the Clergy; and the whole Nation highly rejoic'd, that they were now restor'd to the free and publick Exercise of religious Duties. But as to Matters of Restitution, none but the rich Bishops and some Abbies receiv'd any Benefit, while the poorer Monasteries, and inferior Clergy, receiv'd no Satisfaction for all their Losses.

Great Abuses from the Pope's Legate.

The Interdict, after six Years, is releas'd.

Paris, minus.

In the mean Time King John, having pass'd into France, was once more trying his Fortunes in that Country; and entering Poitou, his Success was so great, that he soon subdu'd the greatest Part of it, which gave great Hopes that his other Provinces would follow. From whence he press'd with the like Victories into Bretaign; but being just ready to give Battel to Lewis the Dauphine, his ever faithless Poitouvins suddenly forsook him, and oblig'd him to abandon his Design. But the greatest Blow to his Hopes was the total Defeat of his Confederate Otho the Emperor, at the famous Battel of Bovines, where Philip stricken from his Horse by the Earl of Boloign, had there with his Life ended the Contest, had not a faithful Soldier cover'd him with his own Body; who thereupon recover'd his Footing, and gain'd such an effectual Victory, that no Prince was for the future able to withstand him. This melancholy News oblig'd King John to desire a five Years Truce of the French King, by which all Things and Persons were to remain in the same State as they were in at the Time of the Ratification. This being concluded, King John return'd into England on the nineteenth Day of October, after some Advantages gain'd: And this was the last Expedition that ever he made into Foreign Parts.

King John's last Expedition in Foreign Parts.

VII. King John, tho' he had neither retriev'd his Honour, nor recover'd his Territories, now seem'd to have surmounted those Difficulties, as might have made him easie the rest of his Reign; but his former Carriage had laid such a Foundation for Discontents, that instead of Rest, he soon found himself plung'd into greater Troubles and Misfortunes than ever he had felt before. For about the Time of his Return, the Earls and Barons, under a Pretence of a Pilgrimage, met at St. Edmund's Bury, where after long and private Consultations, the Charter of King Henry I. was produc'd, which they had lately receiv'd from the Arch-Bishop, containing, as our Author says, the Laws and Liberties that King Edward had granted to the Holy English Church, and the great Men of the Kingdom, with some other Liberties added by King Henry himself. Here they took a solemn Oath at the High Altar, That if the King refus'd to grant them their demanded Liberties, they would withdraw their Obedience, and make War upon him, 'till he should by a seal'd Charter reconfirm them: And further they agreed to go after Christmas and demand his Confirmation of the said Liberties, and in the mean Time to provide themselves with Horse and Arms, that no Compulsion might be wanting, if Occasion so requir'd. Accordingly at the appointed Time they repair'd to the King at London, all in very pompous military Accoutrements, where they desir'd, That the Laws and Liberties of King Edward, with other Privileges granted to the Kingdom and Church of England, might be confirm'd, as they were contain'd in the Charters of Henry the First: Further alledging, That at the Time of his Absolution, he promis'd by his Oath to observe those very Laws and Liberties. The King startled at their Demands, and dreading their Preparations, calmly desir'd Time 'till the Close of Easter to return them a positive Answer, and so satisfie them for the present: But the better to secure himself, he immediately caus'd all Persons to renew their Homages, and to swear Allegiance to him against all others; and further took upon him the Crusado, that he might be more safe under the Protection of that Badge; but still without Effect. For in Easter Week, the great Men met at Stanford, consisting of most of the Nobility of England, and making up a powerful Army, in which were no less than two thousand Knights, besides other Horse and Foot, arm'd with divers Weapons; and Arch-Bishop Langton was their principal, tho' private Adviser. At the same Time the King at Oxford expected their coming thither; but hearing of their Numbers and Preparations, he sent some of his chief Courtiers to know of them What Laws and Liberties they desir'd. Upon which the Confederate Earls and Barons deliver'd them a Schedule, containing principally the ancient Customs of the Kingdom; declaring, That if the King would not immediately grant and confirm them under his Seal, they would compel him by seising his Castles and Possessions. Upon the sight of these, the King falling into a violent Passion, ask'd Why the Barons did not with these Exactions demand his Kingdom? Declaring That they were all foolish and groundless, and with a solemn Oath protested, That he would never grant such Liberties as would make himself a Slave.

The Beginning of the Barons
Wars.

Thus began an unhappy War, call'd the Barons War, occasion'd by the Nobilities positive insisting, and the King's obstinate refusing to confirm the Laws of King Edward, and the Liberties and Privileges of other preceding Kings, as the Author of the Annals of Waverly judiciously observes. To which he adds, That those Laws had been much corrupted and infring'd, during this King's Father's Reign; but chiefly in his own, who had dispossest several great Men without any Judgment of their Peers, condemn'd others to cruel Deaths, and violated their Wives and Daughters, insomuch that his tyrannical Will stood instead of a Law. The Barons having defy'd the King, and renounc'd their late Homage, chose the Lord Fitz-Water for their General, calling him The Marshal of the Army of God, and of the Holy Church; and immediately mediately march'd to Northampton, and besieg'd the Castle fifteen Days, but without Success. Upon which they rais'd the Siege, and went to Bedford Castle, where they were kindly receiv'd by the Master William Beauchamp. Here receiving secret Intelligence that they might now possess themselves of the City of London, they immediately march'd to Ware, and on the twenty fourth Day of May, early in the Morning enter'd the City at Algate, by the Favour of some of the rich Citizens. Having obtain'd this great Advantage, they besieg'd the Tower, and by their threatening Letters to all Opposers soon caus'd a very great Defection, in all Parts both among the Commonalty as well as the Gentry. The King for a while kept himself upon the Defensive, but now seeing himself deserted, and fearing they would seize his Castles, he sent the Earl of Pembroke and other faithful Messengers to them, to let them know he would grant them The King complies. the Laws and Liberties they desir'd, allowing them to appoint a Day and a Place to meet and conclude this Affair. This is suppos'd to have been a deceitful Message on the King's Part, yet the Barons were transported with it, and joyfully appointed the King to meet him on the fifteenth Day of June, in a Meadow between Stanes and Windsor call'd Runnemede; which signifies the Mead of Council, because from ancient Times Treaties for the Peace of the Kingdom had been often held there.

M. Paris. In this Place the King appear'd with the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and other Bishops, with some few Lords; but on the Barons Side the Nobility were not easily to be number'd: So that the King finding himself much over-power'd, without any seeming Difficulty granted them the Laws and Liberties in two Charters, because being so many, they could not be contain'd in one Schedule. The first and chief is call'd Charta Communium Libertatum, or Magna Charta, Magna Charta, &c. confirmed by the King. the Charter of Liberty or the Great Charter; and the second Charta Foresta, the Charter of the Liberties of the Forest. In the great Charter, among other Matters it was decreed, 'That the Common Pleas should not follow the Court, 'but should be fix'd in one certain Place: That Itinerant Justices should be sent 'through every County once a Year, to hold Assizes in each County, together 'with the Knights of the respective Divisions; and such Things as they could 'not determine in the proper Counties, should be determin'd in some other 'Place in their Circuit; and if any Difficulty arose, so as they could not determine it, it should be referr'd to the Justices of the King's Bench. That Earls 'and Barons should not be amerc'd but by their Peers: That no Tax should be 'rais'd without the Consent of the Parliament, excepting only for the Redemption of the King's Person, if Necessity requir'd it, or for Knighting his eldest 'Son, or for the Marriage of his eldest Daughter: In either of which three Cases he might levy a moderate Tax by his own Authority. If on other Occasions he wanted a Subsidy, the Arch-Bishops, Bishops, Abbots, Earls, and 'greater Barons should be summon'd singly by different Writs; and all others 'in general who held of the King in Capite, should be summon'd by the Sheriffs and Bailiffs, to meet at a certain Day and Place; and that the Summons 'should be issu'd out forty Days at least before the Time of Meeting; and in the 'Writ of Summons, the Cause of their being summon'd should be specify'd. And because not only the King, but his great Men usually tax'd their Subjects at Pleasure, it was also provided, that no Person whatsoever should tax 'his free Tenants, except only in the three fore-mention'd Cases. The King not only sign'd this Charter, but swore to it; and by the Charter it self twenty five Barons were appointed to be chosen by the whole Baronage, to take care upon Oath to see it well observ'd. To any four of which all Persons might complain of any Breach of it, and they were to admonish the King of it; and if the Grievance were not redress'd within forty Days after, then those four Barons were to refer the Matter to the whole Body: For whom it was lawful, together with the Commons of the Land, to take Possession of the King's Castles and Possessions, and to oppress him all manner of Ways, saving only his own Person, Twenty five Persons appointed for Security.

Person, and the Persons of his Queen and Children, 'till according to their Will the Grievance was redress'd : And all Persons on such an Occasion were allow'd to take an Oath of Fidelity to the Barons. And to confirm all, the King sent his Letters Patents to all the Sheriffs of England, commanding them to oblige Persons of all Conditions within their Interdictions to swear, That they would observe these Laws, and, if Need requires, to compel the King also to observe them.

All Things now seem'd to be in a quiet and settled Condition, and all Men rejoic'd, hoping that God had touch'd the King's Heart, and that England should now be freed from the Servitude which had so long afflicted it : But all these Affairs in a short Time prov'd contrary to Expectation ; for the King's mercenary Soldiers, desiring War more than Peace, were by their Leaders continually whispering in his Ears, That he was now no longer a King, but the Scorn of other Princes ; and that it was more eligible to be no King, than such a one as he. By daily adding fresh Fuel to the Flame, the King at length quite alienated his Affection from his own natural Subjects, and confided wholly in These ; so that in a little Time he became very reserv'd and melancholy, often walking alone, and giving divers Signs of inward Rage and Discontent. Then giving Orders to the Governors of his Castles to fortifie, Man and victual them, he privately retir'd to the Isle of Wight, where he began to pull off his Mask, and resolv'd both by the Spiritual as well as Temporal Sword, to free himself from his Obligations. To begin with the former, he sent Pandolf with others to the Pope, that he might by his Apostolick Authority make void what the Barons had done, and frustrate all their Designs ; and for the latter, he sent some Bishops and Noblemen to all the neighbouring Nation, to procure foreign Assistance, promising large Possessions and Sums of Money to such as would arm themselves in his Cause ; and if it were needful, they might make Deeds of Gift to such as were willing to come, for the greater Security of their military Stipends. For near three Months the King continu'd privately in the Island, without any Court or Regal Appearance, sometimes plying about the Sea-Coasts, and conversing only with Seamen ; which gave Occasion for strange and various Reports, as that he was turn'd a Fisherman, sometimes a Merchant, and other Times a Pirate ; tho' he only waited for the Return of his Messengers from Rome, and the Arrival of his mercenary Forces.

The King relapses,

and retires to the Isle of Wight.

Magna Charta condemn'd by the Pope.

At Rome he met with what Success he could desire, where all the Transactions with the Barons were fully represented to the Pope, and the Charter of Liberties shown him in writing : Which when he had carefully perus'd, he with a furious Look cry'd out, What ! do the Barons of England endeavour to dethrone a King, who has taken upon him the Holy Cross, and is under the Protection of the Apostolick See ; and would they force him to transfer the Dominions of the Roman Church to Others ? By St. Peter, this Injury must not pass unpunish'd. Then debating the Matter with the Cardinals, he by a definitive Sentence damn'd and callated for ever the Charter of Liberties, and sent the King a Bull containing that Sentence at large. As the King was successful at Rome, so he met with fair Prospects from his Foreign Assistance, consisting of very numerous Troops drawn from Poitou, Gascony, Brabant, Flanders and other Parts ; all desperate Adventurers, whose miserable Fortunes at home, easily drew them to any Mischiefs abroad. These were to be rewarded with large Possessions in England, if they succeeded against the King's Subjects ; and had not Hugh de Boves, at his setting forth from Calice with forty Thousand Men, Women and Children, been by a sudden Tempest all drown'd in the Sea, King John had made an universal Conquest of his own Kingdom, far more miserable than that by the Normans.

The King begins a War upon his Subjects.

However with these Forces he began the Siege of Rocheſter Castle, which held out so long, that when he took it, he would have hang'd all the Men in it, had not Savery de Malleon dissuaded him from such a cruel Attempt. After which which he began to meet with greater Success; for dividing his great Army into two Parts, with the one he march'd Northwards, where he victoriously subdu'd all Places, while the Earl of Salisbury with the other Foreigners did the same Southwards. At which Time all Things were in a deplorable State; and in the greatest Confusion; Fathers set against their Sons, Brother against Brother, Kinsmen and Allies against their nearest Friends, attacking, surprizing, pursuing, burning, ravaging, tormenting and murdering; all the Kingdom by the Combustion of so universal a War, becoming like a general Shambles, or Place of infernal Desolation. And now it appear'd strange that those Barons, and their adhering Impugners of the King, whose Pretext formerly was, that they durst not obey the King because of the Papal Curse, being now themselves by vertue of the same commanded to obey and assist him, could without any Scruple condemn both it and him, pretending it concern'd them not, because not particularly nam'd. And the Arch-Bishop himself, who had made the World believe, that the Pope's Censure, and his own too, were sufficient to deprive the King of all Sovereign Command, now being in Name, and under the same Penalty, requir'd by the Pope to denounce the same against the King's Opposers, he without any regard to it told the Messengers, He would not do it for any Cause whatsoever, 'till he had conferr'd with his Holiness in Person. For which Contempt, Pandolf and the Bishop of Winchester, solemnly denouncing the Curse themselves against the Barons, did likewise suspend him from all Episcopal Authority. Shortly after the Arch-Bishop was oblig'd to appear at Rome in a grand Council, where the Pope excommunicated all, either French or English, who oppos'd King John; and here he was accus'd and convict of Treason against the King, and of Contempt against the Pope and Church's Censures. For which the Pope fully resolving to depose him from his See and Dignity, by the Cardinals earnest Intercession for him, he was intreated to use him somewhat milder; but yet by a publick Sentence he confirm'd his Suspension, and commanded by his Letters all Suffragan Bishops to withdraw their Obedience from him. And for a further Revenge, whereas Simon Langton, his Brother, had by his Procurement been elected into the See of York, the Pope not only vacated his Election, and made him incapable of any Episcopal Dignity, but also plac'd in that See Walter Gray, a true Friend to King John, and a profess'd Enemy to the Family of the Langtons.

The Pope joins with him.

Paris. 1216. To secure the Roman Power, not long after the Pope proceeded to excommunicate all the disloyal Barons by Name, and interdicted all their Lands, together with the City of London, where they had their chief Residence: Which tho' it gave a dangerous Blow to their Faction, yet still standing upon their Guard at London, they so little regarded these Censures, that they decreed That neither themselves nor the Citizens should observe them, nor the Prelates denounce them, alledging That they were obtain'd by false Suggestions, and therefore not valid; That it did not belong to the Pope to direct and govern in Lay-Matters, since St. Peter only receiv'd an Ecclesiastical Power from our Saviour: Why therefore should they be govern'd by the Avarice and Ambition of the Roman Bishops? Who are rather the Successors of Constantine; without resembling St. Peter either in their Piety or Authority. While they were thus complaining, and daily declining, King John rang'd through all Parts with his cruel Mercenaries, who, as M. Paris assures us, spar'd neither Age nor Sex, suffering none to escape their Barbarities: And he further relates, That they took Priests from the very Altar, with the consecrated Hosts in their Hands, and then wounded, tortur'd and robb'd them; and that to extort Money from Persons of all Conditions, they hang'd some by the Privities, others by the Legs and Feet, some by their Arms, Hands or Thumbs, injecting Salt and Vinegar into their Eyes; and others they laid upon Trivets and Grid-irons over burning Coals, and then put their parch'd Bodies under Ice to cool them: So that now all Commerce ceas'd, and no Markets were held but in Coemitories and Church-Yards.

The Barons finding their Estates given to Strangers, their Wives and ^{M.P. &c.} Daughters violated, and their Fortunes ruin'd, began now to curse the Pope, who had formerly most shamefully encourag'd them to withstand their Sovereign; and to recover all, they resolv'd upon a desperate Project, agreeable to their former Actions, which was to deliver the Kingdom of England into the Hands of Lewis the Dauphine of France. Accordingly they sent some of their chief Friends to France with their Letters of Allegiance, to implore King Philip's Favour for sending his Son, and his Son's, for the Acceptance of the Crown; and upon the Delivery of twenty five English Hostages, they receiv'd a present Supply of French Soldiers, with the Promise of the speedy Arrival of their new Sovereign. The Pope having Intelligence of the Designs of the French King, immediately sent his Legate Cardinal Wallo with his Apostolick Commands to King Philip to prevent his Son from entering St. Peter's Patrimony, denouncing the great Curse against all Men combining with the excommunicated Barons. To which Philip return'd answer, That England was no Patrimony of St. Peter's, for John having been convict of Treason against his Brother Richard, was never a lawful King; or if he were such, he now stood condemn'd for the Death of his Nephew Arthur: That no King could dispose of his Kingdom without the Assent of the Barons, who are bound to defend it; and if the Pope would insist upon this Error, it would prove a pernicious Example to all Civil States. Then all the great Men of France unanimously declar'd, They would maintain this Point even to Death, That no King or Potentate, by his single Authority, had power to give away, or transfer his Kingdom, and thereby enslave his Nobility. At the same Time Lewis begg'd of his Father, Not to hinder him of that which he had not given him, and for which he was resolv'd to spend his Blood; and would sooner chuse Excommunication, than falsifie his Promise to the English Barons.

His Pretensions.

With this slender Respect and Scorn to his Holiness, the Legate seeing such ^{M.P. &c.} stern Looks, and fearing some Mischief retir'd in haste; and Lewis as speedily set forwards for England, with his Fleet of six hundred Ships and eighty Boats, with which arriving first at the Isle of Thanet, and afterwards at Sandwich, the Barons came thither and join'd with him. Whereupon thinking it Wisdom first to arm himself against Spiritual Weapons, he immediately wrot a plausible Letter to Alexander Abbot of Canterbury, who was to denounce the Pope's Curse against him, 'in which he laid before him his Title to the Crown which John had forfeited; First by Treason in King Richard's Reign; Secondly because his attaining the Crown was by pure Election: Thirdly because he was solemnly condemn'd by the French Peers for the Death of Duke Arthur: Fourthly for violating his Oath in enthralling the Kingdom to the Pope, in wronging the Clergy, and oppressing the Laity. That therefore the Right was devolv'd to Lewis the Dauphine; First by Inheritance of his Wife, who was Niece to King John, and Secondly by the Election of the Nobility. These specious Pretences had no Effect upon Alexander, who forthwith denounc'd the Sentence of Excommunication against Lewis and his mighty Army, and closely adhered to his Sovereign, notwithstanding all the Threats and Promises us'd by Lewis to win him to his Side.

He arrives at London.

In the mean Time King John lay at Dover with his Army, which consisting ^{M.P. &c.} of Strangers, he durst not attempt to hinder the Landing of the French, lest his Men should desert to Lewis; from whence he went to Guilford, and so on to Winchester; whilst Lewis himself, finding no Army to oppose him, in a short Time subdu'd Rocheſter, and all the Country, except Dover Castle. Then coming up to London, he was met by the Barons with all the outward Demonstrations of Joy and Triumph, receiving at the same Time Homages from them and the Citizens; and he likewise swore upon the Holy Evangelists That he would restore to all of them all good Laws, and their lost Inheritances. At the same Time he made Simon Langton his Chancellor, who being inrag'd at the the Pope's hindering him of the Archbishoprick of York, did now persuade Prince Lewis with all the Barons and Citizens to be present at Divine Service, notwithstanding the Interdict, and Wallo's excommunicating both Lewis and him by Name: So that when once the Clergy and People became unanimous, the Pope's Censures were of little or no Effect. Lewis's Homagers daily increasing, he left London, and in no long Time made himself Master of most of Kent, Suffex and Hampshire, with almost all the Southern Parts of England; but not without Resistance in several Places: Particularly at Odiham Castle, where but thirteen English Men, not only oppos'd Lewis and his whole Army for fifteen Days, but also sallying out took every Man his Prisoner, and at length with great Admiration of the French, and honourable Conditions surrender'd the Castle. In the Time of these Hostilities Alexander King of the Scots came to wait upon Lewis at Dover, and did him Homage for the Lands he held in England; and on the other Side He, as well as the Barons, swore, That they would never make Peace with King John, without the King of the Scots Consent. Dover, with a few other Castles only now stood out; where while Lewis us'd incredible Toil and Expence in a furious but ineffectual Siege, and his Confederates were employ'd in the same manner at Windsor; King John and his mighty Army, breaking forth with a sudden Violence, like a furious Tempest over-run many Counties, to the Ruin and Destruction of the Barons Castles, Houses, Lands and Possessions in all Parts.

The Barons were now under great Troubles and Afflictions, to see their native Country by their own Wilfulness thus horribly ravag'd, and their Goods and Estates plunder'd and ruin'd by the King's Forces; and what added to their Grief was to find that their faithful Services, in this their faithless Adherence, not so respected by Lewis, as he and their own vain Hopes had promis'd them, whilst he conferr'd upon his own French Men only all those Territories and Castles he conquer'd. But their greatest Affliction was what they accidentally learnt from the Viscount de Melun, a French Nobleman, who being in his last Sickness at London, generously sent to those Barons that were there for the Security of the City, and declar'd to them That he was extreamly griev'd for the impending Ruin that was falling upon them, of which they had no Knowledge; Particularly That Prince Lewis with sixteen Earls and Barons of France had sworn, That when he had conquer'd England, and was crown'd, he would for ever banish all Those who fought for him against King John, as Traitors to the Realm, and destroy their Posterity; and that they might not doubt the Truth of it, he affirm'd it upon the Word of a dying Man, and as he hop'd for Salvation, that he was one of these who had taken that Oath; yet he desir'd them to be secret, and provide for their Safety as well as they could; presently after which he expired. This being whisper'd among the Nobility, prov'd a terrible Alarm to them, both as to their Security and their Consciences; especially when they found themselves thus stigmatiz'd with the odious Character of Traitors by a foreign Prince, and under the Sentence of Excommunication from the Apostolick Authority. Some of these reflecting upon their miserable Condition, thought of returning to their old Obedience; but others were afraid they had so highly provok'd the King, that he would never accept of their Return; yet no less than forty of the Barons took a Resolution to quit Prince Lewis, and sent their humble Submission of Obedience to him a little before his Death.

Several of the Barons relent.

In the mean Time the unfortunate King kept himself in perpetual Motion and Action, sometimes in the West, and other Times in the East and North; whilst Lyn in Norfolk serv'd as a Place of Retreat or Defence for all the King's Friends in those Parts, and there he also secur'd his Treasure, Crown, and all his portable Regalia. After many Motions and Traverses, especially in Lincolnshire, in October he arriv'd at Lyn, where he was receiv'd with great Joy and many Presents; in return of which he granted the Town large Immunities, and a

Mayor, and gave his own Sword to be carry'd before him, with a Silver Cup gilt, which are still to be seen. Shortly after the King passing from thence to Lincolnshire, and marching over the great Marsh between Norfolk and that County, he and his whole Army were in Danger of being lost by the Quick-sands and Flowing in of the Tide; but all his Wagons, Carts, Sumpter Horses, with their Lading, and all his Treasure, precious Vessels, sacred Relicks, and his Regalia were swallow'd up in the Mouth of the River Welland; which M. Paris Hyperbolically describes by the Earth opening in the midst of the Floods, and plunging them into the Abyss. The King got safe that Night to Swines-head Abby, and there lodg'd; but through excessive Grief for the Loss of his Carriages and Treasure, he fell into a Fever, which he heighten'd by eating Peaches, and drinking new Ale or Bracket. The next Morning he remov'd from thence, but not being able to ride, he was carry'd in a Litter to Sleaford Castle; from whence he proceeded in the like Manner as far as Newark, where finding his Fever increasing, and a Flux beginning, he by his Testament appointed Henry his eldest Son, then a Child, to succeed him, devoutly confess'd his Sins, forgave his Enemies, and receiv'd the Eucharist; and after three Days Continuance in that Place, he dy'd on the eighteenth of October, and fifty first Year of his Age, after a troublesome and unfortunate Reign of seventeen Years, seven Months and thirteen Days. His Body, according to his Order, was bury'd in the Cathedral Church at Worcester, but with little Funeral Pomp; and his Tomb, with his Image upon it, is still to be seen in the Choir of that Church.

This is the most authentick Account of the Death of this unfortunate Prince; but as to the vulgar Story of his being poison'd by a Monk in Swines-head Abby, that is no where mention'd by the ancient Writers, and so differently by those more modern, and with such improbable Circumstances, that we cannot think it worthy to trouble the Reader with it. His chief Misfortunes were the natural Punishments of his Crimes, particularly his Ingratitude and Treason against his Father, and his treacherous as well as traiterous Practices against his Brother, which pursu'd him so close, that he was not only chastis'd by disloyal Subjects, and an ambitious Pope, but also lost more Territories in a few Years than all his Successors ever did in thrice that Space of Time. He indeed met with extraordinary Hardships, both from abroad and at home; and these often put him upon exorbitant and illegal Practices, which still added to his own and the Nation's Misfortunes. Yet if he had met with a less usurping Pope, a less potent King, and a less turbulent Nobility to have manag'd, and also less envenom'd Writers to have transmitted his Story, he might have made a Figure of no small Renown in the World. His Nature and Fortune did never well agree; for he naturally lov'd Ease, yet his Fortune was ever to be in Action: He was faithless, cruel and violent; neither fit for Prosperity nor Adversity, for the one made him insolent and the other dejected; so that a middle Fortune would have best suited with his Temper. He was extremely greedy of Money, which tho' it was got with great Noise, was usually spent in Silence; and was very intemperate in his Pleasures, in his Lusts exceeding his Father, and not sparing the Wives of the greatest Noblemen. He was extremely variable, sometimes very religious, as appears by his founding several Monasteries, and other Acts of Devotion; and at other Times scarce a Christian, as appears from so many profane Sayings related of him. And indeed the Monks have blacken'd his Memory with several strange Stories; as that he counterfeited the Bishop's Seals, and writ abroad That all Englishmen were become Infidels and Apostates, and therefore such should come to subdue them, and take their Possessions; and at another Time That he offer'd his Kingdom to a Moorish King, and promis'd to embrace the Mahometan Religion: Of which these and several others are justly suspected by all judicious Writers.

This King by his great and arbitrary Taxes was a severe Oppressor, yet in several Respects he was no bad Governor: For he was the first or chiefest who appointed those excellent Forms of Civil Government in London, and most Cities and Incorporate Towns in England, and endow'd them with the greatest Immunities; the First who caus'd Sterling Mony to be here coin'd; the First who ordain'd the honourable Ceremonies in the Creation of Earls; the First who settled the Rates and Measures for Wine, Bread, Cloth, and such like Necessaries; the First who gave to the Cinque Ports the Privileges and Customs they now enjoy; and the First who planted English Laws and Officers in Ireland, enlarging the Royal Stile with Lord of that Country, making by this some Amends for his Losses in France. In this Reign we find the Prices of several Commodities; particularly that Wheat at the highest was once six Shillings the Quarter, and eighteen Pence at the lowest Rate. The Price of Wines was once fix'd thus; Rockell Wine at twenty Shillings the Tun, the Wine of Anjou at twenty four Shillings the Tun; and no other French Wines at above twenty five Shillings the Tun; unless it was some of extraordinary Goodness, which might be sold at twenty six Shillings and eight Pence the Tun.

The Reign of King HENRY the Third.

Containing 56 Years, 1 Month, and 4 Days.

U. Part. I. THE unexpected Decease of King John prov'd of singular Advantage to young Prince Henry his Son, to whom the Affections of most of the Nobility, Clergy and People were inclin'd, both upon the Account of the dying Words of the Viscount Melun, and also the present Influence of the French. Therefore as soon as the Earls, Bishops and Barons, who remain'd firm to the late King, could conveniently meet, they all at the Summons of the Earl-Marshal assembled at Glocester, whither the Earl brought Prince Henry, then not ten Years of Age; and having plac'd him in the midst, he made a Speech to the Assembly, beginning with Behold our King! and after a short Pause thus proceeded, Altho' we have persecuted the Father of this Child, and that perhaps justly, for his male Administration, yet since his Son is innocent of his Father's Crimes, and since, according to the Scriptures, 'the Son ought not to bear the Iniquity of the Father, we must have pity upon the tender Years of this innocent Prince. And forasmuch as he is the King's eldest Son, and ought to be our Lord and Successor in the Kingdom, let us unanimously appoint him our King and Governor; and expel Lewis and his Followers, and so take away the Reproach of our Nation by breaking the Yoke of that unjust Servitude. This Proposal was at first oppos'd by the Earl of Glocester, but in a short Time all agreed as if they had been divinely inspir'd, crying, Let him, let him be made King! and immediately appointed the Feast of St. Simon and Jude for his Coronation. At which Time, being eight Days after King John's Death, Wallo the Pope's Legate, several Earls, Bishops, Barons, Abbots and Priors, with a great Multitude of others, assembled at Glocester to advance Prince Henry to the Crown of England; tho' he was not the nearest Heir, for Eleanor, Sister to Arthur Duke of Bretaign, was still alive, but kept close Prisoner in the Castle of Bristol. All Things being ready for the Solemnity, Wallo with the rest brought him in Procession into the Cathedral Church, and placing him before the high Altar, laying his Hands upon the Holy Gospels and Relicks of Saints, he swore this solemn Oath, ‘That he would honour God, and yield Peace and Reverence to the Holy Church, and all its Clerks, all the Days of his Life; That he would administer true Justice to the People; That he would abolish all bad Laws and ill Customs, if any were in the Kingdom, and would observe, and cause to be observ’d all such as were good.’ Then being over-aw’d he did Homage to the Church of Rome, and to Pope Innocent, for the Kingdoms of England and Ireland, and faithfully engag’d to pay the thousand Marks yearly to the See of Rome, which his Father King John had granted to it. After which the two Bishops of Winchester and Bath, anointed and crown’d him King, with the usual Solemnities; only for want of a Crown, which King John had lost in the Sea, he was crown’d with a plain Circle, or Chaplet of Gold.

The Earl-Marshal made Governor to the King.

The Dauphine’s Endeavours.

The Speediness of this Royal Ceremony was not greater than the Necessities of the State requir’d; for his Enemy Prince Lewis had still London at his Devotion, and many potent Earls, Barons, and valiant Male-contents, subject to his Command, who had taken a solemn Oath Never to acknowledge any of the Sons of the late King John. The young King on the other Side was surrounded with many Difficulties, as want of Years, want of Money, and many others; to prevent which the great Earl-Marshal of Pembroke was by the unanimous Consent of Prelates and Peers made Guardian of the King’s Person, and Vice-Governor of the Kingdom. Upon which, Letters were issu’d out in the King’s Name to all such as had Command in the Republick, with many Promises of Reward and Favour, which in most Places were obey’d; the Prejudices against the late King being in a great Measure bury’d with him in the Grave: And they were much encourag’d when they saw that Prince Lewis and all his Party were every Sunday and Holy-Day declar’d Excommunicated by the Pope’s Legate. Prince Lewis, who had besieg’d the valiant Hubert de Burgo in Dover Castle, perceiving that King John’s Death was no ways advantagious to him, rais’d the Siege, and enter’d London, where he might best provide for his declining Condition. Having the Tower deliver’d into his Hands, he remov’d and invested Hertford Castle, which after the Slaughter of many of the French, surrender’d upon honourable Terms. Robert Fitz-Water claim’d the Custody of this Place, as belonging to him by ancient Right; upon which the Frenchmen declar’d, That those English were never to be trusted, who had been Traitors to their own Master; yet Prince Lewis gave him a dilatory Promise, That when he had totally subdu’d the Kingdom, every Man should have his Rights restor’d. The Castle of Berkhamsted, under Waleran a German Commander, despairing of Relief, was likewise surrender’d, which like other Places was fill’d with a French Garrison; which rais’d great Jealousies, and much weaken’d the Affections of those who had invited him into the Nation. His next March was to St. Albans, where he requir’d the Abbot to do him Homage, which he absolutely refus’d, Unless he was first releas’d from the Homage to King Henry; which Answer irraging the Prince, the Abbot was constrain’d to compound for eighty Marks of Silver, to spare the noble Monastery and Town, till Candlemass next.

A short Cessation of Arms.

But these intestine Causes, for which the Barons had call’d in Lewis, failing by the Death of King John, and the Insolence and Vanity of the French occasioning new Reasons of Aversion, were all strong Motives to dispose the Minds of the English to return to due Obedience; yet finding themselves bound in Honour, not to leave him to the Mercy of King Henry, when upon their Oaths and Hostages he had thrown himself upon them, they now desir’d his Absence, but not his Destruction. The better to effect their Designs, a Cessation from Hostilities was propounded and concluded between the King and Prince Lewis; to which the latter readily inclin’d, because he had Intelligence from Rome that the Curse which Wallo had denounc’d against him, would shortly be confirm’d by the Pope, unless he speedily left England. As this Truce gave

Lewis

Lewis liberty to sail back to France for new Supplies from his Father, who much desir'd to confer with him; so his Absence gave Opportunity to the English to consult more freely concerning their Safety; that from that Time, Lewis was never so deep in their Affections, and immediately lost many Lords and others, who again shew'd themselves true Englishmen.

M. Paris.
1. Corom. Prince Lewis upon his speedy Return out of France, resolving to make as speedy a Dispatch, sent out of London his Army of more than twenty thousand Men, designing not only to relieve Mont-Sorrel in Leicestershire, besieg'd by the King's Forces, but also to subdue the adjacent Country. The March of his Army, which after the Relief of Mont-Sorrel went as far as Lincoln, was very odious and grievous to the Country, consisting of the Scum and vilest of the French, who wanting Cloaths for themselves, caus'd many to go naked to supply their Wants, and put others to cruel Tortures to force them to excessive Ransoms. The Earl of Pembroke, Governor of the King, by the Advice of Wallo and the Bishop of Winchester, resolving to put the Cause upon God and the Fortune of the Field, repair'd with his Charge to Newark, where the general Assembly for that Service was appointed. The whole Army rested there for some Days, which they spent in Devotions and receiving the Eucharist, humbling themselves before the offended Majesty of Heav'n; and all being prepar'd, now resolv'd either to return victorious, or to die in Defence of their Country, their Sovereign's Rights, and their own Liberties, all which seem'd to lye at stake. To give them the greater Spirit and Vigor, Wallo with extraordinary Solemnity execrated Lewis and all his Coadjutors; and thus the Army march'd towards Lincoln, where Lewis's Forces had besieg'd the Castle; but the King himself was left eight Miles from the City, at Stow, with Wallo and a strong Guard, there without peril of his Person to attend God's Pleasure in the Event of this Action.

The Dauphine's Army does much Damage.

M. Paris. Upon their Approach, if the Advice of some had been follow'd, the French Army had issu'd out of the City, and given them Battel in the open Field; but the French General, the Earl of Perch, thinking the King's Army to be greater than it was, by reason the Ensigns were doubled, and so much added to the Appearance, oppos'd that Design, shut up the City Gates, and us'd his utmost Endeavours to gain the Castle. Upon which the Governor of the Castle let in Faukes de Brent, with a considerable Force through a Postern Gate; while the Earl of Pembroke with the rest of the Army storm'd the City in another Place, where courageously entring, those in the Castle sally'd out upon the Flank of the Enemy, and together with the other with great Slaughter dispers'd and defeated the French Party. The Earl of Perch being surrounded with the Royalists, and refusing to take Quarter of any English Traitor, as he call'd them, was slain, with many other of his Countrymen. In this Conflict the Force of natural Propension was very apparent; for notwithstanding the fierce Resolutions of the King's Soldiers, when they saw the Faces of their Kinsmen, Friends and Countrymen on the other Side, they began to relent, and most of their Revenge fell upon the Horses, and not the Riders, whom they only endeavour'd to take Prisoners. The Pursuit was but coldly follow'd upon the flying Barons, otherwise scarce a Man could have escap'd; in which notwithstanding the chiefest Barons were taken Prisoners, with about four hundred Knights, besides Esquires and ordinary Soldiers, and a vast Number of the Townsmen. Such as escap'd the Fight were not past Danger; for the Country People set upon them as they fled, and kill'd great Numbers, so that almost all the Footmen were destroy'd before they could reach to London. The whole Riches of the vanquish'd Army, and of the whole City of Lincoln became the Booty and Spoil of the King's Soldiers, so that this Victory was afterwards call'd by the Name of Lewis-Fair; and because the Clergy were excommunicated, the Pope's Legate order'd them not to spare the Churches, nor the Cathedral it self; the vast Riches belonging to which may be conceiv'd by that of the Precentor, who complain'd that he had lost eleven thousand Marks for his share. The

The Marshal of France, the Castellan of Arras, and about two hundred ¹⁰⁰ Knights got safe into London, but were but coldly receiv'd by Prince Lewis, who charg'd upon their Cowardice the Loss of all the rest. The Fear of being taken Prisoner justly encreasing, he us'd all Means to fortifie London, and dispatch'd Messengers into France for more Succours and Supplies; while the vigilant Earl of Pembroke endeavour'd to straiten him as much as possible. In the mean Time, by the Diligence of the Lady Blanch, Wife to Prince Lewis, Eustace, who from a traiterous Monk became a Demoniack, was now got to Sea with a large Supply both of Men and Ammunition bound for London; but Heav'n was no better pleas'd with these, than with the other Mercenaries at Lincoln. For the English Navy gaining the Wind of the French, sunk several of their Ships by running forceably against them with the Iron Brows or Beaks of their Gallies; using at the same Time unslak'd Lime in Dust or Powder, which being thrown on their Enemies Faces, perfectly blinded 'em. Thus were Lewis's Hopes for any present Succours absolutely defeated; nor durst the French from that Time engage with the English in a Sea-fight. Eustace himself, after a long Search, was found and drawn out from the Bottom of a Pump, and at Dover had his Head cut off; tho' some say he was slain by Richard a natural Son to King John. The News of which Success being brought to the King, did not more elevate him, than it wounded Lewis; for the Loss was not only great as to Men, but also in all sorts of Riches and Provisions.

The French defeated at Sea.

The Dauphine declines.

He treats with King Henry.

and leaves the Nation in Peace.

To give no Rest to the Prince's declining Fortunes, the Earl of Pembroke ¹⁰⁰ with a powerful Army besieg'd him in the City of London, as well by Water as Land; endeavouring to force him by Famine to surrender the Place. At length Matters came to a Capitulation; and in an Islet in the River Thames, not far from Stanes, King Henry, Wallo the Legate, William Marshall, and the Earl of Pembroke met with Lewis and the Barons, to finish the Treaty: For Lewis had promis'd to yield to the Legate and the Earl in any Thing that was not dishonourable. The Articles which the Prince swore to were these: 'First he and the Barons, and his other Associates, should stand to the Judgment of the Church, and for the future be obedient to the Pope and the Roman See; That he should forthwith depart the Kingdom, and never return with a Purpose of doing Harm. Secondly, That he would endeavour what he could to induce his Father to restore to King Henry all his Rights beyond the Seas. Thirdly, If his Father refus'd to do it, he himself would perform it, if ever he came to the Crown; and that at present, he would immediately deliver to the King all those Castles and Territories he had possess'd in England during this War. On the other Side the King, the Legate and the Earl swore, 'First, That the King should restore to the Barons, and others, all their Rights and Inheritances, with all the Liberties formerly demanded of his Father King John. 'Secondly, That none should suffer Damage or Reproach for taking part on either Side. 'Thirdly, All Prisoners should be releas'd on both Sides without Ransom. Whereupon Prince Lewis with his Adherents was formally absolv'd from the Sentence of Excommunication by Wallo, and so all Parties ran into mutual Embraces, and parted with the Kiss of Peace. The Welsh, who had join'd with the Barons, were excluded this Treaty, and so were left to the King's Mercy. Thus Lewis, having been first forc'd to borrow five thousand Pounds of the Londoners to discharge his Debts, was in a manner driven out of England, above two Years after his first Arrival, having for the most part been a receiv'd King; and was more likely to have made a Conquest of this Kingdom by the Arms of others, than the Norman that made Way with his own, had not the supream Disposer otherwise diverted it. Such Effects proceeded from the Violence of an unruly King, and the Despair of an oppress'd People; who now, notwithstanding the Mismanagement of the Father, willingly embrac'd the Son, being naturally inclin'd to love and obey their Princes.

M. Paris.
Wend. v.

II. The Kingdom of England was now purg'd from all Foreign Incumbrances, but was not immediately freed from those Troubles and Inconveniencies that naturally succeed all intestine Convulsions. For divers Persons of Note, presuming upon their former Services to the State, or fearing that if full Justice took place they must lose much of what they gain'd, began to show themselves very violent and audacious in their Behaviour. The chief of these were William Earl of Albermarle, Faukes de Brent with his Soldiers, Robert de Vipont, with several others, who having had the Castles and Possessions of certain Bishops and great Men, either to keep in Trust, or by the Iniquity of the Times converted to their Uses, did still detain them, both against the Claims of the Legal Owners, and the King's express Prohibition. Among others, Robert de Gaugy defended the Castle of Newark, then belonging to the Bishop of Lincoln, against the King's Army, commanded by the great Marshal Earl of Pembroke, and continu'd obstinate for eight Days, and would not surrender, till by the Mediation of Friends, the Bishop paid down an hundred Pounds. After a considerable Time, Peace being thoroughly restor'd and establish'd in the Nation, Itinerant Justices were sent through all Counties to revive the ancient Laws, and to cause the late Charter of King John to be strictly observ'd; and then the valiant Hubert de Burgo was made Justiciary of England. In all the best Regulations and Establishments, the noble Earl of Pembroke was principally concern'd, who daily made it his Business to settle all Things with the greatest Quietness and Security. The greater was his Loss both to the King and State by his Death, which happen'd about the Middle of May; and his Body was bury'd in the Temple Church at London, where his Portraiture in a Coat of Mail is still to be seen in the middle of the Round. He was a great Commander in War, and no less prudent Counsellor in Peace, leaving behind him five Sons and five Daughters; his Sons were successively Earls of Pembroke, and dy'd without Issue; his Daughters were all advanc'd to great and noble Matches. Upon his Death, Peter Bishop of Winchester was made Protector, and Governor of the King's Person, who for some Time rul'd with the same Moderation.

The King, now in a settled and calm Condition, resolv'd to be crown'd a second Time; which was perform'd by Stephen Arch-Bishop of Canterbury at Westminster, with the Confluence of all the Prelates, Peers and People: This Ceremony was renew'd, because the former Coronation at Glocester was not so solemnly perform'd, by reason of the Turbulency of the Times, and the Want of a Crown of Gold. About the same Time the new Building of the Abby-Church of Westminster, then call'd the Chappel of St. Mary, was begun; of which the King himself laid the first Stone, as if he design'd to consecrate his future Actions to the Glory of God. Also the Body of Thomas Becket, once Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, was translated out of its Stone Coffin, in the Vault where it was first interr'd, into a rich Shrine made of Gold, and beset with Jewels, at the Charge of the then Arch-Bishop. The King and Pope's Legate were present, with almost all the Bishops, Abbots, Priors, Earls, Barons and Clergy of the Kingdom, as likewise an infinite Multitude of common People, from France and other foreign Parts. The splendid Entertainment which the Arch-Bishop gave the whole Company, is related in the Manuscript Chronicle of Dunstable in very high and hyperbolical Terms, as equalling, or even exceeding all ever known in the World before.

This Calm which was just begun grew soon disturb'd by sudden Storms; for while the King kept his Christmass with great Magnificence at Oxford, William Earl of Albermarle, incited by Faukes de Brent, and other turbulent Gentlemen, upon some Discontent, left the Court without leave, and fortify'd the Castle of Bitham in Lincolnshire, furnish'd it with the Corn of the Canons of Bridlington, pillag'd the Town of Deeping, and under shew of repairing to the Parlia-

Parliament, seiz'd on the Castle of Fotheringay, and committed many other outrageous Acts, in Contempt of the King, and to the Breach of the publick Peace. Many others in several Places follow'd his pernicious Example; yet at length the Earl coming in under the Conduct of Walter Arch-Bishop of York, was at the Intercession of the Legate Pandolf pardon'd; and the like dangerous Clemency was extended towards his Accomplices and Followers, whom the King, in respect of former Services, set free without Punishment or Ransom. What Occasion there was for severer Proceedings, may easily be discern'd from the Number of Castles and large Possessions that Faukes de Brent, Philip de Marc, and others detain'd, without any other Right than what the Iniquity of the late Tumults had given them. It was no small Addition to the Troubles of these Times, that Lewellyn, King of the Welsh, desiring to free their Marches from the English Power, rose up in Arms, and laid Siege to the Castle of Buelt, which invited King Henry to march thither with a sufficient Army; but the Work was made easie, and soon concluded by the voluntary Departure of all the Enemy's Forces. These Appearances of succeeding Disturbances mov'd the King to think of strengthening himself with faithful Alliances; and not long after, Alexander King of the Scots came to York, where he had met the King in the preceding Year, and there marry'd the Lady Joan, King Henry's Sister; and at the same Time Hugo de Borgo, in the Presence of both the Kings, and by the Advice of each Kingdom, marry'd the Lady Margaret, Sister to the King of the Scots.

In these unsettled Times, the Condition both of the Church and State seem to have much Resemblance, every Man daring to attempt in either, what his own Audaciousness would suggest, or others Connivency permit: But Arch-Bishop Stephen now became very diligent in his Councils and Synods, in which by his own Authority he summon'd both Clergy and Laity, and by which he regulated many Inconveniencies as to both. At a Synod he held at Oxford, an execrable Impostor was conven'd before him, who had made upon his Body certain Marks or Wounds like those of Jesus Christ, whom he blasphemously pretended to be. Being brought before Him and the Bishops, he was by them condemn'd to be immured 'till Death between four Walls; as was also an infamous Woman, who call'd her self Mary the Mother of our Lord. As to the publick State, many insolent Actions were committed against the King's Authority and Peace of the Nation, especially by Constantine Fitz-Arnulf, a seditious Citizen of London, who by means of a Wrestling-Match between the Inhabitants of London and Westminster, raised a popular Tumult, and attempted to set up Prince Lewis; in the Heat of which he cry'd out, Mount Joy, Mount Joy, God for us, and our Lord Lewis! Tho' the Lord Mayor, a discreet Person, earnestly perswaded all to their Duties, yet Constantine had render'd the People incapable of good Advice, by the seditious Proclamations he had publish'd. The Noise of the Sedition increasing, Hubert the chief Justiciary, with some fresh Troops enter'd the Tower, whither he commanded the principal Men of the City to appear before him, who easily threw off the Blame from themselves upon Constantine. But he, as resolute in his Answer, as desperate in the Sedition, publicly declar'd That they had done no less than they ought, and that they would stand by it: Upon which the rest being dismiss'd, he and his Nephew with a third Person, were condemn'd to be hang'd the next Morning; and tho' he offer'd fifteen thousand Pounds for his Life, yet he could not escape the Hand of Justice. It is believ'd that he rely'd wholly upon the Articles and Oath between the King and Prince Lewis, that the Friends of the latter should not be molested; and upon this Occasion Lewis afterwards deny'd Restitution of such Things, as the Articles mention'd, pretending that Henry had by this first Act broken his Faith, and by that vacated the whole Contract. This Execution being done without Noise, or the Citizens Privacy, the Justiciary, accompany'd with Faukes de Brent and his armed Troops, enter'd ter'd London, and apprehended such others as were culpable; and for a Terror to the rest caus'd their Hands or Feet to be cut off, and then set at Liberty. The King depos'd all the Magistrates, but when he found that only the meaner Sort were interest'd in this Disorder, he was soon reconcil'd to the City; tho' the Citizens were not so soon reconcil'd to his Ministers, who had punish'd so many, according to their Deserts, but not according to due Form of Law.

This Seditious Beginning might have occasion'd far more dangerous Proceedings, had not the King by a moderate Behaviour, and a patient Connivence of some particular Indignities, prevented a general Disquiet. For the Barons, still viewing their long desir'd Liberties, and requiring a Confirmation of them by the King, who had sworn to them at the Conclusion of the Peace with Prince Lewis; William Briwere, one of the King's Council, gave this Answer, That the Liberties they desired were violently extorted, therefore ought not to be observ'd. The Arch-Bishop enrag'd at this Answer, told him, If he lov'd the King, he would not hinder the Peace of the Kingdom; upon which the King prudently reply'd, That he had bound himself by Oath to observe their Liberties, and what he had sworn to should be observ'd. To confirm which he immediately issu'd out his Letters to all the Sheriffs of the Kingdom, to make Enquiry by the Oaths of twelve Legal Men in every County What were the Liberties of England in the Time of King Henry his Grand-father, and to send a Return to London fifteen Days after Easter; by which Act all Men hop'd to see a Conclusion of those unhappy Contests which had so long disturb'd the Nation. But this only prov'd an usual Shift of Prolongation, so that the Business was deferr'd for that Time, to the greater Vexation of that succeeding; for during this long Reign, this put the King to the greatest Inconveniencies, made him ill belov'd of his People, always oppos'd in his Designs, and far a less King, only by striving to be more than he really was.

In the mean Time the King conceiv'd new Hopes from the News of the Death of Philip the French King, that formidable Enemy to England; and immediately sent Arch-Bishop Stephen with three other Bishops to Lewis, now crowned King, to demand the Restitution of Normandy, with all his other transmarine Dominions, according to his Oath made when he left England. To which this new King answer'd, That he was justly possess'd of Normandy, and those other Dominions, as he was ready to make appear to King Henry, if he would come to his Court and make his Claim: Adding, That the King of England had violated his Oath in laying a grievous Ransom upon those he had taken at Lincoln; and likewise those Liberties, for which the War was began, and to which he had solemnly sworn at his Departure, were not observ'd. Upon this, the Ambassadors perceiving they could obtain no other Answer, return'd into England, without any further Advantage. The King now finding himself was unable to recover those Dominions abroad, or to maintain his own Royal State at home, resolv'd to resume those Crown Lands, which the Unsettledness of former Times, had thrown into the Possession of private Hands: Which was principally by the Advice of Arch-Bishop Stephen, and the chief Justiciary Hubert, now made Earl of Kent, who by that means drew upon themselves no small Loads of Envy and Hatred. Tho' such Recoveries as these might be no less necessary than reasonable, yet because the interest'd Persons were so numerous, they wisely made use of all Supports that either Religion or human Policy could afford them. In order to effect it, a Bull was procur'd from the Pope by which the King was declar'd to be of Age, and at liberty to govern by himself, and to chuse his own Council; and all Men were commanded, upon pain of Ecclesiastical Censures, to restore all such Possessions as against the Laws and the King's Will they detain'd from him. This drew the interest'd Party to a Resolution of taking up Arms, first meeting for that purpose at Leicester, where the Earl of Chester and his Confederates consulted how to remove the chief Justiciary, whose predominant Grandeur was not by them to be endur'd, and how to retain those Castles and Possessions demanded. But upon Notice, that if they did not immediately deliver all they unjustly detain'd, they should be excommunicated by Name, and understanding the King's Forces were superior to theirs, they came to the King at Northampton, and surrender'd all that belong'd to the Crown into his Possession; but did not lay down their high Displeasure, because at their Petition the King would not remove his chief Justiciary, the great Object of their Envy.

The King of France declares War against King Henry.

Lewis King of France being encourag'd by these Domestick Dissentions, declared War against King Henry upon this Pretence, That whereas Aquitaine was held of the Crown of France by Homage, the King of England, being not hinder'd by Sickness, or any other Occasion, had neither appear'd at the Coronation of King Lewis, nor excus'd himself by his Ambassadors. In prosecution of which Pretence, he besieg'd and took the important City of Rochelle, with some other Places, and likewise worsted Savary de Maleon, King Henry's Lieutenant in Aquitain; which occasion'd the Loss of the rest of Poictou of which the King was possess'd. With this he lost the Service of the said Savary, a valiant Commander, who for some Indignity offer'd him by the Earl of Salisbury, who was sent to inspect his Actions, suddenly turn'd to the French, among whom he had great Credit and Preferment. King Henry concern'd at these Disadvantages, resolv'd to have recourse to the general Aid of his People, to recover all his Losses; but while he held a Parliament for that purpose, the whole Assembly was suddenly disturb'd with the great Complaints of an insufferable Outrage. For Henry de Braibrock, an itinerant Judge, who with others held the Assises at Dunstable, was forcibly taken and imprison'd in Bedford Castle by the Order of Faukes de Brent, who was inrag'd at him for giving no less than thirty Verdicts against him upon Trials for Land. The Judge's Wife by her Tears so mov'd the whole Parliament to Pity and Indignation, that all other Business laid aside, the Clergy as well as Laity forthwith attended the King to the Siege of the Castle. Faukes himself flying into Wales, there to increase his Power, left his Brother Lieutenant in the Castle, with a desperate Body of Men, with Provisions and Ammunition sufficient for a whole Year. Yet after two Months Siege, the Castle was taken, the Judge set at Liberty, the Lieutenant and the whole Garrison hang'd, and the noble Pile quite destroy'd, as an Example to others who in due Time would not submit themselves to their Sovereign. Faukes now finding his Castle ruin'd and his Estate confiscated, by the Procurement of the Bishop of Coventry, came to the King at Bedford, and falling at his Feet, implor'd Mercy for his former good Services; but all that he could obtain was only the Favour of Banishment. At the Time appointed for his Departure, he with Tears desir'd the Earl of Warren, who was to see him take Shipping, That he would commend him to the King, and let him know, as an important Secret, That all the Troubles he had rais'd in the Nation were purely by the Instigation of the Barons.

The interrupted Counsels of Parliaments, and Designs of the King for regaining his foreign Territories, were now reassum'd; yet the King could not obtain so much as a Fifteenth upon Moveables, without first promising That he would again confirm the long desir'd Liberties of the Nation. And being oblig'd by his urgent Necessities, he sign'd and seal'd many Charters, one directed to each County in England; and two to every County that had Forests, one concerning the Common Liberties, the other concerning the Liberties of the Forests. By the Assistance of this new Tax, Richard Earl of Cornwall the King's Brother, and William Earl of Salisbury his Uncle, with sixty Knights and a considerable Force were sent into Gascony in the Spring; where they safely arriv'd at Bordeaux, and were honourably entertain'd. Their seasonable Arrival had good Effects, for it confirm'd the Well-dispos'd, settled the Irresolute, and reduc'd much which had been taken away by the French. Hugh Earl of Marche, coming by the French King's Directions to remove Earl Richard

But William Longspee, the King's Uncle, did not long survive these good Services; but returning into England upon the Affairs of State, soon ended his Days at the Castle of Salisbury, with the greatest Marks of Humility and Piety. About these Times the Pope sent abroad into the World his Nuntio's and Emissaries, with a Design to settle a Contribution to the See of Rome, out of all the Cathedral and Conventual Churches in Christendom: For which he alledg'd, That it was to wipe away from that See the ancient Scandal of Avarice and Bribery, which had been occasion'd only by its great Poverty; and this might easily be prevented, if out of every Cathedral Church two Prebendaries, and out of every Monastery two Monks Portions, were set apart for that purpose. But neither the Messenger nor the Message found any Incouragement in England; for the Pope's Agent Otto, by the Procurement of Arch-Bishop Stephen, receiv'd Letters from Rome commanding him immediately to return: Otto inrag'd at this unexpected Revocation, threw the Pope's Letters into the Fire, yet durst not disobey the Contents. And whereas the Proposal it self had been debated and examin'd to the utmost, both here and in France; and judg'd to contain such an universal Oppression, as might cause a general Defection from the Church of Rome; the King in presence of his Prelates and Peers return'd this frugal Answer, That since what his Holiness requir'd was a Concern of the Universal Church, he was ready to follow the Example of other Kingdoms, and therefore would first see what they did: With which Answer the Assembly was dismiss'd.

This Difficulty so avoided, the King was earnestly inclin'd to make a Voyage in Person to the Assistance of his Brother Earl Richard who proceeded in the Affair of Gascony; which tho' by the Departure of the late Earl of Salisbury, it receiv'd some Damage, yet by the Valour and Conduct of other worthy Persons, it still did prosper. His Intention and Desire was somewhat retarded by the Arrival of Letters from France, which declar'd his Brother's Health, and the good Success of his Affairs; and others add by the Advice of a famous Astrologer, who foretold that King Lewis should not prevail. But what most prevented his Voyage was the express Orders of the Pope, who positively prohibited him from making any Attempts in France at that Time, lest he should divert the pious Designs of King Lewis, whom he had lately engag'd in a Crusado against the Count of Tbolouse and his Subjects, as being all infected with the then accounted Heresie of the Albigenses. Against these suppos'd Hereticks King Lewis spent a Month in the Siege of Avignon, where he sustain'd exceeding Losses, by a terrible Plague which destroy'd his Army, by a strange Kind of venomous Flies that dispatch'd great Numbers of his Men, and by a sudden Inundation which laid a great Part of his Camp under Water; and last of all he is thought to have been poison'd by an unchast Rival of his Bed the Earl of Champaign. And this was the end of Lewis, the great Enemy of the English Nation, who was succeeded by his Son Lewis, the ninth of that Name, and a Minor, who was afterwards canoniz'd for a Saint.

The King declares himself of Age, and cancels the Charters.

Anjou and Poictou, inviting them by large Promises to acknowledge King Henry for their natural Lord; but before their Arrival, the young King, by his Mother's Means, had made Peace, and receiv'd the Homages of these Barons, so that the Design prov'd of no Effect. In the Absence of his Ministers, the King was busily employ'd in raising what Mony he could; and while he was endeavouring to recover what was lost, he much endanger'd what he retain'd. He began with the Citizens of London, from whom he extorted five thousand Marks, because they had formerly granted the like Sum to Prince Lewis. And to proceed as he had begun, at a Parliament at Oxford, he there declar'd himself of full Age, and That he would take the Management of publick Affairs into his own Hands: Accordingly, by the Advice of Hubert his Justiciary, he remov'd his Guardian the Bishop of Winchester from his Court. At the same Time, and by the same Advice, he cancell'd and vacated all the Charters of Liberties and Forests, which for two Years had been observ'd throughout the Kingdom, declaring, That what had been then done, was in his Minority, when he had no Power of his own Person or Seal, upon which Account it was all invalid. These unjustifiable Proceedings occasion'd great Discontents and Murmurings, all accusing the Justiciary, and accounting him the Author of all, because the King was wholly govern'd by him. Shortly after, the Religious Orders, and all others had notice, That if they would enjoy their Privileges, they must renew their Charters, otherwise they should be of no Advantage to them; and what they were to pay for such Renewals, was left to the Discretion of the Justiciary. Thus, as it is usual, the whole Nation paid for the King's changing his Ministry.

The Nobility confederate against the King.

Hubert being lately advanc'd to the Earldom of Kent, the Envy and Hatred of the Nobility increas'd; especially upon the Return of the King's Brother Richard Earl of Cornwall, who had seiz'd upon a certain Manor, then in Possession of one Waleran a German, to whom King John had formerly granted it, which he alledg'd was Part of his Earldom of Cornwall. Upon which the King directed his Letters to his Brother, commanding him forthwith to restore the Manor he had taken from Waleran; which occasion'd the Earl to come in Person and plead his Right before the King, offering to stand to the Judgment of his Court, and of the Peers of the Realm. At the naming of the Peers, the King and Justiciary, suspecting his Intentions, in a great Passion commanded him, Either to restore the Manor, or for ever leave the Kingdom; to which the Earl reply'd, That he would neither part from the one, nor leave the other, without the Judgment of his Peers, and immediately hasten'd to his own Habitation. And hearing that Hubert advis'd the King to secure him, he took Post for Marleburg, where meeting with William Mareschal the young Earl of Pembroke, and the Earl of Chester, he enter'd into a strict Confederacy with them. Then marching to Stamford, they were met there by the Earls of Glocester, of Warren, of Hereford, of Warwick, and of Ferrars, with many Barons, and a great Multitude of armed Men; whose Force was so formidable, that they thought fit to send a bold Message to the King requiring him To make immediate Satisfaction to his Brother Earl Richard, for the Injury he had done him, which they imputed wholly to the Justiciary; and also to restore those Charters he had cancell'd at Oxford, which if he refus'd, they would compel him by their Arms to make them competent Satisfaction. The King terrify'd by his Father's Example, appointed them to meet him at Northampton, where upon the Lord's resolute Demands, he settled such large Allowances and Possessions upon his Brother, that every one departed well pleas'd, without debating the Affair of the Charters, which at that Time might have occasion'd the greatest Mischiefs to the Kingdom.

Reg. 12.

This Danger was not a little increas'd by the Insurrections of the Welsh. The King had given the Castle of Montgomery to his Favourite Hubert, the Garrison of which Place, by the Assistance of the Country People, endeavour'd to make a Way through an adjacent Wood more passable and secure for Travellers; but while they were cutting down the Thickets, the Welsh suddenly set upon them, kill'd some, and forc'd the rest to retire into the Castle, and immediately invested it. Upon which the King and his Justiciary came speedily, and rais'd the Siege; and then march'd towards the Wood, and there clear'd all by great Labour and Burning, so far as a Receptacle of the Welsh, by them call'd Criddy, which he commanded to be set on Fire; but the Justiciary finding it to be of an impregnable Situation, advis'd him to erect a Castle in that Place. Yet during the Time of its Building, the Workmen were daily interrupted by the Enemy, and several of them kill'd. At the same Time the King finding so great a Scarcity of Provisions, and so many of his own Men Friends to Lewellyn, that he was oblig'd to make a disadvantageous Peace, of which the chief Article was, That this Castle should be demolish'd, and Lewellyn should pay three thousand Marks towards his Charges; upon which he return'd home with little Honour, having left William de Branse, a noble Baron, behind him Prisoner.

The King goes against the Welsh.

In the same Year dy'd Arch-Bishop Langton, a Man of great Spirit and of little Dependence, who had been the main Promoter of the Nation's Liberties. The Convent of Canterbury elected Walter de Hemesham to succeed him; but both the King and the Suffragan Bishops refus'd him upon several Accounts; so that the Matter was brought to Rome to be determin'd by the Pope. After long Delays, the Pope promoted Richard de Grant, Chancellor of the Church of Lincoln, to the Archbishoprick, by his own sole Authority; and the King and the Bishops, contrary to all Expectation, in a short Time obey'd the Pope's Commands, and submitted to the whole Proceeding. This was a new Incroachment, and the first Arch-Bishop the Pope ever presum'd to nominate, without a previous Election by the Convent, or the Bishops. Having obtain'd this Advantage, the Pope sent one Stephen his Chaplain into England to collect the Tenth lately promis'd to the See of Rome; which Affair was propos'd in a full Parliament at Westminster, where the King by his Silence seem'd to give Consent to the Pope's Demands. But the Earls, Barons, and all the Laity stiffly resolv'd not to oblige their Baronies and Lay-Fees to the Court of Rome; and had compounded with the Legate for a certain Sum, had they not been betray'd by Stephen de Segrave, who so subtly order'd the Affair, that he obtain'd his Demands. The Prelates and Clergy, after a long Deliberation, and no small Reluctancy, consented, lest they should incur the Sentence of Excommunication. Then Stephen shew'd them the Pope's Letter and his Commission to collect the Tenth out of all Profits whatsoever, without any Deduction either for Debts or Expences; and because the Matter requir'd Speed, he gave notice to the Prelates that they should immediately pay down the Money, and afterwards levy it upon every Person by Way of Tax; which Exaction prov'd so burdenson, that they were forc'd to sell or pawn their Vestments, Chalice, and other holy Vessels belonging to their Churches. Besides he exacted the Tenth of the Autumnal Fruits of the Earth, while they were yet growing, none daring to refuse him besides the Earl of Chester; and for the more speedy raising of the Money, he brought along with him certain voracious Usurers, who supply'd the Indigent with Money, which they were compell'd to borrow, tho' by that Means they were irrecoverably ruin'd.

The Pope oppresses the Nation.

Yet in these burthensom Times, on Michaelmas Day the King caus'd the whole Nobility of England to meet at Portsmouth with such a numerous Army of Horse and Foot as none of his Predecessors had ever rais'd, resolving to pass over the Sea to recover those Dominions his Father had lost: But being ready to embark, there was not Shipping sufficient to transport half the Number; which so intrag'd the King, that turning to Hubert his Justiciary, he call'd him Old Traitor, and openly charg'd him with Receiving a Bribe of five thousand Marks from the Queen of France to put a stop to this Design; and

and proceeded so far as to run at him with his drawn Sword, but the Earl of Chester and others interposing, sav'd the King from so foul a Dishonour, who shortly after receiv'd him into Favour again. The whole Army soon broke up upon the Arrival of a great Man out of Bretaign, a principal Confederate with the English, who by alledging the unseasonable Time of the Year, and other Reasons, occasion'd the Enterprize to be deferr'd 'till the next Spring. Accordingly after Easter, the King having visited the Poor and Impotent, and bestow'd bountiful Alms, took shipping at Portsmouth, and with a powerful Army landed in Bretaign. The Success of this Expedition is so variously related, that without great Prejudice to an observant Reader, it might be all omitted. Much certainly was not done: King Henry's Design was to have march'd through Bretaign, where many acknowledg'd him, into Poitou; and, as some write, he did so, and receiv'd Homage in Gascony. To hinder this Passage, the King of France lay with a strong Army at Angers; while Fulk Pagunell, a Norman Peer, with sixty valiant Knights, perswaded the King of England, That it was easie for him to reduce Normandy to his Obedience; but Hubert had other Thoughts, and diverted the King from that Enterprize. The Normans therefore made an unfortunate Journey, for they not only miss'd of their Hopes, but for their Conspiring were dispossest at home by King Lewis. But whether it were by Loss in Battel, or otherwise, this is agreed on, that after the wasting of infinite Sums of Mony, and a great Diminution of the Soldiers Numbers, the King of England return'd without accomplishing his Designs; leaving for the Defence of Bretaign the three great Earls of Chester, Pembroke and Albemarle, with Forces sufficient for the Service.

It is not improbable that the dangerous Rebellion of the Irish hasten'd his Return; for the King of Connaught and his Subjects, seeing the King and the Earl of Pembroke, who had large Possessions in those Parts, wholly taken up with the Affairs of France, had furiously set upon King Henry's Soldiers and People, with Hopes of utterly expelling them out of the Nation. But all their Projects prov'd fatal to themselves, and the English Forces marching against them, kill'd no less than twenty thousand, and took their King Prisoner. Not long after the Welsh, under their King Lewellyn, in revenge of some of their Countrymen, whom Hubert had slain in cold Blood, made new Incursions, and committed great Devastations upon the Borders of England, sparing neither sacred Persons nor Places. When the Bishops and Prelates heard of it, they solemnly excommunicated that Prince, with all his Adherents and Abettors; and the King having rais'd an Army at Oxford, march'd in Person to suppress them, but not without great Loss on his Side. As to the Affairs of France, by the Wisdom of Queen Blanch, and Mediation of the Arch-Bishop of Rheims and the Earl of Bulloign on one Part, and the Earls of Bretaign and Chester on the other, a three Years Truce was ratify'd by Oath, between the French and the English.

electd Edmund of Abington, a Man more agreeable to the Roman Palate. The King seeing the great Emperor Frederick, even at this Time while he was winning the Kingdom of Jerusalem from Infidels, in his Absence so inhumanly depos'd from his Empire by the Pope, upon a private Resentment; no wonder, if in this his unripe Years, and distracted Government, he fear'd to draw upon himself so merciless an Enemy. How little these Roman Incroachments were lik'd in the Nation, appears from the Actions of several Persons of Quality and others this Year, who took up Arms and forceably enter'd the Barns and Houses of the Roman or Italian Clergy-Men that were benefic'd in England, and carry'd away, and distributed their Corn and Goods among the Poor.

St. Paris. And now the great Hubert, Earl of Kent and chief Justiciary of England, after he had enjoy'd the greatest Favour of two Kings, seem'd to have run the Stage of his best Fortunes. For the King, upon fresh Inroads of the Welsh, being advis'd by the Bishop of Winchester and other Counsellors, to put an end at once to the Inroads of that Nation, he complain'd, That according to his Treasurers Accounts, his Revenues would scarcely afford him Provisions and Cloaths, and the usual Alms, much less any Thing for warlike Expeditions. To which they reply'd, That he impoverish'd himself by alienating the Honours, Wardships and vacant Dignities which ought to come into the Exchequer, so that he had only the Name without the Revenues of a King; but his Predecessors, who took due Care of their Treasury, abounded both in Wealth and Glory. The King took this Hint, and immediately call'd his Sheriffs and Bailiffs to an Account, and whoever was convicted of Fraud, was remov'd from his Office, and oblig'd to pay the whole into the Exchequer with Interest. He also remov'd Ranulph Breton Treasurer of his Chamber from his Office, and fin'd him a thousand Pounds; and by the Advice of the Bishop of Winchester, his Nephew Peter de Rivaux, a Poictouin, was plac'd in his Room; by which Means the King's Coffers were for a while plentifully supply'd.

St. Paris. These were but Preparatives to a further Scrutiny intended against Earl Hubert, who by the Instigation of the same Bishop, was now remov'd from being Justiciary, and was succeeded by Stephen Segrave, a common Knight. Shortly after, the King being highly incens'd against the Earl, requir'd him to give a strict Account of such Monies and other Revenues, that had ever pass'd through his Hands, since he was first made Justiciary. To this Hubert answer'd, That he had King John's Charter, by which he was discharg'd of all Accounts, who having so often experienc'd his Fidelity, would receive no Account from him. The Bishop of Winchester reply'd, That the Charter was not valid, after King John's Death, and no ways hinder'd the present King from exacting an Account from him. And to this was added, That he had been guilty of several Treasonable Practices, and had given treacherous Advice to the King, to the Prejudice both of him and his Kingdom; to all which the King requir'd him to answer, and stand to the Judgment of the Court. Hubert finding himself abandon'd by his chief Supporter, desir'd an appointed Day to give in his Answer, which was with great Difficulty obtain'd; and being now deserted by all his Friends, except the Arch-Bishop of Dublin, his Enemies daily increas'd, and many other false or improbable Crimes were laid to his Charge; as That he had procur'd the late Earls of Salisbury and Pembroke, Faukes de Brent, and Richard Arch-Bishop of Canterbury to be poison'd; and That he had gain'd the King's Affection by Sorcery and Witchcraft. Others accus'd him of Injustice, Rapine and Extortion; and the Londoners enter'd their Complaint against him for formerly condemning their Fellow-Citizen Constantine to be hang'd without Legal Process. All which Crimes were so highly aggravated before the King, that he proceeded to an unusual Method, and caus'd it to be proclaim'd throughout the City of London, That whatsoever Person had any Complaint against Earl Hubert, should come to the King, and he should have Justice done him.

On

On the fourteenth Day of September, the King held a grand Assembly of the Prelates and Peers, where Hubert was conven'd to answer to the Articles exhibited against him; but the Earl fearing the King would put him to some ignominious Death, took Sanctuary in the Priory Church of Merton in Surry, and durst not appear 'till the King should be of a milder Temper. Upon which the King in a great Rage sent to the Mayor of London, to force him from thence, and to bring him either dead or alive: The Londoners, glad of this Opportunity, upon ringing of a common Bell, gather'd together to the Number of twenty thousand; but some of the most discreet Citizens, dreading such Tumults, repair'd to the Bishop of Winchester's House in Southwark, and desir'd his Advice, who told them, That whatever were the Consequence, they must execute the King's Precept. At the same Time the Earl of Chester suggested to the King, That if these Tumultuous Proceedings were countenanc'd, it would occasion dangerous Seditions at other Times; and that it would be a great Reproach to him in foreign Countries, when they heard he thus treated his former Favourites: Which so prevail'd upon him, that he immediately dispatch'd Messengers, and revok'd his first Precept. After this, the King being a little mollify'd, the Arch-Bishop of Dublin obtain'd the Favour that Earl Hubert might have a longer Time allow'd him to give in his Answer. During which Space, Hubert thinking himself secure by the King's Letters Patents, design'd a Visit to his Countess, then at St. Edmund's Bury; but when the King was inform'd of it, he sent a Knight with three hundred Soldiers to apprehend him, and bring him Prisoner to London. Upon which Hubert fled into a Chappel at Brentwood in Essex, and for his Protection took the Cross in one Hand, and the Host from the Altar in the other; both which they wrung out of his Hands, and without Respect to the Place violently dragg'd him forth; and chaining his Feet under his Horse's Belly, they brought him in a most opprobrious Manner to London, and immediately committed him to the Tower.

He is apprehended.

Upon this Usage, the Bishop of London hastily went to the King, and severely rebuk'd him for this Violation of the Sanctuary, declaring, That if he did not immediately set Hubert at Liberty, and send him back to the Chappel from whence he was taken, he would excommunicate all that were concern'd in the Fact. The King being terrify'd, acknowledg'd his Error, and sent him back to the same Chappel; but at the same Time sent to the Sheriffs of Hertford and Essex, upon pain of Death, to go in Person with the Powers of both Counties, and surround the Chappel, to prevent Hubert's Escape, or his being supply'd with Sustenance. Upon this the Arch-Bishop of Dublin, his only true Friend, supplicated the King with Tears to know his Pleasure concerning him; and the King offer'd him the Choice of three Things, either for ever to abjure the Kingdom, to be condemn'd to perpetual Imprisonment, or to confess himself a Traitor. But Hubert would chuse none of them, being conscious to himself that he did not deserve so severe a Treatment, tho' he was willing to quit the Nation for a Time. Yet rather than be starv'd, he at length yielded himself to the Sheriffs, who brought him in Chains to London, and made him a second Time Prisoner in the Tower. The Arch-Bishop of Dublin us'd all Methods to mollify the King's Heart, but no Sacrifice could appease his Anger, but that of the Earl's Hoard of Gold and other Treasure, then lodg'd with the Knights Templars, who refus'd to deliver it without Hubert's express Order. Hubert readily submitted himself and all that he had to the King's Pleasure; so that all his chief Wealth and Riches were deliver'd to the King's Possession. His Enemies hearing of his great Treasure, took a further Advantage, and accus'd him of Fraud and Rapine, urging that he might be put to Death: To whom the King reply'd, That Hubert had faithfully serv'd his Uncle King Richard, and the King his Father, and if he had done otherwise towards him, he should never be put to Death; for he had rather appear too merciful than too cruel to one who had so often preserv'd his Predecessors and himself in great Dangers.

He mollifies the King.

gers. And the King being now softened into Compassion, by the Riches he had taken from him, regranted to him all the Lands which King John had given him, as also those he had purchas'd. Shortly after, the King's Brother Richard, with the Earls of Warren, Pembroke and Ferrars, became Sureties for his future Behaviour; after which he was sent Prisoner to the Castle of Devizes, under the Custody of four Knights of theirs, where he appointed Laurence, a Clerk of St. Albans, to be Steward of the Lands granted him, who had been a faithful Friend, and a great Comfort to him in all his Afflictions.

Yet he is kept Prisoner.

IV. King Henry being wholly freed from the Influence of Hubert his former Justiciary, now fell into the Hands of Peter de Rupibus Bishop of Winchester, and his Kinsman Peter de Rivaulx; so that the Management of all publick Affairs was committed to them. The former, that he might govern at his own Pleasure, procur'd the King to remove the English from their Places and Offices, and in their Rooms to substitute Poictovins and Bretaignes; who being invited into England, came over to the Number of two thousand Knights and Esquires, and were all plac'd in several Castles in Garrison; and to them the easie King committed the Wardships of the young Nobility, which afterwards were much degenerated by their ignoble Marriages with Foreigners. When the Earl of Pembroke found that all Ranks of Men were alike oppress'd, and the Laws manifestly violated, he as a Lover of Justice, with some other great Men went boldly to the King, and openly remonstrated, That by pernicious Councils he had call'd in Poictovins and other Foreigners, to the great Oppression of his native Subjects, and the Breach of their Laws and Liberties; wherefore they humbly besought him to regulate these Disorders in the Government, otherwise his Nobility would withdraw themselves from his Councils, so long as he made use of Strangers. To whom the Bishop of Winchester sharply reply'd, That the King might call in whomsoever he pleas'd for the Defence of his Crown, and that in such Numbers as were sufficient to reduce his proud and rebellious Subjects to Obedience. Upon this severe Answer, the Earl and the rest retired from the Court, and promis'd faithfully to assist and support each other to the last Drop of their Blood.

Foreigners called into England.

The Nobility discontented.

The People, naturally inclining to doubt the worst upon such Divisions, had their Fears increas'd by several Prodigies of strange Thunders and Tempests, but especially by the Appearance of four Parhelions, or Mock-Suns, besides the true Sun, which were seen in the Air from Morning till Night; which indeed happen'd to be the Forerunners of several Troubles in England, Wales and Ireland. The Poictovins and other Strangers thus bearing the Sway, so that the King's Person went guarded with whole Troops of them, the Earls and Barons refus'd to come to the King at a Parliament summon'd at Oxford. Upon which the King was advis'd to send out a second and third Summons, to try whether they would come to Westminster on the eleventh Day of July, promising also to reform whatever was amiss. But when the Peers heard the Number of the Foreigners increas'd, and that there were but small Hopes of an Accommodation, they laid aside all Thoughts of meeting the King at the Day appointed, and by select Messengers declar'd to him, That unless the Bishop of Winchester and the Poictovins were immediately remov'd from his Court, they would by the Common Council of the Kingdom, force both Him and those evil Counsellors out of the Realm, and would consult about creating a new King. The King, whom his Father's Example had made more timorous, could easily have been perswaded to a Compliance; but the Bishop of Winchester and his Friends infus'd more Spirit and Resolution into him. Upon which the most suspected Persons had a Day appointed them by the King, in which they should deliver sufficient Pledges to secure him of their Loyalty. Against that Day the Lords in great Numbers repair'd to London, but the Earl of Pembroke, being forewarn'd of Danger by his Sister the Countess of Cornwall, fled back into Wales;

They threaten the King.

The King pu-
nishes them.

Wales; and chiefly for want of his Presence nothing was concluded. The King not long after march'd to Glocester with an Army, where the Earl and his Adherents refus'd to appear; upon which the King burnt their Towns and Houses, as if they had been Traitors, and without Trial dispos'd of their Estates to the Poictovins and Strangers.

The King ill advised.

The Earl of Pembroke finding himself oppress'd, and deserted by some whom the Bishop of Winchester had bought off, immediately enter'd into a Confederacy with Lewellyn Prince of Wales, and other chief Men of that Country; and they all took an Oath not to make any Peace but by a general Consent. And now the King having receiv'd more Foreigners, march'd with them down to Hereford, and from thence sent to the Bishop of St. Davids to defie the Earl of Pembroke, and commanded his Army to march against him, and besiege his Castles. Yet notwithstanding, after some small Attempts and calmer Considerations, the King publicly promis'd, That by the Advice of his Council, all that was amiss should be rectify'd and amended: Accordingly on the ninth Day of October, the great Men met the King at Westminster, and humbly besought him for the Honour of Almighty God, to take into Favour his natural Subjects, who without any Trial by their Peers, he treated as Rebels. To which the Bishop of Winchester reply'd, That there were no such Peers in England as in France; therefore it was lawful for the King, by such Justices as he appointed, to banish any Criminals out of the Nation, and by Judgment condemn them. This Answer was so highly resent'd by the Bishops, that with one Voice they threaten'd to excommunicate all the King's chief Counsellors by Name; but the Bishop of Winchester appeal'd from their Sentence to the See of Rome. Then they solemnly execrated all such as had alienated the King's Mind from his Native Subjects, and disturb'd the Peace of the Kingdom.

The Earl of Pembroke worsts the King in Wales.

In the mean Time the Earl of Pembroke had retaken a Castle which he had lately surrender'd to the King; which provok'd the King to march with a powerful Army into Wales; but the Earl had before destroy'd all the Forage, so that the King for Want of Necessaries was oblig'd to retire to the Castle of Grosmont in Monmouthshire. Here the Earl, whose Conduct was equal to his Valour, so manag'd his Forces, that attacking the King's Army by Night, he put the whole into such Disorder, that they immediately fled, and left five hundred Horse, and all their Baggage, for a Prey to the Enemy; upon which, the King leaving two Noblemen with the Poictovins, to make good the Marches against the Welsh, return'd with Dishonour. The Earl also found them Employment whom the King left behind; and whereas the valiant Baldwin, a Flemish Knight, with a thousand Horse, thought to have surpris'd him, when with a tenth Part of that Number he came to view the Castle of Monmouth; the Earl alone bravely defended himself against twelve of his Enemies, and when his Horse was slain, he threw one of them out of the Saddle, and leap'd into it himself, never giving ground 'till his other Forces came in to his Assistance, and obtain'd a compleat Victory, with the Slaughter and Captivity of many Poictovins and others. His other Exploits in and about Wales, were not few nor dishonourable, only he had the Misfortune to have his Sovereign on the contrary Side. About the same Time, Hubert de Burgo, having Intelligence that the Bishop of Winchester design'd his Death, escap'd out of the Castle of Devizes, where he was Prisoner, to a neighbouring Church; but was hal'd from thence by the Keepers of the Castle. The Bishop of Salisbury, in whose Diocese it happen'd, caus'd him to be safely restor'd to the same Place, from whence by the Earl of Pembroke, and a Troop of Soldiers, he was rescu'd, and carry'd into Wales. Thus he, who when he was in Power and Grandeur, insisted upon absolute Obedience to the King, now under Pressures and Afflictions, stood as

Reg. 18.

The Earl of Pembroke increasing in Strength and Hatred against such as were the King's Seducers, made great Devastations upon their Lands and Possessions; and

and joining with the Forces of Lewellyn, proceeded with Fire and Sword as far as Shrewsbury, part of which they laid in Ashes, and plunder'd the rest. The King then at Glocester, for want of sufficient Forces, departed thence with no small Concern to Winchester, abandoning those other Parts to Waste and Ruin. When the King's Counsellors saw their Houses and Lands destroy'd, their Poictovin Friends greatly diminish'd, and themselves without Remedy, they projected how to ruin the Earl by Treachery, whom they could not conquer by Valour. In order to which they compos'd Letters in the King's Name, seal'd with his and eleven of their own Seals, and directed them to Fitz-Gerald, the King's Justiciary in Ireland, and several others who were the Earl's sworn Feudataries, importing, 'That tho' the Earl had been proclaim'd a Traitor, 'proscrib'd by the King's Court, and divested of his Paternal Estate, yet still he 'pursu'd the King with his usual Malice and Violence; wherefore they were 'requir'd, as faithful Subjects, whenever the Earl should come over thither, 'to take him alive or dead, and present him to the King, which if they perform'd, 'all his great Possessions in Ireland should be divided among them; for which 'they gave them the King's Promise and their own Securities for the Performance. The Irish Noblemen hearing the Tenor of these Letters, sent private Messengers to these Counsellors, assuring them, 'That if what was promis'd them 'could be secur'd by the King's Charter, they would undertake to effect what 'he desir'd. Upon which these Counsellors surreptitiously got the Seal from the Bishop of Chichester now Chancellor, and without his Knowledge seal'd a Charter with it, by which all the Rights and Possessions of the Earl were to be divided among them, and forthwith dispatch'd a Messenger with it to the said Noblemen. Upon the Receiving of which, they immediately resolv'd the Destruction of the Earl; accordingly they rais'd a great Force, with which they enter'd his Lands, took his Castles, and wasted his Possessions, purposely to provoke him to come over into Ireland. This Plot soon took effect; for going over to take Revenge of these mercenary Enemies, he was treacherously beset by them, and was kill'd by a Wound given him on the Back, while he with incomparable Bravery defended himself against a Multitude. Thus dy'd this valiant Man, who deserv'd to have liv'd in better Times, and under a Prince who knew how to value Men of Worth; yet when he receiv'd the News of his Death, he much lamented the Loss of so brave a Soldier, and so noble a Subject, declaring, He had not left his Equal behind him.

*He is destroy'd

Before this happen'd, the King came to a Treaty at Westminster with the Bishops and Nobility; in which the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and several Bishops represented to him, The calamitous Condition to which both he and the whole Kingdom was reduc'd, by following the pernicious Counsels of the Bishop of Winchester and his Accomplices, whose Advice had occasion'd all the evil Events, Wars and Miseries that had happen'd in his Reign: Adding withal, That if he did not speedily remove these evil Counsellors from his Court and Presence, and receive his Native and Liege-Subjects into their Places, they must of Necessity proceed to Ecclesiastical Censures against all Opposers. Upon which the King calmly reply'd, That he could not reform his Council, 'till he had taken their Accounts, and so desir'd a small Respite, which at present gave Satisfaction to all. At another Meeting, the King was again admonish'd by the Arch-Bishop, of the desolate Condition of his Kingdom, and all the impending Dangers; and being again threaten'd with the Excommunication of himself as well as others, he at length promis'd to be directed by their Counsels. Shortly after he commanded the Bishop of Winchester to retire to his Bishoprick, and keep to his Care of Souls, without concerning himself with the Affairs of the Publick; and likewise commanded Peter de Rivaulx to give in his Accounts, yield up his Castles, and depart his Court, declaring with an Oath, That if he had not been a benefic'd Clerk, he would have caus'd his Eyes to be pull'd out. He also discharg'd the Poictovins from his Service, both in his Court and Garrisons, commanding them to return into their own Country, and never see his Face more. Thus having purg'd his Court, and freed his Kingdom from Foreigners, he submitted to the Advice of the Arch-Bishop and Bishops, by whom he hop'd to reduce his unsetled Kingdom to a prosperous Condition. By their Directions he came to a Treaty with Lewellyn Prince of Wales, and issu'd out his Letters to all his Confederates and proscrib'd Persons to meet at Glocester on the twenty ninth Day of May, to be reconcil'd to him, and restor'd to their Inheritances, while the Arch-Bishop and Bishops assur'd them of safe Conduct. The first who came to accept of the King's Favour was the late Justiciary Hubert, whom the King receiv'd very graciously; after him Gilbert Basset and Richard Sward, with several others, who were all receiv'd with the Kifs of Peace, reconcil'd to the King, and restor'd to all their Rights and Possessions. At the Intercession of the Arch-Bishop he also restor'd to Gilbert, Brother to the late Earl of Pembroke, all his Inheritance both in England and Ireland, and receiv'd his Homage; and on Whitsunday following at Worcester he knighted him, and gave him the Marshal's Staff.

to many.

Upon this general Reconciliation, the Practices by which the great Earl of Pembroke was destroy'd, and his Possessions dismember'd, were all laid open; and the Copies of the Letters sent into Ireland were by means of the Arch-Bishop publickly read in the Presence of the King, the Prelates, Earls and Barons. The exhibiting of these drew Tears from most of them; and the King declar'd by an Oath, That he knew not the Contents of the said Letters, tho' by the Importunity of the Bishop of Winchester, Rivaulx, Segrave and others, he had caus'd his Seal to be put to them. These being shortly after summon'd to appear in the King's Court at Westminster, instead of coming, took Sanctuary in several Places; but at length by the Management of the Arch-Bishop, most of them were brought before the King, who in Person sat upon the Bench with his Justiciaries. Peter de Rivaulx was the first that appear'd in a Clerk's Habit, yet with a Dagger at his Girdle, and bow'd to the King, who as soon as he saw him, call'd him Traitor, accus'd him for his pernicious Counsels, and requir'd him to give an Account of his Treasuryship, and also the Wardships of the young Nobility, with the Escheats and other Profits of the Crown; and after this sent him to the Tower, and seiz'd all his Lay Possessions, because under his Clerk's Habit he had a Coat of Mail, and a Knight's Weapon at his Girdle. At the same Day also appear'd Stephen Segrave before the King, who likewise call'd him Traitor, and added, That by his wicked Advice Hubert Earl of Kent was remov'd from his Office of Justiciary, and imprison'd, and many of the Nobility proscrib'd, requiring him to give an Account of his Justiciaryship. But by the Mediation of the Arch-Bishop, Time was given to him and others; and the King getting Mony out of them, and making Hugh de Pateshull chief Justiciary, all Things in a short Time were brought to a reasonable and quiet Condition.

20. Portion. The Messengers arriv'd in March with the Emperor's Letters, clos'd with a Seal of Gold, and the Arch-Bishop of Coloign, and the Duke of Lo-vain were sent to conduct her over. The King brought her to Sandwich, with a fair Train of three hundred Horse, and being nobly furnish'd with all Things, she took shipping in May, and arriv'd at Antwerp, and was magnificently entertain'd; while her Sweetness of Behaviour, and her charming Beauty attracted the Love and Admiration of all People. At the Solemnity of her Marriage were present three Kings, eleven Dukes, thirty Earls, besides a great Number of Prelates. This Imperial Affinity gave a worthy Historian occasion to display the Glory and Grandeur of the English Princes; but among them all, none were more highly advanc'd than the Children of King John, one of whose Sons was now a King, the other afterwards chosen to be an Emperor, one of his Daughters now a Queen, this other now an Empress. Here Roger Wendover ends his History, to whose Labours we have been often and very much oblig'd.

M. Paris. V. King Henry, being arriv'd to the thirtieth Year of his Age, and the twentieth of his Reign, resolv'd to enter into a nuptial State, and accordingly marry'd the Lady Eleanor, second Daughter to Raymond Earl of Provence, who tho' his Fortunes were in a low Condition, yet he marry'd his four Daughters to as many Kings. Immediately after her Marriage she was crown'd at Westminster with extraordinary Splendor and Magnificence; at which Solemnity the City of London signally display'd its Grandeur, being richly adorn'd with Silks, Banners, Crowns, Palls, Tapers and Lamps, with all the strange Varieties of Wit and Invention. The Citizens, well mounted, and gloriously attir'd, met the King on Horse-back; and at the Dinner, with the Clangor of Trumpets before them, they enter'd, carrying three hundred and sixty Cups of Gold and Silver, to serve the King and his noble Guests with Wine, according to their Duties in Coronations. Our Author here takes particular Notice, that the Earl of Chester, as Lord High-Constable, carry'd the Sword of St. Edward, call'd Curteine, before the King, in Token, 'That he is Earl of the Palace, and 'has by Right a Power of restraining the King, if he should act any Thing 'amiss. Shortly after the King went from London to Merton-Abby, where he met with his great Men to treat with them about the Affairs of the Kingdom; and here were made the Laws call'd the Statutes of Merton. To this Place came the Emperor's Messengers, desiring the King to send his Brother Richard to his Assistance against the French; but by the Advice of the Nobility, his Request was refus'd, because he was young, and next Heir to the Crown, if the King dy'd without Issue.

Ibid. And now the jealous Lords began again to relapse into their usual Discontents, heinously resenting it, That the King was so much govern'd by his Wife's Uncle, William de Valentia; infomuch that the King withdrawing himself into the Tower of London, the Lords refus'd to come to him. Upon better Advice therefore the King return'd to his Palace; where some great Officers, and others, were remov'd from the Privy-Council, and their Places, not without the Admiration of most People. But the Bishop of Chichester, chosen Lord Chancellor in the King's Minority, being requir'd by his Sovereign to deliver up his Seal, positively refus'd, declaring, That as he had receiv'd it by the Authority of the Parliament, he would not resign it without their Consent. These frequent Oppositions from his Prelates and Peers, induc'd this unsteady King to resume into his Favour some of those Counsellors he had not long since displac'd, as Peter de Rivaulx, and Stephen Segrave. Then to secure himself from remoter Dangers, he travell'd towards Tork, to establish a Peace between him and Alexander King of the Scots; who in Confidence of the Amity and Assistance of Prince Llewellyn, demanded the County of Northumberland. Nevertheless, by the Wisdom of their Friends, and their own Moderation, they parted in Peace; the King of England, rather than give up so necessary a Frontier, obliging himself to lay out certain Lands, in lieu of that County, which King John had formerly given as a Portion with his Daughter. In this Year Matth. Paris tells us of a strange Prodigy seen near the Abby of Rock in Torkshire; which was, that for several Days together some Troops of Men on Horseback appear'd to rise out of the Ground, and dividing themselves into Parties, seem'd to fight with each other, and at last to sink into the Earth again. The like Apparitions, as he says, were also seen this Year in Ireland, as the Earl of Glocester related it to him, and affirm'd the Truth of the Fact.

of the National Privileges of England formerly granted, and upon Acceptance of the Earls of Ferrars, and Warren, and John Fitz-Geoffry into his Privy-Council. The King, to satisfy the People, caus'd them to swear to give no unfaithful Advice, and to abstain from all Corruption, or Sale of Justice; and finally he promis'd himself to rely wholly upon his natural Subjects for Advice, and to leave all others. Upon this a Thirtieth of all Profits was granted; but then it was appointed, that the Money should not be paid into the Exchequer, but was to be deposited in some Religious House or Castle in every County, to be expended for the Use of the Publick, as Occasion requir'd; so that if the King fail'd to perform his Part, every Man should receive back what he had deposited. One ordinary Cause of Expence seem'd now to be remov'd, for Lewellyn Prince of Wales, being distemper'd in Body, and disturb'd by the Rebellions of his Son Griffin, voluntarily agreed to hold the whole Principality of the Kings of England.

Paris* complains of the State of England at this Time, which by the King's Flexibility was become the ordinary Prey of sometimes one Sort of Strangers, and sometimes another, as Poictovins, Italians, Germans and Provencials. But no Kind of Strangers then so much infested England as the Romans, of whom there swarm'd three Sorts; Usurers, who were the Pope's Merchants; Italian Clerks, vile and illiterate Persons, who being arm'd with the Pope's Bulls and Censures, possess'd themselves of many spiritual Revenues; and Farmers and Proctors for the Romans, who subtly scraping together whatever was of Value in the Land, sent it over the Sea to their luxurious Masters. And as these Papal Engines acted here in England, so they did with others at Rome, the Governors of that Church not seeking to win Mens Souls but their Money, oppressing the Religious by Punishments, Usuries and Simonies, without any Care of Justice and Honesty; which caus'd the Greek Church at this Time to fall quite away, and to oppose it self against that of Rome. England had then no less Cause than Greece; but as Pope Gregory knew that the only Way to keep England firm, was to secure the King, so the King saw no Way to curb his Barons, but by yielding to the Pope, tho' with so many insufferable Mischiefs. And for some such Design Cardinal Otto the Pope's Legate was sent into England, utterly against the Will of the Peers, and especially of the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, who publicly reprov'd the King for allowing of it, declaring it dangerous to the Kingdom. Yet some good Offices were at first perform'd by the Legate; particularly in a Treaty of Peace begun between the two Kings of England and Scotland at York, where Otto interpos'd himself, and occasion'd a final Agreement. Notwithstanding this, the Barons were inrag'd to see the King so addicted to the Will of the Romans, and the Legate, for which the Earl of Cornwall his Brother reprov'd him as carrying himself more like the Pope's Pensioner than a King. By which the King began to be so sensible of his Authority, that when the Legate call'd a National Synod at St. Paul's, he sent Messengers to forbid him on the Behalf of the King and Kingdom, Not to attempt any Thing that was against the Crown and Royal Dignity.

ssens'd.*

About this Time Simon Montfort, an active and vigorous Man, so wrought himself into Favour, that the King with his own Hands privately gave him his Sister Eleanor, Widow to the late Earl of Pembroke, notwithstanding she had vow'd her self a Nun. This being known to the Earl of Cornwall, and the discontented Lords, it was highly resent'd, because the King according to his Promise had not first consulted them, as in all Matters of Moment; insomuch that none but Earl Hubert adher'd to the forsaken King. The Earl of Cornwall was the Head of this Defection, of whom Men generally hop'd, That he would now free the Nation from the great Oppressions of Romans and other Strangers. Upon which the Legate undertook to advise him, alledging, That if the whole Nation rose against the King, yet he being his own Brother, ought to adhere to adhere to him. To whom the Earl reply'd, That it was not strange that he should be so concern'd for the present Condition of the Kingdom, since he was the only Heir apparent to the Crown: And tho' so many Profits accru'd to the King, yet by the great Gifts bestow'd to the Queen's Relations, the Treasury was exhausted, when the Kingdom was environ'd with Enemies and Strangers, who were enrich'd with the Church Revenues and Benefices founded by his pious Ancestors. The Legate finding that neither Threats nor Promises would prevail upon the Barons of this Party, but that their Inclinations were bent towards the Earl, he advis'd the King to appoint the first Sunday in Lent to give his positive Answer. Upon which Day the Nobility met at London, guarded with Horse and Arms, to compel the King to the Performance of his Promises; and at length, after many Debates, the King promis'd to submit himself to the Determination of some of the most grave and discreet Men; which Agreement was reduc'd to Writing, and seal'd both by the Legate and the Nobility.

L. Paris. Not long after, the King going to Woodstock, a Traitor was seiz'd there who design'd to assassinate his Majesty; for which he was drawn in Pieces by Horses at Coventry. About the same Time the Legate was in no less Danger at Oxford, where being at first honourably entertain'd by the University in Ousney Abby, the Pride of his Romans there prov'd so insupportable, that a Company of the younger Students, being provok'd to arm themselves, not only slew the Legate's Kinsman, but would have done the same to the Legate himself, whom they term'd an Usurer, a Simoniack, a Perverter of the King, and a Subverter of the Kingdom, enriching Strangers with the Spoils of the Natives. But absconding himself, he at Midnight escap'd over the River, not without Danger of drowning, and fled to the King for Protection. For which Outrage, the King sending a Troop of Soldiers, imprison'd thirty of the Offenders; and the Legate interdicted the whole University; 'till all the Bishops of England, who met purposely at a Synod, pleaded for a Relaxation. To whose Importunity the haughty Legate would not condescend, unless all the Bishops would yield to go on Foot with the Students from St. Paul's Church to the Legate's House, which was about a Mile distant, who there without Gowns, Caps or Shoes, should humbly crave Absolution; all which was accordingly perform'd.

The Pope's Legate in Danger.

Reg. Not long after the Legate was recall'd to Rome by the Pope, upon Notice of the daily Offences given to England; but by the earnest Endeavours of the King, who fear'd lest the Nobility should prevail against him, he was detain'd as a necessary Evil to establish Peace. About the same Time he created Simon Montfort Earl of Leicester, but shortly after broke suddenly with him, alledging That he had first corrupted his Sister, and to cover her Shame he permitted the Marriage. He likewise receiv'd Stephen Segrave again into his Favour and Council; so unconstant was this Prince, that he scarce lov'd or hated, but according to the Influence and Suggestions of those about him. Yet at length he began to discover the indirect Practices of his beloved Legate, whose great Friend, Peter Saracen, having been taken Prisoner by the Emperor, and oblig'd to pay ten thousand Pounds for his Ransom, this shameless Man advis'd the King to bind himself and his Crown for the Payment of it. By which the King perceiving what Toyls were laid to insnare him, in a great Rage swore, That he repented he had ever admitted the Legate into the Land, to devour all its Wealth. And the Bishops of the Nation, meeting in a Synod at London to relieve the Oppressions of the English Church, told the Legate in plain Terms, That the Importunity of the Romans had so long exhausted their Church Revenues, that they would no longer endure it. Shortly after when the Legate was entering Scotland, the King of that Country met him, and declar'd to him, That never any Legate had enter'd there before, and there was no Occasion for any at this Time; for Christianity and the Church was then in a prosperous Condition. But by the Mediation of some Friends, it was agreed under the the Hand and Seal of the Legate, That this should not be drawn into a Precedent; whereupon the Legate enter'd Scotland, and held a Synod at Edinburgh, and having extorted what Mony he could, he return'd privately to England. About the same Time the variable King caus'd several Articles of Treason and high Misdemeanors to be exhibited in his Court against his faithful Hubert, pretended to be committed while the Management of publick Affairs pass'd through his Hands: To all which he answer'd with such Modesty and Submission, and so fully to the Purpose, that all who heard him were satisfy'd of his Innocence; tho' the King and all his Lawyers did their utmost to prove him guilty. However the King's Anger was no ways abated, 'till he had resign'd four of his best Castles, Blanch Castle, Grosmund in Wales, Screnefrith and Hatfield. the King.

About the same Time the Emperor Frederick being excommunicated by the Pope, afterwards by his Ambassadors complain'd to King Henry, That he seemed to have forgot his Alliance and Marriage with his Sister, when he suffer'd the Pope's Sentence of Excommunication against him to be publish'd in his Kingdom, and had inconsiderately allow'd the Pope's Legate as Coadjutor in these Practices against him; wherefore he desir'd that the Legate might be expell'd England, as the Enemy and Pillager of his Subjects. To whom the King most dishonourably answer'd, That he ought to obey the Pope, and his Ecclesiastical Commands, because he was his Tributary and Feudatary. However he advis'd the Legate to leave his Kingdom, to prevent further Mischiefs, and incensing the Emperor; yet he found Pretences to stay 'till the following Year, and in the mean Time to extort unreasonable Sums from the Clergy and others. There were also Commands given to the Italian Usurers, by the King, To leave the most pure Earth of his Realm, as he phras'd it; but, as M. Paris adds, by giving the King Mony, which is too much us'd to justify the Impious, they for the most Part remain'd still, being unwilling to forsake such rich Pastures. Whether upon Discontent for these burdensom Times, or otherwise, Richard Earl of Cornwall took upon him the Cross, began his Voyage to the Holy-Land, and left his Son Henry to the King his Brother's Care; and not long after was follow'd by William Longspee Earl of Salisbury, and several other English Noblemen, that attended him.

gate departs.

At length, after near four Years Continuance, the Legate being commanded by the Pope to return, took his solemn Leave of the King, and parted with many tender Sighs and Embraces. No Man but the King lamented his Departure; for, setting aside the Holy Vessels and Ornaments of the Churches, he had drawn more Riches from the Clergy than he left behind; besides he had occasion'd three hundred rich Benefices and Prebendaries to be given to the Pope's Creatures, and reserv'd for his own Use. Upon his Departure, Peter of Savoy the Queen's Uncle arriv'd, whom the King entertain'd with great Magnificence, and gave him the Earldom of Richmond. This and the like Bounties to Strangers occasion'd still more Hatred against the King, who in favour of his Queen, procur'd her Uncle Boniface to be chosen Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, the Rents of which were then above four thousand Marks per annum. Edmund his Predecessor, being weary of the Pope's Exactions and Oppressions in England, had made choice of a voluntary Exile at Pountney in France, where he dy'd with the Honour and Opinion of a Saint. In the same Year dy'd two great Ladies of the Royal Blood of England; first, Isabella, the Empress, and the King's eldest Sister, in Childbed, to the great Grief of the Emperor her Husband; next, Eleanor, Sister to Arthur Duke of Bretaign, who having been kept Prisoner thirty nine Years, deceas'd in the Castle of Brissol, without ever being marry'd. This last was a Lady of a noble Spirit, ever insisting upon her Right to the Crown; who upon her Death left a more indisputable Title to King Henry, than ever he had before.

VI. The King's Employments had hitherto been almost wholly taken up in Civil Disturbances, or in the too patient Bearing of some foreign Grievances, nourish'd within his own Kingdom; which gave him perhaps little Leisure, Means, or Inclination to pursue any Transmarine Action. But now having with great Opposition furnish'd himself with Mony and Men, he took Shipping immediately after Easter towards Poitou, where the Earl of Marche, now Husband to Queen Isabel his Mother, expected his Arrival. He committed the Government of the Land to the Arch-Bishop of York; and took with him the Earl of Cornwall, lately return'd with much Honour from the Holy-Land, and seven other Earls, with about three hundred Knights, besides other Soldiers. To resist the English, the King of France, who had given Poitou to his Brother Alphonso, assembled a powerful Army of four thousand Men of Arms, and about twenty thousand Soldiers, with a thousand Carriages. And laying Siege to Fronteney, a Castle belonging to the Earl of Marche, King Henry sent a Messenger of Defiance to him, as a Breaker of the Truce. Lewis, a just and valiant Prince, deny'd That ever he broke the Truce; but that the King of England had been the Aggressor in joining with such as were Rebels against him. Yet, provided that the English would not protect his Enemies the Earls of Marche, Tholouse and others, he offer'd to give him Poitou, and a great Part of Normandy, in Satisfaction of his Father's Oath, and further to prolong the last Truce three Years more. These Conditions, so honourable and advantageous to the King of England, by the Practices of the Poitouvins, who fear'd the French King's Anger would prove too heavy for them, if the English abandon'd their Cause, were unfortunately refus'd.

The King's Designs in France.

The fair Offers of the French King refus'd.

Upon this Refusal, the French King express'd much Concern for the Oaths that his Father had made to King Henry when he left England, of delivering up his Dominions in France. But one of his Ministers reply'd, That the Oath was mutual, and that the King of England had broken it when he caus'd Constantine a Citizen of London to be hang'd for defending his Father's Honour. This weak Pretence satisfy'd the King's Scruples for the present; and proceeding in his Attacks upon the Castle of Fronteney, took it with the Earl of Marche's Son, and above four hundred other Prisoners. When some advis'd him That the Earl's Son and the rest might be executed as a Terror to other Rebels, he generously reply'd, The Son has obey'd his Father, and the rest the Command of their Lord, upon which account neither of them deserve Death. After this, Lewis march'd directly to Tailleburgh where King Henry was incamp'd, who now perceiv'd that he was utterly disappointed by the Earl of Marche, and in great Danger: Therefore expostulating with the Earl How he had perform'd his Promise of procuring Men, if he supply'd him with Mony? the Earl reply'd, He never made such a Promise, and if any Writing was seal'd to that Effect, it was all the Contrivance of his Wife, the King's Mother. Immediately Earl Richard disarm'd himself, and with a Truncheon in his Hand went to the French Camp, where he was kindly and honourably receiv'd; and desiring a short Truce of the King, he obtain'd one for a Day and a Night: By which means King Henry his Brother had an Opportunity of escaping with his Army, tho' not without great Dishonour and Difficulty. The Earl of Marche now repenting of his Attempts, submitted to the French King, and made private Articles for himself; so that King Henry being abandon'd, was oblig'd to fly into Gascony. Upon which the Cities of Nantes, Pont, and all the rest of Poitou, forthwith submitted to King Lewis; only Hertold Governor of Mirabel Castle went to the King of England, and implor'd his Protection; to whom the King reply'd, That he was betray'd by the Earl of Marche, and was scarce able to secure his own Person, therefore he had leave to act according to his Discretion. Upon this he went to the King of France, and submitted himself to his Protection, and that King answer'd, That he only had behav'd himself faithfully to his Sovereign, and therefore receiv'd the Castle and Himself very kindly; and having first taken an Oath of Fealty, generously restor'd it to him again. The further Prosecution of this War was hinder'd by Sickness and Famine, which much afflicted the French Army; which at length occasion'd a five Year's Truce between the two Kings. Lewis return'd to Paris, and Henry retir'd to his City of Bourdeaux in Gascony; where, being govern'd by the Counsels of the King of Arragon and the Earl of Tholouse, he spent the Winter in Softness and Pleasure, as tho' no Dishonour had befallen him. Here his Queen Eleanor bore a Daughter call'd Beatrice.

King Henry returns with Dishonour from France.

In the following Year the five Years Truce between the two Kings was solemnly confirm'd; by which Agreement the King of France was not only to retain whatever he had gain'd by the Sword, but also to receive five thousand Pounds every Year from the King of England: To such dishonourable Terms was this poor Prince by his own Inconsiderateness reduc'd. His Return was long expected in England, yet much delay'd by the Gascoigns, by reason of the Mony he expended amongst them; so that he could not arrive at his own Kingdom before the twenty fifth Day of September. By reason of this expensive Voyage, he soon became very burdensome to his Subjects, as well by the Levy of Scutage, as by forc'd Loans, and other Methods. The Jews also felt the Severity of his Wants so far, that Christians commiserated their Condition; whose Gold he receiv'd with his own Hands, and their Silver by those of his Officers. These and other importunate Corraisons, were not only us'd to fill up such Breaches as the French Affairs had produc'd, but also to spend on Shows and Entertainments. For on the first of November, Beatrice Countess of Provence, the Queen's Mother, arriv'd in England, being receiv'd at London with all imaginable Pomp and Magnificence. She brought her Daughter Cynthia with her, who on the twenty third of the same Month was marry'd to the King's Brother Earl Richard; and the Nuptials were celebrated with such Splendor and Feasting, that no less than thirty thousand Dishes were provided for the Entertainment.

These new Expences occasion'd a further Want in the King's Coffers, and therefore he call'd a Parliament for a new Supply; to whom he promis'd To observe the Liberties sworn to at his Coronation, and granted in his Charters, and further declar'd, That his Honour and theirs should be inseparable. Upon which the whole Body besought him To remember 'how often he had receiv'd Mony from his faithful Subjects, without performing his Promises; 'That after the taking of Bedford, he had Carrucage, two Shillings upon every Plough-Land; the Year after, a Fifteenth upon all their Moveables: Upon his Passage into Bretaign he had no small Sums from the Prelates, Monasteries, Burgesies and Jews: After his Return he had Scutage, three Marks upon every Knight's Fee; then a Fortieth of all Moveables; a while after, a Thirtieth; shortly after, for the Marriage of his Daughter to the Emperor, two Marks upon every Plough-Land; and at his Son's Birth, by Presents he had heap'd up considerable Sums. Again when he went into Gascony, he had rais'd vast Quantities of Mony from all Sorts of People, and upon his Return, after he had been deluded and dishonour'd, he had in a manner fleec'd his Subjects. Yet still, under the Name of Aid for the Marriage of the King's eldest Daughter, they granted him twenty Shillings upon every Knight's Fee, to be paid at Easter and Michaelmass. To which they added this severe Expostulation, How well the King will keep his Promises, in Requital of the past and present Contributions, he only knows to whom nothing is unknown. But such as endeavour'd to strengthen the Pope's Designs, by raising Mony from the English Clergy, met with a constant Opposition; not only through the Unwillingness of the Clergy, but also because the Emperor had written to the King, in exprefs Terms, That if he suffer'd any Contributions for the Pope, he would certainly revenge it upon all the English that fell into his Hands.

In the mean Time, Griffin Brother to David Prince of Wales, after a long Imprisonment in the Tower, endeavouring to escape, lost his Life by the Breaking of the Rope that should have given him his Liberty; which Accident occasion'd his Brother David to revolt and take up Arms, notwithstanding the solemn Submission he had made three Years before. And to support his Designs, in Imitation of King John, he put himself under the Protection of the Pope, offering him an annual Tribute of five hundred Marks; all which produc'd no great Effect. At the same Time that the King receiv'd the News of the Welsh Insurrection, he also heard, That the King of the Scots had declar'd, He would not hold the least Piece of Earth of the King of England. For the Management of this double War, he first march'd into the North, where at Newcastle, by means of the Death of the principal Incendiary, and the Mediation of others, all Contests between the two Kings were adjusted, according to those Articles formerly made between them at the City of York. The Welsh being now less formidable, the King sent but a small Part of his Army against them, under the Conduct of Hubert Fitz-Matthew; but through their own Neglect, and the Vigilance of the Welsh, Hubert and all his Men were defeated and dispers'd. The News of this Dishonour so affected the King, that he resolv'd to send a powerful Army against the Welsh; but when he desir'd a Subsidy of his Parliament for that purpose, he was with one Voice and Mind deny'd; tho' at the same time his Debts to Foreign Merchants for Wines and other Necessaries, were so numerous and so continually remember'd, that he could scarce pass abroad without their Clamours. Yet the News he receiv'd from Gascony, That his Lieutenant De Molis had defeated the King of Navarre, did somewhat mitigate these Misfortunes; and at the same Time Robert l'asselen by his severe fining such as had encroach'd upon the King's Forests, in a short Time fill'd his Coffers beyond all Expectation.

The King's ill
Success.

The great Benefits the King found from his new Supplies, caus'd him daily to consider how to augment them, and put a Stop to all foreign Hindrances and Out-lets. Upon the Departure of Otto, the Pope's Legate, who had vastly enrich'd both himself and his Master, it was hop'd that the Nation should have found some Ease from the Romish Extortions; but it prov'd otherwise; for, as M. Paris complains, new Agents and Factors still came over, as if England had been an unexhaustible Spring, and Rome a bottomless Gulf. Upon which Account the King had writ both to this Pope and his Predecessor, desiring them To desist from thus afflicting England with their Exactions; yet out of Fear of him whom he had acknowledg'd his Sovereign, and a Desire of more Power, he supported the Romish Ministers, against the Pleasure of the whole Nation. Which so encourag'd the present Pope, that he design'd to make a Visit into England himself; to which purpose he caus'd his Cardinals to write their perswasory Letters to the King, as a Thing highly conducing to his Safety, and to his Kingdom's Immortal Glory, to enjoy the Presence of the Lord Pope, who greatly desir'd to see the Delicacies of Westminster, and the Riches of London. But the King's Council exprelly declar'd to him, That the Rapines and Simonies of the Romans had sufficiently stain'd the Purity of England, without the Pope's coming personally to pillage the Wealth of the Church and Kingdom. Tho' the Pope was refus'd Entrance in Person, yet his Rapines were still carry'd on by his Factor and Chaplain Martin, insomuch that several of the Peers, commiserating the Condition of the Land, took Order for a strict Watch at all the Ports of England, that all Letters from Rome should be stopp'd. Shortly after the King order'd a strict Enquiry to be made into each County of the true Value of the Benefices which the Italian Clergy-Men then enjoy'd in England by the Gift of the Pope; and they were found to amount to sixty thousand Marks per Annum, which at that Time exceeded the whole Revenue of the Crown. Upon which Report the King became fully sensible of the insatiable Avarice of the Romish Church, but all that he durst do was to permit a sharp Epistle to be written in the Name of the general Body of the Nation, in which they set forth the execrable Extortions and Exactions of the Pope's Legates and Nuntio's, and sent it to the Pope then sitting in a Council at Lyons. Here, the Pope giving dilatory and uncertain Answers, Earl Bigot and the rest of the King's Agents, with terrible Threats and Oaths declar'd, That they would remedy that themselves, which the Pope would not. And indeed the Nobility at home had already begun to act to that Effect, having commanded Martin to depart out of the Land, or he and all his Company should be cut in pieces: Who departing in Haste, so inrag'd the Pope with the News of this Usage, that he declar'd thus, It is full Time that we make Peace with the Emperor, that so we may humble these rebellious petty Princes; for the great Dragon being once pacify'd, the smaller Serpents will easily be trodden under foot. Then to let King Henry see his Power, he sent to all the Bishops of England, commanding them that each should set his Seal to that Charter of Tribute which King John had unhappily granted; which these timorous Bishops perform'd, greatly to the Nation's Damage, and their own Reproach. The King at first shew'd his Resentments, and declar'd That he would never comply with such Baseness; but wanting Constancy and Courage, he in a short Time return'd to his wonted Tameness and Submission.

The Welsh Affairs growing very troublesome by reason of the casual Death of Fitz-Matthew, the King prepar'd to suppress their Insults in Person: In order to which the King came to St. Paul's Church, and there took leave of the Citizens of London, after a familiar and popular Manner. And that neither War nor Want should make him forget his Magnificence, he began to pull down the old Abby Church at Westminster, and new build it in that stately Manner in which it remains to this Day. But all that he did in Wales for near two Months, was to build the Castle of Ganock, which he finish'd with great Difficulty, and put a strong Garrison into it; and the Winter approaching, he destroy'd all the Victuals and Forage upon the Borders, and the inward Parts of Wales, and then return'd with his Army into England. For this Expedition the King pawn'd his Jewels to his Brother Richard for three thousand Marks. Here M. Paris has a long List of great Persons, who dying about this Time, left neither Name nor Issue to preserve the Memory of their Grandeur; but none so remarkable as the Earls of Pembroke, of whom there were five successive Brothers, who dying left the noble Earldom, with a mighty Estate in England, Ireland and Wales, to be divided between five Sisters, all marry'd to the greatest Men of the Nation. Our Author ascribes this sudden Failure of the Heir Males to the Curse of an Irish Bishop upon their Father, who for taking away some Lands belonging to his See, and refusing to restore them, pray'd that God would shew some remarkable Judgment upon his Family.

Great Complaints against the Pope's Usurpations.

The King finding himself free from foreign Troubles, now apply'd himself to the Reformation of the inward Maladies of his Dominions; and for that End he call'd a full Parliament to London, to which he deliver'd in Writing the Sum of the Grievances both in Church and State: As First, 'That the Pope had extorted great Contributions of the Clergy, without the King's Consent, against the Rights and Liberties of the Kingdom. Secondly, 'That Patrons could not bestow their Livings on fit Persons, because the Pope gave them to his Romans, who could not speak English, but impoverish'd the Nation by carrying away the Coin. Thirdly, 'That the Pope's Provisions and Pensions were exorbitant and insupportable. Fourthly, 'That English Men were drawn out of their Country to finish their Causes abroad. And Fifthly, 'That the Pope by his Clause of Non Obstante vacated Oaths, Customs, Charters, Grants, Statutes, Rights and Privileges. Upon which the King, Prelates, Earls, Barons, Abbots and Priors, did all write their several Complaints to the Pope, requiring speedy Redress of those infinite Injuries to the King and all his subjects, who would rather die than thus daily endure such Oppressions. Notwithstanding, standing, several Prelates, out of Fear or Ambition, privately promoted the Pope's Designs, when he secretly requir'd an annual Tallage of the Clergy for the Maintenance of his Soldiers; and that the State should have no Notice of it, he caus'd them to swear not to reveal this Contribution to any Man for the Space of half a Year. Yet the King came to the Knowledge of it, and by Proclamation commanded that the Mony should not be carry'd out of the Land, and that none of his Subjects should contribute any Mony to the Pope: But it came to no great Effect, for some Romanizing Bishops and ambitious Clerks of his Council, fearing the Papal Threats, drew him to leave his Purpose weakly, which he had manfully undertaken. The Bishop of Worcester, a principal Agent, was said to have Authority from the Pope to Interdict the Land, which was the main Thing the King fear'd, and which, as our Author freely writes, was not worth his Fears; and the Earl of Cornwall also with others, labour'd to promote the Pope's Interest, so that the wonted Extortions were as current as ever. And further the Pope granted to Boniface, now Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, a Foreigner and Uncle to the Queen, a Bull for levying a Tax of ten thousand Marks in seven Years Time upon the Bishops and Clergy of his Province, to discharge, as it was pretended, the Debts of the Archbishoprick.

But so little Effect.

f. Paris. If we should so often insist upon the Relation of this Kingdom's Misfortunes, as the Pope's endless Corraisons, and the State's repeated Complaints give us Occasion, we should overburden the Reader with dismal Matter, which Monks themselves have mournfully and copiously set forth, showing the too servile Affections of our Ancestors, who still enter'd upon new Consultations about the Disease, but never brought the Remedy to its right use. For upon fresh Extortions from Rome, the King again assembled his Parliament to think of a Redress, the whole State, as well Clergy as Laity, being reduc'd to such a low Condition as was never known before; of which they again made their heavy Complaints, who were to protect the Land from such Wrongs and Mischiefs. Their only Remedy was again to write Letters to the Pope, which slender Force he could easily dissipate; and tho', to put a Stop to present Clamours, he promis'd never to send any Legates into England, but at the State's Request, yet he daily sent his exacting Clerks, with the Power, tho' not with the Title and Ensigns of Legates, so to delude the King, and impose upon his Subjects. In the midst of these unhappy Times, the King summon'd all his Peers to meet on the Festival of St. Edward, the thirteenth of October, partly, as the Writ of Summons sets forth, To hear the good News of a Benefit conferr'd on England from Heav'n, partly to celebrate the Translation of that Martyr, and partly for the Solemnity of Knighting William de Valentia, the King's Half Brother. The good News they were to hear was, That a Portion of our Saviour's Blood was sent to the King from Jerusalem; which with great Reverence and Devotion, the King himself in a mean Habit carry'd on Foot, from St. Paul's Church to Westminster, where it was carefully reposit.

d. As the Pope continually wanted Mony from this Kingdom, so did the King also: For which Reason he summon'd a Parliament at London, and requir'd of the Members to grant him a pecuniary Aid. But instead of complying, they reprov'd him, For asking it without blushing, seeing when they granted the last, he promis'd by his Charter, That he would no more burden his Nobility. Moreover they blam'd him For his repeated Kindnesses and Liberalities to Foreigners, and Contempt of his Native Subjects, for not encouraging the Trade of his own Kingdom, and in exacting unreasonable Gifts from Merchants: And lastly, For keeping Bishopricks and Monasteries void in his own Hands. To which they added, That neither the Justiciary, Chancellor, nor Treasurer, were made by the Common-Council of the Kingdom, as they were in his Predecessor's Reign. The King inwardly touch'd at this, promis'd, That what was amiss should be speedily redress'd; to which the whole Body return'd Answer, That as they had often, so they would now patiently wait a while; and according

Upon which the Matter was deferr'd for three or four Months; and meeting again the King made a Speech to them to this Effect, That they had not treated their King civilly, but would impose mean and servile Conditions upon him; and what each of them in private thought to be his Right was deny'd him, even that Authority which every Master exercis'd in his Family, who might use what Counsel, and might chuse what Servants he thought fit in his own House, but this they deny'd to their Sovereign: And as Servants ought not to judge or impose any Difficulties upon their Lord, so neither might Vassals upon their Prince; therefore he resolv'd to remove none of his Ministers at their Pleasure. Yet notwithstanding he expected a pecuniary Aid, for the Recovery of his Rights beyond the Seas, which was their Concern as well as his. They all unanimously reply'd, That they would no longer impoverish themselves to enrich Foreigners: So the King was left to furnish himself by the Sale of his Jewels, Plate, and other valuable Goods; and being told that he might find Buyers in London, he reply'd, That if the Treasury of Augustus were to be sold, the Citizens of London were able to purchase it.

A. D. 1249. The King reduc'd to Straits. The Affairs of Gascony, which had been greatly disturb'd by one Guasto de Biard, were now by the Courage and Conduct of Simon Montfort Earl of Leicester, reduc'd to good Order; which render'd his Presence very acceptable in the Court of England. The King intending to promote that Enterprize afresh against the following Spring, left no Methods untry'd, which either by Art or incessant Intreaties he could use to replenish his exhausted Coffers. In which he too much debas'd the Royal Name and Dignity of a King, declaring to several, whose Bounty he crav'd, That it was more Charity to assist him with Money, than one that went begging from Door to Door. In the mean Time the King neglected not the Administration of Justice; for, whereas the whole County of Hampshire was infested with Felons, Robbers and Murderers, he so manag'd the Affair, by sitting in Person at Winchester Castle, that the Infamy and Danger of those Places were clear'd by hanging the chief Offenders, many of whom were wealthy, and some the King's own Servants; the latter of whom pleaded, That the King had for a long Time stopp'd their Wages, so that they were oblig'd either to sell their Horses and Equipage, or live upon Robberies. The King, now desirous to be Friends with the Citizens of London, to whom of late he had been too hard and extorting, publicly reconcil'd himself to them, whom for that Cause he commanded to appear at Westminster, and there immediately undertook the Crusado, and receiv'd the Badge from Arch-Bishop Boniface; but whatever his Intentions were, he himself never came to Action. In the mean Time, contrary to the Example of his Ancestors, he so much abridg'd the Expences of his House, and his Alms, that he justly sustain'd some dishonourable Imputations. Nevertheless he began wisely to extricate himself out of many Merchants Debts; towards which he forc'd great Aids from the Jews, as being the ordinary Clippers and Defacers of his Coin, and the Forgers of Seals and Charters; from one of whom he had at several Times got thirty thousand Marks of Silver, besides two hundred Marks in Gold. And to get more Money he sent a severe Inquisitor to search into the Transgressions upon Forests; which Charge he executed with that Violence and Extortion upon the Gentry, that tho' he rais'd large Sums, yet it lost him the Affections of his People, when he came afterwards to stand in most need of them.

His Extortions. A. D. 1251. He debas'd himself. The King, now wholly intent upon raising of Money, neither gave any rich Presents according to the ancient Custom of England, nor would put on his Royal Robes, but still shorten'd the Allowances of his Household and Entertainments, without any Regard to Majesty or Censure. And to spare his own Charges, he sometimes invited himself to one great Man, and sometimes to another; but was never satisfy'd with his Entertainment, unless considerable Presents were also made to himself, his Queen, and Son Edward, and likewise to his his chief Favourites, which they rather look'd upon as a Debt than a Courtesie. This was the dishonourable State of the King's Court at this Time: Yet in the greatest Wants, and most rigorous Parsimony, he could not defend himself against the Suits and Preferments of his Poictovins and Provencials; so that it became a common Murmur in England, Our Inheritance is converted to Aliens, and our Houses to Strangers: And what was yet more grievous, their Pride and Violence were insupportable. In these unhappy Times the Clause of Non Obstante, first introduc'd by the Pope, was taken up in England by the King, in his Grants and Charters, as Non obstante priore Mandato, and Non obstante antiqua Libertate, and the like; which our Author calls a detestable Clause: And Roger de Thurkeby, one of the King's Justices, at the first Sight of it, with a deep Sigh cry'd out, Alas, to what Times are we arriv'd! The Civil Court is corrupted by the Ecclesiastical, and the River is poison'd from that Fountain.

Many took the Advantage of these Times, among the rest Henry de Bath, one of the King's Justiciaries, who by his Briberies and Extortions had rais'd a great Estate upon the Ruin of others; for which he was accus'd to the King, who oblig'd him to appear before the next Parliament at London. At the appointed Time he came with a magnificent Train of his own and his Lady's Relations, hoping by that means to turn the Edge of Justice. Besides other Crimes, he was accus'd of incensing the whole Baronage against the King, which had endanger'd a general Sedition; and the King was so highly provok'd against him, that he caus'd it to be proclaim'd in his own Court and in London, That if any Person had any Complaint against Henry de Bath, he might come in and be heard. Upon which one of his Fellow-Justices charg'd him with acquitting a notorious Criminal for a great Bribe; which further so inrag'd the King, that standing up he rashly cry'd out, That if any Man would kill Henry de Bath, he would pardon him; and he had soon been dispatch'd, had not the Prudence of John Mansel, and the Threats of the Bishop of London secur'd him from further Violence. But at length having made Earl Richard his Friend, by great Presents, through his Mediation, and the Promise of two thousand Marks, he gain'd his Liberty, return'd to Court, and was receiv'd into Favour: For at this Time Justice, and all other Things became saleable. In the same Year, part of Wales was wholly subdu'd, and receiv'd the English Laws; and the North-East Parts were committed to the Government of Alun de Zouch, who farm'd them at eleven Hundred Marks per Annum. About the same Time the Community of London swore Allegiance to Prince Edward, saving the Fidelity they ow'd to the King his Father, who then also granted them a Confirmation of all Liberties they enjoy'd in the Reign of King Henry the First; for which Charter they paid the King five hundred Marks.

VII. All Things being now in a quiet, tho' unsettled Posture, Alexander III. King of Scotland, now about twelve Years of Age, sent Ambassadors to King Henry, desiring the last Peace between the two Nations might be ratify'd, as well as the Agreement of a Marriage between himself and the Lady Margaret the King's Daughter. Upon which Motion, both the Kings met on Christmass at York, where King Henry first knighted young Alexander, and the next Day gave him his Daughter Margaret in Marriage. The Nuptials were solemniz'd with a mighty Confluence of Prelates and Noblemen out of England, Scotland and France, besides two Kings, three Queens, a thousand English, and six hundred Scotch Knights, who all appear'd in the most splendid Apparel and Equipage. The Arch-Bishop of York, who was Prince of the Northern Parts, gave sixty fat Oxen towards the Nuptial Dinner, and was at the further Expence of four thousand Marks. Upon the Marriage Alexander did Homage to King Henry for Lothian and the other Lands he held of him; but being also demanded to do the same Homage for the Kingdom of Scotland, as his Predecessors cessors had done, the young King wisely reply'd, That he came thither at the King of England's Invitation, and by this Marriage to unite himself more firmly to him, but unprepar'd to give an Answer to such Difficulties, without consulting his Nobility. King Henry hearing this modest Reply, would press him no further, lest the design'd Mirth and Jollity should be disturb'd, but reserv'd it to a more convenient Opportunity.

The King affronted by Earl Montfort.

Not long after the Noblemen of Gascony sent over great and many Complaints to the King against their Governor Simon Montfort Earl of Leicester, who upon that Account came twice into England; and the last Time he so well vindicated himself before his Majesty's Person, that he silenc'd most of his Adversaries. The King, perceiving that his Brother Richard, and many of the chief Nobility join'd with him, could not restrain his Resentments; and when the Earl boldly demanded a Recompence for his Services and Expences, according to the King's Royal Word and Ingagement, the King reply'd, He would not stand to any Promise he had made to a Traitor. Upon which the Earl told the King He Lied; and were he not a King, he would make him eat his Words; reproachfully demanding, Whether any Man would believe he was a Christian, or had been at Confession? The King answering in the Affirmative, the Earl ask'd, What avail'd Confession, without Repentance and Satisfaction? The King reply'd, He had never more Reason to repent, than for his bestowing such Preferments upon one who had so little Gratitude and Manners; and would have caus'd him to be apprehended for his Insolence, but by the Interposition of Friends, they parted from each other outwardly reconcil'd. Shortly after, he order'd the Earl to return into Gascony, telling him, That if he was such a Lover of War, he might there find sufficient Employment, and a Reward answerable to his Merits: To which the Earl boldly reply'd, That he would go over, and not return, 'till he had subdu'd the Enemies, and reduc'd the rebellious Subjects of an ungrateful Prince. Thus was this weak King insulted by his own Subjects, and not only by Men but also by Women; particularly the young Countess Dowager of Arundel, who receiving a Repulse from the King in a Matter alledg'd to be hers in Equity, thus freely accosted him: My Lord the King, why do you turn your Face from Justice? We can obtain no Right from your Court; You are plac'd between God and us, but you neither govern your self nor us, as you ought; but daily oppress the Church, and afflict the Nobility of your Kingdom. The King, fir'd at her Discourse, with a furious Look demanded, Whether the Nobility of England had given her a Commission to be their Advocate? To which she with no less Warmth reply'd, The Nobility have not made me any such Charter, tho' you have broke that which you and your Father have granted, and sworn inviolably to observe, and for which you have so often extorted Money from your Subjects. Where are the Liberties of England, so often reduc'd to Writing, so often granted, and so often purchas'd and redeem'd? Therefore I, tho' a Woman, with all your natural Subjects, do appeal from you to the Tribunal of Heaven, where the great and terrible Judge shall revenge our Cause. The King, confounded at such bold Truths, for a while remain'd silent, and then ask'd her Whether she desir'd a Favour, because she was his Cousin? To which she only reply'd, Since he had deny'd doing Justice, how could she expect any Favour? and so departed without any other Satisfaction than the Affronting a Monarch without Control.

and by the Countess of Arundel.

In the same Year Grosthed Bishop of Lincoln employ'd one of his Clerks to take an exact Account of the yearly Revenue that Italian and Foreign Clergy-Men possess'd in England, which was found to exceed seventy thousand Marks, when the King's bare Revenue was at this Time so low, that it scarce reach'd one third Part of that Sum. At the same Time John Mansel Clerk, who was the King's principal Counsellor, enjoy'd such an unreasonable Number of Ecclesiastical Preferments at once, that his Revenues amounted to four thousand Marks.

Marks per annum, an Income then sufficient for the greatest Prelates. The King, who had incurr'd the ill Will and Curses of the People by many illegal Exactions, still wanted a large Sum of Mony for an Expedition to the Holy-Land; for which purpose he call'd a Parliament, and demanded great Supplies of them. To which they consented, upon Condition that he would once for all submit himself to govern wholly by Law, and confirm the Charters and Liberties of the Kingdom. To that end, the Nobility being assembled in Westminster Hall, all those that oppos'd, violated, diminish'd or chang'd the Liberties contain'd in the great Charters, were solemnly excommunicated and anathematiz'd with Bell, Book and Candle, by the Arch-Bishop and Bishops, in their Robes and Pontificalia; and this was done in the Presence, and by the Assent of the King, who in the mean Time laying his Hand on his Breast, after all was perform'd, pronounc'd these Words, 'So may God help me, as I inviolably observe all these Things; which I promise, as I am a Man, as I am a Christian, as I am a Knight, and as I am a King crown'd and anointed.' Then also the original Charters granted by King John were produc'd, and read before them all; which the King having regranted and confirm'd, they put out their Candles, and threw them down smoaking upon the Ground, and every one wish'd, That such as oppos'd that Sentence, might so stink and smoke in Hell. Never were Human Laws and Liberties confirm'd with greater Solemnity and Majesty; yet the King, being led by pernicious Counsellors, in a short Time made it his Endeavours to break through all Obligations, which meeting with a turbulent Nobility, at length brought himself and the Nation into great Miseries.

In the mean Time the valiant Montfort Earl of Leicester being remov'd from his Government of Gascony, the King's Son Edward was put in his Room; upon which Change, Alphonso King of Castile pretended a Grant of that Country from King Henry II. confirm'd by his Sons Richard and John. Upon this, several of the Nobility of Gascony revolted from King Henry, and join'd with Alphonso; but the Citizens of Bordeaux continu'd faithful, and gave Notice to the King of England, That without a speedy and powerful Assistance, he would lose the whole Country. The King at this was extremely concern'd for the Removal of Montfort; and using what Expedition, and raising what Force he could, in August he landed at Bordeaux, where such Means were us'd, that by the End of Summer, he recover'd all his Castles in Gascony, either by Force or Composition. Yet the King, not daring to rely upon the Fidelity of the Gascoignes, and suspecting that they might still revolt to the King of Castile or Spain, sent Ambassadors to desire his Friendship, and that he would marry his Sister Eleanor to his Son and Heir Prince Edward, on whom he had lately bestow'd Gascony. The Ambassadors so well dispatch'd the Affair, that they not only concluded the Match, but also made a League with the King of Castile, and brought back a Charter seal'd with a Golden Seal; by which he releas'd to King Henry whatever Right he had, or could have in that Country by the Grant of Henry II. King Richard, or King John. Then, upon the Ambassadors assuring their Master of Alphonso's Sincerity, he shortly after sent to his Son Prince Edward, to come over to him, in order to send him into Spain to consummate the Match. Among other Acts of Love and Sincerity, Alphonso sent this good Advice to the King of England, That after the Example of good Princes, he should be a Lamb towards his Subjects and Natives, and a Lion to Aliens and Rebels. Earl Montfort, who had generously refus'd the High-Stewardship of all France, with a brave Troop of Soldiers now offer'd his Service to the King, who admiring at his Greatness receiv'd him with all outward Marks of Joy; at whose Reconciliation, the Gascoignes, who dreaded the Power of his Arms, were so dishearten'd, that they came gradually in, and became good Subjects.

A. D. 1254. Reg. 38. 59. Prince Edward marry'd to the King of Castile's Sister.

In the following Year the Queen also arriv'd at Bordeaux with her two Sons, Edward and Edmund; and shortly after Prince Edward was sent in great State to King Alphonso, where having marry'd his Sister Eleanor, he was honourably sent back to his Father with his princely Bride. Upon his Arrival, King Henry settled upon Him and his Princess all Gascony, Ireland and Wales, with the City and Towns of Bristol, Stamford and Grantham: From which Time the King began to prepare for his Return into England, and upon stating his Accounts, he found that the Expences of his Expeditions into France, besides thirty thousand Marks he bestow'd upon the Poictovins, amounted to so vast a Sum as would have more than purchas'd all his Lands in that Country. And what was still worse, our Author tells us it was to little or no Effect; so that when the King was told of this mighty Expence by one about him, he cry'd out, For God's sake name it no more, lest the very Relation makes Men wonder and stand amaz'd! Having settled all Affairs, King Henry ask'd Leave of the King of France to pass through his Kingdom, which was not only granted, but also he himself met the King of England at Chartres, where he was then attended by a thousand brave Horse with noble Riders, besides Sumpter-Horses and many Carriages. His own Queen was with him, and her Sister the Countess of Cornwall; and there the Queen of France met them, with her other Sister the Countess of Anjou, as also the old Countess of Provence, the Mother of all these four Ladies. From thence they were conducted to Paris, where for eight Days they remain'd with triumphant Joy and Satisfaction, making mutual and magnificent Entertainments, such as had not been known before. After which the King of France brought King Henry one Day's Journey towards the Sea, where they took their Leaves with extraordinary Tenderneſs and Affection; and King Lewis at his Departure, with a deep Sigh said, Oh that the Peers and Baronage of my Kingdom would give their Consents, and then we might be inseperable Friends! This he spoke with Respect to Normandy and those other Territories, which his Nobility would not permit him to restore to the King of England; which was a great Trouble to the Conscience of this pious Prince.

A. D. 1255. Reg. 39. 40. Prince Edmund made King of Sicily.

It was the next Year before the King landed in England, and a considerable Time after before the new Princess Eleanor arriv'd, who was receiv'd by the Londoners with great Pomp, and had her Lodgings furnish'd with Hangings and Foot-Carpets after the Spanish Fashion; which seem'd strange and superfluous to the English, who were not accusom'd to such Sort of Magnificence; and the great Honours paid to the Spaniards prov'd very ungrateful to the Natives. On the other Side, Edmund the King's second Son, by a Ring sent from the Pope, was solemnly invested in the Kingdom of Sicily and Apulia. The Ambassador who brought it was a Bishop, who immediately departed; for indeed his Business was glorious in Show, but in Reality delusory and unprofitable; both because the King had unreasonably engag'd himself in the Pope's Contest with the present Emperor, as also because the Romish Forces had lately been overthrown, before this airy Honour could be granted to Prince Edmund; whom yet his Father treated as a King, highly pleasing himself with the Trouble of a wastful Title, to his own and the whole Kingdom's great Impoverishment. The Calamities of the Kingdom in these expensive Times were the more deplorable, because they were continually countenanc'd by the King, who ought to have redress'd them. But the Pope having no way so easie to be supply'd as by the King, nor the King any but by the People, both Pope and King agreed to grind the People for each others Interest; the King to satisfy the Pope's Avarice, and the Pope to advance the King's Ambition. The Gaining of the Kingdom of Sicily was the Colour, for which the King pretended to go in Person; and therefore Rustand, the Pope's Agent, who was sent to gather the Tenth of all England for the Use of the Pope or King indifferently, had call'd a great Council the former Year, and adjourn'd it 'till this; where he also requir'd all the Prelates to bind themselves to the Pope's Merchants, as having already received a great Sum of Money from them, which was employ'd to the Use of their Churches. To which deceitful Allegation, the Prelates reply'd, They would rather die than suffer such Oppressions, and they accounted it a greater Instance of Martyrdom to die in such a Cause, than in that of Thomas Becket. The rest of the Nobility also absolutely refus'd either to recover Sicily, or to bear the Charge of it, as being both impracticable; the one for the Strength of Manfrede, and the other for the present Poverty of England. And indeed not long after, the Pope and Manfrede were reconcil'd, and so King Henry and King Edmund were deluded, one of his great Expences, and the other of his imaginary Crown. By this the King was partly waken'd out of his Dreams, in which he had continu'd feeding his Thoughts with a Prospect of leaving a Kingdom to each Son; tho' he never rested 'till he had almost plung'd the Crown into the Gulfs of irrecoverable Debts and Usury. For besides many other Burdens, the King, by the Management of the Romish Court, now stood engag'd to the Pope for near two hundred thousand Marks.

The Nation oppress'd both by the King and the Pope.

These continual Wants occasion'd the King to be stricter than formerly, and to go in Person into the Court of the Exchequer among the Barons, where he made severe Orders against all Sheriffs and Bailiffs of incorporate Towns, who did not at the exact Time appear at the Exchequer, to pay in the King's Money that came to their Hands. At the same Time he amerced all the Sheriffs in England, because they had not distrain'd every one that had fifteen Pounds a Year in their several Counties, to come up and be knighted; all which added to the Grievances of the Nation. In the same Year two Things added much to the publick Expences; the first was the Arrival of the young King and Queen of Scotland, who were entertain'd by King Henry at London with great Charge and Magnificence. The other was the Insurrection of the Welsh, who having been much oppress'd by the continu'd Sale of the Government of their Nation, stood up for the Defence of their Laws and Country, and invading the English Borders, destroy'd the Tenants of Prince Edward, whom as yet they had not acknowledg'd for their Lord. Whereupon the Prince, having no present Money, borrow'd four thousand Marks of his Brother Earl Richard, in order to suppress their Incursions; but the whole Winter was so wet and stormy, and the retiring Places of the Welsh so boggy and impassable, that the English durst not attempt them, so that the Expedition prov'd ineffectual, and the Prince's Expences in vain. And indeed the Welsh perform'd great Actions under Prince Lewellyn ap Griffith, by whose Means they valiantly recover'd all the Inland Country of North-Wales, with other Places; in one Encounter slew above two thousand English Men, and ravag'd the Country to the very Gates of Chester. This they had the greater Opportunity to effect, because King Henry, while he form'd Kingdoms in the Clouds, and plung'd himself into the Depths of Usury, suffer'd his Relations and Favourites to trample Right and Reason under Foot, and with the Hatred of himself to fill their Purses; while his own Treasure daily consum'd, and Mens Minds were more and more alienated from him, as Persons who despair'd of Redress and Justice. The Welsh persisting in their Attempts, forc'd the valiant Prince Edward to retire for want of Assistance; and when he complain'd to his Father, his Answer was, That Wales was his own by Gift, therefore he ought to get Honour in his Youth, for he himself was otherwise employ'd.

The Successes of the Welsh.

In Order to supply his Wants the King call'd another Parliament to Westminster, where he brought his Son Edmund, attir'd in an Apulian Habit; and having plac'd him in publick View, he said, Behold, ye faithful Subjects, my Son Edmund, whom Heav'n of its Bounty has call'd to Royal Dignity: How worthy is he of all your Favours; and how inhuman will it be for any to deny him Assistance in this extraordinary Juncture? Then he declar'd, That by the Consent of the Church of England, he had oblig'd himself to the Pope,

under pain of losing his Kingdom, for the Payment of one hundred and forty thousand Marks, besides Interest, which had greatly increas'd; for the Discharge of which he demanded the Tenths of the whole Benefic'd Clergy for five Years, without Abatement or Deduction. This Demand made all Men stand amaz'd, especially when they found that this Oppression had taken its Rise from the Pope himself: But at length, when neither Excuses nor Intreaties would prevail, they granted the King an Aid of fifty thousand Marks towards his urgent Necessities; but with this unacceptable Condition, That he should for the future most inviolably observe that Capital Charter, which had been so often promis'd, and so often purchas'd: But the King thinking the Sum insufficient, refus'd to accept it; tho' afterward it is believ'd that he took it. Tho' the King was exceeding poor, yet his Brother Richard had heap'd up such Riches, that he was able to spend a hundred Marks every Day for ten Years together, without accounting his Revenues he receiv'd from England and Germany. Upon the Account of his great Wealth, this Year Ambassadors from Germany came and declar'd to him, That the Princes of the Sacred Empire had elected him King of the Romans, beseeching him to accept of that Dignity. At first he declin'd it but by the Persuasion of his Brother, he consented; and after some Time he pass'd over to Aix-la-Chapelle, where both he and his Countess were crown'd with great Splendor and Magnificence, and plac'd in the Throne of Charles the Great with the usual Solemnity. His Departure was succeeded by a great Famine and a prodigious Scarcity of Coin, the former proceeding from the Wetness of the Season, and the latter chiefly from the Earl's carrying over with him seven hundred thousand Pounds in ready Money: An incredible Sum in those Days, besides what King Henry had of late sent to the Pope upon several Accounts; so that it was no Wonder if England was exhausted of all its current Money.

Reg. 42.

In these Times of Want, when fifty Ships laden with Corn were sent by Richard King of the Romans to London, the King took a laudable Care that the Citizens should not engross that Commodity to the Damage of the Poor; but no Warnings, Intreaties, or Advices were sufficient to make him truly frugal in his own Person, by which he was miserably straiten'd. Nor would the Parliament he summon'd contribute any Thing, but forming some great Attempts in their Minds, in direct Terms concluded, That they neither would, nor could any longer endure such Exactions. Moreover they laid open many Grievances, and Earl Montfort complain'd of the Dishonour and Injury done by the King's Half-Brother William de Valence, calling him Traitor; so that against the next Session of Parliament to be held on St. Barnabas's Day at Oxford, he, with the Earls of Glocester and Norfolk, alledging their Fear of Strangers and Favourites, resolv'd to come with all their Forces. They also sent Emislaries to the King of France, begging so much Assistance at least, as that he would not hinder their good Intentions of establishing the distracted State of England; and they also took care to watch the Ports against Foreigners. Thus they prepar'd to abate the Insolency and Haughtiness of the Portuguese and other Strangers, by whom the King was powerfully led; for they despair'd of Redress at his Hands, who, as M. Paris says, like another Proteus took all Shapes upon him to serve his Ends, and slip out at his Pleasure, no Promises or Ties being strong enough to hold him. And to add to his Misfortunes, the Pope also began to show his Displeasure, because he observ'd not his reiterated Promises, by which he had bound himself, upon Forfeiture of his Kingdom, to correct his wonted Excesses; and therefore threaten'd both to Excommunicate him and to Interdict his Dominions. Upon which the King in a great Confusion sent him five thousand Marks, to pacify and bring him to a softer Temper, and to keep off the Sentence for a Time; with which Money, and the King's earnest Petitions, his Holiness seem'd tolerably well satisfy'd.

^{Ibid.} At the Time appointed the Parliament met at Oxford, where the turbulent Earls and Barons occasion'd the King to allow of twenty four Persons to be chosen, one half by himself and the other by the Peers, to have the whole Administration of the Government and State, and the yearly Appointment of all great Officers, reserving only to the King the highest Place at Meetings, and Salutations of Honour in publick Places. And because they would not miss of their Designs, they came well arm'd and appointed, so that the King and Prince Edward were forc'd to swear to their Ordinances, the Lords having threaten'd Death to all Opposers. The chief of their Ordinances were, 'That the King should inviolably observe the Charter of Liberties, so often granted and purchas'd: That such a Justiciary should be chosen, who would do Justice to the Poor as well as Rich: That the twenty four should chuse the Justices, Chancellors, Treasurers, and other Officers from Year to Year: That they, or their Adherents, should have the Custody of the King's Castles: That three Parliaments should meet every Year at set Times. These, with some others, ^{The King complains.} were call'd The Provisions of Oxford, which the whole Baronage of England was bound by Oath to observe, and That they would never desist from prosecuting these their just Resolves, either for Loss of their Lives or Estates; and to confirm them the Arch-Bishops and Bishops solemnly execrated all such as resisted them. Thus through the Easiness of a weak and inconstant Prince, and the growing Power of an insolent and exasperated Nobility, the Head of the State became a Cypher, and the whole Government was put into the Hands of a few, who really design'd their own Interest and Grandeur more than the common Good of the Nation. This Confederacy was so strong, that when William de Valence, refus'd to deliver up any Castle given to him, Earl Montfort and the rest answer'd, They would either have his Castles or his Head: Which violent Proceeding so terrify'd the Poictovins, that they suddenly left Oxford and fled into France, where also the Barons had made them odious. The People also seem'd to join in this Confederacy, which caus'd the Peers to be so peremptory in all their Conferences, that when Henry Son to the King of the Romans, refus'd to take their Oath without his Father's Consent, they plainly assur'd him, That if his Father would not join with the Baronage of England, he should not have one Foot of Land in the Nation. And lest any Thing might be omitted, they commanded the City of London to stand upon its Guard, and caus'd the Citizens to bind themselves under their publick Seal, immutably to adhere to the Baronage of England. Moreover, because several other petty Tyrants of the Nation, encourag'd by their Example, had oppress'd their Inferiors, they procur'd the King to appoint four Knights Commissioners in every Shire, to enquire into all such Injuries, and certifie the same under their Seals within a limited Time.

^{Ibid.} The Barons daily proceeded in their Methods of Reformation, in removing of Officers, punishing Offenders, and discouraging of Strangers; against the last they were more severe, because the Earl of Glocester, being reduc'd to a dangerous Weakness, had all the Symptoms of Poison, which was charg'd upon the Poictovins. This, and some other Accidents of the like nature made them very jealous and suspicious, and the declar'd Resentments of the King to the Earl of Leicester gave them no small Uneasiness. This was discover'd by chance; as the King was passing by Water from Westminster, he was surpriz'd by a violent Storm of Thunder and Lightning, of which being extremely fearful, he commanded the Barge-Men to set him on Shore at the nearest Stairs, which happen'd to be Durham House, where the Earl of Leicester then lay. The Earl hearing the King was there, immediately ran down to receive him, and finding him under some Consternation, he said, Your Majesty need not be afraid, the Storm is all over. No, Montfort, answer'd the King with a stern Look and a deep Oath, I fear not the Thunder so much as I do Thee. At which Words the Earl a little confounded, reply'd, Sir, I am sorry you should fear

Normandy quite lost from England.

In these new modell'd Times, Richard King of the Romans, desiring to see ^{M. Paris &c.} King Henry his Brother, and designing to bring such a Force as might strengthen him against his Barons, was advertis'd that the Nobility design'd to oppose him both by Sea and Land; which caus'd him to lay aside his Purpose, and to land at Dover after a private manner, with his Wife and Son, and but a small Retinue. Here he was met by the King with great Congratulations at the Sea-side, but neither of them were permitted to enter into the Castle, Because it was the principal Key of the Nation. And on the next Day, at the Chapter-House in Canterbury, before many of the Nobility, the King of the Romans was call'd by the bare Title of Richard Earl of Cornwall, and took this following Oath, That he would be faithful and diligent, together with the Barons, to reform the Kingdom of England, hitherto too much disorder'd by the Counsel of Evil Men; and would be an effectual Coadjutor to expel all Rebels and Disturbers of the Land; which Oath he would observe upon pain of losing all his Lands in England. Thus, while the Barons were in a great measure Sovereigns, and the Earl of Leicester was gone with others to make a firm League with the French, the King himself was led, or betray'd into a very dishonourable Compliance with that Nation. For the King having sail'd into France, demanded a Restitution of all those Territories that King Philip and King Lewis had taken and detain'd both from his Father and himself. The French alledg'd many Things against his Demands, but especially, That the ancient Donation of Normandy was never spontaneous, but had been forcibly extorted by Duke Rollo from the King of France. Upon this King Henry, having neither Courage to undertake, nor Money to maintain a War to recover his lost Rights, came in Person to the King of France's Parliament at Abbeville, and there made a final Peace and Agreement with that King, upon these following Conditions. 'That the King of England should resign his Right to the Dukedom of Normandy, and Earldom of Anjou, upon Payment of three hundred thousand smaller Pounds of Tourain Money: In Consideration of which King Lewis further promis'd him the Restitution of certain Territories in Gascony, of the yearly Value of twenty thousand Pounds Sterling. So that retaining all the Province of Gascony, and its Appendages, and having absolutely resign'd his Right to all the rest of the Dominions in the King of France's Possession, King Henry from thenceforward shorten'd his Stile in his Patents, Letters and Seal, and no longer call'd himself Duke of Normandy and Anjou. About this Period, Matth. Paris a Monk of St. Albans, the most celebrated Historian of this Age, ended his History of England, from which we have receiv'd great Assistance; and shortly after ended his Life.

The King endeavours to free himself.

VIII. King Henry, having for the Advantage of some present Money ^{Rish. Wals. &c.} made disadvantageous Concessions, and having freed himself from the irksome Troubles of Foreign Contentments, spent some Time in the Pleasures of the French Court at Paris, where he was splendidly entertain'd and regal'd by King Lewis, while all Things were establish'd and confirm'd after the most effectual Manner. And returning into England not long after, he began to employ all his Thoughts how to restore the Royal Power, and to throw off that Burden which the Nobility had laid upon him. In order to this he sent privately to the Pope to be absolv'd from his Oath to the Provisions of Oxford, which without any great Difficulty was obtain'd both for himself and Prince Edward; but Pope Alexander deceasing before the Dispensation could be seal'd, the King was oblig'd to stay a longer Time, till it could be confirm'd by Pope Urban his Successor. Besides this he wrote into France to King Lewis, and his Son Prince Edward, who was gone over under the Pretence of a Tournament at Paris, to provide him what Forces he could. These Matters being adjusted, the King summon'd a Council

Council or Parliament at London, he there plainly and briefly declar'd, That since by the late Provisions of Oxford, they had likewise oblig'd themselves on their Part to encrease his Revenue, and pay his Debts, of which they had perform'd neither; but instead of that, seeking their own private Interest, had rather diminish'd than increas'd his Revenues; and by putting himself under their Government, he was become more their Slave than their King; therefore they were not to wonder, if confiding no longer in their Councils, he had sought for Redress elsewhere. And shortly after he put himself into the Tower of London, together with the Queen, and then commanding the ancient Treasury to be broke open, he employ'd the Mony in the Fortifications of the Tower. Moreover, he order'd the City of London to be strengthen'd, and summon'd all the Youth of the City, from twelve Years of Age and upwards, causing them to swear Fealty to him; and commanded it to be proclaim'd, that Whoever would take up Arms under him, should be maintain'd at his Charge. These were the Grounds and Beginnings of that unhappy Civil War, which for near five Years tormented this Kingdom; which the King was the more ready to undertake, because about this Time he receiv'd from the Pope his Bull of Absolution from his Oath to the Provisions of Oxford. Upon which Account it was declar'd, That the Oath it self was unlawful, being made without his Holiness's Consent, who was his supreme Lord, and whose Vassal the King now acknowledg'd himself to be. Accordingly the King turn'd out the Barons Chancellor and chief Justiciary, and put in Walter Merton and Philip Basset in their Rooms; which occasion'd the Nobility to hasten to Arms at Winchester, where the King then was, who receiving Intelligence of their Designs by Sir John Mansel, hasten'd back to the Tower of London.

*The Beginnings

Still the War did not begin; for the King making several Concessions and Compliances, all the Contests between him and the Barons seem'd for a while to be ended; so that the King had Leisure and Opportunity to go over with his Queen into his Dominions in France, where he continu'd for a considerable Space. During his Absence the Earl of Leicester appear'd at a great Council held at London by the Justiciary Basset, where he produc'd a Brief or Letter from the Pope, wherein he confirm'd the Provisions of Oxford, and recall'd the King's Absolution, declaring He was deceiv'd in the granting of it; which shews the variable Temper of the Pope and his Court. But how much soever the Absolution was recall'd, it was shortly after re-confirm'd, and made use of by the King upon his Return into England, which was succeeded by several Acts of Hostility between Him and the Barons. The secret Confederacy with Lewellyn Prince of Wales, gave the Barons no small Incouragement, who about this Time wasted the Dominions of Prince Edward in the Marches of Wales; so that now Places were won and lost, and Prisoners taken on all Sides. Prince Edward took the Castle of Bristol, and fin'd the City a thousand Pounds. Earl Montfort, the General of the Barons, executed his greatest Revenges upon the Queen's Friends who were Foreigners; and marching forwards, recover'd Glocester Castle, enter'd Worcester and Bridgenorth; and after that surpriz'd the Isle of Ely, subduing that Fenny Country to the Barons Use. Sir John Mansel, the King's chief Counsellor, apprehending the worst, fled secretly from the Tower, where the King continu'd; and Henry Son to the King of the Romans, was taken by the Barons. In the mean Time the valiant Prince Edward fortify'd Windsor Castle, and garrison'd it with Strangers. Mutual Weariness at length begot a Desire of Peace, and the King would have yielded to the Provisions of Oxford, but the Queen shew'd her self utterly against it; which being known to the Londoners, it put the meaner Sort into such a brutish Rage, that when she was to shoot the Bridge from the Tower towards Windsor, they with Dirt, Stones and villanous Words forc'd her to return back. Prince Edward, under the Conduct of the Bishop of Worcester, came from the Castle of Bristol, and contrary to his Promise enter'd into that of Windsor; but afterwards going forth to meet Earl Montfort at Kingston, with a Design for a Treaty, the Earl got Possession of Windsor Castle, and would not permit him to depart. At London still in a Parliament assembled, Matters were in some Measure made up; and the King's Party daily grew stronger.

A. D. 1264. Reg. 42. At length the King of France was made Arbitrator in these great Contests; and the Cause was fully heard at Amiens, where he gave Judgment for the King of England against the Barons, pronouncing all the Statutes and Acts made at Oxford void; but with this Proviso, That nothing of the Charters granted by King John and the present King should be infring'd. Of which Clause the Earl of Leicester and his Party took Advantage, alledging, That the Provisions of Oxford, were only in Pursuance and Corroboration of those Charters; therefore, refusing to stand by the Arbitration, which they said contradicted it self, the War broke out more furiously than ever. The King with his Brother and Son, and a strong Force march'd to Oxford, from whence he dismiss'd all the Students, which are said to be above fifteen thousand in Number; among whom being so many young Noblemen, the King doubted of their Affections to the Barons. Upon which most of them went to Northampton, where the Barons were then powerful; to which Place the King march'd with his Army, and breaking in at the Town Walls, attack'd the Enemies, among whom the Students of Oxford had a Banner by themselves advanc'd directly against the King; and they more annoy'd him in the Battel, than the rest of the Barons. For which the King, after he had gain'd the Day, threaten'd a severe Revenge; but his Counsellors inform'd him, That they were the Sons of the Nobility and Gentry of his Kingdom; that if he should cause them to be executed, their Fathers and Relations would make a dangerous Retaliation; upon which he desisted. The King here took Simon Montfort the Younger, and fourteen other principal Barons and Knights-Bannerets, forty other Knights, besides Esquires and others. Encourag'd with this Success he advanced his Royal Standard towards Nottingham, burning and wasting the Barons Estates wherever he march'd. To divert this Storm, Earl Montfort hasten'd to London, and then made an Attempt upon Rocheſter Castle, which the Earl of Warren defended for the King. Upon which, the King turn'd his Arms, and coming to raise the Siege, took the Castle of Kingston, which belong'd to the Earl of Gloceſter; and then unexpectedly setting upon those who lay before Rocheſter, while Montfort was absent, he kill'd many and dispers'd the rest. Next he took the Castle of Tunbridge, with the Countess of Gloceſter, whom he set at Liberty; and then taking the Cinque-Ports into Favour, he settled himself for a while at Lewes in Sussex.

The King succeeds.

At Lewes the Barons sent Letters to the King protesting all Loyal Obedience to his Person, but all Hostility to their Enemies about him. To which the King return'd Answer, That they were the Cause of all the Wars and Miseries in the Nation; that their Intentions were not according to their Professions, nor their Actions agreeable to their Pretences, therefore he defy'd them. The King of the Romans, Prince Edward, and the rest of the King's Friends sent the like Letters of Defiance. Upon this, the Barons being weaker in Numbers, sent Mediators for Peace, and offer'd to pay the King thirty thousand Pounds in Consideration of Damages done in the Nation, provided That the Statutes of Oxford might stand good. But the King inrag'd at their whole Proceedings, sent a fresh Defiance to Montfort and his Accomplices; which provok'd them to do the like, and to renounce the Fealty they ow'd him. Upon this both Parties provided for an Ingagement, and as soon as the two Armies approach'd each other, a fierce Battel insu'd, and the stout Earl of Leicester, with the Body under him, and that next to him, set upon the Forces commanded by the King and his Brother; rightly judging, that if they were either defeated or taken Prisoners, the Victory would fall to the Barons. As for the noble Prince Edward, he with the Flower of his Army furiously attack'd tack'd the Londoners, who tho' very numerous, fled at the Terror of his Arms; and to revenge the Affront they had done his Mother at London Bridge, incessantly pursu'd them, and made a most miserable Slaughter of them for near four Miles together. But while his martial Rage transported him too far, the Bodies commanded by the Earls of Leicester and Glocester, having valiantly assaulted those commanded by King Henry and his Brother, in a short Time utterly routed them; so that the two Brothers being almost abandon'd in the Field, were constrain'd, after a long and brave Resistance, to surrender themselves, Henry to the Earl of Leicester, and Richard to the Earl of Glocester, who were immediately secur'd in the Priory of Lewes. Whereupon all the rest of the Men that had fled into the Town, laid down their Arms and yielded, thinking it no Dishonour to sustain the same Fate with their Masters. Prince Edward returning with his Cousin Henry from the Pursuit of the Londoners, soon found that instead of any Advantage gain'd, for the Conclusion of a Peace, both he and his Cousin must surrender themselves as Hostages.

A Battel between the King and the Barons.

The King and his Brother taken Prisoners.

Thus was Montfort Earl of Leicester in possession of two Kings and their eldest Sons; and to compleat all his Designs, he carry'd King Henry along with him, as it were on Progress, but rather in Triumph about the Country, that by the Authority of his Presence he might take in all the Places that still held out. And now having the whole Kingdom at his Disposal, he not only freed all his own Party, but also bestow'd all the great Offices of State upon his own Creatures and Relations; by which Means the King, who had now reign'd near fifty Years, signify'd little more than a Cypher; so that he could not go any where without a Keeper, but was at the Disposal of others. As for Prince Edward and his Cousin Henry, they were not us'd like Hostages, but as ordinary Prisoners, being kept in strict Custody for a Time at Wallingford, then in Dover Castle, and sometimes in other Places. Nor could all the Threats of the Pope and Court of Rome avail, to make him relinquish any Part of that Authority he had assum'd. During this Man's Usurpation, the Cinque Ports presum'd so far as to set out great Numbers of Privateers, who took all Vessels they found, as well English as Foreign, seiz'd their Goods, kill'd their Men, and threw their Bodies into the Sea: By which Means England, that usually excell'd all other Nations in Plenty of Foreign Commodities, was now become so indigent, that Wines, Salt, Iron, and all other imported Wares, rose to that excessive Rate, that they were sold at four Times their former Price: So that there being no Means either for importing or exporting of Goods, all Merchants were reduc'd to great Extremities.

Earl Montfort's Power.

These pretended Patrons of Liberty, who took up Arms to defend the Kingdom from the Tyranny of an unfortunate King, having once obtain'd his Power, fell themselves into Factions, and became as unjust and tyrannical in the Use of it, as the King they had oppos'd; and the Nation was so far from receiving Advantage by the Change, that instead of one they had now many Tyrants. But this Violence upon the Constitution could not continue long; for Montfort, grasping at an unbounded Authority, soon provok'd the Envy of the Earl of Glocester, who was to have a proportionable Share, so that it occasion'd a fatal Quarrel, and a Division of Interest; and upon this Glocester confederated with Roger Mortimer and his Associates, to whom not long after the Earls of Warren, Surry and Sussex, with several others join'd. In the mean Time a Parliament was call'd by the Power of Earl Montfort, and in the Name of the King, to meet at Westminster on the twenty second Day of January; which was the first Parliament, that, according to the Opinions of Doctor Brady, had ever two Knights for each Shire, and two Burgesses for each City and Borough, as at this Day: So that from this critical and rebellious Year the Doctor dates the Original of the House of Commons in Parliament; but with what Certainty, or Probability, may be learnt from the Works of Mr. Petit, Mr. Tyrell, Dr. Hody, and others. This Parliament was call'd upon two Accounts, counts, the One to set Prince Edward at Liberty, and to secure Earl Montfort and his Party; the Other to obtain the King's Charter of Pardon and Indemnity for all that was past. As to the first, the Prince could obtain no more than to be made a Prisoner at large; but not long after, the Breach growing still wider between Montfort and Glocester, the Prince by the Help of John Mortimer, broke loose from his Keepers at Hereford, and arriv'd safely to the Earl of Glocester's Party at Wigmore.

The Freedom of this valiant Prince soon turn'd the Face of Affairs; for he confederating with the Counties of Hereford, Worcester, Shropshire and Chester, by his solemn Oaths and Promises, obtain'd a powerful Assistance from the Earl of Glocester and many others; by which Means he soon became Master of the Cities of Worcester, Glocester and Hereford. At the same Time Earl Montfort, with Llewellyn Prince of Wales, ravag'd all their Enemies Lands in Monmouth and Glamorgan Shires. Prince Edward, and the Earl of Glocester, on the other Side halten'd to the Castle of Kenelworth, kept by Simon Earl Montfort's Son; where they intercepted the Earl of Oxford, with about thirteen Knights-Bannerets before they could reach the Castle. Here Intelligence was brought, that Montfort was return'd with the King out of South-Wales, and lay near Worcester: To which Place the Prince boldly advanc'd to give him Battel; and the Earl hearing of his Approach, incamp'd at Evesham with his whole Power. Upon the third Day of August the Heroick Prince set out from Worcester, and with great Art and Skill struck in between Earl Montfort and his Passage to Kenelworth, and then suddenly turn'd back towards Evesham; the Earl of Glocester with his Force, and the Lord Mortimer with his, moving thither by two other Ways; so that the Earl being almost surrounded, was oblig'd either to fight or yield. At first he was in Hopes that one Party belong'd to his Son, but finding it otherwise, he in a despairing Manner cry'd, Lord have Mercy upon our Souls, for our Bodies are our Enemies; yet still he resolv'd either to conquer or die. His eldest Son desiring him not to despair, since the Chance of War was doubtful, he answer'd, He only fear'd that his own and his Brother's Pride and Presumption had ruin'd them; yet still he hop'd to die for the Cause of God and Justice. However he omitted nothing in this Battel, which was very sharp and bloody, that might speak him a noble and valiant Commander, 'till first his Son, and afterwards himself was slain; at the Instant of whose Fall, there happen'd so great a Clap of Thunder, as if Heav'n it self had fought against him, and no less Power could have given him his Death. In the Battel, the King himself was wounded on the Shoulder, and near being slain, had he not cry'd out I am Henry your King! at which the Prince ran to him, and begging his Blessing, left him to a strong Guard, 'till he had ended the Battel, and gain'd a compleat Victory. Thus dy'd the celebrated Simon Montfort Earl of Leicester, whose Body was reproachfully dismember'd, and his Head sent to the Wife of Roger Mortimer. He was once in a probable Way to establish a new Race of Kings in England; but as the just Reward of his Ingratitude, as well as Ambition and Rebellion, he and all his Family perish'd and came to nothing in a few Years.

King Henry being thus restor'd to Liberty, immediately call'd a Parliament at Winchester, by the Authority of which, he seiz'd on the Charters and Privileges of the City of London, and of many other Towns for their Rebellion. All those who were taken in Battel were committed to safe Custody, and such as had join'd with Earl Montfort were fully disinherited, and a rateable Distribution made of their Estates to the King's most deserving Friends. Simon and Guy Montfort, the Earl's two Sons, were the chief of the Attainted; the Countess Dowager their Mother, and Sister to the King, being extreamly mortify'd at the fatal Losses of her Husband and eldest Son, had leave to pass over into France, where she ended her Days in a Nunnery. Simon, the eldest surviving Son,

Son, sought to preserve himself and the Remains of his Father's Misfortunes in the Isle of Axholm in Lincolnshire. The King to take all Refuge from him, march'd with a powerful Army to Northampton, with a Design to reduce him; being accompany'd by his Brother Richard, and Ottobon the Pope's Legate, lately arriv'd in England. Simon had several Friends about the King, but the Earl of Glocester, envying his Restoration to full Favour, it was at length concluded, upon his Submission, that he should live in Exile, and for his Maintenance receive only five hundred Marks per Annum. The Legate about the same Time, to hinder the Growth of any new Rebellion, excommunicated the Bishops of Winchester, Worcester, London and Chichester, for having once adher'd to Earl Montfort; and also declar'd, That the Clergy were to pay their Tenths for seven Years next ensuing to the King. But still the Castle of Kenelworth would not yield, but with a very few Defendants, after an extraordinary manner, held out half a Year's Siege against all the King's Forces; who at length gave the Garrison their Lives and Liberties, as also all the rich Plunder they had taken from the adjacent Country before the Siege.

The Barons
decline.

To put an End to all Troubles, the most moderate Men were desirous that the King should pardon all Offences, and restore the Lands of the Disinherited upon certain reasonable Fines: Which Proposition found a great Enemy of Roger Mortimer, who had by the King's Donation gain'd much of their Land; which so mov'd the Earl of Glocester to Indignation and Distrust, that he withdrew himself from the Court in great Discontent. Not long after, being more and more disoblig'd, he sent his Messenger to the King desiring him To remove all Strangers from his Presence, to see that the Provisions of Oxford were observ'd through his Kingdom, and to keep such Promises as he had made at Evesham. In the mean Time the chief Out-laws and disinherited Men, had got Possession of the Isle of Ely, from whence they made many Incursions and Devastations. To end these Mischiefs, all, except Earl Montfort's Sons and the Earl of Derby, were offer'd to be put to Ransom, and for certain Fines to be restor'd to their Lands; but they requir'd to have them all without Redemption, and complain'd to the King and the Legate of many Grievances. When Proposals had no better Effect, the King and Prince Edward besieg'd the Isle of Ely on all Sides. Which being known to the Earl of Glocester, tho' he had promis'd under his Seal not to take up Arms against the King but in his own Defence, he gather'd an Army out of Wales in Favour of the Disinherited, march'd up to the City of London, and by the Consent of the Citizens took full Possession of it, commanding also the Pope's Legate, who lodg'd in the Tower, to surrender it to him. Yet shortly after a Peace was fully concluded, by the Mediation of the King of the Romans and the Lord Philip Basset; and the Earl of Glocester bound himself in a Bond of ten thousand Marks, never to raise any Disturbance again. Lewellyn Prince of Wales, who had greatly supported Earl Montfort's Rebellion, for thirty two thousand Pounds was restor'd to four Cantreds, which the King had taken from him in the War, and fully reconcil'd. And the Rebels in the Isle of Ely shortly after submitting to the noble Prince Edward, the Barons War ended, after it had above five Years afflicted the sinful Nation; in which, while they violently struggled for Superiority, both Sides were great Sufferers, according to the frequent Events of Civil Wars.

under the Title of The Statutes of Marlborough; in which among many other Things, Magna Charta and Charta Foresta were again confirm'd. In the midst of this Peace, by the solemn Preaching of Ottobon the Pope's Legate, the King's Sons, Prince Edward and Earl Edmund his Brother, as also Henry eldest Son to the King of the Romans, with the Earls of Glocester, Warren and Pembroke, and about one hundred and twenty other Knights, being touch'd with the great Losses in the Holy-Land, all receiv'd the Cross at the Hands of the Legate, and devoted themselves to this Employment. In the following Year, the Prince went over into France to join with King Lewis in the Holy War, who for his Provision in that Expedition lent him thirty thousand Marks; for the Security of which the Prince mortgag'd Gascony to him. But before he enter'd upon the Journey, he return'd to England, and assisted in the Ceremony of the Translation of the Relicks of Edward the Confessor into a richer Shrine: For which the King had summon'd all the Prelates and Nobility of England, besides the richest Men in all the Cities and Boroughs of England, to render the Solemnity more illustrious. These being all assembled, with an infinite Confluence of People, the King himself and his Brother Richard began the Ceremony, by taking up St. Edward's Coffin upon their Shoulders; to which also the Princes Edward and Edmund, with divers Earls and Barons, lent their Hands: And being so carry'd, the Bones or Relicks were plac'd in a noble Shrine of Gold, adorn'd with precious Stones, which was then set in a high and eminent Place with the utmost Reverence, where it continu'd many Years.

The Prince did not depart out of England 'till the latter End of the following Year; before which Time, on the thirteenth Day of May, several of the Bishops came to St. Paul's Church, and there caus'd the Bull of Pope Honorius the Third to be publicly read, by which he confirm'd the Charters of Liber-ties and Forests, which had been granted by this King in the Beginning of his Reign; and at the same Time solemnly excommunicated all Infringers of those Charters, as had been formerly publish'd in Westminster-Hall, in the Year 1253. Not long after, the Earl of Warren and Surrey, and Alan Lord Zouche, having a great Suit in Westminster-Hall, the former set upon the latter in open Court and mortally wounded him; for which he was fin'd five thousand Pounds to the King, and two thousand to the Family of the Lord Zouche. About the middle of August, the Heroick Prince Edward, with his Princess Eleanor, left England, and winter'd in Sicily; where he was so intent upon his Holy Expedition, that when he understood that his chief Support the King of France was dead, and afterwards, that the greatest Part of his Fleet was lost by a Storm, and when he was dissuaded from the Attempt by all about him, he swore a solemn Oath, That tho' all deserted him, he would go, if he were attended only by his Groom. Accordingly in the following Spring he arriv'd in the Holy-Land, reliev'd the Town of Acon, and after that perform'd many noble Actions and great Enterprizes, to the great Damage of the Saracens, and his own lasting Renown. So that in a short Time he became so formidable to his Enemies, that some of their Commanders dishonourably sent a desperate Assassin, who under the Pretence of treating with him, stabb'd him with a poison'd Dagger; of which by Providence he escap'd with great Torment, and extreamest Danger. And here we are told of an admirable Instance of Conjugal Love in his Princess Eleanor; who is said to have suck'd out the Venom of the Wound with her own Lips, and by that means sav'd his Life: But of this we have no great Certainty. Not long after she was deliver'd of a Daughter, in the City of Acon, who from the Place of her Birth was nam'd Joan de Acres, and was afterwards marry'd to Gilbert Earl of Glocester.

In the mean Time his Father King Henry liv'd at Ease and Quietness, during his declining Years, very different from his Father King John: Yet in the last of his Reign he was afflicted with the Death of his Brother Richard King of the Romans, once accounted the richest Prince in Europe. And shortly after he

he was extremely disturb'd by a violent Contest between the Citizens and the Monks of Norwich, which increas'd to that Degree, that the former set Fire to the Cathedral Church, which together with the adjoining Monastery and Buildings, were all consum'd to the Ground; and they sacrilegiously carry'd away all the Holy Vessels and their Books which escap'd the Flames. The King highly mov'd at this Outrage and Impiety, sent down Justiciary Trivet to Norwich, who convicted great Numbers of the Offenders, and condemn'd them to be drawn at Horses Tails and hang'd; and soon after came in Person, who when he beheld the Ruins of the Cathedral, he could scarce refrain from Tears. The Bishop of Rochester excommunicated all that were concern'd in the Fact, and the King condemn'd the Community of the City to pay three thousand Marks, towards the Rebuilding of the Church, besides ten Pounds in Gold, and the Value of a hundred Pounds in Silver for a Golden Cup. The King in his Return to London, reposing himself at the Abby of St. Edmund's Bury, was there seiz'd with a languishing Distemper that never left him. Getting with great Difficulty to London, he there perform'd all those Religious Offices then thought necessary for a dying Man, and order'd by his Will that his Goods should first discharge his Debts, and the rest be given to the Poor; after which he dy'd on the twentieth Day of November, and the sixty sixth Year of his Age, after a very tedious and inglorious Reign of fifty six Years, one Month, and four Days. His Body, array'd in Royal Robes and the Crown on his Head, was two Days after carry'd by the chief Nobility in solemn mournful Pomp, and bury'd in the Church of Westminster, before the High Altar, near the Shrine of Edward the Confessor, where his Tomb with his Statue in Brals remains to this Day.

A great Disturbance in Norwich.

King Henry dies.

This Reign, which was the longest of any of the Kings of England, affords us great Variety and numerous Instances of an infirm and distemper'd State, occasion'd both by the Inequality of the Prince's Management, and the Impatience of a turbulent Nobility. As to the King's Person, he was of middle Stature, of a strong Body, and well proportion'd; but as to his Mind, he was so variable and uncertain, that it is hard to give a just Account of him. We find that he was naturally wilful and passionate, easily provok'd to Anger, and as easily appeas'd; fickle and unconstant both in his Love and Hatred; for he never had so great a Favourite, but he threw him into Disgrace, nor so great an Enemy, but he receiv'd him into Favour. He was by Nature easie and merciful, so that if he acted too rigorously in any Thing, it is to be imputed to his chief Ministers who had a full Ascendent over him; for he was scarce ever Sui Juris, being always under the Government of others, and too often of Strangers. And indeed it may justly be said of him, that he was a much better Man than a King and Governor; for tho' he oppress'd his Subjects with unreasonable Taxes, often broke his Coronation Oath, and as often violated his own Charters (for which he never miss'd of Punishment) yet he was nevertheless remarkable for his Devotion towards God, his Charity towards the Poor, and his Chastity as to himself. As to the former, he us'd to prefer Prayers before Sermons, alledging, That he had rather converse with his Friend, than hear from him. As to his Charities, Lewellyn Prince of Wales was wont to say, That he more dreaded the Power of his Alms, than all his Forces and Clergy together, and his Chastity has been celebrated by several Writers, as being a Virtue too rare in Princes, and unknown to all his Predecessors of the Norman Race besides William I. But as for personal Valour and Courage, he was not much noted; his greatest Happiness was in his admirable Son, who ended all Civil Troubles, and afterwards by his Prudence and Fortitude rais'd the English Monarchy to a great Part of its ancient Glory.

His Character.

In this Reign, Stealing of Cattel, which before was but pecuniary, is said to have been first made Capital; and as to Weights and Measures, some of them were by Law fix'd thus: An English Penny call'd a Sterling, round and without

out Clipping was to weigh thirty two Wheat Corns taken out of the midst of the Ear; and twenty Pennies were to make an Ounce, twelve Ounces one Pound, eight Pounds a Gallon of Wine, and eight Gallons a London Bushel, the eighth Part of a Quarter. In the forty first Year of this Reign, the King coin'd a Penny of pure Gold of the Weight of two Sterlings, and commanded that it should pass for twenty Shillings; which was the first Piece of Gold we find was coin'd in England.

Thus we have gone through with eight Kings of the Norman Race, of whom the six first were Heroes and valiant Warriors, and the seventh no despicable Soldier. And of these eight, only Richard I. had a certain and unquestionable Right to the Crown of England, if we reckon according to the strict Rules of Hereditary Succession; for all the rest came to the Throne when there was a nearer Heir living.

^{viv.} IN the two last Reigns the Monarchy of England was extremely debas'd and dishonour'd, as well by intestine Convulsions, as foreign Losses; but now it began again to raise its Head, and to display its Grandeur, by Means of the renowned Prince Edward, firnam'd Longshanks, from the Tallness of his Stature, and the Celerity of his Motions. The Spirit and Abilities of this Prince appear'd in the Beginning of his Actions under his Father, after the great Defeat he gave the Barons at Evesham; the Prosecution of the disinherited Opposers; the exposing of his Person to all Hazards and Labours; his single Combate with Adam Gurdon the valiant Out-Law; and his noble Adventures and Attempts in the East: And finally his great Experience in the Affairs of the World, with the Vigour of his Age, which was now the thirty fourth Year, might well presage what an able Master he would prove in the Management of them. Therefore upon the Death of King Henry, John Earl of Warren and Gilbert Earl of Glocester, with the Clergy and Laity, went to the great Altar in the Church of Westminster, and swore Fealty to his First-Born Son Edward, then in the Holy-Land, not knowing whether he was living. Shortly after the Nobility of the Nation met at the new Temple

Upon the Feast of St. Hilary, a Convention of the States was summon'd to settle the Peace of the Kingdom 'till he should return, consisting not only of the Lords, but of four Knights for every Shire, and as many Citizens for every City, as the Waverly Annals assure us; in which it was provided, that there should be no Itinerant Judges, except only of the Bench, 'till the King's Return.

leaves the Holy Land.

During these Provisions at home, Prince Edward, being disappointed of his promis'd Succours, left the Holy-Land, and return'd to Sicily, where he was honourably receiv'd by Charles King of that Island. Here, to the Memory of that filial Duty and Affection rare in Princes, we are assur'd, that the Death of his Son and Heir coming first to his Knowledge, and soon after of the King his Father, he express'd much greater Sorrow at the Latter than the Former; and when the King of Sicily admired at his Behaviour, he answer'd, That the Loss of Children might be retriev'd by the Birth of others, but the Loss of Parents was irreparable. From Sicily he was by the King conducted to the Roman Court, where he spent some Time with Pope Gregory the Tenth, his Friend and familiar Acquaintance in the Holy-Land; and from thence he pass'd into Burgundy, where at the Foot of the Mountains, some English Bishops, Abbots, Earls and Barons met him, with all the Marks of Duty and Affection. Here, being challeng'd in a Tournament by the stout and fierce Earl of Chabloun, he highly signaliz'd his personal Strength and Valour by the Conquest of his potent Adversary. From thence, passing into France, he was receiv'd with great Honour by King Philip his Cosen-German, to whom he did Homage for the Hereditary Lands held of him, and receiv'd formal Possession of them. Then taking his Leave of the King and Peers of France, he went into Gascony to receive the Homage and Service of his Subjects there, in which he found much Opposition from several; but chiefly from Gaston Viscount of Bearn, who because a Predecessor of his had sworn Fealty to the King of Arragon, he utterly deny'd his Homage. Upon which King Edward seiz'd upon his Person, and kept him Prisoner among his Retinue, from whence making his Escape, he was driven out of his Country; and upon an Appeal to King Philip, as Sovereign Lord of Gascony, he in favour of King Edward, compell'd Gaston to hold his Lands of him.

He arrives in England.

His Coronation.

In the second Year of his Reign, having settled his Affairs beyond Sea, he took Shipping at Boloign, and landed in England on the twenty fifth Day of July; where the two Earls of Glocester and Warren receiv'd him with greater State than any others, conducting him to their Castles of Tunbridge and Rigate, where they feasted and entertain'd him with great Magnificence for many Days. On the nineteenth Day of August, he and his Queen Eleanor, his faithful Associate in all his Travels and Hazards, were solemnly crowned at Westminster by Rober Kilwarby Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, in the Presence of Queen Eleanor the King's Mother, Alexander King of Scotland, John Duke of Bretaign, and Multitudes of the Nobility and others: Where for the more royal Celebration of this grand Feast, and Honour of so martial a King, there were five hundred great Horses let loose, for the Benefit of any that could catch them. Towards the Middle of October, the King issu'd out Writs of Inquiry by the Oaths of twelve legal Men, to two Commissioners in every County, to inquire what his Royalties, and the Liberties and Prerogatives of his Crown were, who were his Tenants in Capite, and Military Service, and how many and what Fees they held of him; Of his Tenants in ancient Demeasns, how how they behav'd themselves, and in what Condition their Farms were; Of Sheriffs, Coroners, Escheators, Bayliffs and their Clerks, whether they had extorted Mony from any Man, by reason of their Office, had injur'd any Man, or receiv'd Bribes for Negligence or Remifness; with all other Matters relating to the Benefit of the Publick.

During the Establishment of these Affairs in England, the final Extinction of the Principality and Government of Wales began to draw near; but still like the Movement of all great Transactions, by Length of Time, and gradual Approaches. The Original began at King Edward's Coronation, at which Time the King sent for Lewellyn Prince of Wales to attend at the Solemnity, and pay him Homage; but he making some Excuses, was for that Reason admonish'd to repair to the King's Parliament to be held the following Year at Westminster. At which Time also he refus'd to appear, fearing the King's former Displeasure in his Father's Reign, and alledging, He was in Danger as to his Person; but directing his Excuse to the two Arch-Bishops and their Suffragans, he profess'd his Readiness to acknowledge the King, If he would send a Commission for taking his Oath and Fealty; or if he would appoint some indifferent Place, or if he would give his Son, the Earl of Gloucester and his Chancellor for Hostages of Security. The King, dissembling the Arrogancy of the Demand for the present, proceeded in the Business of his Parliament, and made excellent Laws both for Church and State, and for the Ease and Benefit of both; which are call'd The first Statutes of Westminster. But after the Parliament was dissolv'd, the King took up a Resolution to seize upon the whole Fee of Prince Lewellyn, for his Denial of Homage; and made his Preparations accordingly. In the Beginnings of which, he met with a fair Prospect of Success by a considerable Prize, which four Ships of Bristol took about the Isles of Scilly, in which the Daughter of the great Montfort Earl of Leicester, who was just given in Marriage to Lewellyn, and her Brother Aimerick were surpriz'd; but the found honourable Usage from the King, her near Kinsman. Upon this Lewellyn sent Ambassadors to obtain a Peace, and to propose a Ransom for his intended Wife; but the King refus'd both, unless he would restore the Lands which he had seiz'd and invaded in the Marches to the just Proprietors, and repair the Castles in England which he had destroy'd. The Prince not complying, the King sent Forces to secure the English Frontiers from the Devastations of the Welsh; but those proving insufficient, in the fifth Year of his Reign, he issu'd out his Writs to all the Nobility and others that held of him by military Service to appear at Worcester at a certain Day. And for the better Management of publick Affairs, the Courts of the Exchequer and the King's Bench were remov'd for a while from Westminster to Shrewsbury, that they might be near the King's Person. Having got a sufficient Army the valiant King march'd towards Wales, and in his Passage cut a large and spacious Way through a vast Wood into Lewellyn's Country, where he built the two Castles of Flint and Rothelan. Then seizing on the Welshmen's Lands and Goods, he wasted their Country, and drove them into their usual Place of Retreat, the Mountains of Snowdon; and with the Assistance of the Men of the Five Ports, he in a short Time took the Isle of Anglesey.

At length Prince Lewellyn finding himself unable to resist so potent an Adversary, desired a Peace, which was granted him upon very hard Conditions; the principal of which shows the Welsh to have had greater Riches in Possession at this Time, than after Ages would readily believe. For one Article was, That Lewellyn should pay fifty thousand Pounds at the King's Pleasure; and another, That he should hold the Isle of Anglesey in Fee-Farm of the King, for himself and his Heirs, upon the Payment of five Thousand Marks ready Money, and a thousand Marks annual Rent. The rest of the Articles amounted to as much as a Conquest, or Dissolution of the Principality of Wales, after Lewellyn's Decease, who was to enjoy it during Life, upon certain Conditions.

For the Ratification of all which, Lewellyn granted a sufficient Number of Hostages, and also oblig'd himself to make Satisfaction to his three Brothers, Owen, Roderick and David; the two former of whom he had imprison'd, and the last he had forc'd to fly into England, where he had receiv'd the Honour of Knighthood, and many Favours from the King. After which, King Edward to show his Generosity and Greatness, releas'd the Prince from the greatest Part of the Sums promis'd, and freely restor'd him his design'd Spouse, honouring his Nuptials with his own Presence, and that of the Queen.

A. D. As the King enlarg'd his Dominions in England, so he gain'd some Territories in France, as particularly the Earldom of Ponthieu in Picardy, which fell to his Queen by the Death of her Mother the Queen of Castile, who was also Countess of Ponthieu. Upon which Account he went into France with his Queen, and at Amiens did Homage to King Philip for that and other Lands in Gascony, of which he deliver'd to him the perpetual Possession; for which King Edward resign'd all his Right to the Dukedom of Normandy, reserving only thirty Livres of Paris to be annually paid out of the Exchequer. At his Return into England, he took great Care of the Coin of the Nation, which had been much debas'd by frequent Clippings and Counterfeits; and to put a Stop to this Mischief, in November, all the Jews in England were taken and imprison'd in one Day, and being legally try'd, no less than two hundred and eighty of both Sexes were hang'd, besides great Numbers that were fin'd. The King also held a Parliament, in which to diminish the exorbitant Power of the Ecclesiasticks, the first Statute of Mortmain was enacted. And to regulate the Disorders in the Church, a Council or Synod was held at Reading by John Peckham, lately made Arch-Bishop of Canterbury; in which it was determin'd among other Things That no Clergy-Man should have above one Benefice with the Cure of Souls. As the State-Councils in the late Reign first began to be call'd Parliaments, so the Ecclesiastical Councils or Synods seem to have begun about this Time to be call'd Convocations. And this present Convocation is the first Time that the Diocesan Clergy appear to have been represented by Proctors of their own chusing; before which they gave Procuratorial Letters to their Arch-

A. D. Deacons. About the same Time the King wanting Money, found out a new Project for his purpose; namely, That whereas he was chief Lord of many Manors and Possessions, he well understood that partly by Length of Time, and partly by Casualties during the late Civil Wars, many Mens Deeds and Evidences were lost or destroy'd; therefore under Colour of putting the Statute of *Quo warrant*o, enacted this Year at Glocester, in Execution, he commanded by Proclamation, That all such as held any Lands or Tenements of him, should come and shew their Titles, which if defective, were to be redeem'd by large Sums of Money. This Proclamation was look'd upon as very insidious, and a great Hardship upon many, yet several were oblig'd to comply to their great Damage; but when the bold Earl of Warren was call'd before the King's Justiciaries, and demanded by what Right he held his Lands, he drew out a large rusty Sword and declar'd, That he held them by that Instrument, and by that would hold them till Death. This free and open Declaration, together with the Discontents of many interested People, induc'd this wise King in a short Time to desist from his Design.

A. D. Tho' the noble King Edward had endeavour'd to gain the Welsh more by his Munificence than his Power, and had treated Lewellyn with a Generosity beyond all Expectation; yet the natural Desire of a full Liberty, and the fond Belief of Merlin's Prophecy That this Prince should wear the Diadem of Brute, had such Effects upon that Nation, that they again betook themselves to Arms. David, who had receiv'd many Favours and Honours from King Edward, was the principal Agent, for joining with his Brother Lewellyn, he suddenly surpriz'd the Lord Clifford, the King's Justiciary in Wales, kill'd many of his Servants, wounded, bound and sent him Prisoner to the Mountain of Snowdon.

The Welsh rebel.

Snowdon, and then committed great Devastations, and destroy'd the Marches. The King hearing the News of this Revolt, at first doubted the Truth of it, but upon better Information, he prepar'd his Army to march into Wales; but before he join'd with his Men, he made a Visit to his Mother at a Nunnery in Ambresbury, who with great Satisfaction entertain'd him with the Presence of a Man who pretended to have had his Sight restor'd at the Tomb of his Father Henry. But the King well knowing the Party, to her great Displeasure declar'd, That he so well knew the Justice of his Father, that he would rather pull out the Eyes of such a wicked Impostor, than restore them to their Sight. From thence marching into Wales with his Army, he built a large Bridge of Vessels over the River Menay, opposite to Bangor, possess'd himself of the Country about Snowdon, and gave many Shares of those Lands to his Barons, and others who had faithfully assisted him. Over this Bridge many of the Nobility of the King's Party pass'd out of Anglesey to view and observe the Country; but being terrify'd with the Multitude and Noise of the Welsh coming upon them, by too hasty a Return, they were unfortunately drown'd in their Passage. The Welsh encourag'd by this Accident, which they look'd upon as a Miracle, excited their Prince with the Notion of Merlin's Prophecy, and engag'd him to come down from the Mountains into the Plains, with the greatest Part of his Forces. This Counsel prov'd fatal to him, for being shortly after attack'd by King Edward's Forces, his Army was defeated, and he himself was slain, and his Head was sent to King Edward, who order'd it to be ignominiously crown'd with Ivy, and to be set upon the Tower of London.

Llewellyn the last Prince, slain.

This was the End of Llewellyn, the last Sovereign Prince of Wales, of the most noble and ancient Family in Europe; with whom the Liberty of that Nation did shortly after expire. For the Welsh being now dishearten'd and confounded, it was not long before the valiant Edward made himself Master of the greatest Part of the Country; reserving to himself the Port Towns and Forts towards the Sea, and distributing the Inland Parts to the Lords his Followers. In which he wisely follow'd the Methods of Augustus, who thus under the specious Pretext of a Defence for the Provinces, had the command of all their Forces at his Pleasure. Nevertheless the whole Flame was not yet extinguish'd, for David the Prince's Brother, and chief Incendiary in this fatal Contest, was still with some Forces at large. This Man being at length taken and brought to King Edward at the Castle of Rotinlan could not obtain the Favour of his Speech or Sight, but was immediately sent away Prisoner to Shrovsbury; where a Parliament being summon'd, after a legal and judicial Trial, the King caus'd David to be put to a terrible Death, by Hanging, Beheading and Quartering; his Head being set up at London, and his Quarters at Bristol, Northampton, York and Winchester, to be a Terror to all ingrateful and disloyal Persons: A manifold Execution, and the first of that Kind in this Kingdom, in the Person of a Prince's Son, or any Nobleman we find in our History. The Welsh Line thus extinct, King Edward upon the twenty fifth Day of April had a Son born at Caernarvon in this Country, who was also call'd Edward and reign'd after him, being the first of the Sons of the Kings of England that had the Title of Prince of Wales. And that the Welsh might be inur'd to new Laws, with the Birth of a new Lord, King Edward, after the Example of his Grand-father King John in Ireland, establish'd all the English Laws and Offices amongst them. Thus came Wales, that small Portion left to the ancient Britains, to be subject to the Crown of England: And it is wonderful that it should so long subsist against so great a Power; having had but small Assistance from others, no Strength by Sea, no Alliances or Intelligence with Princes out of this Isle; and being so often invaded, so often distress'd, so eagerly pursu'd, by almost every King of England, and thought to have been by many of them subdu'd, it must needs show the real Worthiness of the Nation, and their noble Courage in preserving their ancient Liberty.

After the King had establish'd the Welsh Affairs, he kept a solemn Christmass at Bristol, which none of the English Kings had done before; and from thence went to London, from whence he had been almost three Years absent. Not long after he seiz'd upon the Privileges of the City, discharg'd the present Mayor, and put another in his Room; because, as we are told, he had taken Bribes of the Bakers, and suffer'd them to sell Bread that wanted six or seven Ounces Weight in a Penny Loaf. The King also held a Parliament at Westminster, in which the Statutes call'd Additamenta Glocestriæ were enacted, or rather the Statutes of Westminster the Second. About which Time all the new Work in the Abby Church of Westminster was compleatly finish'd, which had been begun above sixty Years before. In the succeeding Year the Jews in one Night were generally apprehended, and kept in strict Custody throughout all Parts of England, till they had purchas'd their Liberty from the Crown. It is reported that the Commons of England granted to the King the fifth Part of all their Moveables, to procure the Banishment of all the Jews from the Land; but this subtle Generation, to defeat all their Designs, presented the King with such large Sums of Mony, as stopp'd the Execution.

violent Contest arose between the Lord Pain Tiptoft, Governor of some Castles in Wales, and a Welsh Knight call'd Rees ap Meridoc; insomuch that several Skirmishes were fought between them, to the great Disturbance of the whole Country. Upon which King Edward wrote out of France to the said Rees, requiring him to keep the Peace till his Return, when he should receive reasonable Satisfaction; but Rees having already taken up Arms, resolv'd to revenge his own Cause, and by the Assistance of great Numbers of his Countrymen, burnt and destroy'd many Towns in Wales. These Ravages so far increas'd, that the King thought fit to send to the Earl of Cornwall his Lieutenant in England, requiring him to march with an Army into Wales, to suppress the Attempts of those People. Accordingly the Earl, with some other Noblemen, enter'd Wales with a sufficient Power, and pursuing the Forces of Rees, dispers'd them, and destroy'd several of his Castles; but by Undermining the Walls of the Castle of Drujan, the Baron Stafford, the Lord Montchensy, with many knights and Esquires were bruise'd to Death by the Fall of them. In the next Year Rees renew'd his violent Attempts, and gather'd together a numerous Force; upon which the Lord Tiptoft, Deputy of Wales, with what English Troops he could procure in a short Time, march'd directly to oppose him. Rees understanding that the English were far less in Number, did not doubt of Success, and fell down upon them with great Fury and Precipitation; but at length the Valour and Conduct of the English prevail'd, so that Rees himself was taken Prisoner, and the greatest Part of his Men, to the Number of four thousand, were cut in Pieces. Thus were the Welshmen chastis'd for their rebellious Insurrection; and Rees himself was brought to York, where in the following Year he suffer'd the new introduc'd Execution of being hang'd, drawn and quarter'd.

At length, after a full Establishment of the Affairs in France, and above three Years Continuance in that Country, King Edward with his Queen return'd into England, to the great Joy and Satisfaction of the Nation. Shortly after, like a Father of his Country, he undertook to purge the Land from all Corruptions and Oppressions of his Officers, and because several of his Justiciaries had to enrich themselves taken Bribes, and perverted Judgment, he took care to punish them according to the Nature of their Crimes, and not only remov'd them with all the Marks of Dishonour, but also laid severe Fines upon them. We have the Names of twelve that were found guilty, among whom Sir Thomas Weyland, the King's chief Justiciary, and Adam de Stratton, were principal; the former had all his Goods confiscated, and also suffer'd Banishment, and the latter was oblig'd to pay a Fine of no less than three hundred and twenty thousand Marks. After this the King compell'd all his Justiciaries to take an Oath that from that Time, they would take no Pension, Fee or Present from any Man, but only the Civility of an ordinary Breakfast. Then calling a Parliament, the Statutes of Westminster the Third were enacted; at which Time it was decreed that all the Jews should quit the Nation, in Consideration of which the Parliament gave the King a Fifteenth upon all Goods. Upon which all the Jews were for ever banish'd out of the King's Dominions, and could by no Methods obtain leave to return: All their immoveable Goods were confiscated, with their Bonds and Tallies; but their Moveables, Gold, Silver and Jewels, were allow'd them, and they had Liberty to carry them away with them. In the same Year the King, in a Journey towards Scotland, lost his most beloved Confort, the incomparable Queen Eleanor, who had been his inseparable Attendant in all his Travels, Dangers and Labours. She dy'd at Hareby near Bullenbroke in Lincolnshire; her Bowels were bury'd in our Lady's Chapel in the Cathedral of Lincoln, and her Body in the Abby Church of Westminster, at the Feet of King Henry the Third. The King with extream Grief and Sorrow attended her Corps from Lincolnshire to Westminster, erecting stately Crosses at Lincoln, Grantham, Stamford, Northampton, Waltham, Cheapside, Charing, and in all other Places, where the Body rested, to the renown'd Memory of this most admirable Wife, and excellent Queen.

III. In these Times a terrible Storm began to threaten the Realm of Scotland, which prov'd much to the Diminution of the Name and Authority of that Kingdom, and no less to the aggrandising the Reign of King Edward; and which was introduc'd, as Boetius tells us, with formidable Prefages, as extraordinary Meteors, Floods, Fires and Pestilence. The Beginning of it was occasion'd by the Death of Alexander King of Scotland, who in the Year 1285 lost his Life by a Fall off his Horse, and left his Kingdom without any Heir, besides one young Grand-Child nam'd Margaret, Daughter to Eric King of Norway; upon which the Government of the Kingdom was manag'd by particular Guardians for about five Years. But the young Princess Margaret, whom King Edward had design'd for his Son's Wife, dying this present Year, there arose no less than twelve Pretenders to the Right of the Crown of Scotland, besides Eric King of Norway, which put the Nation into a great Confusion. The Names of the twelve were John Baliol, Robert Brus, Florence Earl of Holland, Partrick Dunbar Earl of Marche, William Vescy, William Ros, Robert Pinkny, Nicolas Soules, Patrick Galighty, Roger Mundevil, John Comyn, and John Hastings. Upon this Contest and Disturbance, King Edward, as Superior and direct Lord of Scotland, call'd a Parliament at Norham in the Confines of that Kingdom, and went thither in Person to determine the Controverſie about the Right of Succession between all the Competitors. The Account of which important Transaction we have from undoubted Records publish'd at large by Mr. Pryn, which discover several Mistakes or Defects both in the Scotch and English Historians.

In the nineteenth Year of this Reign, and the tenth Day of May, by King Edward's Command the Nobility, Prelates and Community of the Kingdoms of England and Scotland met at Norham; where Roger Brabancon, the King's Justiciary, in the King's Name, publicly declar'd to the whole Assembly the Reason of his Majesty's Coming, and of their Summons to that Place, That his Majesty taking notice of the Confusions of Scotland since the Death of Alexander their last King and his Progeny, out of the Affection he had for them and all the Inhabitants, whose Safety and Protection was well known to belong to him, for the doing Justice to all that claim'd the Kingdom, and for the Preservation of the Publick Peace, he appear'd there: And likewise, without Usurpation or Diminution of their Liberties, to shew them his Superiority and Direct Dominion out of divers undoubted Chronicles and Monuments, and to demand their Assent, and Recognition of his Authority. Upon this Declaration, the Nobility and Representatives of Scotland requir'd Time to consult with their absent Members, which the King granted only 'till the next Day; when meeting again, they press'd for a longer Time to answer to his Demand concerning their Recognition of his Superiority and Direct Dominion over the Kingdom of Scotland, which he had declar'd to be his Right. Upon Deliberation, the King appointed the second Day of June, on which Day They were positively to answer his Demand, and if they had any Writings, Evidences or Antiquities that might exclude him from the Right and Exercise of his Superiority and Direct Dominion, or overthrow his Reasons and Arguments for it, they were then to exhibit them openly; protesting, That he was ready to grant what Law and Justice had establish'd. And that they might the better understand his Title, and make their Objections against it, the Bishop of Durham was appointed to declare to the Assembly, That the Arguments the King design'd to use were Historical, and taken from the Writings of Marianus Scotus, William of Malmesbury, Roger de Hoveden, Henry de Huntington, Ralph de Diceto, and Matthew Paris, implying, 'That the Scots had been conquer'd by several of the English Saxon Kings; That several of their Kings had submitted, sworn Fealty, done Homage to them, and receiv'd the Crown and Kingdom from them; and that the Scots had also submitted and been govern'd by such Kings, as the other had plac'd over them; and lastly after the Norman Conquest, the very same Thing had been acted, acknowledg'd and submitted to, in all the several Reigns since that Revolution.

Upon the second Day of June, the Nobility and Community of Scotland, met in a green Plain over-against Norham Castle, where King Edward resided; together with those Noblemen who claim'd the Kingdom. Upon which the Bishop of Bath was sent to demand of them in the King's Name, What they had done since the last Meeting, and whether they would exhibit or propound any Thing that could or ought to exclude the King of England from the Right and Exercise of the Superiority and Direct Dominion of Scotland; protesting in the Name of his Master, that he would favourably hear them, allow what was just, and report their Answer to him and his Council. Being often requir'd, and they alledging nothing to the contrary, the Bishop reported the Substance of what had been said and urg'd for the King of England's Title, and what had been transacted in these several Meetings, and then declar'd to them, That the King would make use of his Right of Superiority and Direct Dominion in Scotland, in deciding the Controversie between the several Competitors for that Kingdom. Then beginning with Robert Brus, one of the twelve Claimers, he ask'd him in the Presence of all, Whether in claiming the said Right, he would demand and receive Justice before the King of England, as Superior and Direct Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland; who publicly, expressly and without Contradiction, answer'd, That he did acknowledge the King of England to be Superior and Direct Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland, and as such he would before him demand and receive Justice. The same Answer was return'd by all the rest rest of the Competitors, who did not only make this publick Recognition, but also set their Hands and Seals to a certain Instrument, still upon Record, in which they declar'd That to the King of England belong'd the Sovereign Seignury of the Kingdom of Scotland, and the Cognizance of hearing, trying and determining their Right; and that they would keep firm and stable to his Act and Determination.

^{ibid.} This done, King Edward and his Council treated with the Scotch Nobility and Competitors about a Method of Proceedings, and the Reformation of the State of the Nation: And it was unanimously agreed by both Kingdoms, That John Baliol and John Comyn should chuse forty Persons, and Robert Brus as many, whose Names within three Days should be deliver'd to the King, to whom he was to add twenty four, more or less, who should hear and discuss the Rights of all the Pretenders, and to make a faithful Report to him, That he might give the definitive Sentence. But because for want of Possession the King had not full Power to put his Sentence in Execution, on the fourth Day of June, by a second Instrument the Competitors, with the Consent of the Community of the Nation, gave him actual Possession of the Kingdom and Castles of Scotland. In which it was declar'd That they did it freely and without Compulsion; that as Sovereign Lord they had given King Edward Seisin of all the Land and Strength of Scotland, upon Condition That he should restore all Things as he had found them, within two Months after he had determin'd the Right of Succession; saving to the Crown of England, the Homage of him that shall be King. On the fifth of June, the Names of the Eighty elected to examine and report the Rights of the Competitors, were deliver'd to the King; and on the sixth, they were order'd to appoint the Day and Place for hearing and discussing their Right. Berwick upon Tweed was appointed for the Place; but not agreeing upon the Day, the King as superior Lord, by the Consent of both Nations, appointed the second of August, as a peremptory Day for the Competitors to plead their Rights and Titles. On the eleventh Day of June, all the Guardians of the Kingdom, with the Governors of the Castles, deliver'd up their Guardianships and Offices to the King as superior Lord; which when he had receiv'd, he committed the Charge of the Kingdom to the same Persons, to govern it under him, and in his Name. This being finish'd, the next Day, all Persons present, both Ecclesiastical and Civil, who were oblig'd to swear Fealty to their own King, did it in a solemn Manner to King Edward, as superior and direct Lord of Scotland, in a Green Plain within the Bounds of that Kingdom. From that Time, till the Beginning of August, the rest of the People were, to save Labour and Expences, sworn by Commissioners in all Parts of the Kingdom, of which the Names of great Numbers are still upon the Rolls; and in every Place, when they had sworn, the King of England's Peace or Pardon was proclaim'd.

The Manner of Proceeding.

King Edward has Possession given him of Scotland.

^{ibid.} While the King was deciding this great Controversie, his Mother Queen Eleanor dy'd about Midsummer, upon which he return'd into England to see her Funeral solemniz'd with all filial Duty and Honour. After which he came to Berwick upon the third Day of August, where the twelve Competitors appear'd before him and a Parliament of both Nations, and with them the twenty four English Examiners of their Titles chosen by the King, and the eighty chosen by Robert Brus and John Baliol. The Petitions, with the Reasons of their Claims having been propounded and shewn to the Examiners, they reported them to the King before the whole Assembly, and in the Presence of every one of the Demandants. The King finding it to be an Affair of great Weight and Moment, by their own Consent, appointed them a longer Time till the second Day of June in the following Year 1292, for the further Proceeding in this uncommon Controversie.

The King's Mother dies.

tors appointed to discuss their Rights and Pretensions, after an attentive Hearing related all that had pass'd to the King; who, with the Nobility of both Kingdoms, carefully examin'd them. But because he found there would be many Delays, and much Time expended, to the Inconveniency and Peril of the Kingdom, it was order'd by the express Consent of all the Pretenders, and by the Assent of the whole Assembly, That the Rights and Titles of Robert Brus and John Baliol should be first examin'd and discuss'd, and that afterwards all others might prosecute their Claims if they thought fit. The King, tho' he had it in his Power to determine the Cause alone, yet that he might proceed with more Prudence and Security, he caus'd the eighty Examiners to take an Oath, That they would advise him how and by what Laws and Customs he was to pass Judgment in this Matter. These eighty alledg'd great Difficulties, and desir'd that the twenty four appointed by the King might be added to them; and these alledg'd greater, and refus'd to undertake the Charge, without the Advice of those English Prelates and Nobility that were absent. Wherefore, by the unanimous Consent of all present, the King appointed the fourteenth Day of October next, for the further Proceeding in this Affair, in his Parliament to be held in the same Place.

The Nature of the Scotch Succession.

The Nobility and Auditors met according to Appointment; and the King demanded By what Laws and Customs Judgment was to be given in the present Case; if none were found, how it was to be determin'd; and whether otherwise concerning the Kingdom, than concerning Earldoms, Baronies and other Tenures? They all unanimously answer'd, That Judgment was to be made by the Laws of the Kingdom, if any were found; if not, the King ought, by the Advice of his Nobility, to make a new One: And as to the Right of Succession in Scotland, Judgment was to be given as in Earldoms, Baronies, and other indivisible Tenures. Upon this Answer, the King order'd the Auditors favourably to hear John Baliol and Robert Brus from Day to Day what they had to alledge; and Robert Brus began with shewing the Reasons and Arguments for his Claim, and then John Baliol set forth his, in a long Plea, and answer'd all that the other had said. Now of the three Daughters of David Earl of Huntington, undoubted Heir to the Crown of Scotland, John Baliol was Grand-son to the Eldest, and Robert Brus was Son to the Second; wherefore the King before the whole Assembly desir'd their Advice; and the Force of the Arguments on both Sides were drawn into this Question: Whether the more Remote by one Degree in Succession, coming from the eldest Sister, ought, according to the Laws of both Kingdoms, to exclude the Nearer by one Degree coming from the second Sister; or whether the Nearer by one Degree coming from the second Sister, ought to exclude the more Remote by one Degree coming from the eldest Sister? To which they unanimously answer'd, That the more Remote by one Degree lineally descending from the eldest Sister, according to the Laws and Customs of both Kingdoms, was to be preferr'd to the Nearer by one Degree coming from the second Sister, in every Hereditary Succession.

Several Claims

Upon this Answer, the King caus'd the Matter to be re-examin'd before the Nobility of both Kingdoms, and appointed the sixth Day of November for John Baliol and Robert Brus to hear their Sentence; which was pronounc'd by the King Judicially, by the Advice of the Nobility of both Kingdoms, the Auditors, and others of the Council: Namely, That Robert Brus should receive nothing by his Petition concerning the Kingdom of Scotland; and the Sentence concerning John Baliol should be suspended, 'till the other Competitors were heard. Then the King commanded John Baliol, with the other Competitors, to proceed in their Petitions; among whom Robert Brus protested That he would prosecute his Claim to the Kingdom of Scotland, or a Third Part of it, after another Form and Manner than before. Upon this, John Hastings one of the Competitors, who was Son to the youngest of Earl David's three Daughters Daughters, claim'd his Third Part of the Kingdom of Scotland as of a partible Inheritance, which ought to be divided between John Baliol, Robert Brus and John Hastings, as Heirs to the three Daughters; alledging, That all the Lands, Tenements, Fees, Liberties, Demeasns and Honours that were holden of the Crown of England in Capite were partible. The Arguments of Robert Brus were to the same effect; and he further claim'd To hold his Third Part in Capite, of his Lord the King of England by Homage, and requested of the King, That he might receive Judgment according to the Common Law of England. Upon this Plea, the King enquir'd of the Auditors and his Council, Whether the Kingdom of Scotland was partible or not; and they all answer'd in the Negative. Whereupon the King appointed the seventeenth of November as a peremptory Day, for all the Competitors to hear their Judgments, in his Parliament at Berwick; designing in the mean Space to deliberate and examine Things with the wisest Men of both Kingdoms, the Auditors, and others of his Council, that he might be fully inform'd how to do Justice to all.

On the appointed Day, there was a full Assembly of both Nations in the Hall of Berwick Castle, together with a great Multitude of the Populace; where nine of the twelve Competitors, for not prosecuting their Petitions, were dismiss'd without further Debate. The Petitions of Robert Brus and John Hastings were next discuss'd, who had claim'd the Third Part of the Kingdom for their Shares, as of a Partible Inheritance; but because it had been agreed and adjudg'd by the Communities of both Nations, That the Kingdom ought to be possess'd by one single Heir, by reason it was undividable in its nature like other Kingdoms, therefore it was judicially declar'd by the King, That they should gain nothing by their said Petition. As to the Petition of John Baliol, who claim'd the whole Kingdom, the King caus'd it to be re-examin'd by the Council of both Nations, and after a full Discussion, it was unanimously decreed, That the Kingdom of Scotland was impartible, and ought to remain in one Heir. And because the King was Judge of the Rights of his Subjects, by the Laws of the Kingdoms approv'd by the Chief of both Nations; and by the same Laws, in the Case before them, it was judicially declar'd, That the more Remote by Descent in the first Line, was to be preferr'd to a Nearer in the second, in the Succession of an impartible Inheritance; and also, That none had deny'd him to be Heir of the first Line, and therefore to be preferr'd before all others as next Heir by Hereditary Succession; Therefore the King of England, as Superior and Direct Lord of Scotland, adjudg'd, That the said John Baliol should have Seisin and Possession of that Kingdom, with all its Appurtenances, upon Condition, That he should rightly and justly govern the People subject to him, that none might have Occasion to complain of Injustice, nor the King, as Superior Lord of the Kingdom, to interpose his Authority; always reserving the Right of the King of England and his Heirs in such Cases, when he would make use of it. Accordingly on the nineteenth Day of November, King Edward deliver'd him his Writ or Instrument of Possession, reserving the Right of him and his Heirs; and also issu'd out others directed to the several Castellans and Governors of Castles in Scotland, to give him full Possession of them. The next Day at Norham he swore Fealty to King Edward, as his Liege and Superior Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland, and afterwards at Newcastle he did Homage to him in Form for the whole Kingdom of Scotland; in Testimony of both which he gave to King Edward his Letters Patents. About the same Time he was put into Corporal Possession of the Kingdom at the Monastery of Scone near Perth, and plac'd in his Royal Throne, according to the ancient Custom of Scotland.

John Baliol declar'd King of Scotland by King Edward.

Thus did King Edward display his Grandeur by his Establishment of Scotland, and not long after he met with an Occasion to manifest his Authority over that Kingdom. And this was by means of an Appeal to him, by Magdolph Earl of Fife, against John King of Scotland: The Substance of whose Complaint plaint was, That King Edward having at Berwick restor'd to him certain Lands and Tenements in the County of Fife, King John had notwithstanding disseis'd him of the same; and to hinder him from prosecuting his Right, had imprison'd him, and caus'd an unjust Sentence to pass against him, in Contempt of the King of England and Superior Lord of Scotland. Upon which Complaint, King Edward directed his Writ to the King of the Scots, summoning him to appear before Him and his Parliament in England, to answer to what Magdolph had to say against him. After Michaelmas he according to Summons appear'd, where he deny'd all Contempt of the Lord his King, but alledg'd, As he was King of Scotland, he durst not answer to Magdolph's Complaint, or any Thing concerning his Kingdom, without the Advice of his own Subjects. Upon this Magdolph demanded Judgment against him as One who refus'd to answer; and the King expressly told him, That he was his Liege-Man and Homager for the Kingdom of Scotland, therefore he had summon'd him to answer before him, or to shew Cause to the contrary. To which he reply'd as before, That he neither could nor durst answer to any Thing concerning his Kingdom, without consulting his People; and when he was told, That he might require another Day, he answer'd, He would require none. At this it was agreed, That King John had made no Defence against Magdolph; and because he would not require a Day, nor shew Cause why he ought not to answer, in Elusion of the King's Jurisdiction and Superiority, it was judg'd a Contempt and Disobedience to him, and that three of his principal Castles of Scotland should be seiz'd into his Hands, 'till he had given a full Satisfaction. But before the Sentence was pronounc'd, he in Parliament made Supplication to the King with his own Mouth, and also deliver'd a Petition in Writing, wherein he acknowledg'd the Superiority of the King of England, desiring That he would first permit him to advise with his own Nation, and he would answer at his first Parliament after Easter next, and would behave himself towards him as he ought to do. King Edward advising upon this, at the Instance of his Nobility, and with the Consent of Magdolph, granted his Petition, and gave him Time 'till the Parliament after Easter, in the following Year.

who submits to him.

A. D. 1294. Reg. 23. From this Time forwards, the King of the Scots, instead of complying, seem'd to have studiy'd nothing so much as showing his Resentments, and to take the first Opportunity to revenge himself of these suppos'd Indignities. In the mean Time there happen'd a violent Contest between the English and the Normans, occasion'd first by a Norman being casually slain by the English. Upon which Accident the Normans slew several of the English, and hung up one upon the Mast of a Ship, whom they had taken at Sea; but not long after, sixty stout Ships of the English, meeting with two hundred Sail of Normans, loaden with Wines, after a sharp Encounter, in which great Numbers of the French were slain, they took their whole Fleet and brought them triumphantly into England. The King of France, who had privately promoted this Contest, in a great Anger now declar'd himself publicly, demanded Restitution, and cited King Edward judicially to appear and answer for some Injuries done in Gascony. Upon his Non-Appearance, and finding that he was busily employ'd in the Affairs of Scotland, the French King with his Forces gain'd Possession of several Places in Gascony. To add to these Inconveniencies, the Scots, having by Time and several Steps strengthen'd themselves, resolv'd at length to throw off the English Yoke: And first King John, with an Excuse for his Non-Appearance before the English Parliament, according to his Promise, sent over heavy Complaints of many and great Injuries, Oppressions and Grievances sustain'd by his own Subjects from the English; for which he demanded Satisfaction of King Edward. After this, by the Consent of his Nobility and others, he enter'd into a solemn League of Confederacy with the French King against the King of England, promising all mutual Aid and Assistance.

The French King is against King Edward.

sistance to each other. This was seal'd with both the Kings Seals, and Counter-chang'd, consisting of seven main Articles; one of which was, That Edward, Son to John King of Scotland, should marry the Daughter of Charles of Valois Earl of Anjou, and Brother to the King of France. And to secure their Consciences, as well as their Cause, the Scots sent to Rome to have Absolution from their Oaths and Homage; and by means of false Suggestions made to Pope Celestin, they were all absolv'd by a particular Bull.

In the following Year, King John shew'd himself more openly, return'd the Homage and Fealty for himself, and all others of his Kingdom to King Edward, and defy'd him by a particular Instrument or Writing; and the Scots declar'd themselves absolv'd from all former Obligations. Upon which Declarations, King Edward, rousing himself, advanc'd with a powerful Army to Newcastle. But the first Blood that was shed was on the English Side, of whom the Scotch slew almost a thousand in a private Village, and proceeded to ravage, burn and destroy the County of Cumberland, and other Parts: Which was not extreamly displeasing to the undaunted King of England, since the first Acts of Hostility proceeded from them whom he had a full Resolution to conquer, That at length he might be sole Monarch of Albion. Here began such a mortal Dissention between the two Nations, such Ravages and Bloodsheds, such Jealousies and Pretensions, as could not be intirely reconcil'd in less than three hundred Years. The valiant Edward, to chastise the Scots for their Breach of Oaths, enter'd their Kingdom with a brave Army, and besieg'd and took the strong Castle of Berwick with a great and terrible Slaughter. From thence he sent Part of his Army to reduce the Castle of Dunbar lately revolted, which was effected by the Death of great Numbers of the Scots, and by the Captivity of ten thousand Men, of whom were seven Barons, a hundred Knights, and thirty one Esquires. The Scots with all their Forces coming to relieve this Castle, King Edward by his mighty Valour defeated them, and kill'd no less than twenty two thousand upon the Spot. King Edward knowing as well how to use, as to gain a Victory, proceeded and took the Castle of Rocksborough; and to put an End to the War, he march'd to Edinburgh it self, and in eight Days took that strong Castle. From thence he march'd to Sterlin, Perth and other Places, reaping fresh Laurels where-ever he pass'd; 'till at length King John and his Nobility submitted and su'd for Mercy; which was granted, upon Condition, That they all should surrender themselves to him as his Subjects. Shortly after, the King of Scotland with a white Rod in his Hand, according to the Custom of Surrenders, presented himself before King Edward at Brechin, and resign'd to him and his Heirs the whole Kingdom of Scotland, without any Condition; and confirm'd this Resignation by a Charter under his Hand and Seal, dated the tenth Day of July, and the fourth of his Reign.

This being done, King Edward immediately held a Parliament for Scotland, at Berwick, where the Nobility of that Kingdom, and great Numbers of others, did Homage to him as their Sovereign Lord and their Supream Governor, and confirm'd the same under their Hands and Seals; the Names of whom are still upon Record: And for the greater Security, they surrender'd into his Hands all the Castles and Forts of that Kingdom; except those of William Douglas, who chose any Punishment rather than yield to the Subjection of England. Notwithstanding this Agreement John the late King was sent to the Tower of London, where he was decently attended, and allow'd the Liberty of ten Miles Riding; and the Noblemen of Scotland, which he brought into England, were forbidden to pass the River Trent, under Forfeiture of their Heads. The Government of Scotland was committed to John Warren Earl of Surrey and Suffex; Hugh de Cressingham was made Treasurer, and William Ormesby chief Justiciary. And the more to show his Resolution of dissolving the distinct Sovereignty of Scotland, and like Wales to unite it to the English Monarchy, he took from Edinburgh the Crown and Scepter with all the Regalia, and brought them them to London; and also remov'd the famous Marble Chair out of the Monastery of Scone, which in Coronations serv'd for a Throne to the Kings of Scotland, and which was believ'd in an extraordinary Manner to be constantly attended with the Power and Fate of that Kingdom. Then to manifest the most compleat Marks of a Conquest, he proceeded, according to Boetius, to the Burning of the Scotch Records, the Abrogation of the Laws, altering the Forms of Divine Service, and transporting the most learned Men to his University of Oxford.

IV. King Edward in a great Measure had now been a Conqueror both of Wales and Scotland; but while he was employ'd about the latter, he met with great Disadvantages from the King of France, who had fraudulently got Possession of all or the greatest Part of Gascony. To obviate these Mischiefs, the King enter'd into a Confederacy with Guy Earl of Flanders, whose Dominions the French King had unjustly invaded; and for a Supply for this and all other Occasions, he call'd a Parliament at St. Edmund's Bury; in which the Citizens and Burgeses gave an eighth Part of all their Goods, the rest of the Laity a twelfth, but the Clergy refus'd to give any Thing, by reason of a Constitution made and publish'd this Year by Pope Boniface, which prohibited all Ecclesiasticks to pay any Secular Taxes without the Consent of the Roman See, and that upon the severest Penalties. The Clergy refusing in two several Meetings, the King proceeded to a higher Strain than any of his Predecessors, seiz'd upon all their Lay Fees, and put the whole Body of them out of his Protection, so that they could receive no Benefit from his Laws, nor Justice from his Courts. This venturous Proceeding so terrify'd the Clergy, that finding themselves expos'd to all Injuries without Means of Redress, the Arch-Bishop of York, with the Bishops of Durham, Ely, Salisbury and Lincoln soon yielded to lay down in their Churches the fifth Part of all their Goods, towards the Maintenance of the King's Wars; by which they appeas'd his Displeasure, and were receiv'd into Favour. But the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, by whose Incitement the rest stood out, had all his Goods seiz'd, and the Monasteries within his Diocese and Part of Lincoln were possess'd by publick Officers, who were appointed to administer bare Necessaries to the Monks, converting the rest to the King's Use. At length by much Suit, and by giving a fourth Part of their Goods, they redeem'd themselves, and purchas'd the King's Favour. Thus will valiant and martial Princes have their Ends serv'd in Times of Necessity, notwithstanding the greatest Opposition.

Yet still he met with some Checks from the Laity, upon summoning his Nobility at Salisbury, where he requir'd several of them to go into the Wars of Gascony. But they all making Excuses, every Man for himself, the King in a great Passion threaten'd, That they should go, or else he would give their Lands to others that would. Upon which Humfrey Bohun, High-Constable and Earl of Hereford, and Hugh Bigot, Earl of Norfolk and Marshal of England, boldly declar'd, That if the King went in Person, they would attend him, or otherwise not; and further the Earl-Marshal said, That he was desirous to go with his Majesty, and march before him in the Vanguard, as by Right of Inheritance he ought. But the King told him expressly, That he should go with any other, tho' he himself went not in Person. The other answer'd, He was not oblig'd to go, therefore he would not without him. Upon which the King swore by the Eternal God, That he should either go or hang; the other swore the same Oath, That he would neither go, nor hang, and so departed without leave, and afterwards, with the other Earl, stood upon his own Guard. Insulting of Kings had been too fashionable in his Father's Reign, therefore this Prince wisely conceal'd and stifled his Resentments, and prepar'd for his Voyage into Flanders, there to relieve the Earl of that Country, now distress'd by the French. But first he left the Care of the Government to Prince Edward his Son

Son, the Bishop of London, the Earl of Warwick, and the Lords Gray and Clifford; and to recover the Clergy, he reconcil'd himself to the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and receiv'd him into Favour. Being ready to take shipping, the Arch-Bishops, Bishops, Earls, Barons and the Commons, sent him a Roll of Grievances, alledging several unwarrantable Impositions upon Wool, and other Commodities, and several unjustifiable Practices, and complaining of the negligent Observance of the Great Charters. To all which the King return'd a civil and seasonable Answer, promising to redress all Things at his Return, and requesting the Nobility to raise no Disturbance in his Absence. And shortly after a Parliament was call'd by the Prince, where a new Tax being granted, the great Charters were again confirm'd, and afterwards seal'd in Flanders with the King's great Seal. This Statute or Charter is in Coke's Second Institutes, and our common Statute Books, going by the Title of Confirmatio Chartarum, in the twenty fifth of this Reign. Magna Charta, &c. confirm'd.

Before the Finishing of these Transactions, the restless Scots, by the Instigation of William Waleys, whom they chose for their Commander, arm'd themselves and killed all the English they could find, and practis'd strange Cruelties besides. Upon Notice of which King Edward directed the Earl of Surrey with the Militia beyond Trent, to march into Scotland, and suppress this Insurrection. The Earl raising an Army in the North, sent his Nephew Henry de Percy with it into Scotland, who upon marching towards the Scots, found the Heads of them, William Waleys, and others, inclinable to a Peace, upon Condition of the Safety of their Lives and Limbs, Lands and Goods, and a general Pardon of all that was past. Henry de Percy admitted of the Peace, upon Promise of Hostages, and Articles in Writing, if it satisfy'd the King, who in a short Time consented to it, that his Voyage to Flanders might not be retarded. But soon after, the Scots taking Advantage from some Discontents in England, upon several Pretences delay'd to give Hostages for the Peace; and towards the latter End of August took Arms again under the Conduct of Waleys, and in a short Time drove almost all the English out of Scotland. William Warren, the Governor of Scotland, fled from Berwick into England, with many English that quitted the Town to the Scots; yet still the Castle was kept, and well defended by those that were lodg'd in it. Insurrections in Scotland.

King Edward in Flanders hearing of these Troubles and Disturbances, by the Mediation of Pope Boniface, made a two Years Truce with the King of France, and came over into England; and having redress'd several Things according to Promise, he summon'd the Militia of the whole Nation to meet him at Carlisle on Whitsun-Eve, to march against the Scots, whose Power was now formidable, and their Forces numerous. But before that Time, on the tenth Day of April, he held a full Parliament at York, to treat with him about certain Affairs that concern'd him and the whole kingdom. Here the Lord High-Constable and Earl-Marshal demanded That, because the great Charters had been confirm'd beyond Sea, for the greater Security they might be confirm'd again; which the Bishop of Durham, the Earls of Surrey, Warwick and Glocester, promis'd that the King should perform, upon his Return with Victory. After which the King commanded his Army to be ready at Roxburg upon Tweed, on the twenty fourth Day of June; and going aside to visit the Tomb of St. John of Beverly in Yorkshire, he found his Army at the Time and Place appointed. With this he march'd like a Conqueror into the Bowels of Scotland, and upon the twenty first Day of July came within Sight of the Enemy, in a large Field near Falkirk, where both Armies encamp'd. In the Morning a terrible Shout being heard from the Scotch Army, the English ran to Arms; but the King's Horse, affrighted at the tumultuous Noise, as he was putting his Foot into the Stirrup, threw him to the Ground, and by his Legs broke two of his Ribs; who notwithstanding proceeded courageously to the Battel. William Waleys, who by his bold Enterprises had gain'd a singular Opinion from his Country- A. Countrymen, having drawn up his numerous Army, instead of a formal Oration, in all Parts us'd this short Speech, I have brought you to the King, fly if you can. But notwithstanding the Numbers of the Scots, the English being led on by a mighty Warrior, attack'd them with so much Conduct and Bravery, that they soon broke their Troops, and defeated them, with a dreadful Slaughter of no less than sixty thousand Men, according to some Authors, tho' others say fewer. Waleys and the great Men of Scotland fled into the Woods; and the King, after he had taken in several Places, and us'd some Severities, return'd triumphantly into England, in the latter End of this Year, after he had in some Measure made a second Conquest of the Kingdom of Scotland.

The two Years Truce made between the English and French, was now by the Means of Pope Boniface, turn'd to a settled Peace; in which Articles, besides the Restoration of Gascony, it was agreed, That King Edward should marry the French King's Sister Margaret, and Prince Edward his Son the same King's Daughter Isabel; Tho', says Walsingham, he by this Alliance promoted not the Good of the Realm in any Point. To this Affinity were added the greater Fences of a Domestick Quiet; for the King, whom Wars and Years had made renown'd and experienc'd, graciously and wisely yielded to grant all that had been promis'd before his last Expedition into Scotland. And at a Parliament held at London, fifteen Days after Easter, he confirm'd the Charters, and for the fuller Satisfaction of the Nobility, he left out that Clause Salvo Jure Coronæ nostræ; and what was wanting at this Time, he afterwards compleated at a Parliament held at Stamford. But that he might seem willing to deny the Pope no reasonable Request, he deliver'd into the Hands of his Nuntio John Baliol late King of Scotland, who was convey'd to his Inheritance in France, where he remain'd with the Brand of a false Seducer, and of a perjur'd Person to King Edward's Judgment, without any Part of his Regal Power over the Scottish Nation.

again confirm'd

The Peace which King Edward made in other Places, prov'd a greater Affliction to the Scots; for tho' they had recover'd Sterlin by Surrender of the English, and began with a noble Assertion of their ancient Liberty to assemble again under Waleys, yet the Time was not come for their Deliverance. For King Edward, according to Articles, having accomplish'd his Nuptials with the French King's Sister at Canterbury, and again confirm'd the great Charters, now made it his whole Business to finish his Design of annexing Scotland to the Crown of England. Accordingly, being accompany'd with his Son, and a formidable Army, he pursu'd the Affair so vigorously, that the Scots, tho' very numerous, fled before him, whose Valour had justly render'd him terrible; and that Day, in Walsingham's Opinion, had been irrecoverably fatal to the Scottish Name and Nation, if the English had been able to have follow'd them in their Armor over their Bogs, Morasses and Mountains; or if the Welsh by their own Skill had supply'd the Defect. However King Edward held so close a Possession, that he would neither grant the Scotch Nobility their Baliol to reign over them, according to their Petition, nor permit them to redeem such Lands as he had given to his English Adventurers. The Scots being driven to Extremities, had recourse to the Court of Rome, and procur'd inhibitory Letters from the Pope to King Edward; who upon Sight of them swore a terrible Oath, That he would not desist. Nevertheless the Scots after a few Days requested the King to suffer them to live in Peace, till they had taken Council of the Peers and the King of France, threatening him also with the utmost Power of Rome. Upon which the King with a disdainful Smile answer'd, Have you done Honour to me as the Direct Lord of your Kingdom, and believe that I can be terrified with Pretences? as if I, like one who has no Power to compel, would tamely give up my undoubted Right? Let me hear no more of this; for if I do, I swear by all that's Sacred, I will destroy all Scotland from one Sea to the other. On the other Side the Scots bravely reply'd, That they would spend the last Drop of their Blood for the Defence of Justice, and the Liberty of their Country. But because the Scots had put themselves under the immediate Protection of the Pope, who now began to claim the Right of that Kingdom, as before he had done of England, the King order'd the most learned Men of his Nation to search the Archives of the Universities and Monasteries, and order'd them to make an Historical Deduction of his Right and Title to Scotland; which was almost the same, but more full and particular than what he deliver'd to the Scots, when in the nineteenth Year of his Reign he claim'd the Superiority and Direct Dominion over their Kingdom. This was sent in a Letter from the King to the Pope, with a Narrative concerning the whole Nation of Scotland, 'As their having done Homage and sworn Fealty to him, and acknowledged him to be their King and supreme Lord several Times; and notwithstanding they had against their Oaths, invaded, ravag'd and wasted England as they thought fit; therefore he caution'd his Holiness against the false Insinuations and Suggestions of that perfidious People; concluding with a Petition, That he would have a Paternal Care and Affection to his Royal Rights.

Yet by the Intercession of the King of France, King Edward granted the Scots a Truce till Whit-Sunday following: About which Time he made his Son Edward Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester, being then about seventeen Years of Age; with which the Welsh were highly pleas'd, as being born at Carnarvon in their own Country. The Truce being ended, the King not long after went into Scotland, where he continu'd all Winter, but lost many of his military Horses for want of Forage. After Christmas, at the Instance of the French King, he again granted a Truce to the Scots till the first Day of November ensuing; and towards the Spring, having settled all Things in Scotland, he return'd into England. Here to prevent Inconveniencies and Tumults, the King by his Proclamations prohibited those Tournaments, Justs, and other Warlike Exercises, which had been very frequently in use among the young Nobility and Gentry. The Truce with the Scots being expir'd, the King sent John de Seagrave with an Army into Scotland, making him Governor of Berwick, and Guardian of the whole Kingdom. This Person marching with a Party of Men towards Edinburgh, the Scotch Army, which lay in Ambuscade, surpriz'd him, and took him Prisoner with many others: But a fresh Party fortunately arriving, rescu'd him out of their Hands. The Scotch Writers say that the English lost great Numbers in this Action, and magnifie it as very noble and honourable to their Nation.

The Scots gain Advantage.

The King hearing of this Success, and that the Scots began to increase in Power, enter'd into their Country with a formidable Army, and by deliberate Marches pass'd near three hundred Miles, as far as Cathness the utmost Limits of the Kingdom; while the Scots unable to withstand his Arms, for the most part betook themselves to the inaccessible Woods and Mountains. But finding the King vigorous in his Pursuit, and resolute in his Designs, they at length sent Mediators, and humbly begg'd Peace of him, and that they might be permitted to compound for their Estates with those English to whom they had been given; to both which the King readily condescended. In his Return from the North, he besieg'd Sterlin Castle, which had been strongly fortified against him, and stay'd all the Winter at Dumferling not far from that Place. M. Westminster says That the great Men of Scotland, as well Earls as Barons, being wholly reduc'd and overcome, submitted themselves to the Pleasure of the King of England, who admitted them to his Grace and Mercy, imposing pecuniary Mulcts upon them, appointing them Days and Years, and certain Times for Payment: After Winter the King went in Person to the Siege of Sterlin Castle, which was vigorously attack'd and ply'd with extraordinary Engines, yet still the Besieg'd made a noble Defence; but being hard press'd by the English, who were continually animated by the Presence of their King, the Castle was

This put an End to the whole Expedition; and the King having settled all Things according to his Desire, appointed John de Seagrave Governor of the Kingdom, and return'd into England in great Triumph: And coming to York, he remov'd the Courts of the King's Bench and the Exchequer, which had been there seven Years, to their ancient Place at London. Thus was Scotland in a manner conquer'd a third Time by the valiant King Edward; and had not Providence in Favour of that Kingdom, ordain'd some inaccessible Places, and natural Strengths where no Armies could march or be maintain'd, the Scots from this Time would have probably lost all their ancient Liberties.

A. D. 1305. Reg. 33. The Punishment of Waleys V. And now King Edward being possess'd of all his Aims, an universal Lord at home, mighty in Alliance and Power abroad, began to look more severely to the publick Administration: And for a Terror to all Opposers, he caus'd William Waleys, who had been betray'd into his Hands by his Companion, to be try'd by the Laws of England; and notwithstanding he had never acknowledg'd or submitted to those Laws, he was condemn'd to be hang'd, drawn and quarter'd, and his Limbs to be set up at several distant Towns: A hard Fate for one who had so bravely defended his own Country, and whom the Scotch have plac'd among the best Examples of Fortitude and Piety; tho' the English have accus'd him of the greatest Cruelty and Barbarity. About the same Time the King began to exercise his Power and Authority upon Sir Nicolas Seagrave, one of the greatest Knights of the Kingdom, who being formerly reproach'd with treasonable Practices by Sir John Cromwell, offer'd to justify himself by a Duel; which the King refus'd to grant, in regard of the War then depending. Upon which Seagrave, contrary to the King's Prohibition, left the Camp, and went over Sea to fight with his Adversary; for which the King requir'd that Justice should proceed against him, as a Contemner of his Royal Authority. The Judges consulted three Days upon this Affair, and at length adjudg'd Seagrave guilty of Death, and all his Goods to be forfeited to the King; but in regard of his Blood they added, That he went not out of England in Contempt of the King, but to be reveng'd of his Accuser, therefore it was in the King's Power to shew Mercy. Upon which the King in a great Passion reply'd, Have you been all this while consulting for this? I know it is in my Power to shew Mercy to whom I please, but not for your Sakes: Who ever submitted himself to my Favour, and met with a Repulse? However, let this your Judgment be recorded, and for ever held as a Law. And so this Knight, for an Example to others, was committed to Prison; tho' shortly after by the Labour of many Noblemen, and thirty Peers being bound for his Behaviour, the King restor'd him to his Estate.

The King's Regulations. In the same Year, the King to establish the Peace of the Nation, sent out a new Writ of Inquisition call'd Trailbaston; for Intruders on other Mens Lands, who to oppress the right Owner, would make over their Land to great Men; for Batterers hired to beat and hurt others; for Breakers of the Peace; for Ravishers, Incendiaries, Murderers, Fighters, False Assizers, and other such Criminals: Which Inquisition was so severely executed, and such Fines rais'd, as brought in great Treasure to the King. So did likewise another Commission at the same Time sent forth to examine the Behaviour of Officers and Ministers of Justice, wherein many were found Delinquents, and paid dearly in their Purses. As the King was strict and severe upon all Criminals in general, so he would not spare his own Son, Prince Edward, who having been corrupted by a vicious insinuating Companion call'd Piers Gaveston, riotously broke the Park of Walter Langton Bishop of Chester; for which the King disgrac'd him so far, as to put him into a publick Prison. The Arch-Bishop of Canterbury at the same Time

Time being accus'd of disturbing the Peace in the King's Absence, he sent him over to Pope Clement the Fifth, there to be crush'd by a double Power. This Pope was a Native of Bourdeaux, and so the more mindful of the King's De-fire, and the King more confident of his Favour, sent him a noble Present of several Golden Vessels: Which so affected the Mind of the Pope, that he let loose this Lion, and untty'd the King from the Covenants made with his Subjects, concerning their Charters and Privileges, wholly absolving him from his Oath: An Act of small Piety in the Pope, and of as little Conscience in the King; who, as if he had no further Occasion for his People, began to assume too much Power, and to take too much Liberty from these unjustifiable Grants.

But on a sudden there happen'd an Occasion which brought him back to his right Orb again, causing him both to see his Error and to reform it; and this was a new Storm from Scotland, from whence he expected nothing but Peace and Compliance. For the Scots, who had twice or thrice done Homage and sworn Fealty to King Edward, and the Bishops also who had done the same, join'd with Robert Brus, Son to the former great Competitor, lately escap'd out of England, in setting up his Title to the Crown of Scotland, and so began a War more mischievous and lasting than any before: And because John Comyn, who was of great Power and Interest in the Kingdom, was resolute in keeping his Oath to King Edward, Robert Brus and his Followers treacherously murder'd him in the very Church of Dumfries, on the twenty ninth Day of January; and on Lady-Day following, Robert was solemnly crown'd King at Scone, in the Presence of two Bishops, many Earls, Barons and Knights. King Edward being inform'd of the Proceedings of this new King and his Confederates, sent Aymer de Valence Earl of Pembroke, with Robert Clifford and Henry Percy into Scotland, to suppress this threatening Insurrection. The King likewise designing to follow them, summon'd his Army to rendezvous at Carlisle, fifteen Days after Midsummer; and to make the Expedition more great and glorious, he knighted his Son at Westminster, and with him three hundred young Gentlemen, the Sons of Earls, Barons and great Men, who had sufficient to maintain their Honour, and gave them their military Garments out of his own Wardrobe. These with the Prince were to march into Scotland against those of that Nation; but before they could arrive there, the Earl of Pembroke had attack'd and routed the Scots, and put their King to Flight at Mtisen near St. John's Town or Perth; in which Battel great Numbers were kill'd, and many Persons of Note taken Prisoners, most of whom were try'd and hang'd for Perjury and Rebellion. Afterwards King Edward, the Prince, and many great Men went into Scotland, where some receiv'd them very honourably, and others left their Habitations and fled. The Army ranging from Place to Place after the Fight, pursu'd the Fugitives, kill'd some and took others alive, among whom were the two Bishops of St. Andrew's and Glasco, with the Abbot of Scone, arm'd with their Surcoats; who were sent into several Prisons in England. The Age of King Edward, his Rage, and Desire of Revenge made him almost inexorable, and to spare scarce any of what Degree soever: The Earl of Athol, tho' of the Royal Blood and ally'd to him, was sent to London, and dishonourably preferr'd to a higher Gallows than any of the rest: The Wife of King Robert, taken by the Lord Ross, was sent Prisoner to London, and his Daughter to a Monastery in Lindsey; and the Countess of Boughan, who assisted in the Coronation of Robert, was put into a wooden Cage, made in the Shape of a Crown, and hung out upon the Walls of Berwick, for a dismal Spectacle to be gaz'd on by the People.

After this Summer's Expedition, the King pass'd the Winter at Carlisle, resolving old as he was never to desist 'till he had finish'd his Work. Here on the twentieth Day of January, he held his last Parliament, in which, besides the Provisions for the Scotch Establishment, several Consultations and Methods were prosecuted for repelling another Kind of Enemy no less troublesome to the State; namely the Pope, and his still continu'd Extortions in this Kingdom, of which great Complaints were made in this Assembly: Infomuch that the Clergy were forc'd to appeal from the Pope's Bulls, and his Cardinal Legate's Exactions; and also the King's Council was oblig'd to enact several Orders and Constitutions for the restraining of their excessive Oppressions. In the Time of this Parliament, Observations being made of the extraordinary Familiarity between Prince Edward and Piers Gaveston, and what mighty Influence that vicious Person had over him, the King wisely commanded him to depart the Land, and oblig'd him by a solemn Oath not to return without his Licence. At the same Time he oblig'd the Prince to swear That he would not receive, retain or permit the said Gaveston to be with him, contrary to his Pleasure; and for his Subsistence beyond Sea, he was allow'd a hundred Marks per Annum.

Gaveston banish'd.

A great Change in Scotland.

During these Transactions, the great Deliverance of Scotland drew near; for the noble King Robert, who for a while had liv'd in the most desolate and abandoned Condition, having gather'd together the scatter'd Remains of his Army, suddenly attack'd the Earl of Pembroke, and gave him a great Defeat, and immediately after chas'd the Earl of Glocester into the Castle of Ayr, which he besieg'd, tho' without Success. Upon which King Edward sent into England, and under great Penalties commanded all that ought him Service to be ready at Carlisle, three Weeks after Midsummer; resolving with this Force to march into the Bowels of Scotland. But before he could effect this Design, God was pleas'd to visit him with his last Sickness; upon which he sent for the Prince his Son to come before him, to whom, besides many Admonitions to Piety, and the good Government of a Kingdom, he solemnly and upon his Blessing commanded three Things in a more especial Manner; 'That he would carry his 'Bones about with him through Scotland, 'till he had subdu'd that Nation, not 'doubting but his Skeleton alone would produce Victory: That he would send 'his Heart to the Holy-Land, with a hundred and forty Knights to that War, 'and the thirty two thousand Pounds he had provided for that Purpose: Lastly, That he would never recall Piers Gaveston from the Banishment he so 'justly merited. After this he sent him to London to consummate the Match with the French King's Daughter; and shortly after, moving by small Journeys towards Scotland from Carlisle, he arriv'd at a small Town call'd Burgh upon the Sands, where by his Distemper being put in Mind of his latter End, he piously broke forth into this memorable Ejaculation; O Lord! if thou thinkest it good for these my People to have me continue longer with them, I am ready to venture my Life for them; but if otherwise, thy Will be done. Then in a short Time after, being seiz'd with a Dysentery or Bloody-Flux, while his Servants were going to lift him up in his Bed, to give him some Nourishment, he expired in their Arms, upon Friday the seventh of July, in the sixty eighth Year of his Age, after a most vigorous and triumphant Reign of thirty four Years, seven Months, and twenty one Days. He was infinitely lamented by his Subjects, and his Corps was brought to Waltham, where it remain'd sixteen Weeks, and on the twenty eighth Day of October it was bury'd in the Abby Church at Westminster, at the Head of King Henry his Father, on the North Side of St. Edward's Shrine.

King Edward dies.

This was the End of the mighty King Edward, the First of that Name of the Norman Line, and the Fourth from King Egbert: A Prince of great Renown, in whose valiant Breast, as Mr. Camden expresses it, God seem'd to have pitch'd his Tent; and as well by his Courage and Wisdom, as by Gracefulness and Strength of Body, to have rais'd him to the highest Pitch of Majesty; so that he is deservedly rank'd among the greatest Ornaments of Britain. He was taller than ordinary Persons by the Head and Shoulders, of a comely Aspect, having black and curl'd Hair, and Eyes often sparkling like Fire; being born and bred up to great and military Actions. Yet his Wit and Understanding was no less than his Valour and Bravery; and he had both an Ability of Judgment within within himself, and also a Readiness to hear the Judgment of others. He was a wise Observer of Opportunity, wary and provident of his own Business, vigilant and vigorous in all publick Affairs, severe in Points of Justice, and not easily appeas'd when thoroughly provok'd, and in Contineny equal to his Father, whom he far exceeded in all other Respects. He was also an excellent Governor, yet his Vigour and Ambition did sometimes overflow and bear hard upon his Subjects; so that his Valour and Power was more for the Grandeur than for the Quiet of England; and never any King before or since him shed so much Christian Blood within the Isle of Britain as this Christian Warrior did in his Time, with what he occasion'd afterwards. He advanc'd the Sovereignty of the Crown of England, over the Kingdom of Scotland, more than any of his Predecessors; but leaving the Work not fully finish'd, from henceforth the Dominion of the Kings of England over that Realm, became less and less, 'till at length it diminish'd to nothing. He had by his first Queen Eleanor a numerous Issue of four Sons and nine Daughters; of these Sons only Edward surviv'd him; and by his second Queen he had two Sons, Thomas made Earl of Norfolk, and Edmund Earl of Kent. As this Edward was the first Son of a King of England that differenc'd his Arms with a File, so he was the first King of England, that bore his Arms upon the Caparisons of his Horse, as may be seen by his Royal Seal.

From the twenty second Year of this Reign we have an uninterrupted Series of Parliaments down to our own Times, in Sumonitiones ad Parl. by Sir William Dugdale; and in his Time the present Constitution of our Parliaments was so far establish'd, that by a Law solemnly publish'd as an Addition to Magna Charta, with Excommunications, it was enacted, That no Tax should be levy'd without the Consent of the Knights and Burgeses in Parliament. In the twenty seventh Year of this Reign an Order was made concerning the Price of Victuals; a fat Cock to be sold at three-half-Pence, a fat Capon for two Pence half-Penny, two Pullets for three-half-Pence, a Goose for four Pence, a Mallard for three-half-Pence, a Partridge for three-half-Pence, a Pheasant for four Pence, a Heron for six Pence, a Plover for a Penny, a Swan for three Shillings, a Crane for twelve Pence, two Wood-Cocks for three-half-Pence, a fat Lamb from Christmasts to Shrove-Tide for sixteen Pence, and all the Year after for four Pence. Wheat was once sold for twenty Pence a Quarter, and in some Places for sixteen Pence.

The Reign of King EDWARD the Second.

Containing 12 Years, 6 Months, and 15 Days.

I. UPON the Death of the great King Edward the First, his Eldest Son, Edward of Caernarvon, now twenty three Years of Age, succeeded him with a general Applause, tho' he was far his Inferior in all Respects. Never any Prince came to the Crown with greater Love of the Nation, or lost it in so short a Time. For before his Father's Funeral Solemnities were finish'd, he contrary to all Advice shew'd a fatal Disregard to all his dying Precepts; and the first publick Act he did was the recalling his loose and beloved Associate Piers Gaveston from Exile, whom he immediately rais'd from the Son of an ordinary Gasconian Knight to be Earl of Cornwall, Lord of Man, Guardian and Lieutenant of England, and Disposer of innumerable Preferments. And because Walter Langton, Bishop of Chester, and Treasurer of England, had like a just Servant in his Father's Reign reprov'd him for some lewd Extravagancies, and complain'd of Gaveston, as the Promoter of Vices so unbecoming a Prince; he remember'd to punish a Man so full of troublesom Virtues, and arrested him by Sir John Felton, Constable of the Tower of London, imprison'd him in Wallingford Castle, and seiz'd upon all his Goods and Temporalties: And his Prejudice was so great against him, that no Man durst speak in his Favour; 'till afterwards, by means of the Papal Authority, he was restor'd, and in some sort reconcil'd.

His Coronation.

That which best suited with this King's youthful Affections, the Marriage with the Princess Isabel, Daughter to Philip King of France, he perform'd with extraordinary Magnificence at Boloign; at which Solemnity were present the King of France, the King of Navarre, the King of Almain, and the King of Sicily, with three Queens besides the Bride, and a glorious Concourse of other Princes, Noblemen and Ladies: Among whom Earl Gaveston by his graceful Mien and rich Attire, so far exceeded the rest in Splendor and Magnificence, that it rais'd the Envy and Indignation of the whole Assembly. This foreign Favourite, who had a beautiful Body, a quick Wit, and a daring Courage, had so far exasperated the English Nobility, that they threaten'd to hinder the King's Coronation, which had been appointed shortly after, if he was not remov'd from the Court and Kingdom. Upon which the King, to avoid so great a Dishonour, promis'd upon his Faith to yield to what they desir'd in the next Parliament. But upon the Solemnity, Gaveston with the utmost Pomp was appointed to carry St. Edward's Crown before the King, which belong'd only to those of the Royal Blood, which more encreas'd the Hatred of the Prelates and Nobility against him. And now having got Possession of the Heart of this weak Prince, he by his riotous Practices soon fill'd his Court with Buffoons, Parasites, and the like pernicious Instruments, drawing Edward from the Thoughts of all noble Enterprizes, in Accomplishment of his Father's Will, or Discharge of his particular Duty, inclining him to all Sorts of dishonourable Vanities and soft criminal Pleasures: While he himself revel'd in outward Felicity, wasting the Riches of the Nation, or converting them to his private Uses. He had so great an Ascendent, that the King's Favours were his continual Advantages; and he wore the very Jewels of the Crown, which the King imprudently declar'd, should have descended to him, were his Power equal to his Affection.

Ordinances
Nobility.

By reason of the King's extravagant Favours, and especially for his marrying him to his Niece Margaret, Sister to the Earl of Glocester, the Nobility were much exasperated, who vehemently press'd the King, That he would oblige him to avoid the Realm. Upon which Importunities, the King with great Reluctancy sent him into Ireland; not as an Exile, but as his Lieutenant there, to direct and act all Things in his Name, as if he had been present himself. But he continu'd not long in that Country; for in the second Year of this Reign, to the King's great Satisfaction, he procur'd a Tournament to be proclaim'd at Wallingford, where he appear'd with so many Military Men out of Foreign Parts, that he insulted over the English Nobility that came to meet him; among whom the chief were the Earls of Lancaster, Hereford, Warwick, Pembroke and Warren, to whom this Favourite gave ridiculous and opprobrious Names. The Prelates, Earls and Barons, taking advantage of the King's exorbitant Kindness to him, and his heaping such vast Riches upon him, to the great Diminution of the Crown Revenues, by their daily Care at length obtain'd of the King to make a formal Grant or Commission to them, enabling them to appoint a select Number amongst them, that should have Power to make Ordinances for the Government of the King's Household and his Kingdom. Accordingly seven Prelates, eight Earls, and six Barons were nominated and solemnly sworn; who after that drew up forty one Articles, Ordinances or Constitutions, which were all confirm'd by a particular Instrument from the King. Thus he who before seem'd jealous of trusting his Subjects, now gave them an Opportunity of punishing that Mistrust; and to add to the King's Troubles, he now receiv'd many Complaints from the Pope, with a particular Demand of the Rent of a thousand Marks per Annum due to the Roman Church, and Arrears for fifteen Years in his Father's Time: But we do not find how he satisfy'd these Demands.

By the twentieth Article of the Ordinances Earl Gaveston was oblig'd with great Uneasiness to quit the Nation and go into Banishment; yet in no long Time after, the King recall'd him with infinite Fondness, declaring, That he had been banish'd contrary to the Laws and Usages of the Kingdom, which he was bound to maintain by his Coronation Oath. Therefore he wrote to all the Sheriffs in England, 'That since in the Instrument of Exile he had no other Appellations but of Good and Loyal, he return'd at his Commandment, and was ready to answer all that could be objected against him: Wherefore he should always esteem him Good and Loyal, and expected them to repute him so, and to publish the Matter through their whole Counties. The Lords did not neglect this Occasion of the King's Tenderness, but publicly declar'd, That the Laws and Customs of the Kingdom, together with the late made Ordinances, were not observ'd nor regarded. The King to obviate the Effects of such Reports issu'd a Declaration to be publish'd in all Parts, manifesting his Desire of Peace and an Observance of the Laws, and the late Ordinances; and not long after he wrote to the Community of the City of London, to secure that City, so that no Mischiefs might arise from the Meeting of the Nobility. These and some other Methods proving ineffectual, he design'd to proceed amicably with the dissatisfy'd Bishops and Barons, and according to the Power reserv'd in his Protestation when he confirm'd the Ordinances, he appointed thirteen Commissioners to treat with those of the Nobility who had made the late Ordinances, and to correct and reform all such Things as were prejudicial and injurious. These Proposals were very reasonable and amicable; but still the Insolencies and Extravagancies of Earl Gaveston so far increas'd, as prevented all Accommodation. And also the young Queen thought her self not a little injur'd by this ungrateful Man's Predominancy, for which she sent her Complaints to the King of France her Father, That her Lord's Affection to him was so great, that it had both alienated his Love for her, and himself from her Bed. Which occasion'd some Writers to say, That the King was as loose in a personal Affection to him, as he was in his publick Favours.

In the mean Time the Lords pursu'd their Designs both privately and publickly, which were much promoted by the old Earl of Lincoln's dying Speech to the powerful Earl of Lancaster, who had marry'd his Daughter and Heir; in which he alledg'd, That God had bless'd him with greater Riches and Authority than any Nobleman in England; for which he ow'd the greater Honour and Service: That he saw the Church of England, formerly in a State of Liberty, now reduc'd to Servitude by the Oppressions of the Romans, and the Exactions of Crown'd Heads; and the People, who had enjoy'd many Privileges, brought to the same Condition by divers Tallages and Vexations: Adjoining him by God's Blessing and his own, That when he had an Opportunity, he would deliver the Church and People from such Oppressions; That he would pay all due Honour and Reverence to the King his Lord, yet cause him to remove from his Presence all evil Counsellors and Strangers, and effectually to observe the Tenor of Magna Charta, and all other Ordinances granted to the Clergy and Laity; for accomplishing of which he should contract a strict Alliance with the Earl of Warwick, who better understood them than any other. Having ended this Speech, he took his leave of the World; and shortly after the great Earl of Lancaster, with his Adherents the Earls of Hereford, Pembroke, Warwick, Arundel and Warren, and several Barons, joining with the Arch-

Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, undertook to relieve the Holy Church from Oppression, and recover the due Liberty of the Kingdom, as Walsingham our Author expresses it.

A. D. 1312. The great Earl of Lancaster was chosen their General, who by common Consent sent to the King then at York, petitioning him, Either to deliver Earl Gaveston to them, or oblige him to quit the Kingdom, according to the late Ordinances. The King took small Notice of their Supplications, left York, and repair'd to Newcastle, where he continu'd for a considerable Space. Upon which the Lords, with what Forces they could raise, march'd with all Speed towards Newcastle; not that they would offer Injury, or create Trouble to their Sovereign, but only take Earl Gaveston, and judge him according to the Laws made by common Agreement. Upon their Approach, the King and Gaveston immediately fled to Tinmouth; and tho' the Queen, then great with Child, with a Flood of Tears begg'd of him not to leave her in that Place, he without any Pity took Shipping and sail'd with his Favourite to Scarborough, commanding the Garrison of the Castle to protect him, while he repair'd into Warwickshire. The Earl of Lancaster, having possess'd himself of Newcastle, sent Messengers to the Queen at Tinmouth to comfort her, faithfully promising, That he would not give over his Pursuit, 'till he had remov'd Gaveston from the King; excusing himself for not coming to her in Person, lest for her sake, he should incur the King's Indignation. Shortly after the Lords left Newcastle, march'd with all Speed to Scarborough Castle, and invested it; but the Earl of Lancaster finding no Opposition from the Country, retir'd with his Forces, and lett the Ears of Pembroke and Warren to take the Castle, who in a short Time so straiten'd it, that Gaveston surrender'd himself upon Condition that he might stand to the Judgment of the Barons, and once more speak to the King. Upon Notice of which, the King earnestly desir'd he might speak with him, and heartily begg'd that his Life might be sav'd; promising upon that Condition to satisfy the Desires of the Nobility in all Things. Upon this Promise, the Earl of Pembroke perswaded the Barons to grant the King's Request, engaging upon the highest Penalties to keep him safe, 'till he had spoken with the King, and then restore him to the Barons at a prefix'd Time and Place, designing to carry him to Wallingford. In his Way thither, at Deddington in Oxfordshire, the Earl left him to the Care of his Servants, while he lodg'd with his Lady at a neighbouring Place; which being known to the Earl of Warwick, he came with a great Force, and at Night took him from the Servants, and carry'd him to his Castle at Warwick. The Lords now consulting what to do with him, a subtle Man amongst them declar'd, That after all this Expence and Trouble, it would be very weak in them to hazard the losing of him; adding, That it was much better he should die, than a War should be rais'd in the Kingdom. Upon which Advice, they took him out of Prison, and carry'd him to an Ascent about a Mile North-East of Warwick, call'd Black-Low, and there beheaded this Favourite; notwithstanding the earnest Solicitations of the King, which nothing but the total Destruction of all Trust and Confidence could have render'd ineffectual.

The Lords now finding their own Strength and the King's Weakness, proudly demanded of the King, That their Ordinances might be confirm'd and put in Execution, Threatning to constrain him by Force if not speedily perform'd; and accordingly they quarter'd their Forces in the Country about Dunstable, while the King continu'd at London. Yet at length by the Management and Mediation of the Pope's Nuncio's, the Bishops and the Earl of Glocester, Articles were agreed upon, and the present Heats allay'd, upon Condition that the Lords should restore to the King all they had taken at Newcastle, and what belong'd to Earl Gaveston, all which was shortly after perform'd. But the Resentments the King harbour'd for the Loss of his dear Companion were by the Sycophancies of the French at Windsor reviv'd again in a short Time; therefore

fore in a Parliament at London, the King vehemently charg'd those presumptuous Lords with their Contempt against him in the Spoils they committed at Newcastle, and the inhuman Murther of his Friend. To all which they boldly reply'd, That they had not offended in any Point, but deserv'd his Royal Favour, in prosecuting the publick Enemy of the Nation, who had been so justly banish'd by two several Kings. Nevertheless, to prevent Civil Contests, by the careful Management of the young Queen and the Prelates, the Lords in the open Court at Westminster humbled themselves before the King, supplicating his Favour; and the King by Writing granted his gracious Pardon to all such as desir'd it. The whole House of Parliament seeing the King's Wants, of their own Accord granted him a Fifteenth, and all Parties return'd home with Satisfaction; but not long after, Guy Earl of Warwick, who in this Parliament was appointed to be of the Privy-Council, deceas'd, being poison'd by some of the King's secret Friends, as it was believ'd by many. In the same Year of this Reign, the King's Sorrow for Gaveston was much alleviated by the Birth of a Son at Windsor on the thirteenth Day of November, and baptiz'd by the Name of Edward; a Prince whose noble Acts afterwards redeem'd all the Blemishes with which his Father's Infelicities had darkned the English Name.

The Lords reconcil'd to the King.

King Edward III. born.

II. While the State of England stood thus distemper'd at home, through the Infirmary of a weak Head, that of Scotland grew strong by the provident Care of a vigilant and courageous King; who not only overcame all Factions, but gradually recover'd most of his own Country, and made great Devastations in the Borders of England. Having taken Edinburgh and other Places, while King Edward seem'd enchanted with unworthy Languishments, he sent his Brother to besiege the strong Castle of Sterling; but after some Continuance before it, and despairing of taking it by Force, both Parties agreed to these Conditions, That if the English did not relieve the Castle within a Year from the Day of the Treaty, it should be surrender'd to the Scots, and the Garrison should have safe Conduct to march whither they pleas'd, with all their Goods. Rous'd with these repeated Advantages, King Edward summon'd all his Power and Force, and with a mighty Army began his March, consisting of a hundred thousand Men, according to the Scotch Writers, and of those of many Nations, who in Imagination had possess'd themselves of all the Strength and Riches of Scotland, before they enter'd that Kingdom. Besides the King was gloriously attended with most of the Nobility and great Men of England, except the four Earls of Lancaster, Warwick, Warren and Arundel, who refus'd to go, because the King had protracted the Ratification of their desired Liberties and Provisions. This splendid Army having enter'd Scotland, more with the Ornaments of Festival Solemnities than the Accoutrements of hardy Soldiers, was met near Sterling by the undaunted King Robert at the Head of a well appointed Army of thirty thousand Men, harden'd with the continual Use of War and Domestick Evils, fierce and resolute, carrying about with them all their Hopes of Life, Liberty, and whatever was dear to them. The Advantage of the Ground was theirs, having on one Side inaccessible Rocks to defend them, on the other a moorish Spot of Land, where they made Pits and Trenches fill'd with sharp Stakes, and cover'd over with Hurdles, so that the Foot might safely pass over; but in the Battel they so hamper'd and confounded the English Horse, that the Scots gain'd the Day, and gave England the greatest Overthrow that ever that Nation sustain'd. This fatal Battel was call'd Bannock's-Bourn, because fought by the Brook or River Bannock, upon which the Scotch made several scoffing Rhymes upon the Losses and Misfortunes of the English. Gilbert Earl of Clare was slain, with many Noblemen of the highest Rank, seven hundred Knights and Bannerets, great Numbers of Gentlemen, and ten thousand common Soldiers, tho' the Scotch Writers say fifty. Many great Men were taken Prisoners, great Riches and Booty lost, and the King himself with great Difficulty escap'd by Flight. This Defeat gave such Wealth and Power to the Scots, that they liv'd securely for several Years after; yet King Edward upon his Return to York shew'd a great Inclination to repair this Dishonour, but the People grew cold and languid, and return'd home without effecting any Thing. The Unhappy Borderers were great Sufferers by it, and became so disheartned, that according to Walsingham a hundred of them would fly from three Scotch Soldiers; to such a sudden Faintness were the Inferiors brought, when the nobler Parts of the State were dispirited.

Calamities in England.

This great Disaster was attended and succeeded by terrible Inundations, Famines and Pestilences, which exceedingly afflicted the Land. Upon the Dearness of Provisions, at a Parliament held at Westminster, it was ordain'd That all Victuals exceeding an establish'd Price should be forfeited to the King: Particularly the best Ox fatted with Grass should be sold for sixteen Shillings, if fatted with Corn for twenty four Shillings; the best Cow for twelve Shillings; a fat Swine of two Years old for three Shillings and four Pence; a fat Wether or Mutton unshorn for twenty Pence, and thorn for fourteen Pence; a fat Goose for two Pence half-penny, a fat Capon for two Pence, a fat Hen for a Penny, two Chickens for a Penny, four Pidgeons for a Penny, and twenty four Eggs for the same. But this Act was in Time found to be so prejudicial, by reason of the Scarcity of all Things, that in the following Year it was repeal'd, and Men were left to their Liberty to make what Advantage they could in these calamitous Times. But neither the Dishonours from Scotland, nor the Miseries and Discontents at home, could divert King Edward from a publick Solemnization of his beloved Gaveston's Funeral; whose Body he remov'd with great Pomp and Splendor from his former Burial at Oxford to King's Langley in Hertfordshire; where he in Person, with the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, four Bishops, many Abbots and Ecclesiasticks, honour'd his Obsequies: But few of the Nobility could so far lay aside their Resentments, as to attend upon such an Occasion.

A great Famine.

In the mean Time the State of the Kingdom became deplorable, there being no Love between the King and the Nobility, nor any great Care in Him, or Them, of the publick Affairs; yet they assembled at a Parliament in London, where nothing material was enacted, and the Famine and Pettilence daily increas'd. The Famine was become so excessive, as we are told, That not only Horses and Dogs, but even Men and Children were stolen for Food; and, which is horrible to imagine, the Criminals newly brought into the Prisons, were torn in Pieces, and eaten almost alive by such as had been there a longer Time. In London it was proclaim'd, That no Corn should be converted to Brewers Uses, which Act, the King, mov'd with Compassion towards the Nation, both follow'd himself, and caus'd to be executed throughout the Kingdom; otherwise, says Walsingham, the greater Part of the People had perish'd for want of Bread. The Bloody Flux or Dysentery, caus'd by crude and corrupt Humours, proceeding from unwholsome Diet, rag'd in all Places, and together with other Distempers brought such Multitudes of the meaner Sort to their Graves, that the Living were scarce sufficient to bury the Dead. But all these Calamities could not extinguish the Rancour between the King and his Nobility, tho' he made the Head of them, the Earl of Lancaster, Chief of his Privy-Council; for daily some Accident happen'd that increas'd the Averfion.

Hatred between the King and Nobility.

Particularly this great Earl's Wife was taken out of his House at Canford in Dorsetshire, by one Richard St. Martin, a most deformed Dwarf, who claim'd her, the greatest Heiress in England, for his Wife, avowing that he had lain with her before she was marry'd to the Earl; which the Lady her self, to her perpetual Infamy and Dishonour, voluntarily averr'd. By her this worthless Person claim'd and obtain'd both the Earldoms of Lincoln and Salisbury, to the

the great Diminution of the Earl's Power and Fortunes; which never could have been effected without the greatest Supporters. The King was noted as a special Agent in this Affair, which being in so tender a Point as Marriage, added much to his other Violations of Order and good Government, and gave Occasion and Boldness to inferior Persons to reproach his Behaviour. Particularly at the Celebration of the Feast of Pentecost, at Dinner in the open Hall of Westminster, a Woman fantastically disguis'd enter'd on Horse-back and deliver'd a Letter to him at the Table, which reprov'd him for his great Neglect of such as had done noble Service to him and his Father, and tax'd him with advancing of unworthy Men, and other Miscarriages. This Letter being read, and the Woman retir'd, the King in a Rage blam'd his Guards for suffering her to enter in such a Manner; who excus'd themselves by alledging It was not the Custom in Kings Palaces, at Times of Festivals, to keep out any that came to divert the Assembly. The Woman being found, confess'd that she was hired by a particular Knight to do this Act; and he being examin'd, boldly declar'd, That what he did was purely for the King's Honour, and so escap'd without any further Noise or Disturbance.

Still the Northern Parts were not only infested and wasted by the Scots, but likewise by such English as under Colour of Protection and Assistance, robb'd and pillag'd where-ever they came, to the miserable Ruin of the Inhabitants. Nor did the King seem to have any Will or Power to relieve the common Calamities, but rather to convert all his Thoughts and Forces against the Displeasure of the Nobility, who under the Notion of maintaining their Provisions and Establishments, daily withdrew their Love, Service and Duty from him. Wherefore finding himself thus weak and abandon'd, he begg'd the Spiritual Assistance of the Pope; who thereupon sent certain Cardinals to settle the Peace and Tranquility of the Nation. These made a formal Reconciliation between the King and the Earl of Lancaster, who in a certain Plain near Leicester amicably met with Kisses and Embraces; but when they could not work the same Effect with the Scots, they put their whole Country under an Interdict. For they had now so much increas'd in Strength and Power, that they began to cast their Eyes upon the Kingdom of Ireland; whither Edward, Brother to King Robert, had pass'd with an Army, and procur'd himself to be crown'd King of that Country, by the Favour of some of the Irish Nobility. Yet after three Years from his first Entrance, the English under the Conduct of the Arch-Bishop of Armagh, and John Lord Brenningham Justiciary of Ireland, so valiantly encounter'd him, that he lost both his usurped Kingdom and his Life. In this Battel fell many of the Scotch Nobility, besides above five thousand of the ordinary Sort, which much diminish'd the Glory of all their former Successes. But King Robert, like an expert and vigilant Prince, was no ways dishearten'd, but proceeding with all Vigour, won the important Town of Berwick, which was soon surrender'd to him, by the Treason, as it is believ'd, of Peter Spalding the Governor. And when King Edward endeavour'd to recover it again, the Scots diverted him from the Siege with Incursions and Slaughters of his People in other Parts of England, being near surprizing of the Queen her self in a Village not far from York, where she continu'd during the Siege of Berwick; which Contrivance was form'd by the Scots and some perfidious English, whom King Robert had brib'd for that purpose. The Inhabitants of York and the adjacent Country, having sustain'd innumerable Losses by the Scots, gather'd together an Army of ten thousand Men, and briskly attack'd them at Wilton on Swaile; but being neither well led, nor experienc'd, they were defeated with the Loss of three thousand Men. The King being inform'd of this Misfortune, and finding all Affairs in a melancholy Posture, gladly concluded a formal Truce with the Scots for two Years, and again return'd with Dishonour from the Northern Parts.

III. The Truce with the Scots gave no Ease to the Nation as was expected, but was succeeded with great Troubles and Confusion. For it happen'd that about this Time, the King, upon the Recommendation of the Lords themselves, had made Hugh de Spenser Lord Chamberlain, who being a Man of equal Insolence, Vices and Ambition with Gaveston, so insinuated himself with the King, that he obtain'd all the Favours and Authority that the other ever enjoy'd, and in like manner procur'd no less Envy and Hatred. Hugh his Father, an ancient Knight, the better to support his Son in his Courses, was likewise employ'd, and grew in great Favour with the King, who afterwards also created him Earl of Winchester; and tho' he was unlike his Son in Manners and Qualifications, yet his inordinate Affection to him was the Cause of his own Ruin. The Son, as he was of a noble Shape and Presence, so the very Spirit of Pride and Rapine carry'd him to such intollerable Actions and Oppressions, that Gaveston might with good Reason seem to be wish'd for again. Against these two, who wholly govern'd the unfortunate King, the popular Earl of Lancaster and most of the Nobility swell'd with such Rage and Impatience, that gathering together above eleven thousand Men, they enter'd upon their several Lands and vast Estates, wasted sixty three Manors of the Father, and took away such Quantities of Sheep, Oxen and Swine, together with such Provisions of Corn, Wine, and other Conveniencies and Necessaries from both, as amounted to about sixty eight thousand Pounds; as it was given in by themselves afterwards. And not satisfy'd with these Wailes, the Lords by the Terror of civil Arms, in Parliament procur'd these two Favourites to be banish'd; revenging at once both their own and the publick Injuries.

*The Nobility rise

In all Contests which happen'd between the King and his Nobility, Queen Isabel had been hitherto a Promoter of Peace, and a Performer of many worthy Offices; but the ill Fates of the Earls of Lancaster and Hereford would not permit her to continue so any longer: For the Queen being one Night deny'd Lodging in the Castle of Leeds in Kent, which belong'd to the Lord of Badlesmere, one of the Earl's Party, she withdrew her good Opinion, and oblig'd the King to take a cruel Revenge for this Dishonour. For immediately after coming in Person with many thousand Men before the Castle, he took the Governor, and all the best of the Garrison, and put them to a shameful Death. Then desiring to be reveng'd on the Lords for their late Insolencies, he march'd to Cirester, took many Castles and besieg'd others; while the Lords, not suspecting such sudden Assaults, were providing for their Defence. At Cirester Hugh Spenser the Son repair'd to him according to Command, having been hovering upon the Sea, expecting the Event of these Affairs by Land. The Nobility, who had fallen from their Sovereign's good Opinion, and wanting now their usual Mediatrix the Queen, lay expos'd to all the Mischiefs that Enemies could raise or procure from the King; who, taking the Regal Power to be in Danger, resolv'd courageously to die in the Contest, or bring the Lords to a full Subjection. In the mean Time the Judgment of Banishment given against the two Spencers was revers'd as erroneous, and their Revocation decreed by the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury and his Suffragans.

The Faction weaken'd by this Detection, drew together in the North under the Conduct of the Earl of Lancaster, who was now to fight for his Life as well as Estate. Upon which the King march'd thither, and with a Part of his Army constrain'd the Earl to fly from Burton upon Trent; whose Forces in their Retreat or Flight behav'd themselves outrageously and barbarously. But they soon met with their deserv'd Punishment

ment; for the King pursu'd them to Burgh-Bridge, while they were marching towards their Allies the Scots, where they were stopp'd by Forces brought from Carlisle by Sir Andrew Harclay, and others from York by Sir Simon Ward. In forcing his Way over the Bridge, the Earl of Hereford was kill'd; and the Earl of Lancaster not being able to sustain the Shock of the Battel, nor yet to escape, was taken Prisoner by Sir Andrew Harclay, and many other Barons, Bannerets and Knights, to the Number of ninety five. The Earl was immediately sent Prisoner to Pontfract Castle, his own but lately surrender'd, where the whole Multitude derided him and call'd him King Arthur, which Name he is said by some to have assum'd to himself, in an intercepted Letter written to the Scots. But this was not all his Fate, for on the third Day after his Apprehension, the King sitting in Judgment at the same Castle, with his Brother Edmund Earl of Kent, the Earls of Pembroke and Warren, both the Spensers, and others, Sentence of Death was given against Thomas Earl of Lancaster, by drawing, hanging and beheading as a Rebel and a Traitor. The two first Punishments were remitted in regard he was of the Royal Blood; but he was beheaded on the same Day he was condemn'd without the Town of Pontfract, before his own Castle, and that without answering, or the Judgment of his Peers. And by the same Judgment were condemn'd the Lord Roger Clifford, the Lord Warren Lisle, the Lord William Tokit, Thomas Manduit, Henry Bradburn, William Fitzwilliams, William Lord Cheyny, Thomas Lord Mowbray, and Joceline Lord D'enynvill; all which were executed at York. Shortly after the Lord Teyes was taken, drawn, hang'd and quarter'd at London, the Lord Aldenham at Windsor, the Lords Badlesmere and Ashburnham at Canterbury, and the Lord Gifford at Glocester; all great Men and in great Cities, to spread the more Terror over the Kingdom; which was attended with the intire Confiscation of all their Lands, Titles and Estates, by which many were enrich'd and advanc'd. Never was the English Nation so stain'd with the Blood of her Nobility shed in this Manner since the Conquest, which being caus'd in a great Measure by the Power of the Spensers, and without regular Process, it open'd Veins for more to follow, and afterwards procur'd a most dismal Revenge.

A grand Execution of the Nobility.

King Edward conceiving that this Exploit had made him formidable to the Scots, as well as terrible to the English, march'd with a mighty Army, but with small Provisions into Scotland; from whence not long after, for want of usual Subsistence, he was compell'd to retire without the Honour of any Action. And what prov'd still more dishonourable, the Scots pursu'd him many Miles into England, and at Blackmore Forest took all his Treasure and Furniture, and were so near taking his Person, that he could hardly escape with a few Followers. They took the Earl of Richmond and the King of France's Envoy, with many others, and wasted the Country with Fire and Sword almost to the Walls of York; they burnt Ripon, and compounded with Beverly for four hundred Pounds, and return'd home loaden with great Spoils and Booty. This was the Success of this unfortunate King in his third Scottish Expedition; yet King Robert, having lain five Years under the Censure of the Pope's Interdict, desir'd a Truce, which was granted him for thirteen Years.

The King worsted by the Scots.

And now being at Leisure, and in a calmer Temper, the King began to have a Sense of the Execution of the Earl of Lancaster, which was discover'd upon this Occasion: Some Persons about him making earnest Suit to grant a Pardon to a Man of low Condition, one of the Earl's Assistants and Followers, he fell into a violent Passion, exclaiming against them as unjust and wicked Counsellors, who could urge him to save the Life of a notorious Villain, and would not speak one Word for his near Kinsman the Earl of Lancaster; who, if he had liv'd, might have been beneficial to him and the whole Kingdom; but for this Man, the longer he liv'd, the more Mischief he would commit: Therefore with a desperate Oath he declar'd, That he should suffer that Death he

Spencers.*

III. The Truce with the Scots gave no Ease to the Nation as was expected, but was succeeded with great Troubles and Confusion. For it happen'd that about this Time, the King, upon the Recommendation of the Lords themselves, had made Hugh de Spenser Lord Chamberlain, who being a Man of equal Insolence, Vices and Ambition with Gaveston, so insinuated himself with the King, that he obtain'd all the Favours and Authority that the other ever enjoy'd, and in like manner procur'd no less Envy and Hatred. Hugh his Father, an ancient Knight, the better to support his Son in his Courses, was likewise employ'd, and grew in great Favour with the King, who afterwards also created him Earl of Winchester; and tho' he was unlike his Son in Manners and Qualifications, yet his inordinate Affection to him was the Cause of his own Ruin. The Son, as he was of a noble Shape and Presence, so the very Spirit of Pride and Rapine carry'd him to such intollerable Actions and Oppressions, that Gaveston might with good Reason seem to be wish'd for again. Against these two, who wholly govern'd the unfortunate King, the popular Earl of Lancaster and most of the Nobility swell'd with such Rage and Impatience, that gathering together above eleven thousand Men, they enter'd upon their several Lands and vast Estates, wasted sixty three Manors of the Father, and took away such Quantities of Sheep, Oxen and Swine, together with such Provisions of Corn, Wine, and other Conveniencies and Necessaries from both, as amounted to about sixty eight thousand Pounds; as it was given in by themselves afterwards. And not satisfy'd with these Wastes, the Lords by the Terror of civil Arms, in Parliament procur'd these two Favourites to be banish'd; revenging at once both their own and the publick Injuries.

*The Nobility rise
against them.They are banish'd.The Beginning of a Civil War.*

In all Contests which happen'd between the King and his Nobility, Queen Isabel had been hitherto a Promoter of Peace, and a Performer of many worthy Offices; but the ill Fates of the Earls of Lancaster and Hereford would not permit her to continue so any longer: For the Queen being one Night deny'd Lodging in the Castle of Leeds in Kent, which belong'd to the Lord of Badlesmere, one of the Earl's Party, she withdrew her good Opinion, and oblig'd the King to take a cruel Revenge for this Dishonour. For immediately after coming in Person with many thousand Men before the Castle, he took the Governor, and all the best of the Garrison, and put them to a shameful Death. Then desiring to be reveng'd on the Lords for their late Insolencies, he march'd to Cirester, took many Castles and besieg'd others; while the Lords, not suspecting such sudden Assaults, were providing for their Defence. At Cirester Hugh Spenser the Son repair'd to him according to Command, having been hovering upon the Sea, expecting the Event of these Affairs by Land. The Nobility, who had fallen from their Sovereign's good Opinion, and wanting now their usual Mediatrix the Queen, lay expos'd to all the Mischiefs that Enemies could raise or procure from the King; who, taking the Regal Power to be in Danger, resolv'd courageously to die in the Contest, or bring the Lords to a full Subjection. In the mean Time the Judgment of Banishment given against the two Spencers was revers'd as erroneous, and their Revocation decreed by the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury and his Suffragans.

*The Lords

The Lords, not all of the same Disposition, began to be apprehensive of the King's Power, and many of them forsook their Commander the Earl of Lancaster, and surrender'd themselves to the King; and others were apprehended, particularly the two Mortimers, who were committed to the Tower of London, and others to Wallingford Castle. The Faction weaken'd by this Detection, drew together in the North under the Conduct of the Earl of Lancaster, who was now to fight for his Life as well as Estate. Upon which the King march'd thither, and with a Part of his Army constrain'd the Earl to fly from Burton upon Trent; whose Forces in their Retreat or Flight behav'd themselves outrageously and barbarously. A grand Execution of the Nobility.

King Edward conceiving that this Exploit had made him formidable to the Scots, as well as terrible to the English, march'd with a mighty Army, but with small Provisions into Scotland; from whence not long after, for want of usual Subsistence, he was compell'd to retire without the Honour of any Action. This was the Success of this unfortunate King in his third Scottish Expedition; yet King Robert, having lain five Years under the Censure of the Pope's Interdict, desir'd a Truce, which was granted him for thirteen Years.

The King worsted by the Scots.

And now being at Leisure, and in a calmer Temper, the King began to have a Sense of the Execution of the Earl of Lancaster, which was discover'd upon this Occasion: Some Persons about him making earnest Suit to grant a Pardon to a Man of low Condition, one of the Earl's Assistants and Followers, he fell into a violent Passion, exclaiming against them as unjust and wicked Counsellors, who could urge him to save the Life of a notorious Villain, and would not speak one Word for his near Kinsman the Earl of Lancaster; who, if he had liv'd, might have been beneficial to him and the whole Kingdom; but for this Man, the longer he liv'd, the more Mischief he would commit: Therefore with a desperate Oath he declar'd, That he should suffer that Death he had deserv'd. And notwithstanding the Crimes and Treasons of this Earl of Lancaster, the People held him in such Veneration, that they repair'd to his Tomb as to that of the greatest Saint; and many Miracles and Cures were reported to have been wrought there. Sir Andrew Harclay, who took him Prisoner at Burgh-Bridge, being advanc'd for his Service to the Earldom of Carlisle, enjoy'd his Honour but a short Time. For in the following Year, either falling into Discontent by the Spensers envying his high Preferment, or combining with the Scots who had allur'd him with the Hopes of a great Match, as he was accus'd, he was degraded of all his Honours, drawn, hang'd and quarter'd at London for Treason; and remains among the Examples of sudden Down-falls, under an unconstant and ill-governing Prince.

A. D. IV. We are now arriv'd at the last Act or Part of King Edward's Tragical Misfortunes; occasion'd from the new King of France, Charles the Fifth, his pretending to seize the Dutchy of Gascony for want of Homage, and from the exorbitant Power and Possessions of the two Spensers. These two powerful Men, one created Earl of Winchester and the other Earl of Glocester, now aspiring to the Height of Command, and endeavouring to remove all Impediments to their Grandeur, continually rais'd mortal Enmities against themselves and the King. The Queen took their Carriage heinously, because, among other Disobligations, they had retrench'd her expensive Way of Living, while they abounded in all Riches and Magnificence, as she complain'd, particularly, That the Daughter and Heir of the King of France was marry'd to a Miser, and tho' she was promis'd to be made a Queen, she was no better than a Waiting-Woman, living upon a Pension from the Spensers. Thus was the Foundation of their common Destruction laid, and begun in the Impotency of a Woman's Will; to strengthen which, they themselves increas'd her Party with Adam Bishop of Hereford, by divesting him of all his Temporalties as a Traitor, for having supported the Mortimers in the Barons Contest. This Adam was a Man of a subtle Wit, profound in Human Policy, daring and factious, who for this Cause conceiving the greatest Indignation, soon found means to become dear to the Queen, and to form a great and secret Party: To which Henry Bishop of Lincoln, who for the like Causes had been kept out of his Temporalties about two Years, join'd himself. Neither would the Avarice of the Spensers permit them to lessen the Multitudes of their Enemies; for they sold the King's Pardons and Favours to such as had been concern'd in the Barons Contest at such excessive Rates, both of Lands and Mony, that they impoverish'd many of the Nobility. In sum, the Royal Power being in the Hands of the Spensers, and the Chancellor Baldock, or of their Creatures and Favourites, this new Faction had the general Discontents of the Nation to work upon for their Advantage.

A. D. The King being thus govern'd, and having sent his Brother Edmund Earl of Kent to compose the Affairs of Gascony, the Matter was soon brought to this Issue: That whereas the King resolv'd to have gone in Person into France, the Spensers, who dreaded a Separation from his Person, as knowing the Reverence of that to be their only Safeguard, perswaded the King, contrary to the Opinion of all others, to oblige the Queen in her Requests, and send her over to negotiate his Affairs with her Brother the French King. All this she in a short Time perform'd, and by her Suit and Management all Differences were compos'd, upon Condition that King Edward should give to his Son Prince Edward the Dukedom of Gascony and the Earldom of Ponthieu, for which the King of France was willing to accept of his young Nephew's Homage. This being effected, the Prince was sent over for that Purpose to his Mother, to the utter Ruin of the King his Father and all his Favourites: For the Heir of England and being in Foreign Parts, and among the contrary Faction, all their Consultation was, under Colour of defeating the Spensers, how to accomplish their own Delights

The several Steps towards King Edward's Ruin.

The Queen sent over to France.

Designs. And what strengthen'd their Interest was the Arrival of young Roger Mortimer from England, a Person as much in Favour with the Queen as the Spensers were with the King, who having been imprison'd in the Tower for joining in the late Rebellion, had either corrupted or poison'd his Keepers, and made his Escape with other Fugitives into France. Now the Queen and Prince having perform'd the whole of their Negotiation, the King about Michaelmas sent several kind Letters and Messages to them to desire them to return into England; but the Conspiracy not being ripe, she deferr'd the Thing upon several Pretences, and detain'd her Son still. Among many that went over with the young Prince was Stapleton Bishop of Exeter, who perceiving the Familiarity between the Queen and Mortimer to be greater than was agreeable either to her Honour or Duty, and seeing him and other Fugitives enjoy that Privacy in Council that was assign'd to himself, he return'd secretly and unexpectedly into England, and faithfully inform'd the King of all that he knew.

Designs against the King.

The unfortunate King Edward now clearly seeing his Error, by the Greatness of his Dangers, earnestly solicited the King of France to send home the Queen and the Prince; but that not succeeding, he imprudently in the City of London caus'd them to be proclaim'd Enemies to the Kingdom, banishing them and all their Adherents from the same. For his greater Security also he caus'd the Ports to be carefully watch'd; and besides this, there was a Design laid, as it was suppos'd and believ'd, to take away the Lives of the Queen and Prince. The Queen on the other Side, fearing that the Spensers Gold might ruin all her Proceedings in France, politickly retir'd out of the Way, 'till with the Prince, the Lord Mortimer, and her other Adherents, were arriv'd safely in Hainault. There was also some other Reasons to move Queen Isabel to depart out of France, besides the Danger of Designs against her Person, as to divert and remove a War from her Native Country, which for her sake began now to be infested on the Sea-Coasts: For Sir John Oturwin, Sir Nicolas Kiried, and Sir John Felton, with the Navy of the Ports, and of other Places, had by Commission from the King so scour'd the narrow Seas, that they within a short Time, brought a hundred and twenty Norman Ships into England, as lawful Prizes. And further, whereas those two Bishops, which the Pope had sent over upon her Account, were return'd out of England, without doing or hoping to do her any Service, she was fully perswaded that the Sword or nothing could effect it.

But at Hainault she found a hearty and honourable Reception from William the Earl of that Country; where, contrary to the Advice and Consent of the Peers of England, she contracted the Prince her Son, then not fourteen Years of Age, to Philippa, one of the Earl's Daughters; and with the Mony of her Portion rais'd Soldiers out of Hainault and Germany for her Service in England. Being provided with Men and Vessels, she embark'd for England with her Son, and Edmund Earl of Kent the King's Brother, Roger Mortimer, and many others who fled out of England, and with two thousand seven hundred and fifty seven Men at Arms, commanded by John the Earl's Brother, she landed at Harwich on Wednesday before Michaelmas Day, where she was join'd by the Earl-Marshal; the Earl of Leicester, with several Barons and Knights, and almost all the Prelates, but chiefly with the Bishops of Lincoln, Hereford and Ely, who together compos'd a considerable Army, which being refresh'd at St. Edmund's Bury, set forwards to meet with all Opposers. The unfortunate King, now destitute of Friends and Means, as well as Courage and Counsel, demanded Assistance of the City of London, where he receiv'd this Answer, That they would honour and obey the King, Queen and Prince, but would shut their Gates against all Foreigners and Traitors to the Realm. The King and his few Friends reposing no Assurance in this Answer, committed an Error worse than any of his former, by retiring himself into the West, with his inseparable Favourites the Spensers, Baldock and others, there to raise an Army

Army against the Queen. But before his Departure, he left his other Son, the Lord John of Eltham in the Tower of London, with his Niece (the Countess of Glocester Wife to the younger Spenser, committing the Government of the Tower to Sir John Weston, who was well provided of Men and Ammunition. He also by Proclamation commanded all Men to kill and destroy the Queen's Adherents, none excepted but her self, the Prince, and Edmund Earl of Kent; and that none upon pain of Death, and Forfeiture of Estates, should any ways aid or assist them; and that whoever brought him the Head of the Lord Mortimer, should be rewarded with a thousand Pounds. Thus the King took his final leave of the City of London, and in a great Measure of his Rule and Dominion.

The Queen's
Power increases

On the contrary Side the Queen in a short Time gather'd a very considerable Force, which to retain, as well as to encrease, Letters and Rumours were dispers'd in all Parts, declaring That the King of France, to aid his Sister, had got ready so many Dukes, Earls and others, that England could scarce maintain them. This false Report had great Effect upon such as depended upon the Force of Arms; but to those whom the Power of Religion might move, it was as subtly, tho' as falsely spread abroad, That the Pope had excommunicated all such as had taken up Arms against the Queen; and the more to countenance the Faction, that two Cardinals employ'd about that Affair, were seen in the Queen's Camp. Besides these, it was proclaim'd, That the Causes of the Queen's Arrival were only to deliver the Nation from the King's Evil Counsellors, which were nam'd to be the two Spensers, Robert Baldock Lord Chancellor, and their Favourites; all others were to be safe, that nothing should be taken from any Subject without paying ready Mony, and a Penalty was impos'd on all who acted contrary, as for the Value of three Pence to lose a Finger, six Pence the Hand, and twelve Pence the Head; and finally whosoever brought the younger Spenser's Head to the Queen, should have two thousand Pounds Reward. With these outward Shows of Justice and Reason, the Queen with her Son and whole Army pursu'd the King, as it had been agreed in a Council of War, marching first into the City of Oxford; where the Bishop of Hereford, the Queen's chief Counsellor, preach'd before her, the Army and the University, believing the Cause of her Proceedings, and taking for his Text, My Head, my Head aketh; from whence he concluded, contrary to the Rules of Physick, as well as Precepts of Divinity, that an aking and sick Head of a Kingdom, was of Necessity to be taken off, and not otherwise to be cured. In the mean Time the Londoners in Favour of the Queen, and Hatred of the Spensers, committed horrid Outrages, besides inhuman Sacrilege in cutting off the Bishop of Exeter's Head, and some others, whom the King had left Guardians of the City, among whom was a Citizen of their own John de Marchal, an Acquaintance of the younger Spenser. They also got the Tower into their Possession, placing and displacing the Garrison and Officers at their Pleasure, under the Name of the Lord John of Eltham, the King's second Son, whom they proclaim'd Custos of the City and the Kingdom. They also set at Liberty all Prisoners, which by the popular Queen's Commands was done throughout the Nation; and all Exiles and Fugitives were recall'd, who all flocking to the City of London, made no small Addition to her Forces.

She pursues the King.

The King re-
sires to Wales.

The miserable King had now the clamorous Effects of ill Counsels calling too loud upon him; yet found no Way left to recover or repair the Misfortunes to which those Errors had reduc'd him. Where-ever he went he found but few Subjects, for those with their Hearts were lost before; but being led on by uncertain Advices, after many Motions, as various as his former Humour, he took Shipping with a few Friends, intending for the Isle of Lundy, or Ireland, but having sustain'd much Damage at Sea, he came on Shore in Glamorganshire, where he entrusted himself to God, and the Faith of the Welsh, who still retain'd their former Love to him, lying secret amongst them in the Abby of Nezhe.

Nethe. In the mean Time the Queen with increasing Forces, and restless Revenge, pursu'd her flying Husband and Sovereign; and from Oxford march'd directly to Glocester, and from thence to Bristol; which being fortify'd as well as the Time would permit, was committed by the King to the Care of the Earl of Arundel, and the elder Spenser. But this Place soon yielded to that Success, which seem'd to deny all Hopes to the King's declining Condition. Old Spenser was there taken and executed upon the common Gallows with all the Rigour that Revenge and Conquest could invent; and with as much Contempt of Law, as he and his Son had formerly shew'd. They condemn'd him without Trial; and prevented his natural End, which could not have been long, being then near ninety Years of Age.

Old Spenser executed.

The King having lain conceal'd for some Time, Proclamations were daily issued from the Queen's Army declaring, That if King Edward would come in and conform himself to the Laws and Government of the Nation, he should be restor'd by the general Consent of the People. But the King, not daring to trust to this Declaration, kept himself still conceal'd with Spenser; upon which the Queen with her Forces and Friends at Hereford undertook to dispose of the Government, and by the Consent of the Lords and Community of England, Prince Edward was made Custos or Guardian of the Kingdom, and had Fealty sworn to him accordingly; the Bishop of Norwich was made Chancellor of the Realm, and the Bishop of Winchester Treasurer. But the King's Person was still too great to be kept long in secret; for the revengeful Eyes of the late Earl of Lancaster's Brother, with some others, soon discover'd him in his Retirement; and by the Force of Mony and Arms they got him into their Possession, together with the younger Spenser, Chancellor Baldock, and Simon de Reding. The King was convey'd by the Earl from the Place of his Captivity to Monmouth, to Ledbury, and so to the Castle of Kenelworth in Warwickshire, belonging to the Earl of Leicester, to whose Custody he was committed: The other three, Spenser, Baldock and Reding, were strongly guarded to Hereford, there to be dispos'd at the Pleasure of their most mortal Enemies. Before their Arrival, the Earl of Arundel with some others were beheaded, chiefly to oblige Mortimer, who now govern'd the Queen's Affections as well as Affairs. The younger Spenser was carry'd along, only to grace the Queen's triumphant March; and, as the chief Cause of her taking Arms, he was render'd a most contemptible Spectacle, and expos'd in a sitting Posture, to increase the Scorns and Reproaches that usually attend such miserable Objects. But he was soon eas'd of his Sufferings, and receiv'd Sentence of Death from the Judge William Trussel; then being ignominiously dragg'd to the Place of Execution, he was hung upon a Gallows fifty Foot high, and after that beheaded and quarter'd; they who brought him to the Queen having their promis'd Reward of two thousand Pounds. His Head was set up at London, and his Quarters in four Parts of the Kingdom; and Simon de Reding was hang'd ten Foot lower than he in the same Place. This Execution was done on a Monday, in Revenge of the Death of the Earl of Lancaster, whose Blood was shed on that Day. As to Chancellor Baldock, he was committed to the Bishop of Hereford's Care, who brought him to London; where the tumultuous People took him by Violence, and tho' he was a Bishop, thrust him into Newgate, where he dy'd miserably.

Prince Edward made Custos of the Kingdom.

The King is taken.

Young Spenser executed.

After some Stay at Hereford, the Queen came to London with her Son Edward, and her Favourite Mortimer; where she was receiv'd with as many Testimonies of Joy and Satisfaction, as could arise from two such great Causes, as the Misfortunes of her Husband, and her own Success. A Parliament or Convention was then summon'd, which was held the next Day after the Epiphany; where it was adjudg'd and declar'd That King Edward was unfit to govern the Kingdom any longer, for these Reasons: First, 'For that in all his Reign he has been mis-led and govern'd by others, who gave him evil Counsel to the Dishonour of Himself, and the Destruction of the Church and his People, not consider-

*He is declar’d
no King.*

For these Reasons he was declar’d no King, and his Son appointed to be crown’d, which was proclaim’d in the great Hall of Westminster, with the universal Consent of the People there present; and the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury made a Sermon upon this Text, The Voice of the People is the Voice of God, exhorting all there present to invoke the King of Kings for the Person they had then chosen.

The Queen, when she heard of this heavy Sentence, of deposing her Husband, seem’d to sink under the Weight he was to bear, and to act the Part of a tender and dutiful Wife; but she who had reduc’d him to that Condition could scarcely with feign’d Tears and Lamentations persuade others to believe that she really deplor’d it. Besides that unjustifiable Passion for Mortimer, which had so long and so violently govern’d her, was a convincing Proof that there was not Kindness enough left for her unhappy Husband to cause a sincere Grief for his Calamities. The Prince her Son, either mov’d by that specious Shew of Sorrow, which might easily deceive his innocent Youth, or rather urg’d by his own natural and generous Temper, solemnly vow’d That he would never accept of the Crown but by his Father’s Consent. Upon which Commissioners were sent to the King at Kenelworth Castle, consisting of three Bishops, two Earls, two Barons, two Abbots, and two Justiciaries; among whom was Judge Trussel, Proxy to the whole Parliament. The Bishops of Lincoln and Hereford went before to prepare and persuade the King to resign the Crown; and as Promises frequently exceed Performances, they assur’d him, He should live more happy than before, and that in Effect he should only resign his Cares, and enjoy an undisturb’d Quiet and Plenty. On the other side they threatned, That if he refus’d to Grant what the People would certainly Take, and which was desir’d of him to satisfy his Son, he could not prevent his own Fate, but would bring Misfortunes upon his Posterity; for in that Case the People would chuse a King that had no Relation to his Blood.

He is persuaded to resign.

Upon the Arrival of the Commissioners, who were to receive his Resignation, the poor dispirited King came forth cloath’d in deep Mourning answerable to his Sorrows; and at the Sight of that Power which was to take away his, he could support himself no longer, but sunk with the Weight of his Afflictions down to the Ground. But after some Time being reviv’d and recover’d, the Bishop of Hereford deliver’d to him the subject Matter of their Commission, with the fatal Consequences of his Non-Compliance, which must involve his Son and Posterity in his own unhappy Condition. Upon which the King being greatly dejected, told them, That he submitted to all Things with the more Patience, because his Crimes and Offences had caus’d the Misery that was fallen upon him; yet it was a most afflicting Thought to him, That his People should retain such Hatred against him, as not to endure him any longer then their Sovereign: But if his Condition would admit of any Consolation, it must proceed from the Kindness they had shown to his Son, which he could not but gratefully acknowledge. This said, they proceeded to the short Ceremony of his Resignation, which principally consisted in the Surrender of his Diadem and Ensigns of Majesty to the Use of his Son the new King. For the Form of it, this being the first known in England, they could follow no Precedent, but were oblig'd to make one, and Judge Trussel put it into the Stile of Law to render it more Authentick, and pronounc'd it after this Manner, 'I William Trussel in the Name of all the Men of the Land of England, and of all the Parliament Procurator, resign to Thee Edward the Homage that was made to Thee sometime, and from this Time forwards, I defy Thee and deprive Thee of all Royal Power; and I shall never be Attendant on Thee as King after this Time. Which being done, Sir Thomas Blunt Knight Steward of the Household, by breaking his Staff, resign'd his Office, and declar'd that the late King's Family was discharg'd. This was done upon the twenty second Day of January, in the forty third Year of his Age, after an unfortunate and dishonourable Reign of nineteen Years, six Months, and fifteen Days.

The Manner of his Resignation.

Here ended all the Power and Sovereignty of King Edward the Second, which dropt from him without those violent Struggles that usually attend such Contests; and in our History this is the first Instance where a King fell with so little Honour, and so great Infidelity, that found neither Sword nor Tongue to assert his Right. Tho' England had endur'd great Miseries and Afflictions, through the Violence and Ambition of some of her Kings, yet she had been govern'd by Men, and those Troubles were incident to vigorous Dispositions; but under this King, who could neither gain nor keep, the Nation sustain'd all those Calamities that could proceed from the Weaknesses and Levities of a Child. His very Nature was so passive and complying, that he seem'd not only to have been govern'd, but even actuated by his Favourites, who directed and carry'd him as they pleas'd, commanded his Person and Kingdom, and only made use of his Name to colour and countenance their Villanies. For this Prince was not, like some of the former, ruin'd by a violent grasping at unlawful Power; but by meanly subjecting himself to the Power and Guidance of Others: And as Pride, Obstinacy and Ambition were the Vices that embroyl'd some of the former Reigns; so Easiness, Complacency, and Submission or rather Subjection were the Ruin of this: Which cannot so much be call'd Vices in themselves, as they became so, in being unfortunately plac'd. In short he was more weak than wicked, and his Exorbitancies met with as great, or greater in his People. He was too much given to Drink, but remarkable for his Continence; and he left some Remains of his Charity and Piety behind him, having founded Oriel College and St. Mary-Hall in Oxford, and built a Church for Friars at his Manor of Langley.

His Character.

In the Beginning of this King's Reign all the Knights Templars throughout England were at once arrested, and committed to Prison. They were a famous Order of Knights instituted by Baldwin King of Jerusalem about two hundred Years before, and first appointed for the Defence of that City, and the safe Conduct of those that travelled thither. Afterwards they were dispers'd through all the Kingdoms of Christendom, and by the pious Munificence of Princes and others, enrich'd with infinite Possessions, which caus'd them to degenerate from their first Institution, and to become exorbitantly vicious and scandalous. So that all the Kings of Christendom at the same Time joyning together, caus'd them to be apprehended within their Dominions, and to be depriv'd both of their Order and Estates. Being first condemn'd in a general Council held at Vienna, their Estates were afterwards given to another Order of Knights call'd Hospitallers.

Reg. 1. Vigour and Strength, but also Beauty and Glory: But the Worth and Grandeur of this Prince did not immediately appear, he being not full fifteen Years of Age at his Father's Resignation, and therefore continu'd under the Tuition and Government of others. Shortly after the Deposition and Resignation of the old King, great Preparations were made for this young Prince's Coronation, and he was first proclaim'd King by Order and Consent of Parliament on the twenty fifth Day of January. And immediately after Writs were issu'd out to all the Sheriffs of the Kingdom to proclaim the new King's Peace, in which he declar'd to the People That his Father the late King had, by the Advice and Consent of the Nobility and Community of the Realm, made a free and voluntary Resignation of his Regal Dignity to him, as being his Eldest Son, and Heir to the Kingdom. Upon Sunday the first of February, this youthful Hero was first girded with the Sword of Knighthood by the Hands of his Cosen Henry Earl of Lancaster, and then crown'd at Westminster by Walter Reginald Arch-Bishop of Canterbury with great Solemnity: And as an Earnest of the numerous Benefits of his succeeding Reign, a general Pardon was proclaim'd; which gave Occasion to succeeding Kings to grant the like at their Accession to the Crown, in Imitation of so renown'd an Example. But by reason of his unripe Years, twelve of the chief Nobility were appointed as Guardians to Him and the

His Guardians.

Before the Affairs of England were fully establish'd, Robert King of Scotland, tho' decay'd and infirm, remembering how much he had suffer'd from this young King's Grand-father, notwithstanding the Peace agreed on three Years before, resolv'd to take Advantage of the unsettled Times, and invade the Kingdom of England; and accordingly about Easter, he sent the Earl of Murray and Sir James Douglas with an Army into England to waste and ravage the Country, according to their former Methods of Invasion. On the other Side young Edward, inflam'd with a Desire of revenging the dishonourable Defeats in his Father's Reign, and being inform'd of the Scotch Designs, by the Advice of his Council publish'd his Proclamations, commanding all Noblemen and others to be well appointed according to their Ranks and Degrees, and to attend him at the City of Tork on Ascension-Day. He also sent to the Lord John Beaumont, Brother to the Earl of Hainault, whom the Queen had brought over from the Low-Countries, requesting his Company and Assistance in this Expedition, and that he would be at Tork at the appointed Time, with what Men of Arms he could procure. To which the Lord Beaumont readily comply'd; and gathering together out of Hainault, Flanders, Brabant, Artois and other other Places many brave Noblemen and Knights to accompany him, consisting of five hundred Men at Arms; all gallantly appointed and mounted, he arriv'd at the City of York three Days before Whitsontide, where he found the young King, the Queen his Mother, and all his Lords, and a powerful Army, attending his Coming. Shortly after their Arrival, there happen'd a great and unhappy Contest between some of the Archers of the English Army; and the Servants of the Foreigners, begun and promoted, as it was believ'd, by some Male-contents Friends to the Spensers and the late Earl of Arundel, which not only caus'd the shedding of some Blood in the Army; but also became a great Impediment in the design'd Expedition. The Occasion of the Quarrel was found to be in the English, which tho' by the King's Care it was with some Difficulty appeas'd, yet it was an ominous Prefage of the ill Success of that Enterprize; and because in the Minds of some of the Parties offended there still remain'd some secret Resentments, it happen'd that all the promising Endeavours of the King of England came at that Time to little or no Effect.

After six Weeks Continuance in and about York, King Edward, hearing that the Scots were enter'd England, left that Place, and with his Barons and Forces, and the Lord Beaumont and his Men, march'd to the City of Durham. Before which Time, notwithstanding the Care of the Earl-Marshal at Newcastle, and the Lord Mowbray at Carlisle, the Scots had pass'd the River Tyne with an Army consisting of four thousand Men at Arms, Knights and Esquires well mounted, and a thousand others arm'd after their Country Fashion, upon small inconsiderable Horses, besides their Forces on Foot. King Edward being inform'd of this, and the Devastations they made, immediately gave Command for every Man to dislodge, and follow the Lord Marshal's Banner; and thus prepar'd, he with his mighty Army advanc'd towards the Enemy, with no better Guide to direct him, than the Smoak of their Burnings. At length he found them incamp'd in Stanhope Park, in the Bishoprick of Durham, where he strongly beleagu'r'd them on every Side, and so confin'd them for the Space of fifteen Days, that their Provisions fail'd them; and being much weaken'd with Hunger, they were constrain'd to invent a Way for their Escape. And therefore they prepar'd great Numbers of Fleaks, Hurdels and Faggots, by the help of which, in the following Night, they and their Horses pass'd safely out of the Park, over a deep and moorish Ground, which by the Negligence or Treachery of some great Men in King Edward's Army was left undefended, and with all Speed and Secrecy fled from the Sight of the English to the next Mountains. King Edward, inrag'd at their Escape, with his whole Army pursu'd them from Place to Place for many Days together; but could not discover them, 'till after a Proclamation of a hundred Pounds per Annum, and the Honour of Knighthood, to be given to any who would bring certain Intelligence where they were incamp'd, he was inform'd by One who had labour'd for that Purpose, that they were lodg'd in a certain Mountain, six Miles from his Camp, and attended his Coming with a Design to give him Battel. Upon this pleasing Account, the King and his Army, having perform'd all Acts of Devotion, and refresh'd themselves and Horses, follow'd this new made Knight as their Guide through difficult Passages, and about Noon arriv'd within Sight of their Enemies.

As the English had the greater Army, so the Scotch had the Advantage of the Ground, having drawn up their Men in the Descent of the Mountain, where a great River ran between the English and them, so full of large Rocks and Stones, that the English could not pass over to them without the greatest Hazards; nor was there Room between the Scotch and River for the English to draw up in Battalia. King Edward therefore, after a Council of War, by his Heralds made these Proposals to the Scots, That if they would pass the River and fight with him in the plain Field, he would freely retire 'till he had left them sufficient Space to range their whole Army, that Day, or when they pleas'd;

He marches against them.

They make their Escape.

King Edward offers them Battel.

pleas'd; or else upon the like Offer, he would come over to them. But the Scotch would accept of neither, sending this Answer to the King of England, That since the English were three Times more numerous than they, it would be the highest Indiscretion for them to abandon that Ground they had chosen for their Defence: And since the English were not ignorant in whose Dominions they were, and what Waste they had made, they might correct them if they could, for they would stay there as long as they thought fit. Upon this Answer, King Edward order'd his Men to continue there the Night following, and they were forc'd to lye upon the Ground and hard Stones in their Armour, without any Conveniency for their Horses or themselves; and thus the two Armies continu'd in Sight of each other for three Days, being neither of them desirous to fight, by reason of the Danger in passing the River. On the fourth Day, the English perceiving that the Scots had left the Mountain by Night, and being inform'd that they were lodg'd on another by the same River Side, more advantagious than the former by reason of a neighbouring Wood, they immediately decamp'd and lodg'd themselves upon another Hill over-against the Scots, where the two Armies being drawn up, made fair shews of a Battel; but neither durst run the Hazard of passing the River. Thus they continu'd for the Space of eighteen Days, during which Time, some of both Parties often broke out, and skirmish'd with each other, to the Death and Captivity of many; and the King of England by his Heralds renew'd his former Proposal of accommodating them with convenient Ground to fight on, or to accept of the like from them; but the Scots continuing in their first Resolution, would consent to nothing of that Nature.

They refuse.

A brave Attempt.

Among other Occurrences that happen'd during this Time, the brave and courageous Attempt of the Lord James Douglas ought not to be forgotten, who in the Night Time with two hundred extraordinary Horsemen pass'd the River some Distance from the English Army, and notwithstanding the Watch, suddenly broke into the Camp, and slew divers of the Army without Resistance; then riding up to the King's Tent, cut some of the Cords of it, and slew the King's Chaplain who valiantly defended his Master, from whence he retir'd with the Loss of a few Men to his own Army. From this Time the English were more careful in their Watch, and the most Part lay every Night in their Arms, to prevent the like Attempts; and tho' the Scots were a hardy People enduring Hunger, Cold and Labour, and satisfy'd with a mean and spare Diet, yet at this Time wanting all Provisions, and losing all Hopes of further Success this Campaign, they resolv'd to break up with all convenient Speed, and return to their proper Habitations; and therefore, after they had wasted all that might be useful to the English, they privately retir'd at Midnight, and got safe into their own Country. In the mean Time the King of England and his Lords, highly dissatisfy'd at this Disappointment, took Counsel what was best to be done; and duely considering that the Soldiers were fatigu'd with frequent Removals, Hunger, Wet, Cold, ill Lodgings and hard Passages, and that their Horses were weaken'd for Want of Conveniencies and good Provision, they concluded that it would be to no Advantage to pursue the Scots any further. And having spent above a Month in an useless Pursuit, the King repair'd with his Army to Durham, and within three Days after to York, where he found the Queen his Mother, and divers other noble Ladies, who receiv'd him and his Company with great Joy. Here the King gave leave to all Soldiers to return to their Habitations, and dismiss'd the Lord Beaumont and all his Retinue and Attendance with munificent Rewards for all former Services. And thus the mighty Preparation which King Edward and his Friends had made for the Ruin of the small Scotch Army, came to little Effect; and this young King born for Victories and Triumphs, was depriv'd of the Honour of his first Action; the ill Success of which was afterwards charg'd upon the Lord Mortimer, who is said to have kept private Intelligence with the Enemy, and to have suffer'd them to escape without Damage.

The Scots retire home.

The King not successful.

During

During these Transactions in the North, the old depos'd King remain'd close Prisoner at Kenelworth Castle in Warwickshire, with an Allowance of a hundred Marks a Month for his Expences; but depriv'd of all other Human Comforts, especially the Company of his Queen, whom he still lov'd intirely, tho' she was the great Cause of his Ruin. All his soft and tender Invitations by Letters were frustrated by the Vigilance of Mortimer, who consented to her sending civil Answers and Suits of Apparel, but perswaded her, That his Design was only to murder her, if he could get her into his Power. This great Neglect caus'd him with many Sighs to say to his Keepers, Wherein have I offended my Wife, and my Son, whom they have made King; that neither of them will let me see their Faces? But in a short Time the Nation began sensibly to reflect upon his sad Fate, calmly to consider the Pretences of his Enemies, and to contrive how they might be kind to him, and prevent further Mischiefs. His chief Keeper also, the Earl of Lancaster, began to be every Way obliging to him, highly commiserating his deplorable State, and many Lords and Others thought upon Means to deliver him out of his Captivity. The Notice or rather Suspicion of this extreamly startled Mortimer and the Queen, and all the chief Actors in this Tragedy, who reviewing all their former Actions, and dreading the old King's Liberty as their own inevitable Ruin, immediately resolv'd to remove him from Kenelworth Castle, and appointed him two new Keepers, Thomas Gournay and John Maltravers Knights, Persons of a rough and incompassionate Temper. These two impious Agents had Commission to enter any Fortrefs and Castle in the Kingdom; and by them he was remov'd from Kenelworth, and hurry'd about in the Night from one Place to another, as first to the Castle of Corfe in Dorsetshire, then to Bristol Castle, and at length to Barkley Castle in Glocestershire; and all this to disappoint his Friends, and to prevent their Assistance. In his Passage to Barkley Castle they us'd the most horrid Indignities to him; and the more to disguise him from any Man's Knowledge they shav'd his Head and Beard; which was done in the open Fields, by the Commandment of Gournay, who caus'd the miserable King to sit on a Mole-Hill while the Barber shav'd him, who using cold Water out of a Ditch told him, That that should serve him for this Time; to which he mournfully reply'd, That they should not hinder him of warm Water to his shaving, and therewithal let fall a shower of Tears that overflow'd his Face and Beard.

The Sufferings of the late King

The Nation pities him.

He is shamefully treated.

At Barkley Castle they proceeded to greater Inhumanities and more barbarous Usages, endeavouring to destroy him by unheard of Contrivances: But being frustrated in their Designs by his Strength of Body and Fortitude of Mind, they desir'd fresh Instructions from some at Court, who directly intimated the Necessity of removing him; only the subtle Bishop of Hereford is said to have sent them this dark ambiguous Line, Edwardum occidere nolite timere bonum est, at once encouraging the Murder, and reserving an Excuse for himself. However to remove all Difficulties, upon the twenty second Day of September, finding him in his Bed, they press'd heavy Bolsters and Pillows upon his Head, and through a ductile Pipe thrust up a red hot Iron into his Bowels and Body; and in this cruel manner murder'd him, that no Wound or Mark of a violent Death might be found upon him. For the Body being afterwards view'd by many considerable Citizens of Bristol and Glocester, summon'd thither for that purpose, they could find no Sign either of Wound or Poison; so that their Evidence confirm'd the Report spread abroad, that he dy'd of the Extremity of Grief. Thus fell the unfortunate King Edward the Second, who for his meek and pious Behaviour under his Afflictions, was afterwards reputed a Saint. This happen'd about eight Months after he was depos'd; and his Body was carry'd to Glocester, where without any Funeral Pomp it was bury'd in St. Peter's Minster by the Benedictine Friars. Afterwards his Son erected to his Memory a fair Monument with his Portraiture of Alabaster, in the second Arch and the North and barbarously murder'd.

The Punishments of his Murderers.

North Side of the Altar, between two Pillars of the Tuscan Order, about which are painted the Figures of several Stags, with which, as common Fable tells us, his Corps was drawn thither from Barkley Castle. After this execrable Parricide the immediate Agents Gournay and Maltravers, instead of receiving Rewards, met with such terrible Threats from the Queen and Bishop of Hereford, that they were forc'd to fly beyond Sea to secure their detested Lives. Gournay, after three Years Exile, was taken and sent for England, but in his Passage had his Head struck off; and Maltravers fled into Germany, where in Repentance he had Time to waste a miserable Life. But Heaven's Vengeance did not stop at the Lives of the chief Contrivers, but afterwards reach'd to the whole Kingdom; and what happen'd to the Progeny of the present Prince, whose Throne (tho' perhaps without his Guilt) was erected upon his Father's Blood, the many imbru'd Scaffolds, the various bloody Fields, the infinite Slaughters occasion'd by their divided Families, with the extirpated Race of most of this present Nobility, will abundantly testify.

King Edward's
first Claim to France.

II. Young Edward having now a Title to the Crown of England beyond all Dispute, by the Advice of his Mother and others solemniz'd the Marriage between himself and the beautiful Lady Philippa, the Earl of Hainault's youngest Daughter, to whom he had formerly been contracted. The Ceremony was perform'd at York on the twenty fourth Day of January; and on the first Sunday in Lent the young Queen was crown'd at Westminster with great Pomp and Glory, and the Coronation was succeeded by all Kinds of magnificent Rejoycings for three Weeks after. In Whitsond Week a Parliament was held at Northampton, in which King Edward first mov'd about his Title to the Crown of France; for Charles King of France, Brother to his Mother Isabel, being lately dead without Issue Male; notwithstanding that King Edward acknowledg'd the Salick Law which excluded Females Inheritance, yet he maintain'd this Point, That the Sons of the Daughters, having no such Imbecillity of Sex, were not uncapable, and that the Peers of France ought to prefer him, who was a Male and Grand-Child to King Philip, before Philip of Valois, whom they had lately advanc'd, tho' he was but a Nephew.

A dishonourable Treaty with Scotland.

In this Parliament a dishonourable Peace was concluded between the Kingdom of England and Scotland, chiefly manag'd by the old Queen and Mortimer; by whose Contrivance, the better to confirm it, a Marriage was agreed on between David Prince of Scotland, Son to King Robert, and Joan Sister to King Edward; which Match, by Reason of the tender Years of the Prince who did not exceed seven Years of Age, promising but little Advantage, was oppos'd by most of the Nobility of England. Besides, by the secret Management of the Queen-Mother, Mortimer and Sir James Douglas, the King by his Charter surrender'd his Title to the Sovereignty of the Kingdom of Scotland, and therein releas'd to King Robert and his Heirs, all Homages and Fealties that the Kings of Scotland by their several Charters ought to have done to the Crown of England. And also he deliver'd up divers Deeds, Instruments and Records of their former Homages and Fealties done to the King of England his Predecessors, together with that famous Evidence call'd Ragman Rowle, which was seal'd and sign'd by the King of Scotland and his Nobility to King Edward the First; which contain'd all the several Services that the King of the Scots, and all the Prelates, Earls and Barons of that Kingdom ought to have done to the King of England for the Time being; as also all the Rights that several Barons and Knights of England ought to have had in the Realm of Scotland. At the same Parliament were also re-deliver'd many ancient Jewels and Monuments, among the rest the Black Cross of Scotland, which King Edward the First brought from the Abby of Scone; and many other Things were transacted to the Damage and Dishonour of the Crown of England, against the Consent of the English Nobility, by the Procurement of Queen

Queen Isabel and her Party, who at that Time so manag'd the Affairs of the Kingdom, that both Lords and Commons were highly dissatisfy'd. In Consideration of the foresaid Peace, the intended Marriage, and the dishonourable Surrenders and Releases, together with the Damages done by the Scots, it was also concluded that King Robert should pay thirty thousand Marks to the King of England, within the Space of three Years. And according to Agreement, upon the twenty second Day of July the Marriage was solemniz'd between David Prince of Scotland and the Lady Joan the King's Sister, at the Town of Berwick, to the great Dissatisfaction of the Chief of the English Nation. In another Parliament held in October, the Lord Mortimer procur'd himself to be made Earl of Marche; at which Time two other Earls were created, the King's Brother John of Eltham was made Earl of Cornwall, and Sir James Butler of Ireland Earl of Ormond. From which Parliament the Earl of Lancaster, and some other Peers, seeing the King at the Disposal of others, absented themselves, and by Arms began to redress publick Grievances; but by the wise Mediation of the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, Matters were adjusted and they reconcil'd to the King.

The King of the Scots marries
King Edward's
Sister.

Within a Year after the Marriage between Prince David of Scotland and King Edward's Sister, Robert King of that Country, being worn out with his great Infirmary, and sensible of approaching Death, caus'd his chief Nobility to be assembled in his Chamber, and in the Presence of all committed to them the Government of his Son David, then not fully eight Years of Age: And among many Things touching the Government of the Kingdom of Scotland, he gave them these politick Instructions concerning their Affairs with the English. First That they would never appoint any set Battel with the English, nor hazard the Realm upon the Chance of one Field, but rather to keep them from invading of their Country by frequent Skirmishes, Incursions, and Intercepting their Forces; that if the Scots were defeated, they might still have a Reserve for a new Resistance. Next, That they would not make any lasting Peace with England, lest long Rest and Inactivity should so enervate their Minds and Bodies, as they would not be able to endure great Pains and Labour; and since the English would not continue any longer in Peace, than their Want of a convenient Opportunity to attempt a new War, it was safest for them, never to conclude a perpetual Peace with them, nor make any Truce longer than three or four Years. Lastly, That they would be always mindful, that when there appear'd the least Shew of any intended War from England, then to be most wary and circumspect, lest their Enemies should invade their Country, and find them unprepar'd for able and timely Resistance. He surviv'd not long after these and some other Instructions, but dy'd of a Leprosie, in the twenty fourth Year of his Reign, leaving his young Son David to succeed him in the Kingdom of Scotland. He was an expert Soldier, valiant and wise, and considering the innumerable Difficulties he had in gaining and keeping his Kingdom against King Edward the First, and the Power of England, he may well be rank'd in the Number of the bravest Princes of that Time.

His Death.

David succeeds.

In the mean Time Earl Mortimer daily increas'd in Power and Grandeur, and joining in Interest and Affection with the Queen-Mother, dispos'd of all Offices and Places, and the Treasure of the Nation; so that many great Men env'y'd and oppos'd him, but none so dangerously as the King's Uncle Edmund Earl of Kent, who endeavour'd to rescue the young King from the exorbitant Power of his Governors. To remove this great Opposer, Mortimer by his infernal Artifices and plausible Accusations caus'd him to be condemn'd in a Parliament held at Winchester, for conspiring to deliver his Brother Edward late King of England; being by an extraordinary Contrivance drawn into an absurd Belief that he was still alive, and kept secretly in Corfe Castle. Thus for endeavouring to set a dead Man at Liberty the noble Earl of Kent had his Head stricken off at Winchester; and he became so dismal an Object of Pity from Noon 'till Night, at the Place of Execution before the Castle Gates, none being found to behead him, 'till a vile Wretch of the Marshalsea was sent and did it: So little Conscience did the Malice and Ambition of his potent Adversaries make of shedding the Royal Blood; yet the Hand of Heav'n seem'd to have been upon him for formerly countenancing what was done against his Royal Brother; so that he lost his Life in the twenty eighth Year of his Age.

King Edward does Homage for his French Territories.

King Edward still under Guardians, in the same Year was summon'd by the new King of France to do Homage to him for Gascony and other Territories in that Kingdom; which Message was very ungrateful to him: But considering the Emergencies of Affairs, he went over into France and met the French King at Amiens; where, to let the French see what manner of Prince he was, he came so royally appointed and attended, as if he design'd to have stricken him with Fear, or Admiration, having many Earls, Barons and Knights, and a thousand Horse in his Retinue. At the appointed Day, being gloriously attired in Robes of Crimson Velvet, powder'd with Golden Leopards, his Crown on his Head, his mighty Sword by his Side, and his Golden Spurs on his Heels, he did his Homage with a Posture and Magnificence different from any of his Predecessors. This, and the haughty Reception he met withal, occasion'd a great Envy between the two Kings; and prov'd afterwards an Incentive towards a bloody War.

A. D. 1320. Reg. 4. At length the Vengeance of Heav'n began to overtake the haughty and subtle Mortimer, whose immoderate Power became a Grievance to the State, and whose Familiarity with the Queen-Mother gave Occasion for some to report he was with Child by him. The publick Complaints and the secret Whispers of several of the Nobility rous'd up a sleeping Lion in the young King's Breast, so that he grew enrag'd at the Proceedings of this shining Favourite; for such were Mortimer's Extravagancies, that he eclips'd the Royal Youth in outward Pomp and Magnificence, his Person being surrounded with a more numerous Attendance, and his Authority so great that he rais'd Men with his Smiles, and ruin'd them with his Frowns.

Mortimer's Grandeur.

He is seiz'd on.

The vigorous Edward awaken'd by these Proceedings, at a Parliament held at Nottingham, resolv'd to destroy this powerful Man whose Interest threaten'd both him and the Publick. Accordingly, with the brave Montague and a few valiant Followers, he enter'd into Nottingham Castle by Night, through a secret Mine in a Rock, since call'd Mortimer's Hole, and with some little Bloodshed seiz'd upon Mortimer with the Queen, tho' he had no less than a hundred and eighty Knights in his Retinue, besides Esquires and Gentlemen. With him were taken the Lord Geoffry Mortimer his Son, and Sir Simon de Bedford a great Agent of his; and all three were sent Prisoners to the Tower of London under a strong Guard. This being done, the King by common Consent of Parliament took into his Hands his Mother's excessive Dowry, and restrain'd her extravagant Living to a narrow Pension of three thousand Pounds per Annum, confining her within as narrow Limits for her Abode, but yearly giving her the Honour and Comfort of one or two Visits; tho' otherwise scarce thinking her worthy of Life, in regard of her Familiarity with Mortimer, and her many heinous Practices.

He is condemn'd and executed.

As to Mortimer, fourteen Articles were exhibited against him in a Parliament held not long after at Westminster, in which he was accus'd of several grievous Crimes and Offences, particularly That he had procured many exorbitant Grants from the Crown out of England, Wales and Ireland; That he had caus'd the Murder of the late King, and his Brother the Earl of Kent; and That he had kept a secret Correspondence with Scotland, and had occasion'd a dishonourable Treaty with that Nation. These and other Accusations being exhibited before the Earls and Barons in Parliament, they declar'd their Opinion that his Crimes were notorious and known to themselves and the People, therefore they adjudg'd That the said Earl Mortimer, as a Traitor and Enemy to the Kingdom, should be drawn and hang'd at the common Gallows at Tyburn. This was executed after the most opprobrious Manner, and his Body was kept hanging two Days, for a Spectacle of Horror and Dishonour: And this Sentence he receiv'd without being call'd to any Kind of Answer; which was a just Judgment upon an impious Minister who had treated others after the same Manner, particularly the two Spensers and the Earl of Kent. There dy'd with him Sir Simon de Bedford, and John Deverel Esquire, as well for Expiation of the late King Edward's Blood, as in Compliment, as it were, of so great a Man's Fall, who in such Cases ought not to die singly. Thus did this noble young Prince, now increasing in Vigour and Wisdom, begin to wipe out the Stains which during his Minority had blemish'd the State of his Kingdom. And to add to his Felicity, this Year Queen Philippa brought forth an admirable Son, nam'd Edward, and afterwards from his mighty Acts call'd The Black Prince; a Prince who seem'd to have been sent from Heav'n for the Glory and Renown of the English Nation, and to be at once the Delight and Terror of Mankind.

The Black Prince born.

III. The young King Edward having taken the Government into his own Hands, soon began to display his Vigour and Power; and the first Country that felt the Force of his Arms was Scotland. For growing sensible that the Peace last concluded with that Nation, was dishonourable to him and his Kingdom, and considering that his Brother-in-Law King David was possess'd of the Town of Berwick, which belong'd to the Crown of England, and desiring to receive the usual Homage for all Scotland, he resolv'd to right himself upon the first Occasion, which was soon offer'd upon a great Contest about the Crown of that Kingdom, which was this. Edward Baliol, Son to John Baliol formerly King of Scotland, thirty two Years after his Father's Deposition, taking Advantage of the Youth of King David, and of the Factions among the Scottish Nobility, by the Solicitation of the Lord Beaumont then in France with him, set his Thoughts upon the Recovery of the Kingdom of Scotland; and came together with the Lord Beaumont over into England, and for a short Time continu'd privately with the Lady Vesey at Sandhall upon Ouse in Yorkshire, till by the Interest of the Lord Beaumont, the Lord Talbot, and others, he was permitted secretly to get what Assistance he could procure in England to furnish him for his intended Enterprize. His Designs being known in England, many Noblemen and Soldiers repair'd to him, and prepar'd to attend him into Scotland; as the Lord Beaumont, with an Intent to claim the Earldom of Bucuban in the Right of his Lady, Sir Gilbert Umfreville claiming the Earldom of Angus, the Lord Percy claiming the Earldom of Galloway, and David Strathbolgy the Earldom of Athol; together with the Lord Stafford, the Lord Talbot, Sir Geofry Mowbray, Walter Comin, and divers others; who at the Conclusion of the last Peace being banish'd out of Scotland, all resolv'd to fight for the Recovery of their Lands and Honours then detain'd from them. Besides Edward Baliol had several Friends in Scotland, from whom he receiv'd fair Invitations and ample Incouragement.

A. D. 1331. Reg. 5.

A new Design upon Scotland.

All Things being in Readiness, and Shipping provided, Baliol with his Friends, and two thousand five hundred well appointed Men, set Sail and landed at Kingcorn, not far from Perth; and to prevent all Hopes of Flight, the Vessels were sent back. Upon the Rumour of his Arrival, the Scots, to the Number of ten thousand, had gather'd towards the Shore to hinder his Landing, being conducted by the Earl of Fife; but finding all his Men actually on Shore, they set furiously upon them to destroy them. Baliol and his brave Adventurers being reduc'd to a Necessity of fighting valiantly or dying cowardly, encounter'd their Opposers with such Vigour and Magnanimity, that they gave them a signal Defeat, and forc'd them to fly dishonourably, crying out That the Enemy was come! The Earl of Fife, wounded both in Body and Mind, desiring to be reveng'd and to redeem his lost Honour, with the Assistance of the Earl of Caricke, Natural Son to King Robert deceas'd, and the Lord Seton, recruited his Forces, and with the same Number gave his Enemies a second Battel, but with no better Success than before; for the greatest Part of his Army was cut in pieces, except the Captains and Commanders, who sav'd themselves by Flight, or were taken Prisoners. Upon this second Victory Baliol march'd further into the Country, which he reduc'd as far as the Abby of Dumferling, where he found good Store of Provision and Ammunition; while the Scots, not far off at a Place call'd Glasmore, had another Army prepar'd, consisting of forty thousand Men. Of which Baliol being inform'd, he thought it necessary to put his small Army in mind of his former great Success, and to use many forcible Reasons to encourage them against the Inequality of the Numbers. His Exhortations being seconded by the Lord Vesey, the Lord Stafford, and Sir Fulk Warren, all Men of extraordinary Valour, the Soldiers were inspired with so much Warmth and Vigour, that they a third Time bravely encounter'd their Enemies, and gave them a great and bloody Overthrow. Within five Days after, the English meeting with Sir Nigel Brus at Dupline, at the Head of ten thousand Men, they valiantly attack'd him, defeated him, and slew most of his Men; having made an Order among themselves to take no Prisoners, because they wanted Men to take Care of them. These four Battels were all fought in a few Days Time, in which, as some Writers report, sixty thousand Scots were slain; which happen'd as well by their confus'd Disorder and Want of Discipline, as the Valour of the English. The chief Men of the Scots slain were the Earl of Marre, one of the Governors of Scotland, the Earl of Carick, the Earl of Murrey, the Earl of Menteith, Robert Keith Marshal of Scotland, Sir Alexander Seton, Sir Alexander Fraser, Sir David Lindsey, Sir George Dunbarre, and many other brave Commanders; while the Earl of Fife with some few others were taken Prisoners. Of the English Side we read not of any great Man slain, besides two Knights, Sir John Gordon, and Sir Reginald Beche, and thirty three Esquires; so extraordinary valiant and fortunate were these English Adventurers.

Further Successes.

The Lord Baliol's Friends and Soldiers being highly encourag'd with these happy Victories, immediately advanc'd towards St. John's Town or Perth, which they besieg'd and soon took by Force without any great Resistance; where they found Provision and Ammunition sufficient both for their Relief and Defence. From hence Baliol sent all his wounded Men to Sea to be convey'd to England and cured there; who in their Voyage met with one Crabbe, a Flemish Pirate and a Friend to the Scots, who hating the English, furiously set upon them with a Design to destroy every Man. But the English, tho' they were wounded, so well defended themselves, and fought so valiantly, that they soon defeated Crabbe and his Company, and forc'd him to fly to Scotland. As he came towards Perth, he found the Earl of Marche, the other Governor of Scotland, and Archibald Douglas, with thirty thousand Scots besieging the Town; to whom he related his bad Success, how the wounded English Men had by their Valour defeated him at Sea, urging further, That there was but little Expectation of prevailing against the Lord Baliol, who with his Handful of Men had overthrown so many of the Scotch Nobility; therefore he advis'd them to break up the Siege, and in Time to provide for their own Security. The Scots, mov'd with his Persuasions, and some other Considerations, tho' they had fill'd up the Town Ditches, and had a fair Prospect of Taking the Place, by the Direction of the Earl of Marche, suddenly rais'd the Siege in the Night, and retir'd with great Dishonour.

The Reputation of these frequent and incredible Victories was so great, that it brought great Numbers of Lords, Ladies and others to the Lord Baliol, who offer'd him their Service and Assistance, as his Loyal Subjects, towards his Recovery of the Crown of Scotland; and there did their Homages and Fealties to him as their Sovereign Lord, for all the Lands and Honours they held. As an Addition to Baliol's Successes, at the same Time, several of the Ports and Cities of England at their own Charges sent a Fleet of Ships towards Scotland, to assist the English Lords if there were Occasion, and to attack the Scotch Navy where-ever they could meet with them; which fell out according to their Expectation and Desire. For they met with them in the Water of Tay, where they fought with them and intirely defeated them, took some of their Ships, and burnt and sunk the rest. All Things thus happily succeeding on Baliol's Side, and daily encreasing in Power, he receiv'd the Oaths of the Earl of Fife, and the Bishop of Dunkeld; and with them and many others he went to Scone, where he was solemnly crown'd King on the twenty fourth Day of September, and receiv'd the Homages and Fealties of many of the Nobility and Gentry there assembled. Before which, young King David, to avoid all Dangers, by the Advice of his Council, fled out of his Kingdom into France, with Queen Joan his Wife, Sister to the King of England; where they were most civilly entertain'd by Philip King of France, and there continu'd for the Space of nine Years.

In the mean Time, the noble King Edward, now at full Age, hearing of the late Coronation of Lord Baliol, and the present Division of the Nobility of Scotland, was highly pleas'd at these Transactions, supposing now that he had a fair Opportunity of subduing that Kingdom; therefore he resolv'd to shew himself openly for Baliol against David his Brother-in-Law. But first, to avoid the Imputation of Breach of Articles, he publicly proclaim'd, That he was not oblig'd to observe any League with Scotland that was made in his Minority, against his own and the Nation's Consent. After which he prepar'd to go in Person with a powerful Army towards Scotland, and march'd with the utmost Expedition, designing for his first Action the Recovery of the important Town of Berwick, which he strongly besieg'd by Sea and Land. After a Month's Siege, there happen'd a great Fire in the Town, which caus'd the Besieg'd to desire a Truce, upon Promise of surrendering it and the Castle, if not reliev'd within fifteen Days, and to give twelve Hostages for Performance. But before the Time was expir'd, all the Nobility of Scotland of King David's Party, march'd with a powerful Army under the Conduct of the Lord Archibald Douglas their General, as far as the River Tweed; but finding it difficult to relieve the Town, they resolv'd to act by Way of Diversion, and hearing that the young Queen was then at Bamburgh Castle, they advanc'd towards it with great Speed in hopes to surprize the Place, but still without Success. Then after six Days ravaging of the Country, by the Importunities of the Garrison of Berwick, who perswaded them to ingage the English Forces, at that Time far less numerous than themselves, they return'd towards the Town, and drew up their Army in four great Battalions, under as many Noblemen. On Monday the nineteenth of July, King Edward march'd out with great Bravery to meet them at the Head of his own Army, and at Hallidown-Hill, not far from Berwick, he valiantly encounter'd the whole Scotch Army, and gave them a total Defeat. In this Battel were slain seven Scotch Earls, nine hundred Knights and Bannerets, and four hundred Esquires, and of common Soldiers to the Number of two and thirty thousand and upwards; tho' the Scotch Writers will not acknowledge half the Number. Upon this great Victory, within two Days the Besieg'd surrender'd both the Town and Castle to the King's Mercy, who kept it in his own Hands, by the Right of Conquest, as well as by that deriv'd from his Father and Grand-father. Then obliging Edward Baliol by Oath, and ordaining him and some Noblemen of England to be Governors of the Realm of Scotland in his Absence, he triumphantly return'd with glorious Success into England, where he was receiv'd with great Joy by all his Subjects. As to his hanging the Governor of Berwick's Sons contrary the Law of Arms, and some other Severities reported of him by Scotch Writers, we look upon them to be highly improbable, and directly contrary to the Character of this great and generous Prince.

Reg. 8.

After King Edward's Return, Baliol the new King of the Scots, at the Head of twenty six thousand Men, most of them English, march'd forwards to prosecute his Success into the very Heart of Scotland, taking Towns and Castles at his Pleasure; and having pass'd beyond the Frith of Edinburgh, and reduc'd all the strong Places that held out for King David, except Dunbritton and a few other Castles, he summon'd a Parliament about Michaelmas to meet him at Perth or St. John's Town. Here all those English Lords, who claim'd Estates in Scotland, repair'd and did their Homage for the respective Lands they held under him, reserving the Allegiance they ow'd to their Sovereign Lord the King of England; the principal of whom were the Lord Beaumont, the Earl of Buchan, the Lord Talbot, the Earl of Athol, the Lord Piercy, and divers other English Noblemen, who were all restor'd to the Honours and Estates they claim'd in Scotland: And in this Parliament all Acts, Statutes, Ordinances and Grants made by Robert or David Brus, late Kings of Scotland, were declar'd null and void. And thus David was seemingly depriv'd of his Kingdom, and Edward Baliol in all Appearance plac'd in the Throne of Scotland. And to strengthen his Alliance, first at Edinburgh, and afterwards at Newcastle, he in the Presence of many great Lords and Commons of both Nations, did Homage to the King of England, as to his superior Lord; and took his Oath of Fealty, binding himself and his Heirs to hold the Kingdom of Scotland of him and his Successors for ever; and further he granted to him the Possession of five Counties next adjoining to the Borders.

King Edward's
great Advantages against them.

But this Homage, and over-liberal Concessions made from one King to the other, were so far from advancing the Interest of either, that they serv'd to turn the Body of that jealous Nation against both; since the Scots saw that King Edward sought his own Grandeur more than their Interest, and that Baliol was an Instrument to promote his Designs. Several of the Scotch Nobility also finding their late Services slighted, began to revolt from Baliol, and to promote the Interest of King David; and not long after, raising great Numbers of the Commons of Scotland, they resolv'd to begin a War. Baliol being inform'd of this met and engag'd with them at Annandale; but after an obstinate Fight, many of his Men were slain, the rest dispers'd, and he himself oblig'd to fly out of the Nation to the City of Carlisle; from whence he sent to the King of England, complaining of the Falshood and Treachery of his People, in whom he trusted, and again begg'd his Assistance against his Enemies. In the mean Time King Edward call'd a Parliament at London, where he declar'd that he had form'd a Resolution to take a Voyage with the French King and other Christian Princes to the Holy-Land. But this Change in Scotland soon alter'd his Design; and having a Tenth granted him from the Clergy, a Fifteenth from the Temporalty, and a Twelfth from the Cities and Boroughs, he enter'd Scotland with a great Power, and no less Terror. Then joining with King Baliol, who before had made great Devastations, he without taking in Castles and strong Places, swiftly pursu'd the flying Scots as far as beyond Cathness, which was farther than King Edward his Grand-father had ever reach'd. After which Actions, the two Kings of England and Scotland rejoin'd their Forces, and return'd towards Berwick. But shortly after, the Earl of Dunbar revolted in the Highlands, and renounc'd his Homage to both Parties; which oblig'd King Edward to remain the rest of the Year in the Borders of Scotland, and keep his Christmases at Roxburgh, still retaining the Pope's Nuncio with him, who came to mediate a Peace between him and King David, then under the Protection of the French King.

A. D. In the following Year, after some Stay in England, King Edward with a well prepar'd Army enter'd Scotland both by Sea and Land; and marching as far as Perth, he ravag'd all the Country, as he had done the Year before; and meeting with small Opposition, he constituted David Earl of Athol Governor of Scotland to subdue the rest of the Places that held out. But tho' the Scots were were suppos'd to be retir'd into their Woods and Mountains for Safety, yet shortly after, under the Conduct of the Earls of Murrey and Dunbar, they surpriz'd five hundred English Archers, who returning home too securely, were all put to the Sword: And not long after, John Earl of Namur, and Robert his Brother, having landed in England, and marching with several Lords and Knights and a select Body of a hundred Men at Arms, were assaulted near Edinburgh by the Earl of Marche and the Lord Douglas; and after a sharp Conflict were forc'd to surrender themselves Prisoners. Yet either out of Generosity or Policy, to gratifie the French King, whose Kinsmen they were, they were not only releas'd by the Earl of Murrey, but were also by him convey'd back as far as the English Borders; but in his Return the Earl suffer'd for his Compliment, being met by the Garrison of Roxburgh, who routed his Party, and took him Prisoner. In the mean Time King Edward's Brother the late Earl of Cornwall enter'd Scotland and destroy'd Galloway, Carrick, Kyle, and all the Western Parts that held out against King Baliol; and after that repair'd to his Brother at Perth, lately return'd from an Expedition in the Highlands. At Perth King Edward receiv'd Ambassadors from the King of France, who to hinder his Progress in Scotland, had procur'd the Pope to mediate a Peace between him and King David, and also to desire him to accompany King Philip in the Holy-War, which he had lately undertaken by the Incouragement of his Holiness. But King Edward being offended at the French King's Intermeddling in his Affairs, gave the Ambassadors this short and resolute Answer, That by the Blessing of Heav'n he was able at any Time to make War upon the Infidels, without their Master's Assistance; and that he would undertake no foreign Expedition, 'till he had subdu'd his Enemies the Scots. Not

The Scotch Nobility submit to King Edward.

After King Edward's Departure, the Earl of Athol, resolving to redeem his lost Credit with the two Kings, laid Siege to the Castle of Kildrumney, which still held out for King David; but upon the Arrival of the Earl of Dunbar, and the Lords Murrey and Douglas, who came to relieve the Place, he was not only defeated by an inferior Force, but also lost his Life together with his Honour and Reputation. The Death of this Governor caus'd a great Turn in the Affairs of Scotland, so that many Places in the North revolted, and declar'd for King David against Baliol and the English Power; which Defection caus'd King Edward to raise an Army of forty thousand Men, with which like a Conqueror he enter'd into the Bowels of Scotland, rais'd the Siege of Lochindoris, pursu'd the Enemy through Athol and Murrey, and pass'd with his victorious Arms as far as Elgin and Inverness, where Scotland is bounded by the Ocean. Then marching from one Province to another, ravaging and destroying all Places that oppos'd his Authority, at his Return, besides other Places, he burnt the Town of Aberdeen, because the Inhabitants had treacherously kill'd an English Knight call'd Thomas Rosselyn. After he had strucken Terror in all Places, and met with little or no Opposition, he left King Baliol to reduce the Remainder of the Scots, and in the middle of September return'd triumphantly into England; having now made four successful and glorious Expeditions into Scotland. In these Expeditions the King never return'd but with such great Destruction and Bloodshed of that afflicted People, that it might give cause of the greatest Admiration to imagine how it was possible for that barren Part of the Isle, and so often wasted, to breed so many Men as had been slain in Battel within these fifty last Years; and yet still be able to bring Armies into the Field, both to maintain their own Contests, and to defend their Liberties, and that poor Ground they inhabited.

A. D. 1327. Reg. 11. The Beginnings of the Wars with France. IV. King Edward, now experienc'd and renown'd in Arms, design'd not to have left Scotland so soon, but he had for some Time a far nobler Prize in View; and that was no less than the Kingdom of France, towards the Attainment of which he had already made some Advances, and several fair Pretensions as to his Title to that Crown. This Design was violently promoted by Robert de Artois, a Prince of the Blood of France, who being highly oblig'd by the French King's awarding the County of Artois from him to his Aunt Matilda, openly declar'd, That he would unmake the King by the same Power he had made him; which so provok'd King Philip, that he immediately proclaim'd him a Traitor, confiscated all his Estate, and forc'd him to fly out of his Kingdom. In England he was generously entertain'd by King Edward, made of his Council, and invest'd with the Earldom of Richmond; and here he became the grand Incendiary between the two mighty Nations, and blew up such a dreadful Flame as lasted above a hundred Years, and the Smoak of it much longer. This at present was very happy for the State of Scotland, which Boetius acknowledges to have been so weaken'd and impoverish'd, that if King Edward had continu'd his Wars, it must have came to inevitable Ruin. This was also the Cause why the French, the great Supporters of the Scotch, became more vigilant, and us'd all Means to annoy the English, not only in Scotland, but also in Gascony and other Places; which, besides King Edward's Title to the Crown of France, had given sufficient Cause for a Breach between the two Kings. But that the World might take Notice of his just Proceedings, and main Causes of his Design against France, King Edward in a pious Epistle directed to the Colledge of Cardinals declar'd, 'First, 'his Title to the Crown of France, which Philip de Valois had unjustly detain'd notwithstanding he himself was the nearest in Blood of any Male living. 'Secondly, That his Ambassadors, desiring to put the Cause to a Civil Trial, 'were not only refus'd to be heard, but were repuls'd with Danger of their 'Lives. Thirdly, That the Court of the twelve Peers, in giving the Crown 'from him, when under Age, left the Office of Judges and became Invaders; wherefore their Proceedings against him during his Minority were 'lawless, null and void. Fourthly, That Philip de Valois invaded the Dukedom of Gascony, which belong'd to the Crown of England, and added such 'Places and Territories as he had injuriously gain'd to those he had injuriously 'detain'd. Fifthly, That he had assisted the Scots in their Insurrections against 'him, when by reason of his near Relation he ought rather to have join'd 'with him; and finally had declar'd by his Actions, That his Honour, Power 'and Person were equally hated by him.

King Edward's Pretensions. King Edward, knowing that Words alone were of no great Effect, to strengthen his Alliance, by the Advice of his Council and his Father-in-Law the Earl of Hainault, resolv'd to join with several Princes of the high and low Dutch, who lay most convenient for his Designs. But the better to unite their Interests, he was advis'd to gain the Alliance of Lewis the Emperor, with whom he made in Effect but an unprofitable Confederacy; tho' it was really subservient to his present Purposes. Most to his Advantage were the extraordinary Endeavours of James de Arteville, a rich Burger of Gaunt, of admirable Dexterity and Management, and so popular among the Flemmings, that he had the Command of Flanders more than the Earl himself, who was lately expell'd. By the singular Diligence of this Burger, and of Sigar de Courtray, a Nobleman of Flanders, a mighty Party was soon rais'd for the English against the French: Which was much increas'd by an Overthrow given to the French Flemmings, who under the Conduct of Guy Brother to the Earl of Flanders, had plac'd themselves in the Ile of Cadixant to stop the Passage of the English, who who fortunately took Guy Prisoner, and slew most of his Men. This Victory was obtain'd by the Earl of Darby, the Lord Cobham, the Lord Beauchamp, and other Commanders; of whose Fame D'Arteville made such a seasonable Use, by letting the Flemmings see the English were able to protect them, that without Hesitation they became firm Confederates in the Presence of the Earl of Gelder at Gaunt, notwithstanding the Endeavours of the great King of France, and their Sovereign Earl to the contrary. As King Edward took Care of his Interest abroad, so was he no less careful of his Country at home; and in a Parliament held at Westminster it was ordain'd, That no English Wool should be transported, and that all Cloath-Workers should be receiv'd from any Foreign Parts, and fit Places assign'd them, with divers Liberties and Privileges; and that they should have a certain Allowance from the King, 'till they were fix'd in a competent Way of Living. It was also ordain'd, That none should wear any Cloaths wrought beyond Sea for the future, except the King, Queen, and their Children; also, That no one should wear foreign Furrs or Silks, unless he was worth one hundred Pounds per Annum. By these and the like Laws King Edward gradually reviv'd the Woollen Manufacture, after it had been lost for many Years to this Nation; from which Time it still increas'd to the general Advantage of the Kingdom. Also in this Parliament the King created his eldest Son Prince Edward, Duke of Cornwall, who was the first that ever had the Title of Duke in England: He also created six Earls, of Darby, Salisbury, Glocester, Huntington, Northampton and Suffolk, and twenty Knights; at which Solemnity the King made a most magnificent Entertainment.

The War, which all this Time seem'd only in Mens Mouths, now began to break out into Actions, and some of the first Flames appear'd at Southampton, which the French, by the help of their Gallies, almost reduc'd to Ashes; but they with the Loss of their chief Commander and three hundred Soldiers were repuls'd the next Day. To extinguish this encreasing Contest, Pope Benedict sent over two Cardinals into England; but one of them in a Speech to the Clergy seeming to favour the French Clergy, the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury immediately stood up and protested, That the Cardinal's Arguments were vain and frivolous. Whereupon they soon after departed, and it was publish'd in all Parts of England, That King Edward had a Right to the Crown of France, which he design'd to prosecute by all honourable Methods. Notwithstanding the King, to avoid the Effusion of Christian Blood, gave Instructions to the Cardinals, that upon certain reasonable Conditions he was willing to make an entire Peace with France, and to take any honest and proportionable Offer: But the chief Impediment to this was that the French insisted to have the Scots included in the Treaty, to which King Edward would by no Means consent, resolving, when Opportunity permitted, to reduce them to the English Scepter, so that the Labour and Hopes of the Cardinals were all ineffectual. Philip de Valois, in Possession of so noble a Kingdom, on the other Side had the most prevalent Motives to stand off; as his own Honour, Profit, Strength and Alliance, besides the Vastness and apparent Difficulty of King Edward's Enterprize. Then to justifie his Cause he alledg'd, 'First, That the Salick Law had cut off all King Edward's Pretensions to the Crown of France. Secondly, That he Himself was acknowledg'd and receiv'd as King by a publick Act of the whole State of France. Thirdly, King Edward's Birth-Place made him a Stranger to the French, and therefore incapable of Governing that Nation. Lastly, King Edward in the Beginning of his Reign, had in his own Person done Homage to Philip de Valois for the Dukedom of Gascony, and by his Letters Patents testify'd the same.

King's Pretensions.

At length, after the most mature Deliberation, King Edward, on the sixteenth Day of July, took Shipping at the Port of Orewell near Harwich, with a Royal Navy of five hundred Sail, and many of the chief Nobility of England in his Company; who with their great Trains and Retinues compos'd a formidable dable Body of Horse. Besides these the King had a great Multitude of Archers and Welshmen, with all which he arriv'd at Antwerp, then belonging to the Duke of Brabant; and while he resided in that City, vast Throngs of People came from all Parts to see him, and to observe the extraordinary Magnificence of his Court. After several Treaties of Alliances, King Edward remov'd to Cologne, whither the Emperor himself came no less than seven Days Journey to meet his Majesty. The Interview was surprizingly pompous, in the Midst of the Market-Place, where two Royal Thrones were erected in the open Air, the one for the Emperor, and the other for the King of England. The former took his Place first, and the other immediately after; in which magnificent Assembly, as Assistants there were four great Dukes, three Arch-Bishops, six Bishops, thirty seven Earls, and of Barons, Bannerets, Knights and Esquires about seventeen thousand. Here the Emperor set forth the Falshood which the King of France had us'd towards him, and thereupon defy'd him, and pronounced both him and his Adherents Enemies to the Empire; and further by an Instrument which he publickly deliver'd to King Edward, he ordain'd and constituted him his Deputy and Vicar-General of the Sacred Roman Empire, over all the Provinces in the West as far as Cologne; and after that he enter'd into a League Offensive and Defensive for the Term of seven Years. After King Edward's Return to Antwerp with his new Power, he vigorously prosecuted his Affair of Confederacy with the Lords and Governors of the Low-Countries, among whom he and his Royal Family continu'd with great Love and Esteem above a whole Year. The principal Persons that enter'd into this League against the French were the Arch-Bishop of Cologne, the Duke of Brabant, the Duke of Gelderland who had lately marry'd King Edward's Sister Isabel, the Marquess of Juliers, with several German Princes. On the other Side the French had the King of Bohemia, the Count Palatine of the Rhine, the Bishop of Metz, the Duke of Austria, the Marquess of Montferrat, the Earl of Genoa, besides many Princes out of Germany, Franche-County, Savoy, Dauphine, Spain and other Countries. So that all the best of the Christian World were either in Arms, or assisting in this Contest between the two mighty Monarchs of England and France.

He enters France. Cambresis, Vernandois, Tierasche and Laonois; and other Parts of Picardy and Artois were wholly wasted except some few of the stronger Places, and such as had sworn Allegiance to him. So that the Inhabitants of the Country fled on all Sides, without making Resistance. In the mean Time King Philip, with a more numerous Army, and still increasing, encamp'd in Cambresis, and resolv'd not to move from thence till he had fought with the King of England and his Allies: And to that End, on the Monday following, a principal Commander of the French sent Letters to another in King Edward's Army, desiring him to give his Master Notice from King Philip, That if he would chuse any open Place, not incumber'd with Woods or Bogs, he would give him Battel before Thursday next: Which was also confirm'd by another Messenger from the King of Bohemia and the Duke of Lorain. Not long after, the two Armies advancing within three Leagues of each other, King Edward, not to be behind hand with the Enemy, by a particular Herald sent the King of France a Challenge To fight his whole Army on what Day he should please to appoint; which was accepted by King Philip, who appointed Friday the twenty second of October: In the mean Time the Princes and Commanders had Notice to prepare themselves for this great Encounter. When, on the appointed Day, both Armies were drawn out in Order of Battel, and all expected a bloody Engagement, it was again debated in the French King's Council of War, Whether it was best to give the English Battel or not. Many of his Counsellors maintain'd,
That

A Day of Battel appointed,

That the Hazard was too great, since if they lost the Day, the Crown of France would be in Danger; whereas if the Enemy were beaten, neither King Edward, nor his Allies would lose any of their Dominions. While this was debating, King Philip was absolutely discourag'd by Letters from the King of Naples and Sicily, who by the Rules of Astrology declar'd That he would be overcome if he fought with King Edward that Time. Upon which King Philip immediately gave Orders to his Army to retreat into the Camp, and in the Night privately march'd away into the Borders of Flanders. King Edward finding that there was no further Expectation of Fighting, remov'd towards Hainault; so that nothing of any great Moment was further transacted this Year. but to no Effect.

About this Time, the Flemmings, the most necessary Part of King Edward's Alliance, began to decline their Assistance, and would not ingage in an offensive War against France, unless King Edward would first assume the Title and Arms of that Kingdom, as the only lawful King of it. This was projected by the famous D'Arteville; and after the Proposal was fully and publicly debated, He with the Consent of the Flemmings and others, took upon him the Title and Arms of France, quartering the French Flower de Lises with the Leopards or Lions of England. And about this Time he plac'd this French Motto under his Shield Dieu & mon Droit, God and my Right; declaring his Confidence to be only in God and the Justice of his Cause: Which Motto, together with the Arms of France, has been continu'd by all the succeeding Kings of England. After this, King Edward publish'd the same under his Seal, setting the Name of England first, and sent his Letters Patents to the Frontiers of the Enemies Dominions, and fixing them upon the Doors of the Churches, as well to declare the Reason of his Proceedings, as to exempt those from a succeeding Storm, who upon this Notice would acknowledge him their lawful Sovereign. His Affairs growing ripe in those Parts, he left his Queen and Children at Antwerp, as an assur'd Pledge of his Return, and in February took Shipping for England; where in a Parliament at Westminster, he obtain'd very liberal Aids upon Wool, Leather and other Things, for the supporting of his intended Conquest. In lieu of which ready Assistance, he granted a general Pardon both for Trespases, and all Aids for making his Son Knight, and the Marriage of his Daughter during his Reign; forgiving also all Arrears of Farmers and Accountants 'till the tenth Year of his Reign, and all old Debts due to any of his Predecessors; and likewise confirm'd the famous Magna Charta, and of the Forests, with some others. In this Parliament the Lords and Commons petition'd, That since the King had taken upon him the Title of King of France, and chang'd his Arms, they might not be oblig'd to obey Him as King of France, nor that the Kingdom of England be put in Subjection to Him, as King of France. Upon which he caus'd several Letters Patents to be publish'd, which gave them full Satisfaction. A. D. 1340. Reg. 14.

The grand Discourse was now all of the Conquest of France; Musters were made throughout the Kingdom, Armourers and other warlike Artificers were full of Employment, and all Englishmen seem'd possess'd with a martial Eager-ness and Fury. King Edward being ready to repass the Sea, receiv'd Intelligence that the French lay near Sluice in Flanders with a mighty Fleet of four hundred Ships to intercept him; whereupon he resolv'd to force his Way through. Accordingly he set Sail about Midsummer, and stood towards the Coast where the Enemy attended, being reinforc'd by the Northern Navy of England, under the Command of the Lord Morley; so that he had in all about two or three hundred Sail. The valiant King commanding in Person, order'd the best Ships that were well mann'd with Archers and other Soldiers to stand foremost in the Line of Battel; then having tack'd about to gain the Weather-gage, they bravely receiv'd the first Onset. For the French Admirals, discovering the Royal Banner of England upon one of the biggest Ships, were satisfy'd King Edward puts to Sea.

that the King was there in Person; they therefore resolv'd to use all Methods to break his Fleet, and take him Prisoner. So falling down upon the English, there began an obstinate Fight, first with a dreadful Shower of Arrows, by which the English Archers did greater Execution than the French; and after that the two Fleets, coming close to each other, proceeded to grappling and boarding, and by handy Strokes a desperate Slaughter was made, and that with various Success. This Fight continu'd from Ten in the Morning 'till Seven at Night; 'till at length the Strength and Courage of the English prevail'd against far greater Numbers of the French, causing Multitudes of them to leap desperately into the Sea, to shun the Power of their Arms; and in the Conclusion, not above thirty of the French Vessels could escape. In this Battel the French lost about thirty thousand Men; and this was the greatest Sea-Fight that had ever happen'd on the Narrow Seas, and the first in which a King of England commanded in Person; where, besides himself, the greatest Earls and Barons of his Kingdom behav'd themselves with incomparable Bravery and Gallantry. This was such killing News to France, that at first none durst tell it to King Philip but by means of his Jester, who in his Presence often cry'd out Cowardly Englishmen! Fainthearted Englishmen! 'till the King enquiring into his Meaning, he told him That the Frenchmen most bravely leap'd into the Sea, and the Englishmen had not the Courage to follow them. By which artificial Turn the King apprehended a Notion of this Overthrow.

He enters the France with a mighty Army.

After this memorable Victory, King Edward landing in Flanders, in a short Time gather'd together one of the most powerful Armies, that ever any King of England commanded, consisting of near an hundred thousand Soldiers English and Dutch, and under the Conduct of many worthy Generals. With this he advanc'd to the Northern Parts of France, where after great Ravages made in the Country, he sat down before Tourney, designing it both for a Seat of War, and a Place of Refuge. King Philip on the other Side had provided an Army, not inferior to the other in Numbers, which besides himself was commanded by the two Kings of Navarre and Bohemia, with several Princes and great Men, who in a short Time advanc'd towards King Edward's Forces. At Tourney, King Edward with invincible Courage sent a Message to his Rival, saluting him by no other Title than Philip of Valois, by which, To avoid the Effusion of Blood, he challenged him to meet and fight him in a single Combate; or, if that displeas'd him, each to bring a hundred Men into the Field, and decide the Contest with so small a Hazard; or otherwise, within ten Days to join in a full Battel with all their Forces near Tourney. To which Philip gave no direct Answer, as being contrary to his Honour; alledging, That the Message was not sent to him the King of France, but barely to Philip of Valois: Nevertheless he let him understand, That his Design was to beat him out of France, hoping in Christ, from whom he deriv'd his Power, shortly to effect it. The Eyes of all Christendom were now upon these mighty Armies, anxiously expecting the Event and Fate of the War, when after three Months Continuance near Tourney, and no great Action perform'd, Jane de Valois, Sister to King Philip and Mother to King Edward's Queen, a Princess of extraordinary Virtue, came from Fountenelles, where she had taken the Life of a Nun, to mediate a Peace between these two inrag'd Kings, her Brother and Son-in-Law. She travell'd from one to the other, labour'd incessantly, and never desisted, tho' often deny'd, 'till she had with great Patience and wise Conduct so allay'd their furious Passions, that she obtain'd a Day and Place for both Kings to parley together: A memorable Work to be effected by a Woman, in such a warlike Age as this was. This Parley soon produc'd a Truce for one Year, by which the Earls of Salisbury and Suffolk, who had been taken Prisoners, were releas'd; and shortly after both the great Armies were disbanded. Upon which King Edward return'd home with his Queen, who had remain'd three Years in those Parts,

A Truce concluded for a Year.

Parts, and had there brought forth two Sons, Lionell, afterwards Duke of Clarence, and John born at Gaunt, afterwards Duke of Lancaster.

But King Edward's condescending to this sudden Truce, had in reality no other Motive than some Supplies of Mony, which came short of his Expectation, notwithstanding those great Impositions laid on his Subjects. Therefore in his Return to England, to punish the Mismanagement of his Ministers and Officers, he committed some to Prison, turn'd others out of their Places, and was so vigorous and active, that it occasion'd a warm Contest between him and John Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, who by Letters boldly complain'd of manifest Violences done against the Liberties of the Church and English Nation contain'd in Magna Charta, &c. And whereas the King openly charg'd the Arch-Bishop to have been the chief Adviser of his entering into a League with the Germans, and then telling him, That he need take no Care for Treasure, because he himself would see him abundantly furnish'd from England, out of the new granted Subsidies and Profits of the Crown; And that through the Defects in the Arch-Bishop's Performances, he was not only oblig'd to desist from his present Designs, but also to intangle himself among Bankers and Usurers; the Arch-Bishop return'd Answer, That he desir'd it might be examin'd in open Parliament who hinder'd the City of Tourney from being taken; directly removing the Blame from himself and his Friends, upon such as were daily Contrivers, who serving their own Turns by the Abuse of the Publick, would expose him to the Odium of their Actions. And some were of Opinion that the Arch-Bishop privately practis'd against the King's good Fortune in France; which if true, it was easie to discover the principal Motive. For certainly Pope Benedict was no ways pleas'd with King Edward's Successes, nor with the War it self, affirming it pernicious to Christendom; the Scandal of which the French charg'd upon the English as unlawful Claimers, as the English did upon the French as unjust Detainers. This Pope therefore interpos'd, and put Flanders under an Interdict, as having dilloyally deserted their own Earl, and their principal Lord Philip King of France, contrary to their Faith and Allegiance; but they for their Justification return'd Answer, That Edward was the only lawful King of France, and Philip, to whom they had sworn, a meer Usurper; therefore notwithstanding the Interdict, and the Papal Decision, they still persisted in their Adherence. But what still further weaken'd King Edward's Interest, was the Desertion of the Emperor Lewis, who being won over to the Party of the French King, became his sworn Confederate, and revok'd the Vicarship of the Empire, formerly confirm'd on the King of England, pretending that the Cause was for concluding the late Truce without him, as appears by his Letters to King Edward, which are again by him bravely and compleatly answer'd.

But instead of this remote and unconstant Confederate, whose Power was without the Limits of France, Fortune brought in another more near and offensive, within the Body of that Kingdom. For about this Time the Succession to the Dukedom of Bretaign was in Contest between Charles de Blois, Nephew to King Philip, and John de Montfort, upon this Title: Arthur Duke of Bretaign had by his first Wife two Sons, John and Guy, and by his second this John de Montfort. John the Eldest, having no Issue, appointed his Niece Jane, Daughter to his Brother Guy deceas'd, to succeed him in his Dukedom; upon which Appointment Charles de Blois marry'd her, on Condition his Issue by her should inherit the same, and for the greater Security he was invested in it during the Life of John their Uncle. But after his Death, John de Montfort, claiming the Dukedom, went to Paris to do Homage for it to King Philip; but Charles de Blois, opposing him in Right of his Wife, the Controversie was referr'd to the Parliament, where Sentence pass'd in Favour of Charles. Montfort inrag'd at this, repair'd to the King of England, to whom he did Homage for his Dukedom, was receiv'd with great Applause, and his Title acknowledg'd as good. Returning back into Bretaign with Satisfaction and Assistance, after some Encounters with his Enemy, he was taken and committed Prisoner in Paris. His Lady, the Countess of Montfort, a Woman of an undaunted and masculine Spirit, vigorously prosecuted her Husband's Quarrel, put on Armour, led her People in Person, surpriz'd and defended many strong Places in Bretaign. But at length being press'd strongly by Charles de Blois, she begg'd Assistance of the King of England, and had it sent, under the Conduct of the Lord Water de Manny; which reliev'd her at present, but the future requir'd more, of which King Edward was not sparing in regard of his own Designs. The Countess her self came into England to treat both for Supplies and Alliance, and of a Match between her Son and a Daughter of King Edward; and the Earls of Salisbury, Pembroke and Suffolk, and the Lords Stafford, Spenser and Bourchier, with Robert de Artois, the first grand Incendiary, were sent with considerable Forces back with the Lady. Many were the Encounters, Attacks and Surprizes, both by Sea and Land, between the English and the French; and at the Siege of Vannes, Robert de Artois receiv'd his last Wound, after he had valiantly, tho' some think dishonourably, assisted the English about six Years. Not long after King Edward went over into Bretaign in Person with fresh Supplies; and lying before Vannes, John Duke of Normandy, eldest Son to the King of France, sent to the Assistance of Charles de Blois, with an Army of forty thousand Men came to give him Battel. But being just ready to encounter, a Mediation of Truce was made by two Cardinals, sent from Pope Clement VI. and concluded for three whole Years, upon several Conditions, with a Reference to the Pope and the Court of Rome, to hear and examine the Differences between the two Kingdoms, but not to determine them without the Consent of both Kings. The English kept Possession of the City of Vannes, that if a settled Peace follow'd not upon this Truce, they might have sufficient Footing, from whence they might march into the Heart of France. John de Montfort did not long out-live this Truce, after whose Death the greatest Part of Bretaign fell into the Hands of Charles de Blois.

A great Revolution in Scotland.

During the Time of the several Years Wars with France, a great Change happen'd in the Affairs of Scotland: For not long after the Departure of King Edward from that Kingdom, King David's Party, under their chief Commander Andrew Murrey, issu'd out from the Loughs, Mountains and other Places of Retreat with considerable Advantage. King Edward indeed had more than once sent Armies under valiant Generals to support Baliol's Cause, where Success was variable 'till the Death of Murrey. After whom the Lord Smart, taking Advantage of King Edward's Foreign Expeditions, us'd all Methods to prepare a peaceable Entrance for King David, still in France. The Assistance of the Lord William Douglas was very beneficial to that purpose, tho' not always fortunate; being overthrown in a set Battel by King Edward's Forces, under the Command of Sir Thomas Berkley, at Blackbourn. But towards the Decision of the Miseries of the Nation, there arriv'd great Quantities of Ammunition and Supplies from the Kingdom of France, at such Time as the Lord Smart had lain ten Weeks at the Siege of Perth with small Hopes of Success. Perth at length being surrender'd, Baliol finding his Interest and Power daily to decline, abandon'd the Nation, and retir'd into England. Upon which Desertion, King David with his Queen, and many of the Scotch and French Nobility, return'd peaceably into Scotland, after nine Years Absence; and 'till the French King's Cause unfortunately put him into Arms against the English, the afflicted Realm of Scotland enjoy'd Rest and Quiet.

King David restor'd.

dict being dead, Clement VI. succeeded; a Man of singular Learning, but extremely profuse in his Preferments, who by Way of Provision had bestow'd several choice Benefices in England upon Foreigners. For the Prevention of a Practice, so odious to the King and his Parliament, it was made High-Treason or Death for any to bring such Papal Provisions into the Kingdom. And in Justification, the King sent an admirable Letter to the Pope in which he represented how highly it derogated from the State of the Kingdom of England, that such Reservations and Provisions formerly us'd, should in such Manner be continu'd. For the Churches of England had formerly been endow'd by noble and worthy Persons; that the People might be instructed by such as were of their own Language: And yet by the Usurpations of some of his Predecessors, Strangers, and sometimes Enemies to the Realm, were preferr'd before Natives; whereby the Monny and Profits were transported, the Churches and Cures unserv'd, Alms and Hospitality disus'd, the Houses and Edifices ruined, the Charity and Devotion of the People diminish'd, and many other fatal Enormities occasion'd, contrary to the Honour of God and the Founders Wills. In the Beginning of this same Parliament, the King created his eldest Son Edward Prince of Wales, investing him by a Coronet and a Ring of Gold. He was now in the thirteenth Year of his Age, being the Delight and Expectation of all Men; and in a short Time he prov'd so renown'd a Gentleman, that the Commendations given by Walsingham of his Father, as exceeding all the Princes that went before him, may be parallel'd in the Son, as surpassing all the Princes that liv'd after him.

Walsing.

His noble Father King Edward, who had his Eye still fix'd upon France as the Mark of his Conquest, having Notice among other Things by a Messenger from the Pope, that the Emperor Lewis had wholly submitted himself, and was absolv'd from all Censures, upon his declaring in King Philip's Favour; he courageously broke out into this warm Expression, If Lewis joins with the French King, I my self will fight with them both. And whether invited by the Fame of King Arthur, and the Knights of the Round-Table, or by the Glory of all Martial Actions and Exercises; he order'd a spacious Room of Wood to be erected at Windsor Castle, two hundred Foot in Diameter, which he call'd the Round-Table, because he there intended to treat all the Knights which he had invited from Foreign Parts. In the Beginning of this Year he held his Feast of the Round-Table at Windsor, and also issu'd out Letters of safe Conduct for all Foreign Knights and their Servants, who should please to come to a solemn Tournament to be kept for fourteen Days together. At the appointed Day there was a noble Appearance of Knights and great Men of several Nations, and the Solemnity began with a most magnificent Entertainment or Supper; and the Day following the Jufts and Tournaments began, and were continu'd almost every Day during the King's Letters of Protection, being perform'd in the Presence of the Queen and all the Ladies of the Court, who had Scaffolds purposely erected to behold these Martial Sports: Which so pleas'd the King, that in August following, he caus'd a more durable Structure to be erected of the like Form, and for the same Exercises to be continu'd every Year. In Emulation of all this King Philip, knowing that all tended to Preparations against him, erected the like in his Court, to prevent the Knights and great Soldiers of Germany and Italy from repairing to King Edward. And in one Thing more, he did wisely and politickly, in giving leave to his Subjects freely to fell down his Woods for building of Ships, by which his Navy was much augmented, and became very serviceable afterwards. But his Jealousies against the King of England put him upon open Acts of Cruelty, and occasion'd him to put several principal Men of Normandy, Picardy and Gascony to Death, only because they were English in Affection: Among whom are reckon'd Sir Oliver de Clifton, Bacco, Percie and Geoffry of Malestroict, Knights of the best Note: Sir Godfrey of Harcourt, Brother to the Earl of Harcourt, being also sum-mon'd to Paris, fled into England, where he became a great Incendiary in the approaching Flame.

A. D. 1345. Reg. 19. It was not Pope Clement's Mediation, or Diligence in discussing the Title and Pretensions of these two mighty Monarchs, that could prolong the fatal Punishment of France; yet according to former Articles, each Prince sent his particular Orators, where the Difficulties arose so thick and intricate, that the Pope despairing to clear them, deferr'd the Consideration of them to another Time. But King Edward affirming the Truce to be manifestly broken, by the Execution and Persecuting his Friends in Normandy and elsewhere, signify'd thus much to his Holiness, That the Sword, not the Tongue should determine his Right and Title. His Provisions of Men, of Arms, of Ships, of Victuals and Treasure, and of all Things necessary for so brave and daring an Enterprize, were worthy of the Grandeur, Courage and Majesty of an English Monarch. Into Gascony he sent the valiant Henry Earl of Darby, with a gallant Appearance of Commanders and proportionable Troops of Soldiers; where he perform'd many great Actions, for the Defence and Enlargement of that Dukedom, and took several Cities, Towns and Castles. After a glorious Campaign, in which he also defeated a superior Body of French with the Loss of seven thousand of their Men, he return'd richly loaden with Spoils and Prisoners to Bordeaux. Not long before this, at the taking of the City of Bergerac by Storm, where he permitted every particular Soldier to seize any House and convert all the Treasure to his own use; a certain Knight or Soldier call'd Reth seiz'd upon a House where the Bankers for Security had lodg'd their Mony in long Sacks: Upon the Sight of which, Reth imagining so great a Treasure not design'd for private Men, acquainted his General with what he had found; to whom the generous Earl answer'd, That the whole House, and all the Mony in it was his own, tho' it was never so much. The Soldier upon a second Search was still far more surpriz'd, and thinking so great a Treasure could belong to none but a General, once more acquainted him with the Greatness of it, which he had discover'd to be much more than at first. But this great Man was so far from being affected with it, That he told him with some Indignation, That the Greatness of the Treasure could not alter the Case; since he pass'd his Word and Honour, he scorn'd to revoke it. During this Campaign, the Scots attempting upon the Marches of England, by the Vigilance and Valour of the Bishop of Carlisle, the Lords Percie, Nevile and Lucie, and others intrusted in those Parts, they were forc'd to retire into their own Kingdom. It was now the Practice of either Prince to divert and disturb each others Affairs in different Parts, as the English did King Philip's in Gascony, and he the English by his perpetual and constant Confederates the Scots. But King Edward at present could do it the less in Flanders, because his most vigilant and faithful Friend, James de Arteville was this Year slain in a Mutiny by such as were of the French Faction.

A. D. 1346. Reg. 20. At length King Edward, having establish'd his Affairs in England, resolv'd to go in Person into France, and try his Fortunes in that fair Kingdom, and preparing a great Fleet and a brave Army, he took leave of his beloved Queen and went to Southampton, accompany'd by his admirable Son the Prince of Wales, then in the sixteenth Year of his Age, together with all the chief Nobility and most valiant Men of the Nation; to whom he made a short Speech, which was communicated to the whole Army; in which he desir'd them to behave themselves like Men, since he resolv'd to send back his Fleet upon his first landing in France; therefore if any Man's Courage fail'd him, he had his Liberty to stay in England: To which they unanimously answer'd, as tho' inspir'd by his Valour, That they were all ready to follow so brave a Commander, were it to Death it self. After a few Days Sail, his Fleet arriv'd at the Haven of La Hogue in Normandy, contrary to his first Intentions; where leaping on Shore with some Violence, the Blood gush'd out of his his Nose. Upon which his Lords, discourag'd at such an ill-boding Omen, desir'd him to re-enter his Ship, and not land his Men that Day; but the King undauntedly reply'd, It was rather a Sign that the Land desired to have him. Then knighting his Son, and some other young Men of Quality, he enter'd into the Country which did not expect him, resolving to take a full Revenge for the Blood of his Friends, upon the Norman Towns and People; protesting that he sacrific'd them to Cliffon, Bacco, Percy and the rest. His Army, consisting of thirty thousand Foot and twenty five hundred Horse, march'd divided by Day in three Bodies, which usually join'd together at Night. The Cities of Valongnes, Carentan, St. Lo and Harfleur became the first Prey to his victorious Arms; and Rodolph Constable of France, and the Earl of Tankerville, whom the King had sent to Caen, increas'd his Spoil and Fame by taking them Prisoners, with the Defeat of twenty thousand Men. Moving from Caen, he continu'd his March by the Bishopricks of Liseux and Eureux, wasted and burnt all along the Seyne almost to the Walls of Paris, and came and encamped at Poissy. Here he endeavour'd to draw out King Philip to a Combate, declaring That he would wrestle with him in the Eye of all France, on the great Theatre before his Capital City of Paris. But after he had continu'd there five Days, fearing to be enclos'd between the Rivers Seyne and Oyse, he caus'd the Bridges to be repaired, and pass'd into Beauvais, with Design to retire into his Country of Ponthieu, all the Way marking his Road with dreadful Traces of Fire and Blood.

up to Paris.

King Philip, foaming with Rage to behold from his Capital City such furious Flames in the Heart of his Kingdom, with the greatest Army that France had ever seen, advanc'd towards his Enemy, resolving upon Revenge, and scarce doubting of Victory; especially since King Edward's Retreat was look'd upon as a Flight. King Edward had retir'd to gain the River Somme at a Place call'd Blanquetaque below Abbeville; but that Passage was to be disputed by the Sword: For King Philip had before sent a Norman Lord call'd Godemar du Fay, who stood ready on the opposite Bank of the River with a Body of twelve thousand Men, so advantageously posted that King Edward's Passage was concluded to be impracticable. But this undaunted Hero, resolving to pass or perish in the Attempt, plung'd foremost into the River, crying out, They who love me will follow me! upon which all press'd forwards, each striving who should be foremost, 'till through Showers of Darts and Arrows they gain'd the opposite Shore, and soon put the Enemy to flight, with the Loss of two thousand of their Men. King Philip, who thought he was secure of his Rival, and that he must be inclos'd between the Somme and his own numerous Army, was enrag'd at this Defeat, and cry'd out That he was betray'd: Therefore he immediately follow'd the English by the Banks of the River, on the other Side of which King Edward and his Army lay; and he had with him an Army of above a hundred thousand Men, yet King Edward bravely offer'd him a free Passage over the Ford, if he would pass the next Tide, and chuse a fit Place for Battel. But King Philip refusing this generous Offer, the other march'd further into Ponthieu 'till he came near a Town call'd Cressy; where finding a convenient Country for two Armies to draw up in Battalia, and rightly conjecturing that his Enemies would follow him where-ever he march'd, he said to his Nobility, That he would now stay 'till he had fac'd his Enemies and recover'd this Province, the Inheritance of Queen Eleanor his Grand-mother; concluding with his own Motto, GOD DEFEND MY RIGHT: And because he had not above a fourth Part of the Army King Philip brought into the Field, he commanded his Marshals to chuse the best Piece of Ground they could; which being done, and having sent out his Scouts, he strongly encamp'd himself and his Army, impatiently expecting his Enemy.

profoundest Devotions, and taking the Sacrament with his Son and the chief Nobility. In the Morning he form'd his Army into three main Battalions, the first of which was led by the young Prince of Wales, of Strength and Courage far above his Years; with whom were join'd the Earl of Warwick, the Earl of Oxford, the Lord Harcourt, with divers other Persons of Quality, amounting to the Number of eight hundred Men of Arms, two thousand Archers, and a thousand light-arm'd Welshmen. The second Battalion was commanded by the Earls of Arundel and Northampton, the Lord Ross, and many other valiant Lords and Knights; the whole Body amounting to the Number of eight hundred Men of Arms, and twelve hundred Archers. The last Battalion was headed by the King himself, accompany'd with the Lord Mowbray, the Lord Mortimer, and others; amounting to the Number of seven hundred Men of Arms and two thousand Archers; the whole Army making up in all about thirty thousand effective Soldiers. Then having Knighted fifty young Noblemen and Gentlemen for their Encouragement, the valiant King without the least Perturbation, mounted on a white Nag and with a white Staff in his Hand, rode from Rank to Rank, and exhorted every Man to maintain his Right and Honour, with such moving and obliging Expressions as fired the most faint-hearted in the Army. Then refreshing themselves, every Man prepar'd to conquer bravely or die honourably. The Prince's Battalion led the Van, and he had plac'd his Archers in the Front, who were drawn up in a thin oblong Square, that they might not be surrounded by their numerous Enemies, and behind them stood the Prince himself at the Head of the main Body of the Men of Arms; whilst the King himself was drawn up on the Right Hand further off, on the Side of a Hill, with twelve thousand Men, for a Reserve in case of Extremity, and the Carriages were plac'd within a strong Intrenchment cast up for that purpose. The good Order of the English being told to the brave old King of Bohemia on the other Side, he made Answer, as a Man of Experience, Then I see, the English are resolv'd to win all, or die.

It was about three in the Afternoon when King Philip approach'd the English at the Head of his vast Army, and Multitude of Commanders, which he also divided into three main Bodies; and then order'd the first Onset to be made by the Genoese Cross-Bows, who were about fifteen thousand. This they did with some Reluctancy, as being tir'd with the March, and having their Bow-strings much damag'd by a great Shower of Rain; so that when they came to engage with the English Long-Bows, they were soon broken in Pieces, and put to flight. This was attended with such Confusion and Damage to King Philip's Horsemen, that he cry'd out Kill these cowardly Villains who only hinder us! But after a while, getting clear of the Genoese, the Earls of Alencon, Flanders and Blois, with other Commanders fell in with that English Battalion where the young Prince commanded, who receiv'd them with incomparable Valour and Bravery. But fresh Squadrons of French and German Horse rushing in with great Fury, the second Battalion commanded by the Earls of Arundel and Northampton came in to his Assistance, and vigorously attacking the Enemy, caus'd a new Deluge of Blood in the Field. In the mean Time King Edward himself with his Battalion hover'd on the Hill like a Tempest in a Cloud, ready to discharge its Fury, but at present only watching and observing this unequal Conflict. Here a Message was sent to him from the Earl of Northampton to desire him to come down and succour his Son, now very hardly beset; upon which he demanded Whether he was alive: The Messenger told him Yes, but was in Danger of being over-power'd by Numbers. Then reply'd the King with his usual Courage, let them know, that while my Son is alive, they send for no Assistance to me, for the Honour of this glorious Day shall be His. This Answer from so compleat a General added new Life and Flame to the Prince and his valiant Supporters, so that pressing forwards with uncommon Vigour, this brave young Lion, surrounded with Blood and Death, far out-did his Father's and the World's Expectation. Then rushing in to the main Body of the French, the Marquess Charles, Emperor Elect, receiv'd him with great Courage, 'till his Men being slain round about him, and himself wounded in several Places, he found it necessary to quit the Field without staying to see the Fate of his Father the old King of Bohemia; who tho' he had already lost one Eye, and was almost blind with Age, resolv'd not to stain his former Victories with an ignoble Flight: But making the Gentlemen about him lead him up to the Enemy, and ordering his Horse's Bridle to be ty'd to those next him, as the rest did to those of their Companions, they fought so desperately that they were all slain upon the Place, and their dead Bodies were found the next Day surrounding that of their Master. Then were the Arms of that valiant King, being three Ostrich-Feathers, taken by the Prince of Wales and afterwards us'd in his Devise; and have ever since been born by his Successors the Princes of Wales.

The Black Prince and the English are victorious.

In the mean while King Philip did not fail to perform the Part not only of a courageous General, but also of a valiant Soldier: For rallying again the Flower of his Nobility and Men of Arms, he enter'd the hottest of the Battel, and not being known, he was so hemm'd in among the English, that his Horse being kill'd, he was remounted by those about him; and being again dismounted, and wounded in the Neck and Thigh, he had been slain or taken Prisoner had he not been mounted a third Time by the Lord John of Hainault; who at the same Time, partly by Persuasions and partly by Force, oblig'd him to quit the Field. After whose Departure little Resistance was made, so that the Victory in a short Time fell intirely to the English; and Night put an End to the Conflict. On the French Side were slain the two Kings of Bohemia and Majorca; and of Princes, the Earl of Alencon King Philip's Brother, the Earl of Blois, the Earl of Flanders, the Duke of Lorrain Nephew to the King of France, the Dauphine of Vienne, and many others of the chief Nobility of France, Bohemia and Germany. Besides these, there fell twenty four Bannerets, twelve hundred Knights, fifteen hundred Gentlemen, four thousand Men of Arms and Esquires, and above thirty thousand more of the Commons of France. And all this without the Loss of any of the English Nobility, or of many common Soldiers; which was justly look'd upon as a signal Instance of the Divine Favour to King Edward's Arms; which were so nobly employ'd on this Day, being the twenty fourth of August, 1346. King Edward finding the Victory compleat, advanc'd with his untouch'd Battalion towards his victorious Son, and running into his Arms with a most affectionate Embrace and a Kiss, he said, My dear Son, Heaven send you to persevere in these prosperous Beginnings; you have this Day acquitted your self most nobly, and truly merit that Crown for which we have fought. Instead of replying, the noble young Prince with the profoundest Modesty and Silence fell on his Knees before his triumphant Father. The Night was spent by the whole Army in solemn Rejoycing for this glorious Victory, but they made no manner of Boasting: For it was the King's express Command, That none should insult, nor make any vain ostentatious Songs, but all humbly to give Thanks to Almighty God, for his infinite Goodness and Mercy to them. The next Day, for the sake of the Dead, the pious King caus'd the Place of Battel to be consecrated, for the decent Sepulture both of his Enemies and Friends; and order'd that the Wounded should be carefully dress'd and reliev'd; and to the meaner Sort, when recover'd, he generously gave Money, and sent them whither they pleas'd to go. While the King was taking Care of the Dead and Wounded, five hundred Lances and two thousand Archers being sent out to discover what was become of the Enemy, met with great Numbers of such as were coming from Abbeville, Roven and other Places, all ignorant of what had happen'd; and ingaging with them, intirely defeated them, with the Loss of seven thousand Men. Our Writers report, that of Straglers that fled from the Battel, and of others that were coming towards the Place, there were slain many more than in the Field the Day before; which shews us the wonderful Loss this afflicted Country sustain'd at one fatal Blow.

The disconsolate King Philip in the mean Time fled with a small Company to the Castle of Braye, where the Guard enquiring who he was, he answer'd The Fortune of France; and being let in, he was receiv'd with all the Marks of Sorrow and Lamentation. Coming to Amiens, he bitterly exclaim'd against the Lord Godemar for suffering King Edward to pass the River Somme, and threaten'd him with Death; but the Lord of Hainault moderated his Fury with this important Truth, That it was not in Godemar's Power to resist the King of England, when all the Flower of France could not. And finding that Complaints and Punishments were of no Use, he endeavour'd to make the best Defence against the prevailing Arms of King Edward; who, resolving to make the wisest Use of his Victory, went and sat down before the Town of Calais, which had been a long Annoyance both to him and his Kingdom, being then a Place of great Strength, and reputed the very Key of France. Nor did he invest it only by Land, but also block'd it up by Sea, the Earl of Huntington his Admiral lying before it with a great Fleet of seven hundred thirty eight Vessels of all Sorts. Upon his Approach to the Place he sent a Summons to John de Vienne the Governor To surrender to Him as rightful King of France, otherwise, upon taking the Place, he would put them all to the Sword. The other answer'd, He knew but one King of France, who had sent him to keep that Place, of whose Assistance he doubted not, and in whose Service he resolv'd to live and die. Upon this brave Answer, King Edward began to intrench himself strongly before the City, and since he could not expect to take it by Assault, resolv'd to reduce it by Famine; and to this End he threw up an Intrenchment quite round the Place, with regular Fortifications, and form'd his Camp into Streets, consisting of Huts cover'd with Reeds, sufficient for his Soldiers to lodge in all the Winter. The Governor finding it was like to be a long Siege, resolv'd to free the Town of as many useless Mouths as he could, and accordingly drove out more than seventeen hundred of the poorest and least necessary People, and shut the Gates against them; which when the King saw, instead of driving them back and starving them, he out of a Generous and Christian Compassion permitted them to pass through his Camp without Molestation, giving them all a Dinner, and two Pence a Person in Money.

Many Expedients were consider'd for raising the Siege of this Important Place, but two more especially: The first was to gather a sufficient Force to beat King Edward in his Trenches, and the second was to make a powerful Diversion by Means of their ancient Allies the Scots. This latter, as the more easie, was first put in Execution by King David, who enter'd the Kingdom of England with a brave Army of above sixty thousand Men, assuring himself of Success, in regard, as he conceiv'd, that the main Strength of the Nation was gone into France. But he soon found his Error: For the Lords of the North, as Gilbert Humfrevile Earl of Angos, and William Lord la Zouche, with eight other Lords, Percy, Mowbray, Nevile, Deincourt, Manley, Leyburne, Scroop and Musgrave, as also the Arch-Bishop of York and Bishop of Durham, with others of the Clergy, gather'd so great a Force, and so well order'd them by the particular Animation of the Heroick Queen, who in Person rod from Rank to Rank, that they intirely defeated this great Army; took King David himself Prisoner, with the Earls of Fife, Menteth, Murrey and Southerland, the Lord Douglas, the Arch-Bishop of St. Andrews, and many others, with the Death of at least fifteen thousand Soldiers. This Victory, as well as that of Cressy, happen'd on a Saturday, six Weeks after the other; as if all Things had concurr'd to render this Year glorious and triumphant. King David was taken Prisoner by an Esquire nam'd Copland, who carefully kept him in Possession, and and being order'd by the Queen to deliver him up to her, he utterly refus'd, whereupon she complain'd to the King lying then before Calais. Copland being commanded to repair thither, gave the King such a modest and loyal Answer, that he order'd him a Reward of five hundred Pounds a Year in Land, with a Warrant to deliver his Royal Prisoner to the Queen; which he did at York with so handsom an Apology, as both she and the Lords of the Council were fully satisfy'd. To compleat the Triumphs of this glorious Year, Sir Thomas Dagworth, like another Machabee, says our Author, with eight hundred Men of Arms, and one hundred Archers, in Bretaign overthrew Charles de Blois, who having twice in one Day with incredible Odds of Thirty to One, attack'd that brave Knight, was beaten out of the Field with extraordinary Loss of Nobility and others slain and taken. Not long after, the same Sir Thomas, with only three hundred Men of Arms and four hundred Archers, attack'd the same Lord Charles, lying at the Siege of Roche-Darien, with twelve hundred Knights and Esquires, six hundred other armed Men, two thousand Cross-Bow Men, and great Numbers of other Infantry; took Charles himself Prisoner, driving all his Forces, with incomparable Manhood and great Destruction out of the Field.

Still King Edward continu'd in Person before Calais, which he so closely block'd up by Sea and Land, that the Garrison could receive no Relief; so that now they were reduc'd to a languishing Condition, as appear'd by a Letter from the Governor to King Philip, which by an extraordinary Accident fell into King Edward's Hands. In which he told his Master, That his People in Calais had eaten Horses, Dogs and Rats; and nothing remain'd for them but to devour each other; wherefore they were resolv'd, if not reliev'd, to die among their Enemies with Honour, rather than within the Walls by Famine. King Edward, by an uncommon Strain of Generosity, sent this Letter to King Philip, requiring him to use all Expedition, and succour his good People in Calais, who suffer'd such Miseries for his Sake. Upon which King Philip hasten'd his Preparations, and having at length gather'd together a vast Army of a hundred and fifty thousand Men, he with his Son John Duke of Normandy march'd and advanc'd near to King Edward's Camp; and on the latter End of July he sent to offer him Battel. But the King of England wisely answer'd, That he should find him within his Trenches, if he durst venture the Experiment; but since he had been at such Expence of Time and Treasure, he would not leave the Place, 'till he was Master of it. After this two Cardinals, sent on purpose, urg'd for a Mediation and Treaty; in which the French King offer'd King Edward all Gascony and Ponthieu, with the Marriage of his Son John, and also the City of Calais. To which was reply'd, That King Edward was not oblig'd to the offer for Calais, since the Place and all in it were at his Mercy already. Next the French propos'd, That the Right of both Kings might be decid'd by Combat between five or six, chosen by each Side, and the Place assign'd by the King of France: To which the Earl of Lancaster answer'd, That the Place ought to be assign'd by King Edward, as rightful King of England and France; for Philip of Valois had no Right at all: So the Cardinals finding all ineffectual, retir'd to St. Omers. King Edward at that Time having a Reinforcement of seventeen thousand Men, not to be backwards in Bravery, not only offer'd the French King Battel, but also at his own Cost to fill the Trenches, and remove all Impediments that could hinder them from joining; provided he might have sufficient Security that nothing should be convey'd in to the Town during that Time. This generous Offer was likewise refus'd, and King Philip, in a despairing Condition, suddenly set fire to his Tents, and with his vast Army retir'd to Amiens, where he disbanded his Soldiers.

quent Piracies, as well as obstinate Defence they had made, the King would grant no milder Terms than that six of the chief Burgers of the Place should come to him bare headed, bare footed, in their Shirts, with Halts about their Necks, the Keys of the Town and Castle in their Hands, and submit themselves to the King's Pleasure: For the rest he was design'd to shew them Mercy. This final Sentence being brought to the Town, caus'd a general Consternation, it being thought impossible to find six who would fall a Sacrifice for the rest; 'till at last a chief Burger call'd Eustace St. Pierre gave a noble Example of Heroick Courage and Concern for his Fellow-Citizens, and bravely offer'd himself to be the first Man; which soon excited five Others to join with him. These six being brought before the King in that ignominious Manner as was appointed, he was at first inexorable, and notwithstanding the earnest Intercessions of his Son and Lords about him, he order'd them all to be immediately beheaded. But this deplorable Spectacle so pierc'd the Heart of the generous Queen, then in the Camp and great with Child, that she went and threw herself at the King's Feet, and begg'd of him for the Sake of Jesus Christ, the Blessed Virgin, and the tender Love between them, that she might have the Lives of those poor miserable Men. This affecting Sight soon melted the King into a tender Compassion and Compliance; and she immediately caus'd them to be carry'd into her Apartment, where being new cloath'd she order'd them a Dinner and six Nobles a Man, and then to be set at full Liberty: A noble and God-like Action, and worthy such a great and pious Queen. And thus the strong City of Calais was gain'd upon the third Day of August, 1347, after almost a whole Year's Siege with infinite Labour and Expence: All the Inhabitants, except a Priest and two ancient Men, were turn'd out, and sent away to seek new Habitations; and a Colony of the English were planted in their Room, which continu'd in the Possession of the English Crown above two hundred Years after. Upon the Taking of the Place, by the Mediation of Cardinals and other great Men, a Truce was concluded and sworn between the two Kings, upon the twenty eighth Day of September, to continue 'till fifteen Days after the Midsummer following; and King Edward in a short Time after, having settled the Town and his Affairs in those Parts, making Sir Amery de Pavy, an Italian, Governor of the Place, return'd into England with great Glory and Renown; and spent the remaining Part of the Year in Triumphs and Tournaments, celebrated with extraordinary Magnificence.

A. D. VI. Never was the English Name so great and glorious as at this Time, ^{For} 1348. nor did England herself in any preceding Age enjoy a King more renown'd
Reg. 22. for Wisdom, Valour and Good Fortune; the mighty Splendor of his Virtues, England's Gran. leu. not only adorning her with Garlands, conquer'd Spoils and Trophies, but seeming also, like some new shining Sun, to infuse Plenty and Fertility into the Earth it self. To add to his Glory, this Year he was solemnly elected Emperor of Germany, by the Princes of that Empire, and Ambassadors were sent over to him to desire him to accept of that Dignity: But after a mature Consideration of the Troubles and Factions in the Empire, he sully declin'd it, declaring to the Ambassadors, That he would not undertake so great a Burden,
'till he had gain'd the Crown of France, which was due to him by Hereditary Right. All this Year England so glory'd in the Spoils of France, that there was scarce a Woman of Condition but could shew some rich Furs and Foreign Furniture, and the English Ladies began to pride themselves in the Fashions of Great Luxury. the French; and Luxury now increas'ing, fine Table-Linnen, Gold and Silver, Plate and Jewels were commonly seen in the Houses of private Persons. And indeed the Vanity of the Women became very great at this Time; and they were so fond of Tournaments, that it was ordinary for them to ride forty or fifty in a Troop to these Assemblies; and having more Beauty than Discretion, went dress'd like Men in Party-colour'd Coats, embroider'd Girdles, and Daggers

Daggers at their Wastes; and thus they rod upon fine Horses from one Tournament to another, waisting their Estates, and losing their Reputations. But God had provided a severe Scourge for the Luxury now reigning in the Nation, sending a dreadful Plague throughout the Nation, so that the Earth was fill'd with Graves, and the Air with Cries and Lamentations. This Pestilence began first among the Turks, and pierc'd by Degrees into Italy and France, where it cut off many thousands. In the City of London it had so quick and sharp an Edge, that in the Space of one Year, there were bury'd in the common Church-yard call'd the Cestertian, or Charter-House, above fifty thousand Persons.

A terrible Plague.

During these Calamities, the Lord Charny Governor of St. Omers made a secret Bargain with St. Amery de Pavy Governor of Calais, for twenty thousand Crowns to betray that important Town to him; of which King Edward having Notice, went privately thither the very Night the Delivery was agreed on, with the Prince of Wales, and several Earls and Barons, and lodg'd himself in the Castle, to secure it with the Men he brought with him. The Mony was actually brought and paid, and twelve Knights and a hundred Men at Arms were let into the Castle; but to their great Surprise were immediately made Prisoners by the King's Guards who lay undiscover'd. The Lord Charny was then under the Town with a considerable Force, plac'd near two Gates, ready to enter it when they were open'd. But in the mean Time the Prince of Wales issu'd out at one Gate, and the King at the other, conceal'd under the Banner of Sir Walter Manny, and fought bravely on Foot among the common Soldiers, being engag'd with the Lord Eustace of Rylemont, a valiant Man, who struck the King twice to his Knees; yet at last he was overcome by him, and made his Prisoner, with the Lord Charny and many other French Men of Note. The young Prince also prevail'd against the Party he engag'd; and there were slain and drown'd about six hundred French, who were double the Number to the English that fall'd out upon them; so much did the latter exceed the former in Valour. The Night following the King order'd a splendid Supper to be provided, as well for the Prisoners as his own Nobility; and to their great Surprise coming in amongst them, he told the Lord Charny, That he was but a little oblig'd to him, since he design'd to steal that from him by Night, which he fairly won by Day. But coming to the valiant Rylemont, he after a most obliging Manner took a rich Chaplet of Pearls from his own Head, and plac'd it upon the other's, as one who had deserv'd best in the whole Action, and generously forgave him his Ransom. Then removing Sir Amery de Pavy from his Government, and placing Sir John Beauchamp in his Room, the King return'd into England in Triumph with the chiefest of his Prisoners.

A secret Design to betray Calais.

The King prevents it in Person.

And now the renown'd Edward, resolving to give the highest Incouragement to all Martial Virtues, about this Time instituted, or rather compleated the most Noble Order of Knighthood call'd the Garter. For the more solemn and magnificent Celebration of it, the King sent his Heralds into France, Germany, the Low-Countries, and almost all the Kingdoms in Europe, to invite all Knights and Esquires to come and shew their Military Skill and Valour, in all Kinds of Martial Exercises. As to the Original, Form and Nature of this glorious Order, we must refer our Reader to the learned Mr. Ashmole's elaborate Work upon that Subject; and shall only observe, That the End and Design of this Institution was truly noble and generous, and worthy of the mighty Prince who had invented it. For it was not only to adorn martial Virtue by splendid Robes and rich Jewels, but also to engage them by a Solemn Oath before God to preserve Fidelity, Honour and Courage in the Minds of those who were admitted into it; which Virtues were justly esteem'd as the noblest Badges and Distinctions of all Military Men, and by a strict Observation of which they could only acquire great and real Reputation; when not to act justly, valiantly and faithfully, was accounted the most imaginable Blemish and Dishonour.

nour. Not long after this famous Institution, King Edward had a fresh Occasion to show his Valour: For hearing that certain Spanish Men of War, who the preceding Year had cruelly slain many Englishmen and taken away their Commodities, were come into his Seas, he like a Martial Neptune encounter'd them in Person not far from Winchelsey, with such Ships as could suddenly be procur'd; and after a most obstinate Fight, in which he and the Prince of Wales did Wonders, he took twenty six of the principal Ships, sunk others, and drove away the rest. The Gallantry and Spirit of the Spaniards was such, that disdain to out-live the Disgrace of yielding, most of them dy'd by the English Weapons, or were drown'd in the Sea. Thus did this great Prince seek all Occasions, as well by Sea as Land, to expose his Person, not only to gain Glory, of which he had already sufficient, but to defend his Nation from Foreign Enemies that had insulted it; and he seems so much to have valu'd himself upon that Account, that on the first Pieces of Gold he ever coin'd, we find his Figure represented with a drawn Sword in the middle of a Ship of War. In the same Year dy'd Philip King of France, after he had reign'd twenty three Years, and was succeeded by his Son John Duke of Normandy, who renew'd the Truce with the English 'till Pentecost in the Year 1356.

A. D. But this Truce was not long well observ'd in France, each Nation taking 1351. what Advantage they could upon the other, in Picardy, Bretaign and Gascony.
Reg. 25. Sir John Beauchamp Governor of Calais finding the Ways to that Place much infested by the French, march'd out with three hundred Men at Arms, and two hundred Archers on Horseback, and took much Booty in the adjacent Country; but in his Return was encounter'd by the Lord Beaulieu with a Body of two thousand Frenchmen; which Lord he slew, and had routed his Company, when another stronger Party came up, and worsted his, took him Prisoner with twenty English Knights besides. For the present he was succeeded by Sir Robert Herle, who being recruited by a select Body of Men commanded by the Lord Manny, march'd into the French Territories, and after much Damage to the Neighbourhood, return'd without Loss and so large a Booty of Cattel, that a fat Ox at Calais would hardly yield sixteen Pence Sterling. Not long after Henry Earl of Lancaster, lately made a Duke in Parliament, and the second in England, was sent by King Edward to Calais, who marching along the Sea-Coasts, burnt the Suburbs of Boloign to the very Walls; then advancing as far as Estaples, which he plunder'd, he took a Compass to return back on the right Hand, where he did the like to Fanquenberg, and after that to Terouenne. In the Havens of these Towns he fir'd above a hundred Vessels of all Sorts, and proceeded with Fire and Sword up to Arques and the Gates of St. Omers; and having sufficiently made known the Terror of his Arms, he triumphantly return'd to Calais with many Prisoners and much Booty. In Bretaign, where the valiant Sir Thomas Dagworth had been unfortunately slain, Guy de Nesle, Marshal of France, raising a considerable Army in that Country, was gallantly attack'd by Sir Walter Bently, Sir Robert Knolls and other brave Captains, who tho' they had but three hundred Men of Arms and six hundred Archers, intirely defeated him, with above four Times their Number. Thirteen Lords, a hundred and forty Knights, a hundred Esquires, five hundred Men of Arms, and great Numbers of common Soldiers were slain; and nine Lords, and a hundred and forty Knights and Esquires were taken Prisoners: Which prov'd a terrible Blow to the French Interest in those Parts, and was not easily repair'd. taught the English Commanders that Buying and Selling was no Breach of the Truce.

To return to the Affairs of England, King Edward conceiving Displeasure against the Flemmings, being disappointed of the Match between a Daughter of his, and their young Earl of Louis, who was escap'd to France and bestow'd on a Daughter of the Duke of Brabant, withdrew the Mart or Staple of Wool from their Towns which had receiv'd great Advantage by the Trade, and caus'd the same to be kept at Westminster, Chichester, Canterbury, Lincoln, Warwick, York, Newcastle, Exeter, Caermarthen, Bristol and Hull. Judging it more requisite to advance his own Towns than those of Foreigners, by the Commodities of his Kingdom. In the same Parliament that this was settled, many wise Ordinances were also enacted for the Governing and Ordering this Staple. Stow mentions an Act made in this Parliament at the Instance of the Londoners, That no common Harlot should wear any Hood, except rayed or strip'd with divers Colours, nor Furs; but Garments revers'd the wrong Side outwards: In which they endeavour'd well to set a scandalous Mark upon Impurity, to render it the more odious. In the next Parliament, the Lord Roger Mortimer, Grandson to the famous Mortimer, who was attainted and executed twenty three Years before, was now restored to Blood, and the Judgment against the Grandfather was revers'd, as being given without his Answering, and contrary to Law. About the same Time great Mediation was made by the Pope to reconcile the two Kings of England and France; and Commissioners met on both Sides to treat and conclude a Peace. The chief Article in Deliberation was That the King of England should enjoy the whole Dukedom of Gascony, with the City of Calais, and the whole Counties of Artois and Guisnes, for himself and Successors, independently, without doing any Kind of Homage to the Kings of France. This at first seem'd fully agreed on, but at length was broken off by the French, to their further Calamity and Confusion, who might better have given up a Ceremony relating to a Part, than have had the Whole so miserably rent and torn in Pieces as it was afterwards.

These Miseries soon began to approach: For it being signify'd to King Edward that John King of France had given the Dukedom of Gascony to his Son the Dauphine, being much incens'd he immediately bestow'd that Province upon his invincible Son the Prince of Wales; commanding Him to defend his Right with his Sword against his Adversaries. All Things being ready for his Voyage, accompany'd with the Earls of Warwick, Suffolk, Salisbury and Oxford, the Lords Chandoys, Audley, Buteport, Lisle, and other brave Men, and having a thousand Men at Arms, and fourteen hundred Archers, he set Sail towards Gascony; where he immediately proceeded to perform Actions worthy of his great Name and Courage. On the other Side, King Edward, rous'd with a false Alarm, cross'd over the Seas, in Expectation of finding his Enemy King John at St. Omers; but failing of that, after many generous Offers of Combat and Battel, he ravag'd as far as Hesdin, and then return'd back to England to recover the Town of Berwick which the Scots had gotten by Surprise. Calling a Parliament at Westminster, a great Supply was granted to him of fifty Shillings upon every full Sack of Wool, for six Years ensuing; by which Imposition, our Historians believe that the King might be able to expend a thousand Marks a Day; such Vent of Wool was at that Time. But Berwick, before King Edward could appear to succour it, was burnt and dismantled, and then abandon'd by the Scots. The French had sent forty thousand Crowns and some Men at Arms into Scotland, to support their Confederates against the English; but King Edward, not satisfy'd in regaining his own without chastising his Adversaries, proceeded in a hostile Manner against the Scots both by Sea and Land. At Roxborough, Baliol one of the Kings of Scotland surrender'd to King Edward all the Right and Title which he had to that Kingdom, or any of the Appurtenances, reserving only to himself a yearly Pension of two thousand and fifty Pounds.

Pounds. Still David the other King was kept a Prisoner in England; and both were accounted Kings to the great Distraction of that miserable Kingdom. And Affliction seem'd to dwell in all Parts but England, where there was nothing to be seen but Triumphs and Festivals.

A. D. 1356. In the mean Time the Prince of Wales, as it were in Emulation of his Father's Glory, perform'd Wonders in France; for with his victorious Arms he recover'd many Cities, Towns and Prisoners, piercing like a Thunderbolt through all Languedoc, and taking and destroying the two great Cities of Narbon and Carcaffone, which our Authors compare to London and York. The Damage done to the French King in this Expedition was exceeding great, for out of these Countries he rais'd a yearly Revenue of about four hundred thousand old Crowns. The Pope sending a Messenger from Avignon, with an Overture to intercede for Peace, had this Answer, That the Message must be sent to the King his Father, for he could not act without his particular Commands. In the mean Time he dispos'd of all Things without Molestation, and return'd loaded with Spoils and Honour to Bordeaux; from whence, after some Refreshment, he set forwards for new Enterprizes and Adventures. His Army consisted of about eight thousand brave and expert Soldiers, with whom he courageously advanc'd through Peregor and Limosin into the very Heart of France, up to the Gates of Bourges in Berry; the Terror of his Name still flying before him to his mighty Advantage. Thus satisfy'd for the present, he took a new Compass, with Design to return by Renvorantine in Blasois, which he took, and then through the Countries of Tourain, Poitou and Xantoign, to his chief City of Bordeaux. But John King of France, hurry'd on with Impatience and hastning to go beyond his Father in Misfortunes, follow'd with an Army of sixty thousand Men, and near the City of Poitiers overtook the invincible Prince. Having drawn up his Men, he in a short Speech told them, That while they were at Paris, and on their March, he had heard them deliver very swelling Words, How they would treat the English whenever they approach'd them: That now they were not far distant, and therefore he would soon lead them thither, hoping to find their Actions answerable to their former Threats. At the same Time two Cardinals from the Pope began to mediate a Peace; but the French King, supposing he had his Enemy at his Mercy, would accept of no other Conditions, but that the Prince should deliver him four Hostages, and as vanquish'd, surrender himself and his Army to his Discretion. To which unworthy Motion the Prince reply'd with a contemptuous Smile, That he hop'd to conquer; but if not, he could but die, yet he would never yield to lose his Honour, which he valu'd above his Life. The Legates Persuasions being ineffectual, both Parties prepar'd for Battel.

The King of France overtakes him at Poitiers.

The glorious Battel of Poitiers.

Now was the Time that this youthful Hero, fir'd with new Prospects of Glory, began to display his noble Qualifications, and to signalize both his Wisdom and Valour, after a most amazing Manner. Having mounted his Steed, riding from Rank to Rank, he told his Men That Victory was in the Hands of Heav'n, and not always to be gain'd by a Multitude; which if they obtain'd, immortal Honour would be their Reward, or else Death would put an end to their Labours: But for his Part England should never pay his Ransom, for he was resolv'd either to die or conquer. Then wisely taking all the Advantage that the Ground, Vines and Shrubs would afford them, a bloody Fight soon follow'd, which lasted above four Hours with uncommon Variety. Never did the English give nobler Testimony of their Valour and Bravery than at this Time; and the Prince himself with incredible Fury rush'd into the thickest of his Foes, forcing his Way with his insatiable Sword, and like a raging Lion dealing Death and Destruction to all that approach'd him. At length the admirable Conduct and inimitable Courage of the English prevail'd against the powerful Numbers of the French; so that they were intirely defeated, and forc'd to abandon the Field; and King John himself, after a long and valiant Resistance ance was taken Prisoner, together with his Son Philip, then but thirteen Years of Age. Thus in short was this wonderful Battel gain'd in the Fields of Beauvoir, near Poitiers on Monday the nineteenth Day of September, to the great Glory of the English Prince and Nation. There were slain divers of the chief and most valiant of the Nobility of France, among whom were the two Dukes of Bourbon, besides many Earls and Barons, about six thousand Men at Arms, and of the common Sort eight thousand more. The Place of Battel was left free to the English, and more than a hundred Warlike Banners were brought away in Triumph. When the English were all return'd from the Chace, they found they had twice as many Prisoners as themselves; the chief of whom were the French King, his Son Philip, and seventeen Earls, besides Barons, Knights and Esquires to the Number of about two thousand: Wherefore to prevent the Inconveniency of too many Prisoners, they let many of them go upon their Paroles, and appointed them their fix'd Ransoms, in which they were very moderate; for the English generously declar'd They would not set so high a Price upon a Knight or a Gentleman, but he might still be able to live after his Rank, and to follow the Wars according to his Quality. The Loss on the English Side was very inconsiderable, for we find not the Name of any Person of Quality: But those who were most remarkable for their Valour were the Earls of Warwick, Suffolk, Salisbury, Oxford and Stafford, the Lords Cobham, Spenser, Barkley, Basset, Sir John Chandois, and others, who behav'd themselves with incomparable Bravery. But the Lord James Audley gain'd the greatest Honour both for his Valour and Bounty, who having vow'd to be foremost in the Battel, perform'd his Promise to Admiration, and seal'd it with numerous Wounds; for which the Prince having rewarded him with a Gift of five hundred Pounds Fee-simple, he immediately gave it to his four faithful Esquires who with him had sustain'd the Brunt of the Day. The Prince demanding of him Whether he accepted his Gift, he answer'd That these Men had deserv'd it as well as himself, and had more need of it; at which Answer the Prince was so sensibly pleas'd, that he gave him five hundred Pounds more in the same Kind, as the just Reward of so much Merit and Generosity.

The French King taken Prisoner.

The Generosity of the Lord Audley.

By this famous Victory the Prince of Wales gain'd a double Conquest, One by his invincible Sword in the Field, and the Other by his unparallel'd Courtesy to his vanquish'd Enemies. For the Night after the Battel he order'd a noble Supper to be provided for the French King, and the Prisoners of the highest Quality; King John and his Son, with the Princes of the Blood being placed at one Table, while the rest of the Lords and Knights sat at others. The Prince in the mean Time waited at the King's Table, and when desir'd to sit down, he with all the real Marks of Humility reply'd, That he was not worthy to sit down with so great a Monarch. And finding him still dejected and afflicted, he endeavour'd to raise his Spirits by the most civil and ingaging Expressions, telling him among other Things, That his Majesty being one of the bravest of Christian Kings had no Cause to afflict himself; for tho' his Arms had not been favour'd by the sole Disposer of all Victory, yet his Gallantry must be acknowledg'd, and his Royal Dignity should be preserv'd inviolable. As to himself he declar'd That the Realm of France should always find him grateful to her which had produc'd so many of his Progenitors; and towards his Majesty, if he would permit him to glory in that Title, he would ever shew himself a most humble and respectful Kinsman. This extraordinary Submission in a conquering young Prince, about twenty five Years of Age, quite melted the captive King into a Flood of Tears; and when the French Lords saw the Prince so humble amidst the highest Charms of Prosperity, and heard his generous Language deliver'd with such an unaffected obliging Air, they declared among themselves That he had spoken nobly and gallantly, and that he would prove a most accomplish'd Prince. At length King John, recovering himself a little, forc'd a civil Smile, and with an affectionate Countenance said,

The Greatness of the Black Prince.

He is admir'd by his Enemies.

That since it was his Fortune to be overcome, he had this uncommon Alleviation, That as he had not behav'd himself unworthily in the Battel, so he was fallen into the Hands of the most valiant and courteous Prince alive. The next Day the Prince causing his Chaplains and the Priests of the Army to celebrate Divine Service, he turn'd off all the Glory from himself, and most devoutly gave it to the great God of Victories; which being done, in the Sight and Hearing of the Prisoners, he heartily thank'd his Soldiers with Expressions full of Sincerity and Generosity. Then settling all Things, he march'd with his Prisoners and Trophies to Bourdeaux, the Capital City of his Dominions. How the News of this Victory was entertain'd in all Parts of the English Nation, is not hard to conjecture, but especially by King Edward, who gave speedy Orders to the two Arch-Bishops, that eight Days together should be spent in giving God the Honour and Glory of this wonderful Success.

A. D. 1357. The Prince having winter'd at Bourdeaux, and procur'd a sufficient Navy, in April set Sail for England, arriv'd at Plimouth, and by easie Journies came to London; where King John Royally adorn'd made a publick Entry, with the utmost Magnificence and Attendance, being mounted on a stately white Courser, as a Mark of Sovereignty, with the admir'd Prince riding by his Side upon a little black Nag, as one industriously avoiding all Suspicions of a Triumph. They were publickly receiv'd by the Lord Mayor and all the Companies in their richest Habits, their Houses and Streets being adorn'd with their most valuable Plate and Tapestry, as well as a noble Appearance of all Sorts of Armour and Weapons; and the Concourse of People were so numerous to behold so uncommon a Spectacle, that the Cavalcade held from three of the Clock in the Morning till high Noon; about which Time the Prince got to Westminster-Hall, where he solemnly presented to the King his Father, then sitting in great Majesty on his Royal Throne, the Person of King John his Prisoner. Yet King Edward could not long retain the severe Grandeur of a Conqueror; for when the Royal Captive approach'd his Throne, with such a manly Submission as became his present Fortune, he was sensibly touch'd with the Thoughts of the Instability of human Affairs, by the Sight of so great a Prince in so low a Condition; so that hastily rising, he met and caress'd him with as much Honour and Respect, as if he was only come to give him the Favour of a Visit. And the King had so true a Regard to Generosity as well as Valour, that being now acquainted with his Son's humble Deportment after the Battel of Poitiers, he declar'd, That he was more satisfy'd with that, than with the Victory it self. Nor did this great King make use of this solemn Entry as a Matter of his own Triumph, but rather of a devout Procession; for by his Order, the same Day the Clergy of London went forth in their proper Vestments, and singing Anthems to meet the Prince; and after that, for two Days together, publick Prayers and Thanksgivings were celebrated through the Cities of London and Westminster. King Edward, having treated his Prisoners after a great and magnificent Manner, order'd King John and his Son to be honourably lodg'd and entertain'd in the Savoy, being then a famous Palace belonging to the Duke of Lancaster; the rest were fix'd in other convenient Places. David King of the Scots was still kept Prisoner in the Castle of Odiam; but not long after, when he had endur'd about eleven Years Imprisonment, at the incessant Suit of Queen Joan his Wife, Sister to King Edward, he was releas'd, upon paying a Ransom of a hundred thousand Marks Sterling, and upon Condition of demolishing certain Forts and Castles.

David King of Scotland releas'd.

A. D. 1358. In the following Year, King Edward, to display his Grandeur, issu'd out an extraordinary Proclamation That all Foreign Knights and Gentlemen from any Part of the World, desiring to come to the Feast of St. George, to be solemnly held at Windfor on the twenty third of April, should have his Letters of full Conduct for the Space of three Weeks, there to partake of those Martial Honours and Prizes, which should attend the Exercises of his publick Joustings at Windfor.

A Tournament proclaim'd at Windfor.

Tournaments. These were celebrated with the highest Magnificence and Splendor, and attended by the Duke of Brabant, and great Numbers of Lords, Knights and brave Men out of Germany, France, Flanders, Scotland, and other Nations. In the same Year dy'd the famous Isabella, Mother to King Edward, in the sixty third Year of her Age, after about twenty eight Years Confinement at the Castle of Risings near London, as having been highly culpable in relation both to her Husband and the Nation. Her Marriage with King Edward II. as it prov'd fatal to her Husband, so it was unfortunate to her Country the Kingdom of France; since from her the present King of England deriv'd his Title, and brought infinite Miseries upon that Nation, which at this Time were greater than ever happen'd since the Time of the Romans. For Charles the Dauphine, Duke of Normandy, who had escap'd from the Battel of Poictiers, took the Government upon him during his Father's Imprisonment; but by the dangerous Practices of Charles King of Navarre, and evil Disposition of the Pavilians towards the Delivery of their Sovereign, he was grievously incumber'd, and surrounded with innumerable Mischiefs, not being able as yet to work out his Father's Liberty. Moreover the English under the Conduct of Sir Robert Knowles, Sir James Pye, and Thomalin Foulk, committed terrible Devastations, and gain'd great Treasure, Booty and Ransoms, in Bretaign and Normandy, under the Pretence of serving those of Navarre. In short all the Kingdom of France was over-run with dissolute Soldiers of several Nations, who having no General, wasted all at their Pleasure, and by unheard of Insolencies discover'd all the Miseries of Anarchy and Confusion.

Queen Isabella dies.

Great Miseries in France.

Two Cardinals in the English Court endeavour'd to put an End to these Troubles by accommodating the Matter between the two Kings; but could not with two Years Labour draw any Thing to such a Head, as the French for their King's Liberty would perform; which put King Edward upon new Resolutions against France. Therefore looking upon himself as deluded by the French, he with a vast Fleet of eleven hundred Sail pass'd over from Sandwich, in Order to a new Invasion. Being arriv'd at Calais, he set forwards from thence with an Army of a hundred thousand Men divided into three great Bodies or Battalions; the first under the valiant Henry Duke of Lancaster, the second under the brave Prince of Wales, and the third led by himself. They march'd through Artois to the City of Rheims the Metropolis of Champaign, where the Kings of France were usually crown'd and anointed; but missing of this Place, they soon took the Cities of Sens and Nevers without Resistance. The Terror of these Armies soon put the Duke of Burgundy upon a Composition; and for a Sum of two hundred thousand Florens of Gold obtain'd that all Burgundy should be spar'd from Plunder and Devastations. The King kept his Christmas near Rheims, where he was inform'd that the French had landed many Men upon the Coasts of Sussex, who had committed great Barbarities, but had in a short Time retir'd. Upon this News he remov'd from thence and advanc'd towards the Walls of Paris; where he honour'd four hundred Esquires and Gentlemen with the Order of Knighthood. Charles the Dauphine, Regent of France, was then in the City with a powerful Army, but could not by any Means be drawn to hazard a Battel, as dreading the Examples of his Grandfather and Father. Ample Conditions were in a humble Manner offer'd to King Edward, but as yet he was inflexible and deaf to any other, than such as he himself like a Conqueror propos'd. Finding new Difficulties in the Siege of Paris, he retir'd into Bretaign to refresh his Army; but upon his Return, seeing the Fortifications increas'd, he turn'd his Anger into the very Bowels of France, wasting and ravaging as far as Chartres and Orleans, and still continu'd inexorable as to the French Proposals. Yet in a short Time an Accident from Heav'n chang'd his Mind, which was a prodigious Storm of Thunder, Hail and Rain, which kill'd six thousand of his Horses, and near a thousand of of his Men; and this so astonish'd the King and his Men, that looking upon it as a Mark of the Divine Displeasure, he immediately prostrated himself upon the Ground, and made a solemn Vow to Almighty God, that he would give a final Peace to France upon honourable Conditions. This, and the Duke of Lancaster's Persuasions, so mollify'd him, that finally by the Mediation of the Pope's Legate, a Peace was concluded at Bretaign near Chartres, upon the eighth Day of May. Thus was the Kingdom of France deliver'd from its terrible Scourge by the Hands of Providence, when it was in a languishing, and almost expiring Condition.

A Peace concluded.

The Articles of it.

The French King releas'd.

The Substance of the Articles of Agreement was this: That the King of England should retain the whole Dukedom of Gascony, with the bordering Countries of Xaintoign, Poitou, Peregort, Limosin, Quercie, Anyolesm, Rovergne, &c. with all the Cities, Castles and Appendages, without any Dependency upon the King of France: That he should likewise retain the County of Ponthieu, the Towns, Counties and Lordships of Calais, Guifnes, Monstruel, Hauves, Wale, Oye, St. Valary, Merk and Sangate: And that he should receive from King John for a Ransom, a Sum of Money amounting to five hundred thousand Pounds, the fifth Part to be paid down, and the rest in two Years Time. For all this, the King of England should renounce all his Right and Title to the Crown of France, the Dukedom of Normandy, the Counties of Tourain, Anjou, Maine, the Sovereignty and Homage of the Dukedom of Bretaign, and the Earldom of Flanders; and that he should at his own Expences set King John at Liberty in Calais, within three Weeks Time. For the Performance of Covenants, Hostages were given of many of the greatest Men in France, who were Sureties for the Ransom: The Scots were not to be assisted by the French King, nor the Flemmings by the English; and the King of Navarre and his Brother were comprehended in the Articles. The Treaty being solemnly ratify'd by both Kings, and Hostages given, King Edward honourably conducted King John to Calais, where he made a most magnificent Entertainment for him, being waited at the Table by King Edward's four Sons, and the chief Nobility of England. Here was King John set at full Liberty, after he had been a Prisoner above four Years; and both Kings departed in the most obliging Manner, with all the Demonstrations of hearty Love and Affection.

A. D. VII. The Wars being ended between the two chief Crowns in Europe, and England being in a profound Peace, King Edward was pleas'd to restore by his Letters Patents to the Priors-Aliens all their Houses, Lands and Estates, which were taken from them twenty three Years before for the Maintenance of the French Wars: A rare Example of a just King; it being seldom known that Princes give up what they have once got into their Possession. In the same Year a second Pestilence happen'd in England, which swept away many of the Nobility and Bishops, and among the rest Henry Duke of Lancaster, a Person of extraordinary Worth in all Respects, who fell much lamented by all Men, especially the poorer Sort, by whom he was call'd the Good Duke. He founded the Collegiate Church of Leicester, and also a noble Hospital there for a hundred Poor People, which last still continues. Shortly after his Death the Prince of Wales, now call'd the Black Prince, being in the one and thirtieth Year of his Age, with the Consent of the King his Father, marry'd the beautiful Lady Joane, Countess Dowager of Kent, Widow of the late Earl Thomas Holland.

Lands restor'd to the Priors-Aliens.

A. D. In the following Year, not long after at a Royal Tournament held in Smithfield for five Days together, he was created Duke or rather Prince of Aquitain or Gascony, and was solemnly invest'd with that Dukedom by his Father, who now chang'd the Title of it into a Principality. In the same Year, in a Parliament was pass'd that remarkable Statute which ordains, That all Pleadings and Judgments in the Courts of Westminster, should be for the future in English.

All Pleadings ordain'd to be in English.

gliff, whereas before they were usually in the French Language. In the same Parliament the King declar'd himself arriv'd to the fiftieth Year of his Age, designing to keep it as a Jubile, and to shew Acts of Grace and Mercy to his People; and therefore granted his General and Special Pardon to all, without Fine or paying any Fees for the Seal; and he set at Liberty all Debtors to the Crown, and Prisoners for Criminal Matters. He also confirm'd Magna Charta, which during this Reign had been confirm'd above ten several Times. In this Parliament also, he declar'd his Second Son Lionel, Duke of Clarence; his Third Son, John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster; and his Fourth Son Edmund, Earl of Cambridge. So the King having pass'd several Statutes, and fix'd the Staple of Wool at Calais, he spent the rest of the Year in publick Pleasures and Diversions with his chief Nobility and French Hostages; taking a Progress with them through many Parts of England, and usually expending for his own Part a hundred Marks, and sometimes a hundred Pounds a Day.

New Promos.
ons.

In the Beginning of the following Year, Prince Edward having waited upon the King his Father, took shipping with his beloved Princess and all his Retinue, and arriv'd at his Government of Gascony; where he kept a noble Court for the Space of three Years, and govern'd the Country with great Love and Clemency. In the mean Time King Edward's Court was honour'd with the Presence of three Kings at the same Time, two of whom had formerly been Prisoners; David King of Scotland, who by the late Death of Edward Baliol, now obtain'd an indisputable Title to that Kingdom; John King of France, who came to transact the Remains of his Ransom, and the Delivery of his Hostages; and Peter King of Cyprus, who came over to desire Assistance against the common Enemies of Christendom. But none was so acceptable as King John, to meet whom King Edward sent many of his Nobility to Dover, from whence he was conducted to Canterbury, where he offer'd a rich Jewel at the Shrine of Thomas Becket. From thence he went to the Palace of Eltham, where he was most obligingly receiv'd by the King and Queen, and entertain'd with all Sorts of Diversions; and some Time after he was receiv'd by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London in the greatest State, by whom he was magnificently treated. But Sir Henry Picard, a Merchant Vintner and formerly Lord Mayor, exceeded all Men in a wonderful Entertainment he made at his own House for no less than four Kings at once, of England, France, Scotland and Cyprus, besides the King's Sons and most of the Nobility of England: A Thing never done by any private Subject of the Nation. King John had his chief Residence at the Savoy, then a magnificent Palace belonging to the Duke of Lancaster; but not long after, in the Beginning of the Spring, he was taken dangerously ill of a languishing Distemper, which put an End to his Life, on the eighth Day of April, to the great Grief of King Edward, his Queen, and the French Princes and Nobility. The King made him a noble Funeral at his own Expence, and caus'd his Body to be transported into France, where it was inter'd on the seventh of May at St. Denis. He was noted for this excellent Saying of his, That if Faith and Truth should be banish'd from the rest of the World, yet they ought to be found in the Mouths of Kings.

France.

That King Edward's Fortune was not only available to himself, or his Lieutenants, but also to his Friends and Favourites, appear'd in the great Contest about the Title of Breaign, which about this Time was determin'd by the Death of the Lord Charles de Blois, Head of one Faction, who was slain in an Engagement against the Lord John de Montfort Head of the other Side; where the Lord Latimer, Sir John Chandois, Sir Hugh Calverley, with other Englishmen, who join'd with Montfort, won great Honour and Renown. This Battle was fought at Auray, not far from Vannes; after which, Montfort having granted some Estates to the Widow of his Competitor, he did Homage to Charles the new King of France, and was accepted as Duke of Breaign, with Consent of the King of England, his main Supporter and Protector. Loss was great on the Enemy's Side; for there were slain, besides the Earl of Blois, the Lord John his Brother, and six Lords, with many others of principal Note, Walsingham says about a thousand Men of Arms and Esquires; and there were taken Prisoners John and Guy the Earl's Sons, with nine other Lords, and of those whose Fame countervail'd many others, Sir Bertram de Glouin Marthal of France, under the victorious Banner of Sir John Chandois.

For such of them as had warr'd under the King of Cyprus against the Infidels, and taken Alexandria in Egypt, return'd with great Riches in Cloaths of Gold, Velvits and precious Stones. About these Times also Sir John Hawkwood, a noble Warrior, pass'd over into Italy, where he bravely reviv'd Military Discipline long diffus'd in those Parts, and found such Entertainment from the Italian Princes, and got such Honour and Riches by his Valour, that his Fame remains to this Day, and his Statue among their most memorable Princes for Action and Bravery; tho' in Reality he went but a Taylor out of England, which in those Days could have furnish'd the whole World with brave Commanders and expert Warriors. And as the English Valour was seen one Way beyond the high Alps, so there fell out Occasions not long after, which made it known and conspicuous another Way, beyond the Pyrenean Mountains.

Reg. 40. VIII. We have now brought this mighty Monarch to the fortieth Year of his Reign, which had it been his last, we had left him the most glorious and triumphant Prince in the World, to whom Fortune had always shown her Smiles, and scarce ever was retrograde. But now these last ten Years represent us with little Turnings of the Scale, some Declensions from that wonderful Height of Glory, and with some Spots and Blemishes which Age and Frailty brought upon him. Yet still he wanted not Vigour and Resolution to perform many great Things, and particularly to reduce the exorbitant Pretences of the Pope in this Nation, who more than once positively demanded that infamous Tribute from England and Ireland that was first granted by King John. This being now again demanded, King Edward in a full Parliament order'd it to be debated by the Prelates, Lords and Commons seperately; and after a full Deliberation they declar'd, 'That neither John, nor any other King, could bring 'himself or his Kingdom to any such Subjection, without their Assent, as appear'd from the plainest Evidences; and if it were done, it was void, as being 'against their Consent and his Coronation Oath: Therefore they finally resolv'd, 'That if the Pope should by Process, or any other Way attempt to constrain the King or his Subjects to agree with any Claims in that Respect, they 'would resist him to the utmost of their Power. Thus by the Care of the King, and the Stout Opposition of the Parliament, this haughty Demand of the Bishop of Rome was quash'd for ever; for we do not find that it was ever reviv'd afterwards.

The Pope's Pretensions quash'd

Black Prince.

Still the mighty Prince of Wales remain'd in his Government of Gascony, with a splendid Court and a noble Attendance, and without Imployment, till he was humbly solicited by Peter King of Castile to assist him, who for his Cruelties and Tyrannical Actions, had been driven out of his Kingdom by his natural Brother Henry; all which the Prince, by the particular Consent of his Father, chearfully undertook, upon Promise of large Remunerations. The Cause was much better than the Person: For this Peter, Son to Alphonso II. King of Castile, had prov'd intolerable to his Subjects, oppressing and destroying his Nobility to enrich himself, divorcing and then murdering his Wife, Sister to the present Queen of France, by the Instigation of his Concubine Maria de Padilla, whom he afterwards marry'd. Whereupon the State adhering to his Brother Henry, who tho' a Bastard by Birth was more legitimate by his Virtues, crown'd him King of Spain at Burgos, and forc'd

Peter to abandon his Kingdom. The brave Black Prince, thirsting after Glory, and desirous to succour the Distressed, pass'd over the Pyrenean Mountains into Spain with a compleat Army of thirty thousand Men, having in his Company, besides most of the prime Commanders of the English, the Persons of two Kings, Peter King of Castile, and the King of Majorca, and John Duke of Lancaster, who some Time after Peter's Death was himself King of Castile and Leon. On the other Side the new King Henry for the Defence of his acquired Kingdom had gather'd together great Numbers, as well French as Castilians, and others both Christians and Saracens, not fewer than a hundred thousand Men. Upon the Borders of Castile near Najara a general Battel was fought between these two unequal Armies; where the Heroical Prince of Wales, now Black indeed with the amazing Terror he struck into his Enemies, obtained a compleat Victory, with the Death of many thousands on the other Side; and Bertram de Glequin, the French General, with many others were taken Prisoners. As soon as the Battel was over, King Peter, transported with the mighty Valour of the Prince, kneel'd down to give him Thanks with the Marks of Adoration; but the other running to embrace him would by no Means permit it: However bowing very low, he gave him Thanks, That by his Valour and Assistance he had now regain'd his Crown: To which the Prince with admirable Modesty reply'd, Sir, return your Thanks to God Almighty, and give him all the Glory; for by Him alone, and not by Me, you have obtain'd the Victory. The Fame of this Action however flew through all Parts of Europe, and the Germans, Flemmings and English in especial Manner acknowledged the Prince of Wales to be the Glory of Honour and Knighthood, and that such a Prince was worthy to govern the World, since he had achiev'd three such wonderful Enterprizes; First at Cressy, where by him the whole Power of France was broken, two Kings slain, and a third put to flight; next at Poitiers, where he again overcame the whole Power of France, and took its King Prisoner; and now in Spain, where at one single Blow he decided the Fate of a Kingdom; as tho' he had the Power to make and unmake Kings and Princes: For he never left Peter, 'till he had replac'd him upon his Throne at Burgos.

The Black Prince consents

He obtains a glorious Victory at Najara.

His great Fame.

But notwithstanding all this Glory, the Prince prov'd a great Sufferer in a short Time, from the monstrous Falshood and Ingratitude of King Peter; for tho' he had shown himself the most generous Man in the World to this wicked Prince, he was forc'd to return to Bordeaux without Money to pay his Army, which occasion'd extraordinary Mischiefs to himself, and to the English Dominions beyond Sea; as if God himself had been displeas'd for his succouring such a Tyrant. Therefore the Prince, who declar'd Honour should be his Reward, to pay off his Soldiers who had been deluded by Peter, coin'd his own Plate for Money; and when that prov'd insufficient, he laid upon his Subjects of Gascony and the neighbouring Provinces a new Tax, which provok'd them to a dangerous Revolt. However God's Vengeance found out Peter; for not long after his Bastard Brother Henry return'd with new Forces, and by the Assistance of Glequin and the French, he not only expell'd him from his Throne, but also murder'd him with his own Hands. Thus ended this great Expedition of the Black Prince, which almost put a Period to the Health and Happiness of his Life; for in this Journey he contracted an incurable Disposition, which some impute to an inveterate Poison, that produc'd dangerous Symptoms both upon his Body and Mind 'till the Day of his Death. We may here likewise in a manner conclude all the Happiness and good Success of King Edward's Reign, during the rest of which we scarce meet with any Thing but the untimely Death of his Sons, and his most beloved Queen, the Discontents and Factions of his Nobility and Subjects, with the Revolt and Loss of most of what he had gain'd by his Conquests in France.

King improves.*

Now began the Peace between England and France to dissolve it self by several Steps and Degrees. For while King Edward quietly enjoy'd himself in the noble Virtues and Actions of his Sons and Subjects, Charles King of France firman'd The Wife, warn'd by the numerous Calamities his Dominions had sustain'd from the English in open War, and most earnestly desiring to recover the Honour of his Nation, betook himself to other Arts and Methods; never venturing his own Person, but executing all his Designs by Deputies, in which the Service of Bertram de Glequin, afterwards Constable of France, was of extraordinary Benefit. Nor did he neglect in Time to find out proper Colours to paint over his Collusions and Contrivances for saving his Honour; insomuch that when it came to a publick Scrutiny, the Loss was plainly upon King Edward's Side, and the Cause of the Breach at least render'd doubtful. His Practices were notwithstanding palpable, and it must be acknowledg'd that King Edward, relying too much upon the Rules of Honour and Magnanimity, did not reap the just Effects of such mighty Victories; nor of a Peace which was so solemnly ratify'd, that in the World's Opinion it could not on one Side be infrig'd, without a manifest Invasion of all Obligations Divine and Human. The Prince of Wales by Letters advertis'd his Father not to trust to any specious Overtures of Amity and Alliance made by the French, because he found that they had entertain'd secret Practices in every Place against him. But the Prince was then judg'd to speak out of a restless Delight after War, and therefore prevail'd not; tho' the Effects soon discover'd that his Words were unquestionably true.

*The French
King's Designs.*

His Pretensions

For now King Charles, having by speedy Payments and other Methods recover'd all the French Hostages out of England, us'd all Means to abuse King Edward's Credulity, 'till he had advanc'd as far as Dissimulation could carry him. He courted the good old King with obliging Letters and Presents, while his Plots were ripening abroad, and the County of Ponthieu, King Edward's undoubted Inheritance was surpriz'd before he heard of it. And whereas the Prince of Wales in Gascony demanded a certain Tax upon Chimnies, the Earls of Armignac and Cominges, and other Lords subject to the Prince, hating the English Empire, repair'd to the French Court at Paris, there to pursue an Appeal from this Oppression made by the Prince, who was not so happy as to follow the Advice of Sir Robert Knolls and other wise Counsellors who dissuaded this Imposition. These Lords pretended that he was to answer before King Charles as his superior Lord, from whom he held by Homage and Fealty; and tho' King Edward and his Heirs were absolutely freed by the last Treaty from all Manner of Service for his Dominions in France, King Charles at length proceeded to summon the Prince of Wales to Paris, to answer his Subjects Accusations. His Answer was like himself, That he would come attended with sixty thousand Men. The King of England complain'd of the Breach of Peace to the Pope and the Emperor, who made a Journey into France to reconcile the two Kings; before whom the English Ambassadors alledg'd, That the French were the first Infringers of the solemn Treaty by seizing of Ponthieu and several Parts of Gascony, without first demanding Restitution for any Injury committed, and insill'd upon many other unfair Practices. The French on the other Side alledg'd That King Edward had not made that publick Renunciation to the Crown of France as the Treaty oblig'd him, nor did he withdraw his Troops out of France so soon as he ought; therefore the Breach was on the English Side, because the Soldiers were theirs. Thus both Sides had their plausible Pretences, but neither submitted to an Agreement.

*A Breach with

Upon this King Edward call'd a Parliament, declar'd the Breach, desir'd Supplies, and obtain'd them; and further by their Advice he re-assum'd his Claim to the Crown of France, and alter'd his Seals accordingly. John Duke of Lancaster and Humphry Bohun Earl of Hereford were sent over with a powerful Army to Calais to invade France on that Side; while the Prince of Wales was endeavouring endeavouring to recover the revolted Towns on the other. But not much was effected, and the Duke after he had pierc'd as far as Roan return'd home. After whom Thomas Beauchamp Earl of Warwick was sent over with fresh Supplies, but he dy'd in his Expedition; leaving behind him the Character of One who had scarce his Equal for Loyalty and Courage. In England was nothing but Grief and Mourning for the Death of the excellent Queen Philippa, who had been Wife to King Edward for forty four Years, and had born him twelve Children. A little before her Death, the King being by, she in a solemn Speech acknowledg'd the great Happiness, Peace and Prosperity in which they had liv'd for so many Years, and concluded with making him three Requests: First, That he would be pleas'd to pay all her Debts; Secondly, That he would make good all her Charities and Donations to Colleges, Churches and Religious Houses; and Lastly, That he would give Orders that whenever he dy'd his Body might be bury'd by hers at Westminster. These being granted with the most tender Expressions, having recommended her self, him and her Children to God's Mercy, she quietly departed, to the exceeding Grief of all her Subjects, who highly lov'd her as a true Friend to the English, liberal to her Servants and charitable to the Poor. Among her many Acts of Piety, she founded Queen's-College in Oxford.

The Death of Queen Philippa.

Her Character.

Still the Wars were carry'd on in France, where Sir Robert Knolls, a Man renowned for Courage and Conduct, was made Commander of an Army, with which he terrify'd the Country as far as the Loyre, harra's'd Vermandois, Champaign, la Brie, and the Isle of France, and burnt all round Paris; yet nothing could move the French King to send any Forces against them out of that City. But this Army having several Lords and great Men in it, who disdain'd to be commanded by him whom they accounted their Inferior, great Factions were rais'd, and the Expedition came to no great Effect. About the same Time the Duke of Lancaster and the Earl of Cambridge were sent with Forces into Gascony to assist their Brother the Prince of Wales; who about this Time, hearing of the treacherous Revolt and Surrender of Limoges, he resolv'd to execute a severe Revenge upon the Place, and all such as were concern'd in the Betraying of it. After a Month's Siege he took the City by Storm, at which Time more than three thousand Men, Women and Children of the Inhabitants were put to the Sword; yet at length the great Bravery of three French Officers so affected his generous Breast, that he shew'd Mercy to the rest, tho' he wholly burnt and destroy'd the Place. This was the last Martial Act of this mighty Prince, with whom the good Fortune of England, as if it had been inherent to his Person, flourish'd in his Health, languish'd in his Sickness, and expir'd in his Death. He was now carry'd about in a Horse Litter; and being advis'd by his Physicians to return into England for his Health, he follow'd their Directions, and with his Princess, his Son Richard and others, he came for England, taking his final Leave of Gascony, which he left to the Management of his Brother John Duke of Lancaster.

The last Action of the Black Prince.

He returns into England.

The French in the mean Time won many Towns and Forts in Gascony, daily raising new Hopes after so long and continu'd Misfortunes. The unhappy Loss of that expert Commander Sir John Chandois was a mighty Advantage to them, whose whole Care rested upon their famous Glequin, a Man so skilful in good and evil Fortune, and who had so temper'd his Courage and Discretion, that he alone could bid his unfortunate Country rise once more and flourish. The Prince of Wales still declining in Health, upon his first Appearance before his Father, surrender'd the Dukedom of Gascony to be dispos'd according to his Pleasure: And while King Edward was at Clarendon, there repair'd to him the factious King of Navarre, whose Business was to make an Offer of an Alliance against the French; but tho' his Proposals were acceptable, yet his Cautions seem'd so defective, that after a solemn Entertainment, he return'd without any Conclusion. Not long after the Duke of Lancaster and his Brother the Earl of Cambridge bridge return'd out of Gascony, with their Ladies Constance and Isabella, both Daughters to Peter late King of Spain, whom they marry'd; the Duke there-upon stiling himself King, and his Wife Queen of Castile and Leon. Nor was the English Name only increas'd in titular Honours, but also by real Actions; for about this Time, the Flemmings, who had provok'd the Nation, were defeated by the Earl of Hereford, in a sharp Sea-Fight, about twenty five of their Ships were taken, and all the Men slain.

The Flemmings defeated at Sea.

A. D. The Pleasure of this Victory was soon after sow'd with a terrible Loss at Sea: For the French having besieg'd the strong City of Rochell with the Assistance of Henry King of Castile by Sea, for the Relief of the English, the Earl of Pembroke was sent with forty Ships, Men, Victuals, Ammunition and Money to the Value of twenty thousand Marks for the Use of the War; but being suddenly attack'd by the Spanish Armado, consisting of many large Ships under the Command of Admiral Buccanigra and others, the English after a long and bloody Conflict were utterly routed, the Earl himself taken Prisoner, and almost all the rest slain or taken. Rochell held out notwithstanding; to the Relief of which while King Edward in Person set Sail with an extraordinary Power, a violent Wind drove him bak into England, to his great Disappointment, and the useless Consumption of ninety thousand Pounds Sterling. Yet still he did not give over his Care for that strong Place, which the English with no small Courage made good against the Enemy. This Place persisting in all Loyalty, John Duke of Bretaign, who had marry'd the Lady Mary Daughter to King Edward, a great Lover of the English, resolv'd to venture his Fortune in their Cause; and coming over to England, he had Aid granted him, with which he warr'd against the French with various Success. Likewise the brave Duke of Lancaster, with a powerful Army from Calais, march'd and ravag'd through the Body of the whole Kingdom of France, 'till he arriv'd at Bordeaux, and that without any considerable Opposition: So that tho' this Expedition seem'd very glorious for the English, yet it was of more Fame than real Advantage to their Affairs; for they lost many Men, and almost all their Horses in that long March, partly through the Diseases incident to Camps, but chiefly for Want of Forage and Provisions. Not long after the Duke drew out into the Field, and a Day was appointed between him and the Duke of Anjou, the French King's Brother, to have decided the Nations Contest in a set Battel, before the City of Thoulouse in Languedoc; but by an untimely and pernicious Sort of a Truce, to which King Edward consented upon the Account of his Son's Sickness, the hopeful Victory not only slip't away from the English, but likewise all Advantages of acting any Thing else in due Season. The French boasted themselves as of a Conquest, tho' what they gain'd was no more than the common Effects of Policy. Glequin in the mean Time made the best use of all Occasions, and did much Damage to the English Party in Guienne and Bretaign; but in Bretaign Sir Robert Knolls so bravely acquitted himself in the Behalf of King Edward's Son-in-Law the Duke, that he only seem'd a fit Match for Glequin, as the other also had stopp'd the Current of his Fortunes.

The English worsted at Sea by the Spaniards.

A. D. The next Year the Duke of Lancaster return'd into England, after whose Departure almost all Gascony revolted, and fell to the French, who by the Advantage of King Edward's Age, the Black Prince's Sickness, and the Success of their Policy, more than their Valour, were grown brave again. A Treaty of Peace was negotiated at Bruges, but all was Colour and Pretence; for at the same Time the French made secret Preparations for new Attempts. The chief Commissioner for the English in that Treaty was the Duke of Lancaster, and for the French the Duke of Anjou; and their Meeting produc'd nothing but a short Truce to breed more Evils to the English. Notwithstanding, much outward Jollity and Magnificence appear'd in England; for this Summer a certain Gentlewoman of no great Quality, call'd Alice Peirce, by her Beauty and other Artifices so much prevail'd upon the aged King, as to be his Mistress; and he having lately

But this Truce wrought more for Glequin's Advantage than he could do with his Arms; for the Duke of Bre The English Affairs still decline. tain had before driven him out of his Territories. But this Management was not now to be wonder'd at: For the Prince of Wales was in a dangerous Condition; Plots were set on Foot at home; the Duke of Lancaster had an Eye to the Succession; Domestick Affairs grew disturb'd; the King's Age was abus'd and mis-led by Alice Peirce, and his Treasure exhausted by others; all which were sufficiently known to the French who diligently made use of their Weaknesses.

For the Cure of these a Parliament was call'd to Westminster, where the King's Wants were laid open, and a Supply desir'd; but the whole Body of the Assembly, weary with bearing these continual Burdens, instead of Contributions, exhibited great Complaints, charging the King's Officers with fraudulent Practices, and petition'd that the Duke of Lancaster, the Lord Chamberlain Latimer, Dame Alice Peirce, and Sir Richard Sturry, might be remov'd from the Court. All this was done A. D. 1376. Reg. 50. with such Heat and Vehemence, that the King, rather than not be supply'd, gave way to them, and remov'd all those Persons from his Presence.

The Prince was thought to favour this Proceeding; for there seem'd no good Correspondence between him and his Brother the Duke of Lancaster, who now manag'd all under his aged Father, and whose Ambition might be dangerous to his young Son Richard, whom he was like to leave to his Mercy. The King in this Parliament, being the Fiftieth Year of his Reign, to gratifie his Subjects, granted another general Pardon, as another Jubilee; which was solemniz'd with great Magnificence.

But this Jubilee was soon turn'd into a general Sorrow throughout the Nation by the Death of that Miracle of Mankind the incomparable Prince of Wales; a Prince the greatest for Magnanimity, Valour and Bravery, and the noblest for Humanity, Courtesie and Wisdom, that ever grac'd the En- Several Regulations at home. glish Name and Nation. He dy'd in the forty sixth Year of his Age, upon the eighth Day of June, in the Memory of which his Anniversary Obit was afterwards appointed to be held at Windsor upon that Day for ever; and the whole Body of the Parliament thought themselves honour'd in attending his Herse to Canterbury, where he was interr'd with the highest Solemnity imaginable. His Loss was so sensible an Affliction to his Father, the truest Judge of his Merits, that he seem'd not to live after him, nor could he continue much above a Year in this World.

In the mean Time John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, got the Government of the Kingdom to be intrusted into his Hands by his Father. But Richard, the eldest Son of the late Prince of Wales, for preventing all Contests about the Succession to the Crown of England, was by his Grand-father first made Earl of Chester, and not long after Prince of Wales. And for a full Assurance and Security, King Edward caus'd all the Nobility of the Realm to take an Oath to accept and defend Prince Richard, as lawful Heir and King of England, after his Decease; nor durst his Uncles, tho' famous Warriors, contradict their Father's Act. Finally the good old King, to comfort himself in Honouring the living Image of his noblest Child, to give the Mind of his Grand-child a Sight of future Majesty, and to make his Uncles acquainted with the Respect due to his Person, he caus'd him to sit above all his Children in an open solemn Feast.

Doctor Wickliff
bro' out his Opinions.

About this Time the famous Doctor John Wickliff, a Man of an acute Wit, profound Learning, and great Judgment, publickly maintain'd several material Points and Propositions in the University of Oxford against the Church of Rome; particularly against the Pope's Supremacy, the Infalibility of the Church, and Transubstantiation. The Pope being inform'd of these, and foreseeing how much his Authority might be call'd in Question, condemn'd twenty three of his Propositions as Heretical; whereupon the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury and Bishop of London, having attack'd the Body of the said Wickliff, in the Presence of his great Favourers the Duke of Lancaster and the Lord Peircy, declar'd the Judgment of the Pope concerning his Doctrines, which had then taken deep root in the University, Court and Country; so that for a while all seem'd to be quiet. But upon some secret Incouragements he was not long silent. His Followers were in the Phrase of these dark Days call'd Lollards, implying a Sort of Weeds; tho' in reality they endeavour'd to extirpate all pernicious Weeds, which Time, Sloath and Fraud had introduc'd into the Church. The Duke of Lancaster, as some think out of private Resentments against Courtney Bishop of London, was so far engag'd in his Protection, that he and the Lord Peircy with great Difficulty escap'd the Fury of the Londoners, who would unquestionably have cut them in Pieces in Revenge of some disgraceful Words utter'd by the Duke against their Bishop. He notwithstanding dissuaded them from all Violence, and kept them from forcing his Palace of the Savoy; but still in a most opprobrious manner they defac'd his Armories in the open Market; a Dishonour not to be indur'd by one of the Royal Blood. By this Outrage the People let him see what he and the Lord Peircy were to have expected, if they could have seiz'd them, before they had gotten to Kenington to Prince Richard, who there remain'd with his Mother. The Duke for this was highly inrag'd, and would not desist from prosecuting his Revenge against the Londoners, 'till he had procur'd the Lord Mayor and Aldermen to be turn'd out of their Places, and others put in their Rooms.

One of the last publick Acts of the old King was the triumphant Celebration of St. George's Feast at Windsor, where he himself had founded the Order of the Garter; and at this Solemnity he bestow'd upon his Grand-child Prince Richard the Dignity of Knighthood, the only Thing in all the Patrimony of Honour that could not descend to him. Not long after, weaken'd with innumerable Toils and Age, he was forc'd to relinquish the World, as the World did him, before his Breath left him. For first his Concubine packing up what she could get, even to the Rings of his Fingers, abandon'd him. Then his other Attendants, by her Example, seizing upon what they could find, fled away; and even his Counsellors forsook him in his last Agony, when he most needed their Advice, leaving his Chamber in a manner empty; which a poor Priest of the House observing, approach'd to the King's Bed-side, and finding him still breathing, call'd upon him to remember his Saviour, and ask Mercy for for his Sins, which none before would do, but every one flatter'd him with the Hopes of Life. This had made him negligent of those pious Cogitations fit for a dying Man; but being now excited by the Voice of this Priest, he shew'd all the Signs of Contrition, and with his last Breath express'd the Name of Jesus. Thus dy'd this mighty King at his Manor of Sheen now Richmond, on the twenty first Day of June, and sixty fifth Year of his Age, after a long, and for the most part glorious Reign of fifty Years, four Months and twenty seven Days. He left the World to the infinite Grief of his Subjects, and he was magnificently interr'd in the South-side of the Royal Chappel in Westminster Abby, by his beloved Consort Philippa, where his Tomb is still to be seen, and near it a prodigious Sword which the King is said to have us'd in his Conquest of France. His Death.

To say something of the Person of this admirable King, he was somewhat tall of Stature, strong and well proportion'd; of such a graceful and noble Aspect, that in his old Age it commanded a general Veneration, and it was reckon'd a good Omen to behold his Face, tho' only in a Dream. No Man was more mild and gentle, where there was Submission; nor more stern and inexorable, where there was Opposition. In common Conversation he was very humble and familiar, both to Subjects and Strangers, but with great Gravity and Discretion; and nothing mean or trivial could enter into his Thoughts, but all was great and magnificent. He admirably well knew his Business, and perform'd it; therefore he was better respected, and better serv'd than any of his Predecessors. He was a Father to Orphans and distressed Persons; generous in conferring Favours upon Men of true Merit; modest and humble in Prosperity, and never dejected in Adversity. He shew'd many noble Instances of Piety and Charity, and in all his mighty Victories, he ever took care to give all the Glory to God. Yet his Valour and Bravery was beyond Expression, and if we consider the greatest Part of this Reign, nothing can be imagin'd more glorious and triumphant, his Fame reaching to remote and barbarous Nations, all Foreigners envying the Happiness of his Subjects. Some Failures indeed happen'd in the latter End of his Reign; but it was when he had in a manner out-liv'd himself, as well as the best Wife, and best Son in the World. Tho' he was a Prince that highly valu'd his Prerogative, yet none of his Predecessors pass'd more or better Statutes for the Benefit and Liberty of his Subjects, or was more strict in punishing his Judges and Officers for Oppression, Bribery or Corruption. And as no King had more frequent and greater Taxes from his People, so they were satisfy'd they were laid out for the Honour and Defence of the Nation; and these were as willingly given, as they were worthily expended, 'till towards the latter End of his Reign, when he was too much in the Possession of others. In short, Walsingham tells us, That God had never rais'd up a King in England, so valiant, generous and fortunate as himself. For Monuments of his Charity and Munificence he founded Eastminster an Abby near the Tower of London, a Nunnery at Debtford, Kings-Hall in Cambridge since part of Trinity Colledge, an Hospital for the Poor at Calais, and St. Stephen's Chappel at Westminster nobly endow'd; and also augmented the Chappel at Windsor with the Provisions for Churchmen, and twenty four poor Knights. His other Buildings were great and numerous, as the Castle of Windsor, which he re-edify'd and enlarg'd, the Castle of Queenborough, the Fortifications at Calais and many other Places. His Person and Character.

Thus we are arriv'd at the End of this great and mighty King's Reign, which began a new Scene of Miseries and Calamities. We find how he came to the Throne and how he left it; in both which we have Considerations of great Importance. His mounting over his Father's Head into the Throne, tho' it might not be his Crime, yet it went not without a Punishment, and that in a high Degree. For tho' he left behind him three Sons of extraordinary Figure and Ability, yet he had not one to sit on his Seat, but left it unguarded to a Child of eleven Years of Age, expos'd to the Ambition of Uncles who over-power'd him; to a factious and discontented Nation at home, and to broken and distracted Inheritances abroad; Himself having seen all his great Acquisitions, gain'd with such vast Treasure and Bloodshed, quite torn from him, and nothing remaining but the single Town of Calais. The fatal Divisions of his Posterity were so pernicious to the whole Kingdom, as well as to themselves, that if the Dead know any Thing of the Actions of the Living, he needed no other Torment than the dismal Vision of those murder'd Princes of his Blood, whose Ghosts may be said to have jostled each other where-ever they met.

S E C T. IV.

The Reign of King RICHARD the Second.

Containing 22 Years, 2 Months, and 8 Days.

A. D. I. KING Edward the Third was immediately succeeded by his Grand-son the Prince of Wales, Richard of Bourdeaux, then but in the Eleventh Year of his Age; not only by Hereditary Right, but also the universal Wishes and Desires of the People, who had an extraordinary Love and Respect for him, for the sake of his incomparable Father Prince Edward, whose Fame and Memory was infinitely dear to the Nation: And upon this ancient Stock of Merit he longer maintain'd himself in the Peoples Affections, than by any worthy Actions of his own. Shortly after King Edward's Decease, this young Prince made a publick and splendid Entry into the City of London, attended by his Uncle the Duke of Lancaster; which happily produc'd a Reconciliation between that Duke and the Citizens of London not long after. Then upon Thursday the sixteenth of July the Ceremony of his Coronation was perform'd in the Abby-Church in Westminster with the utmost Pomp and Magnificence; and the Oath which he took before the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury and the rest of the Lords, was somewhat larger than what we find taken by former Kings, consisting of these Articles: 'First that he would permit the Church to enjoy all her Liberties; That he would reverence her Ministers, and maintain the true Faith; That he would restrain Violence, and all Oppression, in all Sorts of Men; That he would cause good Laws to be every where observ'd, especially those of St. Edward, King and Confessor; and would also cause all evil Laws or Customs to be abrogated: Lastly, That he would be no Respector of Persons, but would give right Judgment between Man and Man, and would chiefly observe Mercy in all his Decrees or Judgments, as God should shew Mercy to him. Which Form of the Coronation Oath, with some small Alterations, has been administer'd to all succeeding Kings and Queens ever since that Time. Then the Arch-Bishop leading the King to the four Sides of the Scaffolds, shew'd him to the People, and according to the ancient Custom ask'd them, If they would be subject to this Prince as their lawful Ruler, and be obedient to his Commands? In this Coronation John of Gaunt, King of Leon and Castile and Duke of Lancaster, made the noblest Figure of any other; and claim'd the Right of being Steward of England, to carry the King's principal Sword, and to be his Carver that Day. And here we may observe that Sir John Dimmock, in Right of the Manor of Scrivelsby in Lincolnshire, was first admitted to serve as Champion to defend the King's Title against all Opposers; but how long before this Custom of a Champion had been in use, we do not find. Then the King created his Uncle.

War. The Kingdom being engag'd in a War with France at the Death of the late King, the French took Advantage of the unsettled Times, and before the Coronation landed at Rye with a considerable Fleet, and burnt that Town; whereupon immediately after the Solemnity, the Earls of Cambridge and Buckingham were sent to Dover, and the Earls of Salisbury and Southampton with considerable Forces to defend those Parts. It seems there was no Fleet then ready to take the Seas, for on the twenty first of August following, the French with a great Number of Gallies landed in the Isle of Wight, burnt several Towns there, and indeed took the whole Isle, except the Castle of Caresbrook; which being bravely defended by Sir Hugh Tyrrell the Governor, they were repuls'd with considerable Loss. But he being unable to secure the rest of the Country, the Inhabitants of the Isle were oblig'd to pay a thousand Marks to the French, to save the rest of it from Plunder and Burning. After which they landed in other Places, and burnt the Towns of Hastings, Portsmouth, Dartmouth and Plimouth, all along that Coast, yet with various Success; for at Winchelsey they found the Place valiantly defended by the Abbot of Battle, and the neighbouring Gentry; but in Sussex the Prior of Lewes meeting them with some new-raisd Men of the Country Militia, the French not only routed them, but kill'd about a hundred of the English, and carry'd the Prior and two Knights Prisoners into France, but not without a considerable Loss on their Side: So unsafe was England at this Time, when it had neither a Fleet to defend it by Sea, nor regular Troops to oppose the Enemy by Land. Nor were the Civil Affairs at this Time much better manag'd; for the King being unfit to govern himself, his Uncles, the Duke of Lancaster and Earl of Cambridge, with divers other Noblemen, were appointed his Protectors and Governors; who tho' at first they took some Care of his Education, yet by degrees they gave him his own Will, and suffer'd those about his Person, who by loose Principles and ill Examples corrupted his good Nature; and giving him false Ideas of Glory, made him think it consisted in a riotous Way of Living, and in conferring extravagant Gifts and Honours upon Friends and Favourites. By which Means the Court became too much a School of Licentiousness; but as yet the King's Vices were not thought dangerous to the publick Peace, being interpreted as the Sallies or Over-boylings of Youth, which would be remedy'd by Age and Experience. The French gain Advantages in England.

War. The Weaknesses of the present Government soon began to be discover'd by an outrageous Accident this Year, arising first from a Spanish Nobleman, call'd the Earl of Denia, who having been taken Prisoner in the late War in Spain by Robert Haule and John Shakel two valiant Esquires, found so much Favour as to have his Liberty, upon leaving his eldest Son for a Pledge, and upon Promise of paying his Ransom as soon as he return'd home. This being neglected, and his Son remaining a Prisoner till his Father's Death, without being redeem'd; the Duke of Lancaster, desirous of having this young Earl in his own Hands, in Order to a Design he had upon Spain, procur'd the King to command these Gentlemen to deliver up their Prisoner to the Duke; which they looking upon as an arbitrary and unjust Proceeding, refus'd, and convey'd him out of the Way; for which they were committed close Prisoners to the Tower for Contempt. But finding Means to escape from thence, and to take Sanctuary in Westminster Abby, the Duke in a Rage sent Sir Alan Buxall Constable of the Tower, with fifty armed Men, to take these Gentlemen out of the Sanctuary by Force; and coming upon them in the Time of Divine Service, they seiz'd Shakel and carry'd him back to the Tower. But as for Haule, he made so brave a Defence with a short Fauchion, that they could not take him; till at length A. D. 1378. Reg. 1/2.

length traversing his Ground about the Choir, they got so much Advantage, that one of them broke his Skull, while another ran him through with a Sword; and at the same Time murder'd a Servant of his that stood by him, as also a Monk who interceded for his Life. This horrid Action was so highly resented by the Clergy, that the Arch-Bishop and five other Bishops solemnly excommunicated all that were concern'd in it; yet still the Duke's Power was so great, that we don't find any Temporal Punishment inflicted on the Actors of these publick Murders, which shews with what great Partiality Justice was administer'd during the King's Minority.

John Philpot's
A^{cts}.

While the publick Affairs were in a declining Condition, and all Enemies had the Liberty of the English Seas to range in, the worthy John Philpot, an Alderman of London, set out a considerable Fleet at his own private Charge; and going in Person, was in a short Time rewarded by a Prize of fifteen Spanish Vessels richly laden, which abundantly repair'd all his Expences. And not long after being by the Envy of some call'd to an Account before the King's Council for his Presumption, he made so noble a Defence, that he was dismiss'd with Applause, and without further Trouble. But the Earls of Salisbury and Arundel had not so good Fortune with the Fleet they shortly after convey'd to Normandy, to assist the King of Navarre, who was then in War with the French King his Brother-in-Law. For a great Part of their Fleet falling in with a stronger Party of Spaniards, many English Gentlemen and others lost their Lives, or were taken Prisoners; yet the Earls themselves arriv'd safe in the Harbour of Cherburgh, which together with the Town and Castle adjoining, was deliver'd to them by Way of Mortgage by the King of Navarre; and it afterwards prov'd very prejudicial to the French, in that Part of Normandy.

About the same Time the Scots breaking in upon that Part of Scotland under the English Dominion, burnt the Town of Roxburgh; but the Earl of Northumberland in Revenge enter'd Scotland with ten thousand Men, and for three Days made a Ravage principally in the Lands of the Earl of Marche, who had burnt the Place. Yet not long after, the Scots took the Castle of Berwick by Surprise, and kill'd Sir Robert Boynton the Governor; but the Earl of Northumberland gathering new Forces, in nine Days Time retook it by Storm, and put all the Scots to the Sword, except one that discover'd the Contrivance and the Scots Designs: And thus by the Valour of the Earl, and his Son the Lord Percy, this important Place was recover'd with more Honour and Difficulty than it was surpriz'd.

Advantages
gain'd in France.

Nor was the Spirit of the English, which now began to re-kindle, unactive in other Places; for Sir Robert Rous had several Ways molested the French, and taken Oliver, Brother to the renowned Glequin, Prisoner; so Sir John de Harlestone, Governor of Cherburgh after him, flew and took many Frenchmen in an Ingagement. These were but the forerunning Drops of greater approaching Showers: For Sir Hugh Calverly and Sir Thomas Percy, made Admirals of the narrow Seas, took many rich Prizes, and perform'd many other worthy Actions, bringing home the acceptable News of the great Dislike that the Inhabitants of Bretaign had conceiv'd against the French King and his severe Government in those Parts. In the same Year, the Lord John Montfort, whom the French had expell'd, being invited home by his Barons, return'd into his Dukedom of Bretaign, accompany'd with the valiant Knights Calverly and Percy, where he with his Friends and Followers were receiv'd with extraordinary Honour. But not long after, Sir John of Arundell, Brother to the Earl of Arundell, being sent into Bretaign to assist the Duke, was with several others drown'd in the Sea. Our Author imputes it as the just Effect of God's Vengeance against the said Sir John and his Family, for their numerous Vices and Outrages, practis'd by him and them before they left England, for which they were loaden with the bitter Imprecations of the People. These Employments, with fresh Designs on foot, found need of pecuniary Supplies; whereupon, in a

Parliament

Parliament held at London, it was agreed, That for a Supply of the King's Necessities, the common People should be spared, and the Burden wholly laid upon the richer Sort. The Rates of the Tax were these; Arch-Bishops, Dukes, Earls and Bishops at ten Marks each, Miter'd Abbots at as much, besides forty Pence for every Monk under their Subjection. In short, says Walsingham, there was no Religious Person, Man or Woman, Justiciary, Sheriff, Knight, Esquire, Parson, Vicar or Chauntry Priest free from this Tax, rated according to the Value of their annual Revenues. About the same Time John Skakel, who had been committed to the Tower for not delivering up his Hostage the young Earl of Denia, was now by a Reward from the King willing to comply, and put him into the King's Hands. Which being done, the Discovery of the Prisoner struck all Men with Admiration: For tho' the young Earl might have been treated according to his Quality, had he discover'd himself, yet he faithfully kept his Word, and appear'd in no other Habit than that of a meer Servant to his Keeper, under which unsuspected Disguise he had lain conceal'd in the Tower, from the Time of the Dispute about him: A noble Example of true Honour, which cannot be pass'd by without Injury to his Virtue.

A generous Act

After sufficient Supplies granted, in the following Year, the King's Uncle the Earl of Buckingham, with Calverly, Percy, Knolls, Windsor, and other valiant Knights, with competent Forces, were sent to assist the Duke of Bretaign. But because the French Gallies infested the narrow Seas, they landed at Calais, and from thence they march'd through the Body of France, ravaging the Countries and burning the Towns, without any great Resistance from the French, till they all safely arriv'd in the Province of Bretaign. About these Times were many Civil Contests in the Kingdom of France: For the Duke of Burgundy, younger Brother to King Charles lately deceas'd, being made Guardian of the Person and Dominions of his Nephew Charles then in Minority, had his elder Brother the Duke of Anjou for his mortal Enemy. And their bloody Contests happen'd fortunately for the English Succours in the Dukedom of Bretaign, out of which as Duke John had been expell'd for adhering to his Father-in-Law the late King Edward, so the English did their utmost to support him in his Cause. In these Extremities the French were reliev'd by their ancient Diverſion: For the Scots entring about that Time with Fire and Sword into Cumberland and Westmorland, drove away much Cattle, slew the Inhabitants, rifled the Booths and Houses of Perith in the Time of a great Fair, killed and took many Men, and dispers'd the rest. The Earl of Northumberland preparing for a bloody Revenge, not without Wonder was commanded to desist by Letters from the King, or rather some evil Counsellors about him. But how coldly soever the publick Affairs were pursu'd, the Want of Money for Supplies was still alledg'd and pretended. And therefore in a Parliament held at Northampton great Supplies were propos'd, and that the Clergy should pay a Third Part of the Tax, as having in Possession one Third of the Nation's Revenues. But at length it was finally agreed that every Person in the Kingdom, of all Conditions, Males and Females, of the Age of fifteen Years, except Beggars, should pay twelve Pence a Head; and the richer People in every Town were to contribute to the Assistance of those that were less able.

Which occasions a dangerous Rebellion.

This extraordinary Poll-Tax was in a short Time made use of as a principal Occasion for a very dangerous Insurrection, throughout many Parts of the Nation. For some of the King's Officers had complain'd that the Money was not duly collected, therefore one John Ley and three of his Associates obtain'd a Commission to inspect and review the Hue Levy, agreeing to pay the King a considerable Sum for the Advantage of it. On which Pretence they committed horrible Oppressions, Exactions and Insolencies in many Parts, especially in Kent, Essex, Norfolk and the adjacent Counties; with which the common People, being highly incens'd, join'd with the Villains or Bondmen, first begun a Mutiny, and afterwards broke out into open Rebellion. For some of the Tax-Gatherers Gatherers had been so insolent as to turn up the Coats of certain young Girls, to see if they were of full Age to pay; which so provok'd one call'd from his Trade Wat Tyler, of Debtford in Kent, whose Daughter had been thus us'd, that he not only beat out the Collector's Brains with his Hammer, but to avoid Punishment, drew together the Rabble, and soon incens'd them into a most desperate Rebellion. Then great Multitudes being gather'd together, they broke open the Jail at Maidstone, where one John Ball, a factious Priest then a Prisoner, having gain'd his Liberty, march'd along with them, and growing vastly numerous, he at Black-Heath made a seditious Discourse to them, taking for his Subject this known vulgar Proverb, 'When Adam delv'd, and Eve span, who was then a Gentleman?' From whence he inferr'd, according to the usual Topicks of most Rebellions, that the Inequality of Mankind was contrary to the Will of God, who if he had pleas'd to have created Slaves or Bondmen, would have appointed who should have been Servants, and who Lords and Masters. This dangerous Doctrine was highly applauded by the Vulgar, who thus animated by their Multitudes, and holding Correspondence with others like themselves in Essex and other Counties, took up Arms, and stopping all Passengers they forc'd them to swear Fidelity to King Richard and the Commons, and never to own any King whose Name was John, which they did in Hatred to the Duke of Lancaster. In a short Time the Essex and Kentish Men being join'd at Black-Heath, made up a Body of near a hundred thousand Men, chiefly consisting of Villains, Bond-Tenants, Country Clowns, Debtors, and Criminals, all headed by Wat Tyler. Their Pretences were Liberty, and a Reformation of evil Laws and Customs; in Order to which they cut off the Heads of all the Lawyers they could find, alledging, That the People could never enjoy true Liberty, while they were suffer'd to live in the Nation.

The Rebels in vast Numbers

They commit
many horrid Outrages.

The King amaz'd at this extraordinary Meeting, sent to know the Occasion^{was} of it; and his Messengers were told, That they met to speak with the King^{King} about certain Matters, and that he must come to them, and hear what they had to desire. Some about the King persuaded him to go immediately, but the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and the Lord Treasurer Hales, earnestly dissuaded him from it, urging him to think of suppressing, rather than treating with such an unruly Multitude. Upon Notice of which they threaten'd to cut off the Heads of these Counsellors; and forthwith marching into Southwark, they pull'd down Houses, and broke the King's Prisons, and set all the Prisoners at Liberty, who join'd with them. The Bridge-Gate was at first shut against them, but by Threatnings and the Assistance of some of the same Temper in the City, the Gates were open'd, and they had free Passage into the City, where they declar'd That they came only to search for Traitors to the Kingdom, and at that Time paid for what they call'd for, which gave them a Reputation among the common Sort, and increas'd their Numbers. The next Day, being the thirteenth of June, they march'd through the City to the Savoy, then the Duke of Lancaster's Palace, which they burnt and beat down, destroying all the rich Furniture, throwing his Gold and Jewels into the Thames, as likewise all his Plate, first breaking it into small Pieces. Here they by Proclamation made it Capital for any Man to retain the least Thing for his own Use, to shew the People they were not sway'd by Avarice; and when one of their Companions was discover'd to thrust a Piece of Plate into his Bosom, they immediately threw him into the Fire, declaring, That they did not come like Thieves, to enrich themselves by Plunder. From the Savoy they came back to the Temple, the Abode of the Lawyers, and without harkning to Intreaties burnt their Lodgings, Books, Papers, and all the Records that were there kept. From thence they rang'd to Clerkenwell, where they destroy'd all the Goods in the Hospital of St. John, and set Fire to that magnificent Building. After which they divided themselves into three Bodies, one of which being headed by another Captain, call'd Jack Straw, went to Heybury Mannor, belonging

longing to the Master of St. John's Hospital, where they were busied in destroying and plundering all the Goods belonging to it, and demolishing a noble House that stood there. A second Body of them, who were most of Essex, and the neighbouring Parts, lodg'd themselves upon Mile-End Green; and a third about St. Catharine's, and Tower-Hill.

The next Day the King went with several Noblemen to those at Mile-End, who were about sixty thousand, where he told them He was their King, demanding, What they would have. Their Answer was, They desir'd he would make them, their Heirs and Lands free for ever, so that they might not be call'd or reputed Bond-men. The King granted their Desire, on Condition they would return home, and leave two or three of each Parish to stay for their Charters of Freedom, seal'd with the Great-Seal; which being dispatch'd with the utmost Expedition, and all their Pardons sign'd, most of the Essex Men return'd home to their own Habitations. Yet all this did not satisfy the insolent Wat Tyler, who had plac'd himself and his Kentish Rabble about Tower-Hill; where the Terror of his rude Multitude was so great, that the Gates of the Tower were open'd to them without Resistance, from whence they hurry'd away the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, the Lord Treasurer Hales and some others, and impiously cut off their Heads upon Tower-Hill. After which they rang'd into the City, and cut off the Heads of many Englishmen, to whom they had any Aversion; and among the rest they dispatch'd a famous Merchant nam'd Richard Lyons, whose Head they set upon a Lance: And their Hatred to the Flemmings was so implacable, that they drew thirteen of them out of the Church of the Augustin Friars, and seventeen more out of other Churches, and cut off their Heads in the Streets with infernal Shouts and hideous Outcries.

The King

They commit
new Outrages.

In the following Day, proceeding in the same outrageous manner, the King sent to let them know that their Companions at Mile-End, upon receiving Charters of Freedom were return'd home in Peace, offering them the like Charters, if they would accept of them. To which Wat Tyler reply'd, He would embrace Peace, if he lik'd the Conditions; designing to have delay'd the King and Council, so that in that Night he might destroy both King and Nobility, and plunder and burn the City, as it appear'd afterwards. Three Charters being sent to him without satisfying him, the King at last sent a Knight to him, who told him that he should come and treat with him about the Articles to be inserted in their Charter; and when the Messenger desir'd him to make haste, he bad him Tell the King his Master he would come when he saw his own Time, and so follow'd on very slowly on Horseback for the greater State. Upon his approaching the King in the Streets, the same Knight being sent again to receive Proposals from him, he was highly offended because he came to him mounted, and told him, It became him to alight from his Horse in his Presence, and drew out his Dagger to strike him: Upon which the King coming up, caus'd his Messenger to alight. Here Tyler's Demands were so bold and exorbitant, that the King, tho' never more ready to comply, began to demur; which caus'd the other to behave himself with an Insolence not to be endur'd by any Sovereign. Whereupon the valiant John Philpot, fir'd with Indignation, told his Majesty, That if he would command the Lord Mayor to Arrest the Traitor, he would lose his Life if it did not succeed: To which the King consented, and gave such a Command to William Walworth, then Lord Mayor, who waiting an Opportunity, and observing Tyler to play with his Dagger as if he design'd some fatal Stroke, and then to lay one of his Hands upon the King's Bridle, he instantly executed his Arrest, by giving him a Blow on the Head with his Dagger, which being seconded by Philpot's Sword in his Body, he fell down dead at the King's Horse's Feet, with more Honour than he deserv'd. The Multitude seeing this, began furiously to cry out, Our Captain is murder'd, let's revenge his Death! But the King with a Courage and Ingenuity beyond his Years, clapp'd Spurs to his Horse, and riding to the Head of them, cry'd aloud, Never grieve for the Death of a Traitor, I will be your Captain and Leader, follow me into the Fields, and you shall have all your Desires. Upon which Words, in amaze they follow'd him towards St. George's Fields, 'till Sir Robert Knolls with a Thousand armed Men rais'd by the Mayor, came upon them out of the City, which so terrify'd this Headless Multitude, that they flung down their Arms and begg'd for Mercy; which the King granted freely, but proclaim'd that no Citizen should have any Correspondence with them, nor suffer them to come within the Liberties. When some about the King ask'd leave to serve the Rebels as they had serv'd others, and to cut off a Hundred or two of their Heads, he mercifully forbid it, lest the Innocent might suffer with the Guilty, for many had been drawn in by Fear, and such fair Pretences as they thought good and loyal; so that he sent them the like Charters he had granted to those of Essex, and other Counties.

The Rebels submit.

They are suppressed.

The Designs of the late Rebels.

The King's Grants revoked.

This Spirit of Insurrection and Rebellion was not confin'd to London, but ^{was sup.} furiously spread it self through several Parts of the Nation. In Suffolk about fifty Thousand arose under the Conduct of John Straw a wicked Priest, who besides many other Barbarities cut off the Head of Sir John Cavendish, Lord Chief Justice of England, and set it upon the Pillory at St. Edmund's Bury. In Norfolk vast Numbers of the same sort of People arose under the Conduct of John Littister, a Dier of Norwich, who compell'd the Lord Scales, Sir William Morley, Sir Stephen Hales, and other Men of Quality to remain with them, and for their own Security to comply with their Actions. Great Numbers also appear'd about St. Albans, under the Command of a common Chandler, who committed unheard of Outrages and Cruelties; and others again rose in several Parts of Essex. Henry Spencer Bishop of Norwich prov'd very serviceable in suppressing the Rebels of Norfolk, and the Earl of Buckingham and Lord Piercy did the same in Essex, but in both Places with considerable Bloodshed. However in a short Time all Insurrections were quell'd, and the Multitudes dispersed; and the King appointed Sir Robert Tresilian his Chief Justice, and some others to try and punish the Ring-leaders of this dangerous Rebellion. Many were executed at several Places, of whom John Straw and John Ball the Priest had been most notorious; and by the Confessions of these two it appear'd what desperate Designs had been laid towards the Ruin and Subversion of the Nation. Particularly, That when they assembled at Black-Heath, and sent to the King to come to them, they design'd to have slain all the Knights, Esquires and Gentlemen that came with him, and to have carry'd the King with them from Place to Place, that the Mob might with greater Assurance come in to their Assistance when they should see him, as it were the Promoter of their Insurrections: That when their Numbers were sufficient in all Counties, they were to have kill'd such Lords, Knights and others as were most able to resist them, especially the Hospitallers: At last they were to have kill'd the King, and all the Bishops, Monks, and Rectors of Churches possess'd of any Lands and real Estates, only sparing the Mendicant Friars, who were sufficient to perform Divine Service throughout the Nation: After all, when there had been none more powerful and knowing than themselves, they would make such Laws as they pleas'd, by which the People were to be govern'd; and they intended to have created new Kings, as Wat Tyler in Kent, and one in each County. In Consideration therefore of this great Escape, and the Worth of particular Persons, the King knighted William Wakworth Lord Mayor, John Philpot, Nicholas Brembre, and Robert Laund Aldermen; and gave to the first a hundred Pounds per Annum Land, and to the other three forty Pounds per An. to them and their Heirs for ever: And, as some write, the Dagger was now added to the Arms of the City of London. And lest the mischievous Multitude should to the King's Dishonour and common Hurt of the Church and Kingdom, enjoy any Benefit by their intolerable Outrages, the King by the Advice of his Council sent revocatory Letters into all Parts, by which he declar'd, 'That no Man should enjoy any Freedom or Advantage by virtue of any extorted Grants, and Charters, during the late Insurrections: All which was likewise declar'd and ratify'd in a Parliament held at Westminster not long after.

It d. In the same Year of these Tumults and Insurrections, the English Valour began again to display it self in distant Countries, chiefly to gratifie the private Ends of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, who claim'd the Crown of Castile and Leon in Spain, in right of Constance his Wife. For John King of Portugal had a defensive War against John then Possessor of the Crown of Castile, who also challeng'd the Crown of Portugal, in right of Beatrix his Wife, the only Daughter of Ferdinand King of Portugal, which this other John, a natural Son of Ferdinand's, had by Faction usurp'd. To the Assistance of the King of Portugal were sent the King's Uncle, Edmund Earl of Cambridge, with many Knights, and others experienc'd in Arms. These arriving in Portugal, most valiantly defended that Country for about two Years, and were the principal Cause of giving the Spaniards a signal Overthrow, in which they lost ten thousand Men in Battel. But at length the two Kings by a publick Agreement, bore the Charges of conveying home the English in Common, that their Countries might be freed from a Power of which they were both equally jealous. In this Expedition Edward, Son to the King's Uncle the Earl of Cambridge, marry'd the Daughter of John King of Portugal; but afterwards, the Earl not thinking it fit to leave his Son behind him as suspecting the Faith of the Portuguese, nor the other to venture his Daughter with the Earl, they ever remain'd disjoin'd in Persons, however united in Ceremony. In the mean Time the Duke of Lancaster, the Occasion of the Expedition, at breaking out of the Insurrections was upon the Borders of Scotland, about settling a two Years Truce with the Scots, which he concluded with what Expedition he could before the Scots had full Intelligence of the Troubles in England. The Scots, tho' they were sorry that this Truce had hinder'd them from great Advantages in England, understanding that some English Peers had form'd Designs against the Duke, freely offer'd him twenty thousand Men to defend his Honour; but he loyally refusing the Offer, they gave him liberty to go and come into their Nation at his Liberty, with all the Marks of Civility and Hospitality.

It d. II. King Richard being now in the sixteenth Year of his Age, and the Nation in quiet, he marry'd the Lady Anne, Daughter to the Emperor Charles the Fourth, and Sister to Wenceslaus the present Emperor and King of Bohemia. This Princess arriving at Dover, was receiv'd with great Solemnity by a splendid Concourse of Nobility, and was marry'd to the King on the fourteenth Day of January; and the Nuptials being celebrated with extraordinary Magnificence, she was solemnly crown'd Queen by William Courtney, lately made Arch-Bishop of Canterbury. She was a Princess of great Virtue and Goodness, which was all the King had with her; for instead of a great Portion in Money which he was then offer'd with the Duke of Milan's Daughter, he gave the Emperor ten thousand Marks for his Alliance, which never prov'd of any Advantage to him. Not long after, a Parliament met at Westminster, where many useful Things were enacted concerning the Excess of Apparel, the Transportation of Corn, and other Matters: But to what Purpose, says Walsingham, are Acts of Parliament, when after they are pass'd, they take no Effect? For, adds he, the King and his private Council did usually change or abolish all Things which had been establish'd by the whole Nobility and Commons of England. Nevertheless it was then provided, that such as had done any Thing in their own Defence against the Rebels, without the Ordinary Forms of Law, should sustain no Damage, but be as much indemnify'd as if they had enjoy'd their particular Pardons; and that all Releases, Poffinments, and other Acts done during these Hurling Times, as they were call'd, by way of Constraint or Necessity, should be utterly void. ment Sir Richard Scroop was made Chancellor of the Realm, and Sir Hugh Segrave Treasurer: But it was not long after before this worthy Chancellor, denying to pass such exorbitant Grants under the Great-Seal, as the King in his youthful Humour had imprudently given to some greedy Courtiers, fell into the King's undeserved Displeasure. He alledg'd several Reasons for his Denial; as that the King was greatly in Debt, and therefore such Bounties ought rather to be employ'd in discharging some of the Creditors; That these Courtiers, knowing that he was so much involv'd, were not true Friends to his Majesty, regarding their private Gains before his Profit, or the publick Wants; That the same Courtiers had formerly receiv'd such Gifts from his Majesty, as were answerable to their Services; and that himself, if he should seal these Grants made in the King's Minority, would receive no Thanks when he should come to riper Years. After all these Allegations, he was order'd more than once to send the Seal to the King; and going in Person he surrender'd it with these Words, That he would always be loyal and faithful to his Majesty, but would never bear any Office under him as long as he liv'd. By this Act the King highly disgust'd the great Men and others of the Kingdom; and gave the first Occasion of Dislike to his Government, or rather to his chief Ministers, who then manag'd all Affairs, and continually prevail'd upon the King's Youth, and Faintness of his Temper.

About these Times, Henry Spenser, the Martial Bishop of Norwich, being drawn on by Pope Urban to preach up the Crusado, and to serve as General against Clement, whom several Cardinals and Prelates had also elected Pope, obtain'd a Petition from the Parliament for that purpose; and having gather'd a considerable Force, he pass'd over into Flanders to support the Cause of Urban against the Anti-Pope Clement. Most of the Nobility were great Opposers of this Expedition, yet still the Bishop for a while proceeded with great Success, took Gravelin, Burburgh, Newport, Dunkirk, and several other Places, and gain'd also a Victory at Sea against thirty thousand of Clement's Associates; yet at length he was forc'd to return before he expected, being destitute of those further Succours promis'd him from England. And what prov'd harder to him, the King, upon Pretence that he had not exactly obey'd his Orders and Commands, for a while seiz'd upon all his Temporalties. In the mean Time the King himself with his young Queen spent all the Summer in Jollity and youthful Recreations, going on Progress to the great Abbies about the Kingdom, with an excessive Retinue of Bohemians; and lying at the Abby of St. Edmund's Bury no less than ten Days, it prov'd a heavy Burden, being both of them presented there, as well as at all the other Monasteries they visited, with large Gifts, which the Queen pour'd forth upon her Bohemian Countrymen. And as this was an Indication of excessive Faintness and Prodigality in the King, so it extremely diminish'd the Esteem his Subjects hitherto had of him.

The Duke of Lancaster invades Scotland.

How account of Treason.

In the Beginning of the following Year, the Duke of Lancaster return'd from his Embassy in France, where he could only procure a Truce of half a Year's Continuance. At his Return, he and his brother the Earl of Buckingham, advanc'd with a very great Force towards Scotland, to revenge the Breach of a Truce; but staid so long upon the Borders, 'till all Provisions being consumed, the Inhabitants receiv'd more Injury from the English Army than by the Invasion of the Scots. Yet afterwards he enter'd Scotland, but by means of his Delays, the Scots had sufficient Time to secure their Goods and Persons; so that meeting with nothing but Hunger and Cold, after the Loss of many Men and Horses, the Duke return'd with Dishonour. Soon after his Return he was encounter'd with a more dangerous Enemy; a Carmelite Friar, had at a Parliament held at Salisbury, made a Discovery in Writing to the King, of a Design that the Duke had to destroy his Majesty, and usurp the Crown: But the King advising about it only with some of his Chaplains, and the Duke coming in suddenly upon them, they counsell'd the King to show the Duke his Accusation in Writing; upon the Sight of which, he boldly deny'd all, and so seemingly well clear'd himself, that the Friar was committed Prisoner to the Custody of the Lord John Holland, and the Evening before the appointed Time of Hearing the Cause, he was found murder'd after a most barbarous and unheard of Manner. The next Morning the Friar's Body was dragg'd about the Streets, as a Traitor at a Horse's Tail, to remove all Suspicion of the Murther; and the Earl of Buckingham furiously rush'd into the King's Chamber, declaring with a terrible Oath, That he would kill any Person living who durst lay Treason to his Brother's Charge, not excepting the King himself. But what tended much to the Duke's Innocency, was, that the Lord Zouch was likewise accus'd of the same Treason by the same Friar; and being sick was forc'd to be brought thither in a Litter, and examin'd before the Lords, where he solemnly deny'd the whole Accusation upon Oath, and that he ever heard or thought of such a Design: Upon which he was acquitted, and permitted to return home; and afterwards became an utter Enemy to all Carmelite Friars. Not long after this Escape, the Duke's Enemies, who highly wish'd for his Death, so represented him to the King, that it was agreed he should be suddenly arrested, and brought before chief Justice Tresilian, who had boldly undertaken to give Sentence against him, tho' the Law gave him the Privilege of his Peers. But the Duke being forewarn'd of these Contrivances, hasten'd to his Castle at Pomfret, and there stood upon his Guard; upon which the Princess Joan the King's Mother, dreading the fatal Effects of such a Rupture, took infinite Pains by Riding, notwithstanding her Years and Corpulency, between the King and the Duke, to pacifie and reconcile them; and at length brought them to such Terms, that all Appearance of Displeasure on one Side, and Distrust on the other, was for that Time remov'd.

He is clear'd.

After new Suspensions he is reconcil'd to the King.

This Storm being over, the Duke went again into France in mighty State, to treat about a Peace; and tho' he staid a considerable Time with many Noblemen in his Company, yet he only obtain'd three Months Truce, after the Expence of fifty thousand Marks. During his Absence, a great Favourite of his call'd John of Northampton, alias Comberton, once Mayor of London, was summon'd before the King and Nobility, and try'd for some late seditious Practices in London, and formally convicted. Sentence being ready to be given against him in the King's Presence, he alledg'd That Judgment ought not to pass upon him in the Absence of his Lord the Duke of Lancaster, which at the same Time render'd him suspected; but the Judge told the Criminal, That he must acquit himself by Duel, or else by the Laws of the Land must be taken, hang'd and quarter'd; to which making no Answer, he was condemn'd to perpetual Imprisonment, sent to Tintagel Castle in Cornwall, and had his Goods seiz'd for the King's Use. Shortly after, a new Parliament being call'd, News was brought of the Surprize of the Castle of Berwick by the Scots, being sold by the Deputy-Governor to the Earl of Northumberland; for which the Earl, tho' absent, was accus'd; and, by the Procurement of the Duke of Lancaster his Enemy, found guilty of Treason without his Appearance. But Circumstances being consider'd, the King pardon'd him, but much against the Duke's Inclinations; which was also the Occasion of a fresh Contest between these two great Men. As soon as the Earl was pardon'd and restor'd, he himself rais'd a considerable Army, and march'd to the Siege of that Castle in the Depth of Winter; but finding he could not then take it by Force, he recover'd it the same Way it was lost, obtaining it by the Sum of two thousand Marks paid to the Garrison; and by that dear-bought Experience learnt to take greater Care of that considerable Fortrefs.

from thence with a vast Fleet, and had transported a numerous Army into Scotland, to join with the Scots, and enter England that Way. Upon which the King immediately prepar'd an Army to march into Scotland, and sent the Duke of Lancaster with a considerable Force to secure the Borders. In the Beginning of July the King went in Person to Leicester, and his beloved Queen with him; where he was attended by the Flower of the English Militia, as Earls, Barons, Knights and others, to a prodigious Number, who made noble Preparations for them, which extremely pleas'd the King. But upon his Arrival at York, that Satisfaction was much abated by an unfortunate Accident near that City: For a Quarrel arising between the Lord John Holland the King's Half-Brother, and the eldest Son of the Earl of Stafford; the former kill'd the latter upon the Road, as he was going to the Queen, whose menial Servant he was. At which the King was so highly incens'd at the Loss of one bred up with himself, that he commanded his Brother to be seiz'd, and his Goods to be confiscated; but this young Lord, finding the Tide run so high against him, avoided the Storm by taking Sanctuary at Beverly. The Princess Joan, Mother both to the King and this Nobleman, hearing this ill News, immediately sent Messengers to the King to intercede for her Son, and obtain his Pardon; but the King was so inrag'd, that he absolutely deny'd her Request; with which she was so sensibly afflicted, that it cast her into a Fit of Sickness, which in four or five Days prov'd her Death. Her Body being embalm'd was preserv'd till the King's Return from Scotland, when it was solemnly interr'd in the Church of the Friars Minors at Stanford; after which the King's Fury against his Brother gradually diminish'd.

King Richard enters Scotland

but to little Effect.

About the Beginning of August the King enter'd Scotland with his mighty Army, but to little Effect; for either he could not find the Scots, or could not follow them into their Woods, Bogs and Fastnesses, whither they and their Cattle were retired. So finding the Country vacant, he burnt the City of Edinburgh, and several other Places, and destroy'd many Woods and Groves. But when the Duke of Lancaster urg'd him to imitate his noble Grand-father King Edward, in carrying his Arms beyond the Firths, and in totally reducing that Kingdom, the King was so far from complying, that suspecting the Duke gave him this Advice only to ruin him and his Army with long Marches and Famine, he return'd him very sharp and opprobrious Language upon that Subject, and tho' the Duke's Answers were temper'd with great Duty and Modesty, yet they had so little Effect, that the Lords found it very difficult to reconcile the King and him. The Season being far advanc'd, King Richard return'd into England, and in full Time; for during these Transactions in Scotland, the Scotch and French Forces slipping past the English, enter'd the West-Marches, burnt Penrith, plunder'd the Country, took many Prisoners, and endanger'd Carlisle. But hearing of the Return of the English Army, they retir'd into their own Country; but carry'd more out of England, than King Richard with his dreadful Army could do out of Scotland, tho' he had the Plunder of the Capital City of the Kingdom: Upon such unequal Terms must a Richer Nation make War upon a Poorer as warlike as themselves. All this Time the French King was providing a mighty Fleet and Army at Stuis in Ilanders to invade England, but was hinder'd in the Attempt by the Flemmings, who tired with the Heaviness of the French Yoke, had taken up Arms and surpriz'd the strong Town of Dam; which tho' it was recover'd in no long Time, yet by this Diversion the French King was forc'd to defer his intended Invasion till the next Year.

A Parliament.

Several new Promotions.

In the mean Time the King held a Parliament at Westminster, in which was granted large Supplies towards an Expedition to be made by the Duke of Lancaster into Spain, under the Title of King of Castile and Leon. In which Parliament also the King's Uncle Edward Earl of Cambridge was created Duke of York, and had a Grant from the King of a thousand Pounds per Annum to support

port his Dignity; and also Thomas Earl of Buckingham, the King's other Uncle, was created Duke of Glocester, with the like Gift or Settlement to support his Dignity. At the same Time Michael de la Pole was made Earl of Suffolk, with a suitable Pension, which occasion'd some Discontent, tho' his Family had well deserv'd of the Crown in the last Reign. But what rais'd the greatest Envy was the Advance of Robert de Vere Earl of Oxford, who, without any Thing to recommend him but a beautiful Body, was now by an unusual Title created Marquess of Dublin, and had a Grant of all the Revenues of Ireland, except some Royalties reserv'd to the Crown, upon paying the annual Sum of five thousand Marks. The King's extraordinary Fondness to this handsom Favourite, was the Occasion of great Scandal, both to One and the Other. To conclude this Year, the famous John Wickliff, after he had made great Numbers of Profelytes, dy'd of a Palsie, to the great Joy of the Monkish Writers of those Times; who boldly ascrib'd his Death to the Judgement of God, and that as a Punishment for his Heretical Sermons, the Use of his Tongue was taken from him. He was bury'd at his own Parish-Church at Lutterworth in Leicestershire, where his Bones rested in Peace, 'till forty one Years after, by a Decree of the Council of Constance, they were dug up and burnt as those of a Heretick.

Dr. Wickliff's
Death.

The Time was now come when King Richard should see himself deliver'd from those Fears and Jealousies which the Greatness of his Uncle the Duke of Lancaster had rais'd in his Mind. And upon Easter Day the Duke, as King of Castile, with the Princess Constance his Wife, came to take Leave of the King, who bestow'd on him a Crown of Gold, and the Queen gave another to the Dutche's his Wife; and at the same Time the King commanded all about him to stile and honour him as a King. On the ninth of July he set Sail for Spain, with a select Army of near twenty thousand Men, in which several brave Noblemen were chief Officers; and took with him his Wife, eldest Daughter and Heiress to the late Peter King of Castile, and his two Daughters. And this Titular King now obtain'd so much Favour from Pope Urban, that out of the Hatred he bore to Henry the present Possessor of Castile, who deny'd his Authority, he granted the like Indulgence or Remission of Sins to all such as should assist him in his Expedition, as had been granted to the Bishop of Norwich, when he made War in Flanders. But this Indulgence, tho' solemnly publish'd at the Cathedral of St. Paul's, did the Duke little Service; for the frequent Dispensations and Abuses of these Indulgences, had render'd them so contemptible, that few would contribute any Thing to this pretended Crusado. However the Duke proceeded with Fame and Success for a long Time; and first landing in Bretaign, reliev'd Brest besieg'd by the Duke of that Country, tho' with the Loss of some Men of Quality. Then landing at the Groyne, he proceeded with great Terror and Valour, took Compostella and Villeclope, with several other Places, subdu'd the greatest Part of Gallicia, and marry'd his eldest Daughter Philippa to John King of Portugal. Yet after all this, before the End of the next Year, the English Army was so wasted by the Diseases of that Country, that not being able to act any thing more of Note, the Duke was oblig'd to enter into a Treaty with John King of Castile the Son of Henry the Bastard, and to quit all his Right to that Kingdom, upon certain Conditions and Articles. So that this Expedition into Spain, tho' it much display'd the Valour of the English Nation, yet it prov'd much more to the Honour than the Advantage of England, which was extreamly weaken'd, by being depriv'd of so many brave Soldiers, when the Nation had so much need of them against the common Enemy the French.

The Duke of Lancaster goes into Spain with a brave Army.

His Acts and Success.

For at this Time the French threaten'd a more terrible Invasion than ever was known before; but the King fearing that Calais might be first in Danger, immediately sent for its Security Henry Lord Piercy, Son to the Earl of Norumberland, and By-نام'd Hotspur, a young Gentleman, whom our Author

The French make vast Preparations against England. says was the Pattern of all Virtue and Martial Bravery. But in a short Time, after he had in some Degree answer'd this Character in France, he return'd home to defend his Native Country, which was this Summer under frequent Alarms and great Consternation from the formidable Preparations of the French King, who had gather'd a vast Navy and a prodigious Army at Stuis for that Design. And the better to secure the Soldiers at their first Landing, the French had fram'd a wonderful Wooden Wall, three Miles in Compass, no less than twenty Foot high, with a great Number of Turrets, with which they were to have suddenly inclos'd their Camp. But it fortunately happen'd, that the Lord Beauchamp, Commander in Calais, took three of their Ships laden with Part of this extraordinary Inclosure, which the King caus'd to be set round Winchelsea to secure that Town; and also took another Ship full of great Guns, and other Instruments of War. Tho' this was a great Discouragement, yet the French King, having most of his Nobility with him, resolv'd to pursue his Enterprize; but Providence, which had sav'd France in the last Reign, seem'd to have sav'd England in this: For the Wind kept contrary from the Middle of August to the Middle of November; and at length chopping about, so far flatter'd the French, that they set out the Fleet to Sea; but being seven or eight Leagues from the Shore, it not only turn'd about to its former Quarter, but drove them back with such a violent Fury upon the Coast of Flanders, that it destroy'd several of their Ships. Upon which Accident the King of France resolv'd to defer the Expedition 'till the next Spring; but before that Time, England being put into a better Posture of Defence, the Design became ineffectual.

but to no Effect. All agree that the Kingdom had never a greater Escape and Deliverance, as well for the Want of its best Soldiers, as for many other Reasons; and we are assur'd That the World never saw a greater and more glorious Fleet together; for it consisted of near thirteen hundred Sail of Vessels of all Sorts: And as for Land Forces, besides fifteen Dukes, twenty six Earls, and two hundred Barons, there were a hundred thousand Soldiers. At this great Disappointment, the French Nobility were highly disgusted, but much more the common People, by reason of so vast a Sum of Money being rais'd for nothing; for the present Charge was found to surpass the Ransom of King John in the last Reign.

Great Discontents in Parliament against the King's Favourites. This Deliverance was so much the more signal, because in the Time of the greatest Danger, violent Discontents and Murmurings arose among the Commons as well as Nobility against the King's Favourites; particularly De la Pole Earl of Suffolk, who had been made Lord-Chancellor of England; and Robert de Vere, who was now advanc'd to the unheard of Honour of Duke of Ireland, with a Grant of the Profits and Government of the whole Kingdom, only reserving to the King the Superior Dominion. These Discontents appearing in a Parliament held at Westminster, and the Commons being ready to impeach the Chancellor of several Crimes, the King retir'd after he had once appear'd, and trifled away his Time at Eltham, during a great Part of the Session. Whereupon the Nobility and Commons by joint Consent, dispatch'd a Message to him, declaring That the Chancellor and Treasurer ought to be remov'd from their Offices, because they were not for the Advantage of himself and Kingdom. At which the King being highly offended, commanded them to mention no such Matter, but immediately proceed to the Business for which they were summon'd; declaring, That he would not for their Sakes, or at their Instance, remove the meanest Scullion Boy in his Kitchen. But what yet more enraged them against the Chancellor was, That he, in the Name of the King, had desired of the Commons extraordinary Supplies for the Necessities of the King's Household, as well as the publick Wars; therefore by joint Assent the Lords and Commons return'd this Answer to the King, That they neither could nor would proceed in any Business of Parliament, or dispatch the least Article, 'till the King came in Person amongst them, and remov'd the Chancellor from his Office. Upon which the King appointed them that they should order forty Knights

Knights of the most substantial and wisest of the Commons to come to him, and declare the Opinions of the rest; but a strong Rumour arising that these Knights would be in danger of their Lives, the Project was altogether ineffectual. After this the whole Parliament by common Consent deputed the King's Uncle the Duke of Glocester, and Thomas de Arundel Bishop of Ely, to go to the King at Eltham, and deliver to him the Sense of the whole Assembly; which they did in a set formal Speech, in which they declar'd to his Majesty, That they had it establish'd by ancient Constitution, That the King ought to call a Parliament once every Year, upon many Accounts; That if the King through his ungovernable Will did estrange and withdraw himself from his Parliament for the Space of forty Days, the Members were at liberty to return to their own Habitations without further Proceedings. Upon this the King imprudently answer'd, That now he perceiv'd that his People and the Commons intended to make Insurrections against him; and in such a Case nothing seem'd more proper than to call in his Cousin the King of France, to receive Advice and Assistance from him, and even to submit himself to him, rather than truckle to his own Subjects. To which these Lords return'd a long and severe Answer, and particularly declar'd to him, That they had an ancient Constitution, not very long since put in Execution, That if the King, through evil Council, Obstinacy, Contempt of his Subjects, or by any other irregular Courses, should alienate himself from his People, and refuse to govern by the Laws and Statutes of the Realm; and should precipitate himself into wild Designs, and abandon himself to his arbitrary Will; that from that Time it should be lawful for his People, by their full and free Consent, to depose that King from his Throne, and set upon it another of the Royal Family.

They send a bold Message to the King.

These and the like Speeches had such an Effect upon the King, that within three Days he came to the Parliament, where De la Pole was impeach'd of several high Crimes and Misdemeanors by the Commons, which are too long to be here specify'd; and which were so fully prov'd, that the Earl having nothing to reply, the King blushing and shaking his Head, said, Alas, alas, Michael, see what thou hast done? And when his Majesty desir'd a Supply, the Commons answer'd, That he did not need any Taxes of his Subjects, while he might so easily furnish himself from him who was his just Debtor: Yet upon the King's yielding to have him turn'd out of all Offices, they granted him a Supply and a Tax upon several Commodities. They also granted that the new Duke of Ireland should have the thirty thousand Marks, which was to be receiv'd of the Heirs of Charles of Blois, provided he would go into Ireland before Easter, and use the Money towards the Recovery of those Dominions the King had given him in that Island; so passionately did the Parliament desire his Absence, that they would rather want so much Treasure, than endure him in England to influence the King. At the same Time Arundel Bishop of Ely was made Lord Chancellor, Gilbert Bishop of Hereford made Treasurer, and John de Waltham Keeper of the Privy-Seal. Furthermore, the Parliament observing, that by the great Corruption of the King's Officers, the publick Revenue was vainly consum'd, the King insufferably defrauded, the common People by continual Burthens miserably impoverish'd, the Rents and Profits of the great Men much impair'd, and by all this that the King's Officers became unmeasurably rich; they therefore chose eleven Lords, and gave them Leave and Power to inspect, treat and determine all Affairs, Causes and Complaints arising from Matters of this Nature since the Death of King Edward the Third, 'till this present Time. Then the Parliament broke up, and the King made this Protestation, That for any Thing that was done in that Parliament, he design'd it not to the Prejudice of himself or his Crown. The Reason of this Protestation soon appear'd to the whole Nation, for the King was so dissatisfy'd at the Treatment of his Favourites, that he afterwards revok'd and abrogated all the Proceedings of this Parliament. He was so far from parting with the Earl of Suffolk and the Duke of Ireland, that he receiv'd them into much greater Favour and Confidence than ever; and at Christmass following, admitted the former to sit down with him at his Table, not in the usual Habit of a Peer, but in the Robes of a Prince. And our Authors agree, That these Favourites had so transcending an Influence, that during the Sessions of this Parliament, they with the King's own Consent had form'd a Design of inviting the Duke of Glocester and other leading Men to a Supper at the House of a certain Citizen of London, where they were all to have been murder'd; by whose Death they not only hop'd to be reveng'd on their Enemies, but also to set the King free from all future Restraints: But this Conspiracy was defeated by means of the timely Notice that was given to the Duke of Glocester, who prevented the rest from accepting the Invitation. This was first effected by the Industry and Courage of Sir Richard Exton, the Mayor of London; who being ask'd by the King to give his Consent, or at least Connivance to this Action, declar'd, He would never imbrue his Hands in innocent Blood. So that the Persons against whom this Design was form'd, by this means became more popular and beloved, while their Enemies grew more and more odious to the Body of the People.

A. D. 1387. Reg. 10. These Favourites, and some others, not long after hearing that Richard Earl of Arundel, and Thomas Earl of Nottingham Marshal of England had engag'd with a great Fleet of French, Flemmings and Spaniards, and had taken above a hundred Ships with nineteen thousand Tun of Wine, besides the Admiral of Flanders and other Men of Note, they openly degraded the Victory, and said, That the Vanquish'd were only Merchants, whose Amity would have been more advantageous to the Nation than all that they had gain'd. Yet still the Earls proceeding in their Expedition, sail'd to the Coast of Bretaign, and landed near Brest, where they not only reliev'd the Place, but attacking two Forts lately built for the Defence of the Court, they took and garrison'd the one, and burnt and destroy'd the other; and then return'd home with the great Applause of all Men except the Duke of Ireland, Earl of Suffolk, and some Courtiers, who not being inclin'd to Martial Actions themselves, envy'd the worthy Exploits of others. Yet these had so much Influence over the King, that tho' the Earl of Nottingham was Lord Marshal, and had been brought up with him, he was so far from congratulating or thanking him, that he receiv'd him with the greatest Coldness, and scarce took any Notice of him. After this Earl, the brave Lord Piercy, Henry Hotspur, was sent to Sea; who tho' he was poorly provided of Men, and not much countenanc'd at Court, which envy'd the great Reputation he gain'd at the Recovery of Berwick, yet he undertook the Employment; and having guarded the Seas the rest of the Year, and behaved himself gallantly against the French, he return'd in Safety, much to the Disappointment of his Enemies at Court. By such Means and Practices as these, King Richard, from being highly respected and belov'd, came to be generally hated and despis'd by the Nobility and People; for these Favourites had so corrupted his natural Temper by Luxury and Effeminacy, that not only Military Affairs, but the Princely Exercises of Hawking and Hunting were thought too rough and tiresome for their tender Bodies.

The Kingdom
endanger'd by Favourites.

As to the Duke of Ireland, he became so insolent, that presuming on his Power with the King, he openly divorc'd his Wife Philippa, tho' Grand-Daughter to King Edward the Third, and a Lady of no small Beauty and irreproachable Virtue; and in her stead prefer'd to his Bed one Lancerona, a Bohemian of the meanest Extract who waited upon the Queen. Tho' the King took no Notice of this Affront offer'd to his Cousin-German, yet her Uncle the Duke of Glocester highly resent'd it, and only waited for an Opportunity of Revenge; which the other perceiving, he resolv'd to strike first. And now the Time being come for the Duke of Ireland to depart, to amuse the People the

the King went down with him into Wales, pretending to see him take Shipping there; but the true Reason was, that being remote from the Nobility, they might the more securely consult how to circumvent and destroy the Duke of Glocester, with the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, Derby and Nottingham, and others of the contrary Party. Here the Earl of Suffolk and chief Justice Tresilian join'd with the utmost Zeal; and having form'd their Design and agreed upon the Execution; the King came to Nottingham, bringing the Duke of Ireland and the rest of the Cabal along with him; to which Place they summon'd divers Citizens of London, the Sheriffs of every County, and all the Judges of England. They advis'd with the Sheriffs about what Forces they could raise for the King's Service against the Lords, and commanded them, That they should not suffer any to be return'd as Members for the next Parliament, but such as the King and his Council should nominate. To which the Sheriffs reply'd, That the Commons generally favour'd the said Lords, so that it was not in their Power to raise an Army in that Case; and as for Parliament Men, they could not hinder the People from keeping to their ancient Custom of free Elections. But the Answers of the Judges were more agreeable to the Court than those of the Sheriffs; and the better to colour these Proceedings with a Form of Law, several Questions were propounded to the Judges, touching the late Provisions, or Act of Parliament, giving the eleven Lords Power to inspect and punish Miscarriages in the King's Ministers. But the main Question was, Whether by the Law of the Land the King might not disannul the Decrees of the last Parliament: They jointly answer'd He might, because he was above the Law; confessing also, That they themselves had in that Parliament given their Judgment that Things were according to Law, which now they acknowledg'd to be contrary to it. But when they were order'd to sign their Opinions in Writing, Sir Robert Belknap, chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, stood out against the rest; but being highly threaten'd by the Duke of Ireland and Earl of Suffolk, he at last consented, and having put his Seal to it, he broke forth into these Words: Now I want nothing but a Hurdle and a Halter to bring me to the Death I deserve: If I had refus'd it, I had suffer'd by your Hands; and now I have gratify'd the King and you, I deserve to die for betraying the Nobility of the Kingdom. The King having the Lawyers of his Side, endeavour'd to raise Forces in several Parts of the Land, but with no great Effect; and after a long Progress, he return'd to London, where he was receiv'd with great Pomp and Splendor, and where his Friends were most numerous.

The Judges join with them.

The Duke of Glocester and the Lords of his Party finding the Designs of the Courtiers against them, first endeavour'd to vindicate, and then to defend themselves against their Artifices. And the Duke offer'd to purge himself by Oath before the Bishop of London, That he had no Design against the King's Person or Dignity; with which the Bishop acquainted the King, and was like to have obtain'd Credit, 'till the Earl of Suffolk violently incens'd his Majesty against the Duke. For which the Bishop took the liberty to tell him openly, That it became him to be wholly silent, since he stood condemn'd in Parliament, and liv'd only by the King's Grace and Favour. But finding the King so much at the Earl's Disposal as to command him out of his Presence, he inform'd the Duke how much the King was influenc'd by his wicked Counsellors, and advis'd him to obviate the Destruction prepar'd for him. Whereupon the Duke immediately sent for the Earls of Arundel, Warwick and Derby, Eldest Son to the Duke of Lancaster, who all resolv'd to raise an Army and stand upon their Guard, and so treat with the King concerning the publick Affairs, and that immoderate Favour shown to them who were Traitors both to him and the Publick. But the King endeavour'd to have surpriz'd them singly, before they had join'd their Forces; but failing in the Design, the Confederate Lords march'd towards London to Haringay-Park near Highgate, where at their

They take up Arms, and march towards London.

Ren-

Rendezvous they muster'd above forty thousand Men. This broke all the King's Measures, and prevented a Voyage he had design'd for France; where, as Walsingham assures us, he was to have deliver'd up Calais and other important Places to the French King, which by the fatal Counsel of his Flatterers he was to have sold to that Prince, on Condition he would assist him to subdue his rebellious Nobility. The King was now in great Confusion, and held several Consultations with his Favourites; and being one Time willing to divert himself by the rambling Discourse of a crack'd-brain Knight call'd Sir Hugh de Linn, kept by the Charity of the Courtiers, he jocularly ask'd him, What he should do with the Lords at Haringay-Park? To which Sir Hugh answer'd very gravely, Let us march out, Sir, and kill every Man of them; and then, by God's Eyes, you'll have bravely destroy'd the most faithful Subjects in your Kingdom.

They appear before the King,

and are seemingly reconcil'd.

This was thought by some to contain a dangerous Truth, but was not duly follow'd; however the most peaceable Men procur'd that the Lords should repair safely to Westminster, and there be heard. Upon their near Approach, they were advertis'd by the Bishop of Ely and others who had sworn and engag'd for their safe Conduct, that at the Muse near Charing-Cross, a thousand armed Men under Sir Thomas Trivet and Sir Nicholas Brambre, lay in Ambush to intercept them. The King clear'd himself upon Oath from this Design; and being seated in his Royal Robes in Westminster-Hall, with many of his Prelates and Peers about him, the Lords presented themselves before him upon their Knees; and being demanded of the Bishop of Ely the Lord Chancellor, Why they were assembled in warlike manner contrary to the Laws, their joint Answer was, That they were assembled for the Good of the King and Kingdom, and to root out such Traitors as were Enemies to both; naming the Duke of Ireland, the Arch-Bishop of York, the Earl of Suffolk, chief Justice Tresilian, and Sir Nicholas Brambre, whom they averr'd to be no less, and thereupon flung down their Gloves, in Token that they were ready to prove them so by Combate. The King, knowing that they were out of the Way, told these Lords, That at the next Parliament, all Parties should receive according to their Deserts; and then with a loftier Air he demanded of them, How they durst presume to levy Forces against their Sovereign? Could they think to terrifie him by their Presumption? Had not he Soldiers sufficient to have destroy'd them like Cattle? Therefore in that Respect he esteem'd of them no more than the meanest Scullion in his Kitchen. After these and other high Words, he took up the Duke his Uncle from the Ground, and bad all the rest rise; and after some more kind Discourse, and drinking with the King, they took their Leaves. Two Days after, to appease the Lords and satisfy the People, he caus'd a Proclamation to be publish'd in London, seemingly in Excuse and Vindication of the the Duke of Glocester and his Associates; but more to amuse them, and to preserve his beloved Favourites from the Storm that threaten'd 'em.

But notwithstanding all the King's Promises, the Lords knowing his fleeting and variable Temper, and the vast Influence of his Favourites, thought it safest not to separate themselves, but with a vigilant Eye to observe their Motions; which prov'd much to their Advantage: For the Duke of Ireland and others, not daring to hazard the Justice of a Parliament, with the King's Privy, had rais'd considerable Forces in Wales and Cheshire. To prevent this, Henry Earl of Derby and others march'd with a great Part of their Army, and met the Duke near Burford in Oxfordshire, who at the first Charge cowardly fled away, and left a brave Commander call'd Molineaux to be slain in the Field, and an easy Victory to the Earl of Derby. The Duke fled into Holland, where meeting with cold Entertainment, he went to Utrecht, and after two or three Years wandering as a Traitor, he dy'd at Lovain in Brabant. Amongst his Baggage was taken a considerable Sum of Gold, and, what was of greater Moment, the King's King's Letters, ordering him to come to London, and promising him to live and die with him against all Opposers. This Defeat confounded the whole Cabal of the Favourites; the Earl of Suffolk in Disguise fled to Calais, where his own Brother, being Governor of the Castle, not only refus'd to harbour him, but seiz'd and deliver'd him into the Hands of the Lord Beauchamp, who commanded the Town, who return'd him back Prisoner to the King in England, where he was set at large. The King betook himself to the Tower of London, and there made Provision for his Winter-Quarters: And what added to his present Confusion, about the same Time an Envoy from the French King was taken with Letters, in which he sent a safe Conduct to King Richard, the Duke of Ireland, and some others, to come to Boloign; where he would be ready to receive them according to his Royal Dignity and Character; and then he was likewise to take Possession of Calais, and other strong Places, for which Walsingham says he had already made King Richard Part of Payment.

The King retires to the Tower of London.

The Confederate Lords finding that such considerable Territories were in danger of being lost abroad, as well as fresh Extravagancies acted at home, in the Beginning of the Year march'd from Oxford to London with an Army of forty thousand Men; at whose Arrival the Mayor and Aldermen deliver'd up the Keys of the City, while the Citizens furnish'd them with all necessary Provisions. Then causing all suspicious Places to be search'd, the Lords took up their Head Quarters in the Suburbs, protesting that they would not depart without a personal Conference with the King, which at length he granted, when he saw he could no longer withstand it. Having first permitted the Duke of Glocester and the other Lords to search the Tower, where he then lodg'd, they waited upon him there; and after some few cold Compliments, they laid before him the Confederation against their Lives at Nottingham; his late Letters to the Duke of Ireland, contrary to his Royal Word and Agreement made at Westminster, together with his dishonourable Treaty for delivering up Calais to the French, and other Matters. The King heard them with a formal Patience and a dejected Countenance, and with Tears running down his Cheeks; which warm Drops, and the Consideration of the King's Youth and easie Nature, mollify'd the Lords and caus'd them to relent. But to end all Contests, it was at last positively agreed That he should meet them the next Day at Westminster, there to treat of the weighty and necessary Affairs of the Realm. Yet as soon as they were gone, some false Friends suggested to him That his Going would be neither safe for his Person, nor consonant to his Dignity; whereupon the King chang'd his Mind, and began to retract his Promise; which Mutability so inrag'd the Lords, then flush'd with Success and Power, that they sent him this peremptory Message, That if he thus trifled with them, and would not come according to Appointment, they would take other Measures, and proceed to the Election of another Prince. This so terrify'd the King, that he did not only meet them, but also consented to the perpetual Banishment of these Favourites, namely, the Arch-Bishop of York, the Bishop of Durham, the Bishop of Chichester, the King's Confessor, the Lords Zouch and Beaumont, and several Knights; together with certain Ladies, who were not only useless and chargeable to the Court, but likewise scandalous and infamous in their Conversations; such were the Lady Mohun, the Lady de Molyns, and the Lady Poynings. Several others were at the same Time taken into close Custody, as Sir Simon Burley, Sir Thomas Trivet, Sir Nicholas Brambre, Sir William Elenham, Sir John Beauchamp, and several of the Clergy. As for the Judges, Fulthorp, Belknap, Holt, Burgh, Cury and Lacton, they were arrested as they sat upon the Bench; but Tresilian at present made his Escape, tho' he was not long after discover'd and sent to the Tower.

The confederate Lords attend him there.

The King is forc'd to comply.

Many brought to Punishment.

The Parliament began at Candlemass, in which the confederate Lords justify'd their former Proceedings, and had twenty thousand Pounds given them out of a Tax upon Leather and Wool, in Consideration of their Labour and Expences,

A Parliament meets call'd the Unmerciful Parliament.

Expences, for the Honour, Profit and Safety of the King and Kingdom. After which they proceeded to draw up many Articles of Impeachment against the Arch-Bishop of York, the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, and chief Justice Tresilian; in which they were accus'd of High-Treason, as well as other Crimes too numerous to mention here. Tresilian, lying in Disguise at a House near the Parliament to discover daily Passages, was betray'd by one of his Servants; and after much ignominious Usage, was drawn through the City and hang'd at Tyburn. Sir Nicholas Brambre's Turn was next, who being Companion to Tresilian in his Actions, exactly follow'd him in his Fortunes. Then Sir John Salisbury, and Sir James Berners, two young Knights, Sir John Beauchamp Steward of the King's Household, and John Blake Esquire, were likewise sacrific'd to the publick Revenge. But the Death of Sir Simon Burly, the King's Chamberlain, was thought less justifiable than all the rest, who only met with the Favour of being beheaded. The Bishop of Chichester was likewise condemn'd, and all the Judges, for signing the dangerous Paper at Nottingham; but at length they found so much Mercy as to be banish'd into Ireland, where they had some Allowance for their Subsistence. The Duke of Ireland, the Arch-Bishop of York, the Earl of Suffolk and others had their Estates confiscated to the King's Use by Act of Parliament. After which an Act of Indemnity was pass'd for the Pardon of all other Persons concern'd on either Side, during the late Insurrections: And it was likewise declar'd by the Parliament, That considering the tender Age of the King, and the Innocency of his Royal Person, nothing should be accounted any Fault or Dishonesty in his Person in any manner, nor should turn to his personal Prejudice by any Contrivance or Interpretation whatsoever. Last of all the Parliament petition'd the King, that for nourishing of greater Love, Peace and Tranquility in his Kingdom, he would be pleas'd to renew his Coronation Oath, and that the Prelates might renew their Fealty, and the Lords Temporal their Homage, notwithstanding it had been done formerly. To all which the King assented, and perform'd it with the utmost Pomp and Ceremony in the Abby Church at Westminster, after publick Mass and Sermon, and with the solemn Execrations of the Arch-Bishop against all Infringers whatsoever. On the next Day, being the fourth of June, the Parliament ended; which, says Knighton, was call'd the Unmerciful Parliament; since by the rigid and severe Proceedings against the Favourites, they so far alienated the King's Affections from his Uncle the Duke of Glocester, and the rest of the Lords of his Party, that he never forgave them as long as he liv'd.

The King renews his Coronation Oath.

Actions against Scotland.

A Peace with Scotland and France.

During these intestine Struggles in the Nation, the Scots found Opportunity to invade the Northern Parts of England under the Conduct of Sir William Douglass a brave young Knight, a Parallel and Rival in the Honour of Arms to the famous Henry Hotspur Lord Piercy, whom Hotspur fighting Hand to Hand, slew in Battel. But the Earl of Dunbar coming up with a great Number of Scots, took Hotspur and his Brother Prisoners, and kill'd many of the English, but not without great Loss to his own Men. About the same Time the Earl of Arundel again put out to Sea, and burnt, sunk or took fourscore French Ships, and likewise seiz'd and plunder'd the Isles of Rea and Oleron, together with some other smaller Islands in those Parts. This occasion'd a Meeting between the English and French Envoys at Calais the next Year about concluding a Peace: And tho', because the French insisted upon having the Scots and Spaniards included, the Conclusion was deferr'd; yet shortly after it was resolv'd upon for three Years, and the Scots also included.

A. D. 1289. Reg. 11. III. The Affairs of England were for a Time in a quiet and peaceable Posture; when in the thirteenth Year of his Reign, by the Advice of some of his Courtiers, summoning a full Council, he demanded of them How old they took him to be? They answer'd him Somewhat above twenty one Years At which he

he reply'd, Then I am of full Age, and capable to manage my own Inheritance; and certainly I ought not to be in a worse Condition than any of my Subjects; for every common Heir at that Age enjoys his Estate, and takes it into his own Hands. The Lords keeping a profound Silence, the King thus proceeded, 'Tis well known, That for many Years I have liv'd under your Tuition, and We thank you for the Pains you have taken; but having attain'd to a full Age, We are resolv'd to continue no longer in Ward, but to take the Government of the Realm into Our own Hands, and to appoint and remove such Officers and Ministers as We think fit. Accordingly he forthwith commanded the Arch-Bishop of York, then Lord-Chancellor, to resign the Seal; which being done, the King took it and retir'd, but soon after return'd and gave it to William of Wickham, Bishop of Winchester. He likewise turn'd out the Bishop of Hereford from the Office of Treasurer, and put another of less Quality in his Room; and chang'd several chief Ministers of State, partly to shew his Authority, and partly to manifest his Displeasure; particularly he remov'd his Uncle the Duke of Gloucester, the Earl of Warwick and others from his Privy-Council, and admitted others more agreeable to his Disposition. And indeed the King, tho' he was of Age, yet still shew'd himself a Minor in the Art of Governing; making so unhappy a Choice of new Ministers and Favourites, as in a short Time brought the Kingdom into great Confusion. Shortly after this Change, some Detractors had so prevail'd upon the King, as to make him believe that the Duke of Gloucester was forming some Design against him; but upon Examination, the Falshood and Malice of it soon appear'd; and the King blush'd at his own Credulity against so near and eminent a Relation: And tho' divers of the Inventers of these Reports were present when the Duke would have question'd them, yet the King charg'd him, as he lov'd him, not to stir any further in the Matter.

The King declares himself of Age.

He takes the Government upon himself.

His unhappy Management.

While the King was under the Apprehensions of one Rival, another more formidable arriv'd in England, which was the Duke of Lancaster from his Spanish Expedition, who had marry'd his Daughter Philippa to the King of Portugal, and had made a Peace with the King of Castile, for which he receiv'd an immense Sum for the first Payment, and for the Second, the King of Castile sent him forty seven Mules laden with Gold. This great Warrior was graciously receiv'd, and he happily reconcil'd the King and some of the Nobility: But whether the King found the Keeping of Gascony an unprofitable Burthen, or the Absence of this Uncle worth the purchasing at any Rate, in the following Year in a Parliament he invested him with that famous Dukedom, by delivering him the Cap of State and Ducal Rod. The Duke went over shortly after to take Possession of his new Government; and his valiant Son Henry of Bullingbroke Earl of Derby, unwilling to spend his Time in Idleness, and eager after Glory and Fame, sail'd to the Wars in Prussia, where in several Actions against the Lithuanians, he gain'd extraordinary Honour; which being afterwards compar'd with King Richard's Softness, made a Way for him into the Hearts and Affections of the English Nation. However the King employ'd his Time in the Appearances of War and in feign'd Combates; of which a short Account may give the Reader some Idea of the Romantick Humour of this Age. The King appointed Royal Jufts and Tournaments to be perform'd in Smithfield, and to begin on Sunday after Michaelmas's Day; which was proclaim'd in all the Courts of Christendom by certain Heralds sent for that Purpose. Upon which Notice great Numbers of Noblemen and Knights from France, Germany and the Low-Countries came over to London; particularly William Earl of Ostre-vent, and Valerian Earl of St. Paul, who had marry'd the King's Sister. The Solemnity began from the Tower of London with a noble Cavalcade of sixty Ladies richly adorn'd, who riding upon fine Palfreys, led every one their Knight by a Chain of Silver by her Side, garnish'd with white Harts and golden Crowns, having their Courfers led before by as many Esquires of Honour; and in this pompous Manner they pass'd through Cheap-side to Smithfield. The Jufts continu'd for many Days, in which the King himself perform'd his part, and the Nights concluded with Musick, Dancings and softer Entertainments; and during this Time the King and Queen lodg'd at the Bishop's Palace by St. Paul's Church, and kept a most magnificent House for all Strangers and others.

A new Parliament.

The Pope now understood that the English State began again to be sensible of the Romish Incroachments; and as in a former Parliament they had pass'd an Act to prevent all Collations of Bishopricks and Dignities by the Pope, with Banishment to all such as accepted the Collations, and Death to all that brought any Excommunications from Rome to hinder the Execution of the Act; so in the present Parliament another severe Act was made against all such as should go to the Pope to procure any such Provisions. A Proclamation was also publish'd at London, That all benefic'd Persons then in the Court of Rome, should return by a prefix'd Day, or lose their Livings. The Pope himself, alarm'd with so great a Thunder-clap, sent with all speed into England to perswade this easie King, that such Statutes as were made in Prejudice of those who follow'd the Court of Rome, and such other Clauses as tended to the Damage of that See, should be abolish'd. To which the King answer'd That the Pope's Nuncio must wait 'till the next Parliament; at which Parliament the King, as also the Duke of Lancaster who was by that Time return'd, seem'd to have some Respect to his Holiness, whose Nuncio was there present; but the Commons would by no means give their Consents, That such Rome-Rangers, as they were call'd, should without due Punishment pursue their usual Courses any longer than 'till the next Parliament. At the same Time, to furnish the Duke of Lancaster into France, to treat of a Peace, and to promote the King's intended Invasion of Scotland, large Supplies were given both by the Clergy and Laity. Hereupon Henry Hotspur, who had long since ransom'd himself, was recall'd from his Charge at Calais, and made Commander of the Marches against Scotland; and was succeeded by the Earl of Nottingham in the Government of Calais. The Duke of Lancaster's chargeable Employment in France produc'd no other Fruits than one Year's short Truce.

Reg. 15.

London de-priv'd of all her Privileges.

However this gave King Richard leisure to live according to his Inclination, which was to keep the greatest and noblest Court of any King in Europe; and his Subjects led by his Example, abandoning all Thoughts of Frugality, gave themselves over to Luxury. Great was the Excess of Diet, the Pomp and Grandeur of his Court, in Apparel inimitable, in Number of Servants exceeding all Belief; ten thousand Men fed daily on his Bread, the Queen had three hundred Women belonging to her Service, and three hundred was the Number that belong'd to the Kitchen. In his private Family he knew not how to deny any Thing, and the Easiness of obtaining Favours debas'd the Value of them; his Expences were innumerable, so that his ordinary Revenues not sufficing, he was forc'd to use extraordinary Means. His immoderate Affection to his Servants, his Uncles Power, and the Peoples Hatred, being not sufficient to undo him, his own immense Prodigality in Time effected it, without which he could not easily have been ruin'd. Being under Necessities, and perhaps willing to try whether he might rely upon a greater Sum, he desir'd to borrow of the City of London a thousand Pound, an inconsiderable Sum for such a King and so rich a City; yet he was not only refus'd, but when an Italian Merchant freely offer'd to lend the Mony, he was for his Officiousness barbarously beaten and almost slain. This, and a Tumult rais'd not long after by a Baker, so inrag'd the King that he committed the Mayor close Prisoner, seiz'd the Liberties of the City into his own Hands, annull'd all their Privileges, and commanded that for the future no Mayor should be elected, but he would appoint one that should be call'd Keeper of the City; and more than this, he remov'd the Terms and Courts of Judicature to the City of York. But the Duke of Glocester and others were not wanting to intercede with the King on Behalf of the Londoners.

ners, of whom the principal were brought before him to Windsor, and submitted themselves and Fortunes to his Mercy; with whom he seem'd so well satisfy'd that three Days after he came to London, where he was met with the most imaginable Pomp and Magnificence. And to make their Peace, they presented the King with a Crown of Gold of great Value, and another of the same Metal to the Queen, together with many other noble Gifts; by which means they got their Privileges to be restor'd, and confirm'd to them, with the Election of a Mayor, and all Things as formerly. But after all their chargeable Presents, and their Submissions, the King forc'd them to pay ten thousand Pound by way of Fine, or else they must have ventur'd the Effects of his new Displeasure; which severe Usage lost him the Affections of the Citizens ever after. It was the following Year before the King remov'd his Courts of Judicature from the City of York to London. In this Year a Parliament was held at Winchester, in which were granted to the King a Tenth by the Clergy, and a Fifteenth by the Laity for the Expences of the Dukes of Lancaster and Glocester, who were then going over into France to treat about a Peace. But their expensive Journey prov'd of no great Effect, and a final Peace could not be then concluded, by reason that the King of France had been seiz'd with an unaccountable sort of Frenzy.

Reg. 16.

The following Year was remarkable for the Death of several illustrious Persons, particularly Queen Anne, who to the King's great Grief deceas'd at his Manor of Sheen. Her Death was such a sensible Affliction to him, that he not only ever after hated the Place, but also defac'd it by pulling down the Pinnacles, and demolishing the Apartment where she dy'd. She had the Character of a beautiful, charitable and good humour'd Lady, but too much given to her Pleasures, of which she is said to have repented on her Death-Bed: We are told that she first taught the English Ladies the modest Custom of riding on Side-Saddles, whereas before they rode astride like Men. About this Time dy'd the Dutchess of Lancaster, the Countess of Derby, and not long after the Dutchess of York; as if Fortune had conspir'd to make almost all the Princes of the Blood accompany the King in his Widowership. These Afflictions did not alter the King's Resolution of passing over personally into Ireland; nor did they divert the Duke of Lancaster from going to his Dukedom of Gascony. In Ireland the wilder sort had much broken in upon the English Establishments, and done great Damage to the good Subjects of England; so that tho' in the Reign of King Edward the Third, Ireland annually yielded thirty thousand Pounds into the King's Exchequer, now it was so out of Order, that it cost the King thirty thousand Marks a Year for its Defence. To reduce the Rebellious he himself led a brave Army against 'em, attended by the Duke of Glocester, with the Earls of Marche, Nottingham and Rutland. The Terror of his Preparations, and the shining Presence of a King, which of all Things was most grateful to the Irish, had such good Effects, that many of their chief Men were compell'd to submit.

To supply the King's Wants occasion'd by this Irish Expedition, the King's Uncle the Duke of York, as Custos or Warden of England, call'd a Parliament at London, where the Duke of Glocester also repair'd to declare the King's Occasions, and had liberal Supplies granted. But before the King could perform much more in Ireland, the Bishops and Clergy were so alarm'd with the bold and numerous Accusations which the Wickliffites or Lollards had made against their Body, that they sent the Arch-Bishop of York and the Bishop of London to the King, begging of him to hasten his Return, to defend and succour the true Faith, and Holy Church, that were both in danger of being ruin'd by the Hereticks, who were contriving how to take away the Possessions of the Church, and overthrow all Canonical Sanctions. The King greatly surpriz'd at the News, leaving the Earl of Marche his Lieutenant in Ireland, hasten'd into England, where he safely arriv'd in the Beginning of May. Upon his Arrival he severely reprimanded some of the Nobility and Gentry, who were the chief Favourers of these Lollards, causing Sir Richard Story publickly to abjure their Principles, openly declaring, That if he ever found him to relapse, he should suffer Death without Mercy. And now the King, in Memory of his former great Favourite the Duke of Ireland, who dy'd at Lovain in great Misery, order'd his Body to be embalm'd and brought into England. His Love arose to that Fondness, that he commanded his Cyphers Coffin to be open'd, that he might view and handle the Body of his Friend, and openly express his Affection. The Body was carry'd to the Priory of Colne in Essex, where a magnificent Funeral was made for it; the King in Person, the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and the Countess Dowager of Oxford, Mother to the Deceas'd, being the chief Mourners; and several Bishops and Abbots attended, but very few of the Nobility would appear, as having not yet digested their Resentments against him.

A. D. All this Time the Duke of Lancaster continu'd in Gascony, where he endeavour'd to gain the Peoples Affections by his extraordinary Munificence; but 1396. when his Hopes were at the highest, he receiv'd a Command from King Richard
Reg. 19. to return, in order to go with him into France to finish a Treaty then on 20. Foot; all which he readily obey'd. The King being then at Langley in Hartfordshire, the Duke was there entertain'd with more Honour, as it was believ'd, than real Affection. Having leave to depart for a Time, he repair'd to the City of Lincoln, where he had a Palace, and there marry'd the Lady Catharine Swinford, Widow to Sir Thomas Swinford, his old Mistress, by whom he had four Children during the Life of his Dutches. But this Match highly discontented the Duke of Glocester and others, who judg'd it a great Dishonour to the Royal Family. However the Duke, in the next Parliament procur'd an Act to Legitimate all the Children he had by this Lady, and surnam'd them Beaufort; and one of them was by the King's Favour created Earl of Somerset.

All things being prepar'd, the King accompany'd by his two Uncles of Lancaster and Glocester, at a most magnificent and expensive Interview between him and Charles King of France, between Calais and Ardres, espous'd the Princess Isabel, Daughter to that King. The young Lady was then no more than seven or eight Years of Age, but King Richard receiv'd her with many Compliments and great Solemnity, and a Truce was thereupon concluded for thirty Years. Her Person was committed to the Dutches of Lancaster and Glocester, and other great Ladies, who conducted her to Calais; from whence, after a short Stay, the King and all the glorious Company came over into England, where the young Queen was crown'd with great Solemnity at Westminster by the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury. The King lost his rich Tents, and a great Part of his Equipage at Sea; and our Author tells us, That this Journey and Interview, besides innumerable Presents made, cost the King three hundred thousand Marks, which was more than all the Portion he receiv'd with his Queen. And the Duke of Glocester was neither satisfy'd with the Truce or the Match, and took the liberty to say, That it had been more proper to recover by Arms what the King's Father and Grand-father had lost in France, than to enter into new Alliances with that Crown, which had always better Success in Treaties than Wars with England.

A. D. IV. In the twentieth Year of this Reign all Things seem'd to be in a 1397. peaceable and quiet Condition in England; and the King found a Parliament
Reg. 20. that was ready to comply with his Desires, and grant whatever he demanded.
21. Yet all this did not satisfy the King's Occasions; for upon certain Rumours spread abroad, That he either was now, or else very shortly to be chosen Emperor, he thereupon began to take greater State upon him, and a higher way of Living than ever before: To maintain which he fleec'd his Subjects, and borrow'd row'd large Sums of Mony; so that there was no Prelate, Man of Quality, or Citizen of any Estate in the Kingdom, but were oblig'd to lend the King Mony, tho' much against their Wills; which was one of the main Things that turn'd the Trading Part of the Nation against him. When he had thus far compass'd his Designs, he resolv'd to proceed, and remove such as either had or might oppose him. And seeing his Uncle the Duke of Glocester stood most in his Way, he design'd to begin with him, and destroy him first, not by Law, but by secret Contrivances. What mov'd the King to act so ungenerously, is variously reported: Froisart and Polydore Virgil with Probability relate, That the Duke carrying himself with too great Pride and Moroseness towards the King, he sometimes complain'd to his two Uncles, the Dukes of Lancaster and York of their Brother's haughty and disobliging Carriage towards him. They, to excuse him and pacifie the King, alledg'd, That tho' their Brother was more hot and vehement than became him, yet they durst assure his Majesty that his Heart was dutiful and loyal; and that this Vehemency proceeded from a zealous Regard he had to the Honour and Revenues of his Majesty; with which the King seem'd satisfy'd at present. But however, these Dukes not knowing how much they might be involv'd in that Displeasure which they perceiv'd he retain'd against their Brother, thought fit to retire from Court; and by that means gave the Duke of Glocester's Enemies the greater Opportunities to incense the King against him. At length many Designs were laid to the Duke's Charge, and many Things whisper'd against him, who had given but too much occasion for disadvantageous Reports; so that the King being under great Apprehensions, resolv'd to secure him by a Stratagem, which he thus effected. The Duke being at his Manor of Pleshy in Essex, the King from a Hunting Seat came in a Summer's Evening to give him a Visit, where he was receiv'd with all due Respect by him and his Dutcheffs. After a short Refreshment, he commanded the Duke to order some of his Horses to be Saddled, to bear him Company that Night to London upon an extraordinary Council; upon which the Duke with only five or six Attendants, immediately mounted and accompany'd him towards London, while the other entertain'd him with the most familiar and obliging Discourse. Coming near Stratford, where an Ambush was laid to apprehend him, the King suddenly clapp'd Spurs to his fleet Horse, and left the Duke to be unexpectedly seiz'd by the Earl of Nottingham, and a great Number of Horsemen; who hurry'd the unfortunate Prince to a Vessel prepar'd for him on the Thames and carry'd him over to Calais, where he was kept close Prisoner, and never return'd after.

The King's Designs against the Duke of Glocester.

The Duke of Glocester seiz'd and carry'd to Calais.

The King being now resolv'd to finish his intended Projects, proceeded after the like manner with the rest of the Duke's Party; and to that End he sent for the Earls of Warwick and Arundel to Court, where he treated them with gracious Words and Promises, but in their Return arrested them for Treason and sent them to the Tower, as he did not long after the Lord Cobham and Sir John Cheney, with several others of the same Faction. The Nation being much alarm'd at these uncommon Proceedings, the King by a Declaration set forth, That the Lords lately apprehended were not thus treated for former Offences, but for certain new Treasons, which should be prov'd in due Time; tho', as Walsingham says, the Event declar'd the contrary. After this he call'd a grand Council of Peers at Nottingham, in which several Lords were accus'd, and left to answer in the next Parliament to meet at Westminster in the middle of September: In the Election of which Parliament our Historians tell us, That the King by certain indirect Practices, and Management of the Sheriffs of the Counties, whom he had made for his Purpose, caus'd them to return such Members of Parliament, as he had before nominated: Which is the first Example of any King's making use of an arbitrary Power in this Kind, and which prov'd one grand Step to his Ruin. In this Parliament the King had a great Guard of Cheshire Men to secure his Person; and the Lords attended also also with no small Numbers about him. The Bishop of Exeter, then Lord Chancellor, open'd the Session with an Oration upon a Text of Scripture, and declar'd the Royal Power to be the only real Power, and that those who endeavour'd to destroy or diminish it, deserv'd the severest Punishments. Then Sir John Busby, a Creature of the King's, being by him nominated Speaker, the Parliament proceeded to reverse all the Proceedings in that of the eleventh Year of this Reign; and first of all that Commission which had empower'd eleven Lords to inspect the publick Revenues of the Nation, declaring it obtain'd traiterously, by Constraint, and against the Royal Crown and Dignity. Next they annull'd all the Pardons granted to the Duke of Glocester, the Earls of Arundel and Warwick and others, as being obtain'd by Constraint, and against the King's Will; not considering, says our Author, that the recalling such Pardons struck at the King's Safety; for since Mercy is the Strength of the Royal Throne, whoever takes that away destroys its main Foundation. In Sum this Parliament revers'd every Thing of moment enacted nine Years before by that which was call'd the Unmerciful Parliament; such uncertain Things have these general Assemblies been, when manag'd either by Court Intrigues, or popular Factions.

Many of the Nobility condemn'd by it.

The Consequences of these Proceedings were first the Impeachment and Condemnation of Thomas Arundel Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, chiefly for being traiterously concern'd in the above-nam'd Commission for inspecting the publick Revenues; for which he was banish'd the Kingdom, and had all his Temporalities confiscated. Next the Earls of Arundel and Warwick were impeach'd and condemn'd of High-Treason that had pass'd nine and ten Years before, and for which they had been pardon'd. The former was behead'd on Tower-Hill, where his Behaviour was extraordinary; and seeing his Son-in-Law the Earl of Nottingham, and his Nephew the Earl of Kent present with all the Marks of Satisfaction, he calmly told them, That it became them at least to have been absent from such a Sight; but the Time would shortly come, when as many should admire at their Misfortune, as they now did at his. Froisart says that the King was present at the Execution, and Walsingham affirms, that he was often hunted with an Apparition or Imagination of his Ghost; for he no sooner clos'd his Eyes to Sleep, but he fancy'd Arundel stood by him. The Earl of Warwick pleading guilty, obtain'd a more merciful Sentence, being condemn'd to a perpetual Imprisonment in the Isle of Man. But the Duke of Glocester, being too popular and formidable to be brought to a publick Trial, was not long before by the King's Order secretly smother'd by Pillows and Feather-Beds at Calais, where it was reported he dy'd of an Apoplexy; after which he was attainted of High-Treason, and had all his Lands and Possessions confiscated to the King's Use. This was the unfortunate End of a Man majestick, valiant and brave, but of a restless and turbulent Temper, which being blown up by his Greatness, brought him into many unjustifiable Actions, which at length produc'd his Ruin. After this the King to strengthen his Party, and to kindle new Lights in the Room of such as he had extinguish'd, made his Cousin Henry Earl of Derby, Duke of Hereford, the Earl of Rutland Duke of Albermarl, the Earl of Kent Duke of Surrey, the Earl of Huntington Duke of Exeter, the Earl of Nottingham Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Somerset Marquess of Dorset, the Lord Spenser Earl of Glocester, the Lord Neville Earl of Westmorland, William Scrope Earl of Wiltshire, and Thomas Piercy Earl of Worcester. Among these, to maintain their Dignities, the King made a Distribution of the greater Part of the Lands of the Duke of Glocester, and the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, hoping to have bound them by a double Obligation of Duty and Affection; not considering that such purchas'd Friends are seldom well satisfy'd, or true in Time of Need.

Reg. 21.

This Parliament was so highly serviceable to the Court Designs, that contrary to the usual Methods of these Times, it was only prorogu'd, and sum-mon'd to meet at Shrewsbury, as a Place more proper than Westminster. Here the the bold Assertions and Opinions that the Judges had made at Nottingham, in the eleventh Year of his Reign, for which they suffer'd, were now confirm'd to be good in Law; and the whole Proceedings of the Parliament held in the same Year, at once declar'd to be null and void, as being done contrary to the Will and Liberty of the King, and the Dignity of his Crown. The Judges also at this Time gave their Opinion, That when the King had propos'd Articles to be handled in Parliament, it was Treason to propose others 'till they were dispatch'd. Under a Pretence of Dispatch of Affairs the King by an unpresided Action obtain'd that the Authority of this Parliament should be delegated to a select Number of Lords and Commons appointed by himself; by which Act the whole Power of the Kingdom was now devolv'd upon the King, twelve Peers, and six Commoners. Then he granted a general Pardon to all except fifty Persons, whom he would not have nam'd, but reserv'd them for a Curb to his Nobility, to keep them still in Danger of being nam'd one of the fifty, if they displeas'd him. Lastly, to add the greater Strength and Reverence to the Acts and Proceedings of this Parliament, the King shortly after procur'd the Pope's Bull, containing great Execrations upon all that should presume to break or oppose them, which was solemnly publish'd at St. Paul's Cross, and other Places throughout England. Furthermore to gratify the Cheshire Men, who had chiefly assist'd him and his late Favourites, he honour'd that County with the Name and Dignity of a Principality, and added to the rest of his own Titles that of Prince of Chester, and to his Coat of Arms the suppos'd Bearing of Edward the Confessor.

Many dangerous Proceedings.

For the present all Things seem'd to concur with the King's Designs; the Heads of the Party that so long oppos'd him were cut off, and the Nobility either terrify'd or brib'd by Honours or Estates; the Commons were unable to express their Resentments otherwise than in Sighs and Murmurs, and the King's great Officers of State, and his very Parliaments were now modell'd according to his Pleasure; so that no King since the Conquest had been more absolute than he was at present. Yet notwithstanding all his Power and Grandeur, in a short Time by small Accidents and unlikely Instruments, he was more plung'd and embroil'd than ever, and without Resistance reduc'd to a short and speedy Overthrow. The Occasions of this great Revolution proceeded first from a Quarrel that arose between the Dukes of Hereford and Norfolk, the former accusing the latter of certain Words spoken to him against the King's Person and Government. The Substance of the Words was, That King Richard had no Regard to the Peers of the Land, but as much as he could endeavour'd to destroy them by banishing some and putting others to Death: That he never troubled his Thoughts with considering how his Dominions were diminish'd by his Carelessness; and that all Things ran to Ruin, both in the Time of Peace and War. The Duke of Norfolk being accus'd, deny'd that he ever spoke such Words, and challenging his Adversary, Coventry was appointed by the King for the Place of Combate. Where both appearing in great Pomp, and the King being present with a mighty Train, as the two Combatants stood ready to engage, the King, under the Pretence of preventing deadly Feuds between two such Families, or rather to be freed from an Enemy tho' with the Loss of a Friend, banish'd the Duke of Norfolk for ever, and the Duke of Hereford for ten Years, and then for six. The former dy'd in a short Time miserable and unlamented at Venice; and 'tis observable that Sentence was pronounc'd against him on the same Day Twelve-Month that the Duke of Glocester had been murder'd by his Order at Calais; so just is the Divine Vengeance at some Times, not only in punishing Villanies, but in causing the Punishment to be attended with such Circumstances as may render it more conspicuous to the World.

thering throughout the Nation, and then re-flourishing contrary to Expectation. These were look'd upon as very ominous in those Times; and the first Consequence of them, as it was thought, was the Death of the great Duke of Lancaster, who deceas'd about Candlemass; a Prince active and courageous, and who had made a noble Figure in the World. He had the Character of a Man prudent and wary in his Actions, an Approver of safe Councils on good Reasons, rather than fortunate Exploits with Hazards; one that was neither too negligent or ambitious of Glory, and therefore deported himself towards the King his Nephew with a Respect decent enough for a moderate Prince, but not so much as the insatiable Desire of Arbitrary Power, join'd with the depraved Manners of the Court, might require. His brave Son, Henry Duke of Hereford, unjustly banish'd, ought to have inherited not only his Title, but also his vast Estate; but the King, being jealous of so great a Power in a near Relation he had so highly exasperated, took care to prevent it by seizing all his Possessions, and pronouncing his Banishment perpetual. This was done by a Meeting at Westminster of those few Lords and Commons, who had the Authority of a Parliament conferr'd upon them. And these proceeded to a more severe and unjust Action against one Henry Bonet Clerk, who for regularly procuring Letters Patents from the King in favour of the exil'd Duke, was adjudg'd as a Traitor to be hang'd, drawn and quarter'd: Only by being the King's Chaplain, he found Favour to escape with Life, and so suffer'd perpetual Banishment.

The Death of the Duke of Lancaster.

His Character.

His Son Henry unjustly banish'd by the King.

The Publick in a dangerous Condition.

By these and the like arbitrary Acts, the Laws and Liberties of England, were reduc'd to a dangerous and languishing Condition; for the King having dispatch'd the Duke of Glocester, and the rest of the Noblemen who oppos'd him, and being now freed from his Uncle the Duke of Lancaster by Death, and his Son by Banishment, had the Liberty to act at Pleasure. His only remaining Uncle the Duke of York, being an easie and quiet Prince, more addicted to Pleasures than Business, and much govern'd by his Son the Duke of Albermarl, was so far from opposing, that he seem'd rather to countenance the King's late Actions, by voting with the present standing Committee of Parliament. So that the King now looking upon himself as Hors-du-page, and free from all Control, abandon'd himself to soft Ease and the destructive Charms of Pleasure; by whose fatal Example many of the Nobility deliver'd themselves up to Sloth and Luxury, which introduc'd Cowardice and Effeminacy, and destroy'd both Manhood and Reputation. The publick Affairs both at home and abroad were in a Condition answerable to such Managers, who had been long byass'd more by private Respects than publick Advantages; which caus'd the Nation to decline both in Honour and Riches; so that all Things being out of Order, the Commonwealth seem'd hastning into inevitable Ruin. The Northern Counties, through frequent Devastations and unfaithful Truces, were impoverish'd by the Scots, who had gain'd several important Posts, and depopulated those Parts with their continual Inroads. On the Seas the Merchants Ships were frequently surpriz'd by the French; and the King's Hereditary Dominions in France reduc'd to a narrow Compass, and many strong Places lost by Negligence or sold by Treachery. The Profits and Revenues of the Crown, and even of the whole Kingdom, were farm'd out to certain Favourites, who unmercifully rack'd and oppress'd the King's Subjects. Great Sums of Money were by new invented Methods, rather extorted than borrow'd from all Sorts of People, of which no Advantage accru'd to the Kingdom; only the King's private Pleasures were extravagantly maintain'd, and unworthy Favourites advanc'd. To add to all, Seventeen whole Counties, which ten Years before had join'd with the Duke of Glocester, notwithstanding the general Pardon, were now held guilty of High-Treason: For which they were forc'd to compound for a large Sum of Money, to take new Oaths of Allegiance, and the richest among them to sign and seal to a Blank, in which the appointed Officers might insert what Sum they they pleas'd; which was sufficient to ruin whole Counties, as well as Families. In sum, the unfortunate King was not only surrounded, but in a manner besieged by ignorant Ministers and sordid Flatterers, who kept him from all Relief of good Counsel, and render'd him so universally hated, that great Numbers design'd to rebel at the first Opportunity; being resolv'd rather to run the Hazard of a short and speedy Ruin, than languish under the Torment of a tedious Slavery.

The King generally hated.

In the midst of these uneasie and unsettled Times the King imprudently resolv'd upon an Expedition into Ireland, to revenge the Death of his Lieutenant the Earl of Marche, the nearest Heir to the Crown, who had been slain in an Engagement with the wild Irish: In Order to which, he rais'd a numerous Army, but not without a vast Charge, and grievous Oppression of his Subjects, not only in levying Money by illegal Methods, but taking up Carriages, Victuals and other Necessaries without paying for them; which rash and unadvis'd Practices render'd himself and his Government still more and more uneasie to the Nation. About Whitsontide he took Shipping for Ireland, accompany'd with the Dukes of Albermarl and Exeter, the Sons of the Dukes of Glocester and Lancaster, and divers other Noblemen; but his Forces mostly consisted of Cheshire Men, on whom he chiefly confided. He also carry'd over with him his chief Relicks, with his Plate and jewels of the Crown that were in his Treasure; as if he had design'd to have taken a final Leave both of his Kingdom and Dignity in England. At his going off, he committed a new Error in Politicks, which was his proclaiming the Earl of Northumberland and his Friends Traitors, and ordering their Estates to be seiz'd, only for not attending him in this Expedition, when their Presence was requir'd in the North against the Scots; which caus'd the Earl in a short Time to be one of the First that revolted from him. In the mean Time the King landed at Waterford, and immediately after his Arrival, march'd from Dublin against the Irish of Ulster, and got many little Victories in several Engagements he had with them; in all which, the King is said to have behav'd himself with great Courage and Resolution. And these petty Irish Princes were so terrify'd with the Force of his Arms, that they sent Envoys to him to petition for Pardon, and to sue for Peace, which at length they obtain'd, tho' with some Difficulty.

He makes an Expedition into Ireland,

But these inconsiderable Triumphs cost King Richard no less than his Kingdom: For while he was thus engag'd and absent from his discontented Nation, Henry the new Duke of Lancaster being invited over by many of the Nobility and Gentry, and likewise excited by the exil'd Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, resolv'd to try his Fortunes in the Kingdom of England. Wherefore after he had dispatch'd some of his choice Friends over to make the best Preparations for his Arrival, he address'd himself to the French King with a Compliment, that he design'd a Visit to his Kinsman the Duke of Bretaign, therefore desir'd his Letters of safe Conduct; which being granted, he there privately levy'd a few Soldiers, and hiring three Ships of the Duke of Bretaign, he put to Sea with them for England, accompany'd with the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and his Nephew, the Lord Cobham, Sir Thomas Erpington and Sir Thomas Ramstone Knights, with some other Gentlemen, his whole Retinue not consisting of above eighty Persons: So that it is hard to judge which was more wonderful, that he durst attempt, or that he should succeed with so small a Number. However the Duke was too wise and cautious to push Things beyond all Possibility of a Retreat; and therefore did not immediately land, but lay cruising up and down, sometimes appearing on one Coast and sometimes on another, that he might the better discover the Inclinations of the People towards him, and what Forces were ready to receive or resist him. But at last being satisfy'd with what he observ'd, he landed without Opposition about the Beginning of July at Raven-spurre in Yorkshire, with no more than twenty Lances, tho' he might have had a greater Force from the Duke of Bretaign; so much did he confide in the Justice which occasioned his Fall.

itice of his Cause, and the Favour of the People. Yet he did not then make any Pretensions to the Crown, but only gave out that he came to regain the Dukedom of Lancaster, and the rest of his lawful Inheritance, which all the Nation knew was wrongfully detain'd from him, and so hop'd that they were the more ready to pity and favour him in a Cause wherein he had receiv'd such palpable Injury from the King.

Many Lords
join with him.

His Arrival being known, the Lords Willoughby, Ross, Darby and Beaumont immediately repair'd to him, and shortly after the Earls of Northumberland and Westmorland, with great Numbers of the Gentry and common People. Upon which, the King's Lieutenant and Uncle the Duke of York, summon'd the Bishop of Chester, the Lord Chancellor Scrope, the Earl of Wiltshire Lord Treasurer, Sir John Busby, Sir Henry Green, Sir William Bagot, and Sir John Russel, chief Counsellors and Confidants to King Richard, to advise how to act in this dangerous Exigency. Among whom it was ignorantly or treacherously concluded to abandon the City of London, and appoint the general Rendezvous to be at St. Albans. But when the common People were call'd out of several Counties to that Place, they openly declar'd. That they would not act any Thing to the Prejudice of the Duke, who they knew was unjustly banish'd his Country, and illegally kept from his Inheritance. This was like a Thunder-clap to the Earl of Wiltshire and the other Favourites, who were conscious that the Peoples Hatred was greater against them, than the King's Person, because they had farm'd the Publick Revenues, and us'd intollerable Exortions; therefore, suddenly leaving the Duke of York, they fled to Bristol; which gave so great a Discouragement to him, that not daring to venture an improbable Resistance, he gave over the Cause, and laid down his Arms. Upon which the rest of the Nobility either openly declar'd for the Duke, or held secret Correspondence with him, resolving to swim down with his mighty Stream, rather than pretend to stem an impetuous Torrent that bore away all before it. For nothing could increase faster than the Duke's Forces in his March; insomuch that they were soon grown to sixty thousand strong, with which he resolv'd to push on his good Fortune, and hasten to London. There he found a Reception suitable to the usual Joy that discontented and turbulent People shew in Alterations; he was receiv'd in Triumph without Victory, and with all the Testimonies of Zeal and Affection, which flattering Crouds could pay their lawful Sovereign. Pageants and rich Presents entertain'd him, with all the Acclamations and extravagant Praises that could be invented, and as many opprobrious Reflections cast on the Conduct of King Richard. From London he hasten'd to Bristol, to pursue the fugitive Favourites; and finding the Castle fortify'd against him, he so briskly attack'd it, that in four Days Time he forc'd it to surrender upon Discretion. And taking therein the Earl of Wiltshire, Sir John Busby, and Sir Henry Green, he the next Day sacrific'd them to the importunate Rage of the incens'd People, by cutting off all their Heads without Mercy.

During these Successes, there was no News of King Richard; who either was hinder'd by contrary Winds, or acted according to the Humour of some weak Spirits, who contain remote Dangers, but are astonish'd at their near Approach. However at length, securing the Sons of the Dukes of Lancaster and Glocester, he resolv'd for England; but the Duke of Albermarl persuad'd him to stay 'till his Preparations were ready, which fatal Council, as it was his Destiny to follow, so it prov'd his Ruin: Yet he immediately sent over the Earl of Salisbury to raise an Army in Wales and Cheeshire against his Return, which he strictly promis'd should be within six Days at furthest. The Earl was very successful in his Levies, and soon got together no less than forty thousand Men; but the King much failing in his Time of Appearance to head them, they of great Discontent return'd home. At length, in eighteen Days time, the King attended by the Dukes of Albermarl, Exeter and Surrey, the Bishops of Lon- don, Exeter and Carlisle, and some others of the Nobility, landed at Milford Haven with a considerable Number of his Cheshire Army, and march'd to Carmarthen, where he staid to consult how to proceed; but when he understood that the Earl of Salisbury's Forces were disbanded, that most of his strong Places as well as London had declar'd for the Duke of Lancaster, that most of the Nobility and Gentry had espous'd his Cause, and that his principal Favourites had lost their Heads, he was so far from retaining the Magnanimity of a King, that he almost ceas'd to be a Man, and abandon'd himself to Despair; being perplex'd and confounded with Uncertainties, and destitute both of Resolution and good Counsel in such amazing Difficulties. For while some advis'd him to march bravely forwards, as being sure of many who out of Duty, or Affection, or for Pay, would follow his Standard; others persuaded him to return into Ireland, and go over to his Father-in-Law of France, and stay 'till the Storm was over, and 'till a more convenient and favourable Season. But the King rejecting both Counsels, took a middle Course, and resolv'd to stay in Wales, and expect the Event of this Defection; while the Soldiers he had brought over with him, endeavour'd to encourage him to Battel, vowing to live and die with him. But this could not raise his drooping Spirits, for in the Night he stole away from his Forces, and with some of his Nobility went Incognito cross the Country to the Castle of Conway; where the Lord Thomas Piercy, Steward of his Household, openly in the Hall before all the King's Servants, broke his white Staff of Office, and repair'd to the Duke of Lancaster; and most of the Royal Retinue by his Example dispers'd and thifted every one for himself. Such uncertain Attendants are the common sort of Courtiers, who like Flies, upon the first Storm, leave the Body that has nourish'd them.

Walsingham's Account.

The poor unfortunate King being thus abandon'd, had no Hopes left but in a Parly; in Order to which, the ejected Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and the Earl of Northumberland repair'd to him to Conway Castle. The Sum of the King's Proposals was, That if he and eight Persons, whom he would name, might have an honourable Allowance, and the Assurance of a quiet private Life, he would resign his Crown. To which the Earl of Northumberland gave his Oath; which so satisfy'd the King, that he immediately departed in their Company to the Castle of Flint, where he put himself into the Duke of Lancaster's Hands, and rod with him that Night to the Castle of Chester. This is Walsingham's Account; but others say that Northumberland deluded the King with more plausible Proposals than the fore-mention'd, and by a sort of Stratagem got him into his Possession and convey'd him to the Duke of Lancaster at Flint Castle; where the King having din'd, the Duke appear'd before him, to whom the King said, Cousin of Lancaster, you are welcome. The other answer'd, I am come sooner than you appointed me, because the Fame of your People is, that for these twenty one Years you have govern'd ill and rigorously, for which they are highly dissatisfy'd; but if Heav'n pleases, I will help to govern them better for the future. To which the King return'd no other Answer but, Fair Cousin, since it pleases you, it pleases Us also. Soon after the Duke, with the miserable King in his Possession, and a great Part of his Army, march'd directly towards London, where he was receiv'd with infinite Acclamations, and the other with as many Reproaches. Before he enter'd the City, the Recorder, with many Knights and Esquires, met him, and desir'd in behalf of the Commons of London, that he would cut off the Head of King Richard, and of all that were taken with him: But the Duke would by no means harken to such a Piece of Villany, but told them, That such an Act would prove an everlasting Reproach to him and his Adherents; but he would carry him along with them to the Tower of London, and then leave him to the Judgment of the Parliament. And here it is observable that the King having surrender'd himself the twentieth of August, but seven and forty Days after the Duke's Arrival in England, the Duke might well assume the noted Motto of Julius Cæsar; for considering his Marches from Ravenspur in the North up to London, and from thence to Bristol, and so through all Wales to Chester, a Person can scarce travel over so much Ground in the Space that he conquer'd it. And so indulgent was Fortune to him, that all the King's Jewels and Treasure which were deposited in Holt Castle, amounting to seven hundred thousand Pounds, with all his Horses and Baggage now fell into his Hands.

A Parliament
call'd in King
Richard's
Name.

The King being secur'd in the Tower, the Duke of Lancaster lost no Time, for he had already at Chester caus'd Writs to be issu'd out in King Richard's Name for the summoning a Parliament to be held at Westminster on the last Day of September; and in the mean Time he consulted with his Friends how to compleat those Designs which beyond his Hopes had been favour'd by Providence. In this Matter the Duke of York was now become his chief Director; and after divers Debates he propos'd it as very expedient, That King Richard should both voluntarily Resign the Crown, and likewise be solemnly Depos'd by all the Estates of the Realm; for otherwise his Resignation would be imputed only to his Fear, and his Deprivation only to their Force, of which the one is always apt to move Pity, and the other to excite Envy: But if both concurr'd, and his Desires agreed with his own Deserts, as being willing to relinquish what he was adjudged worthy to forfeit, then it would appear that he neither was expell'd his Kingdom by meer Constraint, nor left it without a just Cause. This Advice was generally approv'd, and accordingly pursu'd; and a solemn Resignation was render'd to the King on Michaelmas-Day, which he first read with his own Mouth, and then sign'd it with his own Hand. The Form was very full and expressive, and in it was declar'd, That his Resignation was purely, voluntarily, simply and absolutely; and more than that, That he judg'd himself to have been insufficient and unfit for the Rule and Government of his Kingdoms, and by his notorious Demerits had deserv'd to be Depos'd. After this he declar'd his Desire that the Duke of Lancaster might succeed him in his Kingdoms, and in Token of his Will and Intention, he openly pull'd off his Signet Ring, and put it upon the Duke's Finger. The next Day at the meeting of the Parliament, the Arch-Bishop of York and the Bishop of Hereford publickly declar'd the King's Cession and Renunciation, with the Inscription of the King's Hand, and the Delivery of his Signet; all which was unanimously approv'd and admitted by the whole Body.

After which Articles are exhibited against him.

But all this was not thought sufficient; therefore to remove all Doubts and Scruples, thirty three Articles of his Crimes and Failings were drawn up and openly read in the Parliament; of all which, it was said that he had confess'd himself guilty. These Articles were very long and aggravating, and may be seen at length in Doctor Brady's and Mr. Tyrrell's Histories, where they take up above eight Pages in Folio. In the Beginning of them was plac'd his Abuse of the publick Treasure, and dishonourable Waste of the Crown Lands, by which he became intollerably grievous to his Subjects. The particular and unhappy Causes of the Dukes of Glocester and Lancaster, of the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury and the Earl of Arundel, fill'd up several Articles. In the rest he was charg'd with Dissimulation, Falshood, Loss of Honour in the World, Rapines, Extortions, Denial of Justice, Rasures and Embezzelling of Records, dishonourable Shifts, wicked Actions of State, Cruelty, Covetousness, Subordinations, Lasciviousness, Treason to the Rights of the Crown, Perjuries; and in short with all sorts of unkingly Vices, and with absolute Tyranny it self. And indeed there was nothing so improbable that could then be objected, but would have gone for current and undeniable with Affections so thoroughly prepar'd. These Articles being read, all the Estates of the Realm unanimously consented ex abundanti to proceed to the Deposition of King Richard, for the greater Security and Tranquility of the People: And accordingly they appointed certain Commissioners, the Bishop of St. Asaph, the Abbot of Glastonbury, the Earl of Glocester, the Lord Berkly, Sir Thomas Erpyngham, Sir Thomas Grey, and and William Thirnyng Justice, to pronounce a solemn Sentence of Deposition He is solemnly depos'd. against King Richard from all Royal Dignity, Majesty and Honour, in the Name of all the Estates of England. Which being done, they constituted certain Persons to be their Proctors or Agents to go to King Richard and resign the Homage and Fealty that before had been made to him, and give him Notice of what had been done touching his Deposition, and Renunciation.

Upon this, the Royal Throne being now reputed vacant, Henry Duke of Lancaster rising from his Seat, and standing so as he might be seen by the People, after he had cross'd himself and solemnly invocated the Name of Christ, in a Form of Words laid Claim to the vacant Crown of England, as being truly and lineally descended from King Henry the Third. Upon which Claim, and his showing King Richard's Signet, all the Estates unanimously consented that the said Duke Henry should reign over them; and both the Arch-Bishops of the Kingdom solemnly plac'd him in the Royal Throne, with the general Acclamations and Applauses of the People. Then to compleat the Solemnity, the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury made a short Sermon or Discourse upon the Words of Samuel, A Man should reign over the People; from whence he took an Occasion to describe the Happiness of that Kingdom which was govern'd by a Man, and the Infelicity of that govern'd by a Child, whether in Age or Discretion; and whereas they had dangerously felt the Evils of the latter under King Richard, so they hop'd abundantly to enjoy the Blessings of the former from King Henry. After which the new Monarch arose from his Throne, and with an affable Countenance and a gracious Smile declar'd, That none would think that he intended by Way of Conquest to disinherit any Man, certain evil Members only excepted. On the same Day he made a splendid Entertainment for the Nobility and Gentry, who were there in great Numbers. As for King Richard then in the Tower, when all Homage and Fealty was resign'd to him by William Thirnyng in the Name of the rest, he only answer'd, That he look'd not after such Things, but after all he hop'd That his Cousin would be his good Lord and Friend. Thus was King Richard depos'd upon Tuesday the Thirtieth Day of September, after a dishonourable and unfortunate Reign of twenty two Years, two Months and eight Days, being then in the Strength and Vigour of his Age, and not above thirty three Years old.

King Richard submits.

Here ended the Reign, tho' not the Life of King Richard the Second; a Prince who as to his Person was the most amiable and handsom that ever reign'd since the Conquest, agreeable to the Son of so beautiful a Father and Mother; and he might have prov'd an excellent Prince had his Education been answerable to his natural Disposition. For there appear'd in him many good Inclinations, which might have grown to perfect Virtues, if they had not been blasted by corrupt Flatterers in his Youth. These taught him Luxury, Viciousness and the Desire of Power, so that in a short Time, by his being still govern'd by them, he lost all the Esteem and Affection the Nation had once for him; and this occasion'd great Hardships, and very unjustifiable Usage from his Subjects to him, besides the Ruin of his most beloved Friends. He acted as one of a revengeful Spirit, and was guilty of many Breaches of Faith; for which he more than once receiv'd his Punishment from the Hands of those who had not the most Right to inflict it. As to his Temper, he was rather profuse than liberal in his Gifts and Expences, keeping greater State and Hospitality than any of his Predecessors; and tho' we find no publick Act of Charity done by him, yet his rebuilding of Westminster-Hall in that noble manner it now stands, sufficiently shews that he lov'd to appear great and magnificent in whatsoever he undertook: But his Grandeur was one great Step to his Ruin. His Reign in general, in several Respects resembled that of King Edward the Second, his Great-grand-father; for both adher'd to the Advices of Favourites, and both equally neglected the Councils of the ancient Nobility:

His Person and Character.

A Comparison between him Edward II.

bility: But with this Difference, that Edward was passionately fond of the Person of his Favourite, and would endanger his Crown to preserve him; whereas Richard so little regarded the Person of his, that he would not hazard his Throne in his Defence. Edward seem'd of a more easie and flexible Temper, being always govern'd by them he lov'd; but Richard of a more dissolute and wilful Inclination, ever loving those whom he could best rule; so that such only were his Favourites, as would be subservient to his Will. The former was ruin'd more by the Faults of others, and the latter more by those of his own; so that Edward's Case was more pitiable, and Richard's more blameable. Richard assum'd a more absolute Power than Edward, or indeed any of his Predecessors, and more than that obtain'd it; and his Fall did not only show a great and wonderful Revolution, but also most signally manifested that the most absolute Princes are ever most liable to be ruin'd, especially in those Kingdoms where there is, or rather ought to be any Concurrence in the Legislature.

I KING Richard II. being thus formally depriv'd and depos'd, was in his Life-Time succeeded by Henry Duke of Lancaster, from his Birth-Place in Lincolnshire surnam'd Bullingbrook, a Person of great Note and Renown, and now about thirty three Years of Age; every Way qualify'd for his high Office, only he wanted an unquestionable Title: For besides King Richard himself, who proceeded from Edward the Eldest Son of Edward III. the Earl of Marche was then living, who descended from Lionel his Third Son, while his own Descent was from his Fourth Son John. However being so well supported on all Sides, he immediately call'd a Parliament in his own Name, who met in six Days Time, and consisted of the same Members that King Richard had summon'd not long before. In this Parliament, which met on the sixth Day of October, King Henry being seated on his Royal Throne in Westminster-Hall before the full Assembly, and a numerous Concourse of others, Arundel Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, in a formal Oration first declar'd the Cause of their Summons, and that King Richard's former Summons was of no Force or Effect, by reason of the Acceptation of the Renunciation made by him, before King Henry had issu'd out his Writs for this Parliament.

shop's Speech.

Parliament. Then he proceeded to shew That this honourable Kingdom of England, and the most abounding with Riches, had been long govern'd by Children, and the Counsels of young Persons, so that it was reduc'd to a State of Desolation highly to be lamented, had not the Goodness of Almighty God sent a knowing and discreet Man for the Government of the Nation, who by the Assistance of Heav'n would be rul'd and advis'd by the Sages and Ancients of his Kingdom, for the mutual Succour and Comfort of himself and his whole People. Adding further, That Men ought especially to consider how this honourable Kingdom could so long subsist under such miserable Waste and Destruction, which if it had been under good and regular Government, and wise and sufficient Counsel, it would have been the most considerable in the World for Riches and other Advantages. Then having declar'd how ready the present King Henry was to be advis'd by the wisest of the Nation, he again insist'd upon the Excellencies of the English Empire, That no Kingdom in the World could support it self without the Assistance of others, so honourably, gloriously and compleatly as this: And then shew'd, That in the Government of every Kingdom three Things were especially required, Justice, Observation of Laws, and Liberty for all to live according to their Ranks and Degrees; and that it was the King's Will, by the Help of God, to make good these three Particulars. He further declar'd, That it was also his Majesty's special Will, That the Holy Church should enjoy all her Liberties and Franchises; that all the good Statutes enacted in the Time of his noble Progenitors should be firmly observ'd, and that all the Nobility, Commons, and all others, should enjoy all their Liberties and Franchises, according to the Grants made by his foresaid Progenitors. And that no Man ought to censure any Thing done this Parliament, for the King was resolv'd in his Faith and Conscience to do equal Justice to all Parties, according to the Will, Assistance and Grace of God afforded to him.

King Henry's Coronation.

After this, and the Dispatch of some formal Matters, the Parliament by Consent was prorogu'd 'till the Day after the King's Coronation, which was appointed on the thirteenth of October, on the same Day Twelve-Month that he had been banish'd by King Richard. His Coronation was extraordinary solemn and magnificent, and he was anointed with a peculiar Oyl which a Religious Man had given to Henry the first Duke of Lancaster, with a certain Prophecy, That all Kings anointed with That should be Champions of the Church. This Oyl coming into the Hands of King Richard, as he was looking among his Jewels, then going into Ireland, he was desirous to be anointed with it, but the Arch-Bishop prevented him by assuring him, That it was not lawful to be anointed more than once. Upon his Return into Wales, the Arch-Bishop got it into his own Possession, and reserv'd it to the Coronation of King Henry, who was the first King of the Realm that was anointed with it. Immediately after his Coronation this wise Prince us'd all Precautions to establish and perpetuate his Power and Authority; and particularly provided for the Indemnities of all such as join'd with him before King Richard was depos'd, and caus'd all the Acts made by the Parliament of the 21st of the late Reign to be revok'd and annull'd for ever. By which his Uncle the Duke of Glocester, the Earl of Arundel and several others were freed from the Infamy of that Corruption in Blood which follows executed Traitors. At the same Time the Statutes made in the eleventh Year of Richard the Second were reviv'd and confirm'd to be kept according to their full Intent and Purport, as being for the Good and common Profit of the kingdom. And whereas the Articles of those Times exhibited against Treasonable Practices, usually extended so far as to give the Prince too unlimited a Power over his Peers and People, this King therefore reduc'd the Case of Treasons to a more certain Head, utterly abolishing all such Cases as were establish'd in the late Reign. The Substance of the Statute upon that Occasion is, 'Whereas in a Parliament holden by the late King Richard

Several Estab-

diver

divers Penalties of Treason were ordain'd in such a Manner, that no Man could know how to behave himself, to act, or to speak, for fear of such Penalties; it is enacted by the King, Lords and Commons, That for the future no Treason shall be adjudg'd otherwise than it was ordain'd by the Statute in the Reign of his noble Grand-Father King Edward the Third of glorious Memory. By which the Net was broken, the perilous Estate of Subjects reliev'd, the People gratify'd, and the King secur'd in their Affections. But for a farther Security, in this Parliament, after he had made the Earl of Northumberland Constable of England, the Earl of Westmorland Lord Marshal, Sir John Serle Chancellor, John Newbury Treasurer, and Sir Richard Clifford Lord Privy-Seal, he created his eldest Son Henry, then about thirteen Years of Age, Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall and Earl of Chester, and shortly after Duke of Gascony; and the Crown by Parliament was entail'd upon him and the Heirs of his Body, to the Exclusion of all others that could claim any Right of Sovereignty in the Nation.

The Crown entail'd upon Henry's Heirs.

After some exemplary Punishments of some of the late King's evil Counsellors, in the latter End of this Parliament, the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury charg'd all present, upon their Allegiance, That what was then spoken or propounded should be kept secret from all Mankind; and then it was demanded, for the Security of the King, and all the Estates of the Nation, what should be done with the deposed King Richard. To which Question all the Lords Spiritual and Temporal unanimously answer'd to this Effect, That he ought to be put under safe and secure Guard, in a Place where there was no Concourse of People, and be kept by sure and sufficient Persons, after the most secret Manner, without any one who had been formerly Servant to him. Only Thomas Merks, Bishop of Carlisle, a Person of great Learning and Spirit, dissented from the common Opinion; and, according to Sir John Hayward, in a long and remarkable Speech bravely stood up for the Power and Authority of the Kings of England, and by several Arguments drawn from the Constitution of the Nation, from History and Scripture, evinc'd That neither King Richard could be legally depos'd by his Subjects, nor the Duke of Lancaster legally succeed him, tho' he had been depriv'd never so justly: And further display'd the innumerable Mischiefs that usually attended and followed such unjustifiable Proceedings. But his Arguments were then look'd upon as only the Opinion of a single Man, and he was so far from being encourag'd, that he was order'd to be arrested by the Marshal, and committed to Prison in the Abby of St. Albans; tho' afterwards without further Censure he was set at Liberty. During this Session of Parliament, the Arch-Bishop had convok'd a Synod in St. Paul's Church, to whom the King sent the Earls of Northumberland and Westmorland, who declar'd to the Clergy, That they were not sent to them to require any Money from them, but to acquaint them with his Majesty's Resolution to confirm all their Privileges and Immunities, and to join with them, as they should desire him, in the Punishment of all Hereticks and Oppugners of the establish'd Religion; for all which he only crav'd their Supplications to God for the Safety of him and his Posterity, and the Prosperity of the Kingdom; which all there present solemnly and religiously promis'd.

A Consultation about King Richard.

A Synod meets.

All these Provisions King Henry made at home for his Honour and Security; and being sensible that his Actions might be severely censur'd in Foreign Parts, he sent wise Ambassadors to Rome, France, Spain and Germany, to give Reasons for his extraordinary Proceedings. To Rome, he sent the Bishop of Hereford, Sir John Cheney, Knight, and John Cheney, Esquire; to France, the Bishop of Durham, the Lord Thomas Percy and William Heron; to Spain, the Bishop of St. Asaph and Sir William Par; and to Germany, the Bishop of Bangor and others: All whom were arm'd with full Instructions for the Justification of their new advanc'd Sovereign. In France they found the greatest Difficulty in giving Satisfaction, because the French King's Daughter by this King Henry vindicates himself to foreign Princes.

The French are dissatisfied

Revolution lost the Benefit of her Marriage with King Richard; therefore this News was taken very heinously, and a War was immediately threaten'd, or at least design'd, but King Charles relapsing into his old Disease of Frenzy, and King Richard dying not long after, all Thoughts of that kind expired. But the Inhabitants of Gascony were not so easily appeas'd, but stood vigorously for their Countryman King Richard; and those of Bordeaux openly declar'd That since the World began, there was never a more cruel, unreasonable and impious Fact; that the good Prince was betray'd by faithless Men, and all Law violated. Yet still the French were deceiv'd in their Hopes of converting these popular Heats to their Advantage; for partly by the Wisdom of the chief Magistrates, and partly by the Peoples comparing the Severity of the French Government with the Lenity of the English, they were kept firm. Much Labour and many fair Promises were us'd by Lewis Duke of Bourbon to draw the Gascoignes to revolt; but his Designs were soon defeated by the Arrival of Thomas Piercy Earl of Worcester with competent Numbers of Men, sent thither to withstand the French Practices, and restore the Peoples Affections.

A great Conspiracy against King Henry.

King Henry was scarce establish'd in his new gain'd Sovereignty, before a private Body of Enemies were forming his Destruction under the very Protection of his own Wings. The depos'd Richard was still alive, and tho' great Numbers in the Kingdom approv'd of his Downfall, yet many others did not; for some mov'd by Nearness of Blood and Friendship, some by Conscience and Honour, others transported with Envy and Disappointments, and not a few with the Remembrance of former Benefits, or the Hopes of future Advantages upon a Change, much desir'd to set Richard upon the English Throne again. The Manner of this Conspiracy is variously related by Authors; but it is commonly agreed that the chief Parties concern'd were such as had their Lives spar'd in the last Parliament, but had been stripp'd of a considerable Part of their Honours; as John Holland Earl of Huntington, Thomas Holland Earl of Kent, and Edward Earl of Rutland; the two first Half-Brothers to King Richard, and the last his Cousin-German, all three in the late Reign having been Dukes, of Exeter, Surry and Albermarl. Besides these were John Montague Earl of Salisbury, Thomas Lord Spencer, late Earl of Glocester, the Bishop of Carlisle, Sir Bernard Brokas, Sir John Shelley, and John Magdalen, a Chaplain to King Richard, and much resembling him in Person. But one of the principal Instigators in this Design was the Abbot of Westminster, an entire Friend to King Richard, and one who had taken a particular Prejudice against King Henry, because formerly when he was Earl of Darby he publicly deliver'd a dangerous Truth, That the King of England had too little, and the Clergy too much. The above-nam'd Persons and some others being assembled in a Private and convenient Place, the Earl of Huntington in a Speech declar'd That King Henry by violently invading, and fraudulently mounting the Throne of his sole Sovereign, was both a Tyrant and Usurper, and such a One as it was lawful for any Man, by any Means to destroy, without Respect to his good or evil Qualifications; since it was lawful for no Man under his Pretences to assume Sovereign Power. Therefore the Examples of the best Commonwealths did not only permit such an Action, but also honour'd the Actors with Statues and Titles, and rewarded them with the Wealth and Riches of the suppressed Tyrant. And because Policy was as necessary as Force, it was propos'd and approv'd that solemn Jufts and Tournaments should be held at Oxford in Christmass Holy-Days between the Earl of Huntington and twenty more on his Part, and the Earl of Salisbury and as many more on his, to which King Henry should be invited; and when he was intent upon the Spectacle, he should be suddenly surpriz'd by such a Number as at that Time might be assembled without Suspicion. Upon this they all took a solemn Oath of Secrecy; and an Indenture Sextipartite was likewise made between the Lords, wherein

wherein they mutually bound themselves to each other, to do their utmost for the Ruin of the present, and the Delivery of the former King. They likewise concluded what Forces should be rais'd, where and by whom they should be order'd and plac'd, as likewise to whose Trust the Execution of this Exploit should be committed.

In Pursuance of this Design, the Earl of Huntington acquainted King Henry with the design'd Tournament between him and the Earl of Salisbury, and begg'd of him to honour them with his Presence, and that he would be pleas'd to be their Judge in case any Difference should arise; to which he graciously promis'd to consent. In the mean Time every Conspirator provided himself with what Number of Men he could procure, under the Pretence of Magnificency; and at the Time appointed enter'd the City of Oxford, where the King and Court was expected the next Day. The Earl of Rutland was only wanting, who having sent his Men before, went to visit his Father the old Duke of York, who liv'd in a Country House upon that Road; where being at Dinner, the Duke accidentally espy'd a Label of the Indenture hanging out of his Son's Bosom; and justly supposing it something extraordinary, he forc'd it from him. Viewing the Contents, the six Seals, and his Son's Name, he was so incens'd, that rising immediately from the Table, he gave order for his Horse to be made ready; reproaching his Son for that having been false to King Richard, and now prov'd a Traitor to King Henry; That he was very sagacious in finding out Inventions to ruin his Father, who in the last Parliament had been bound with him Body for Body; therefore since he had so little Value for his Father's Head, he would have as little for his: Upon which he immediately took Horse for Windsor. The Earl finding that his Father was not to be withdrawn from his Resolution, that all was discover'd, and his Life in the greatest Danger, with the utmost Expedition rode to Windsor another Way; and being arriv'd before his Father, upon Pretence of an extraordinary Accident, he procur'd the Castle Gates to be lock'd up. Then taking the Keyes with him, he threw himself at the King's Feet, and crav'd his Mercy. The King in a great Surprize demanded his Offence; which when he fully heard, he promis'd him his Pardon, provided his whole Relation prov'd exactly true. Shortly after the Duke of York being admitted into the Castle, without further Ceremony, put the Conspirators Contract into the King's Hands; who finding by that all Rutland's Account to be true, deferr'd his Journey to Oxford, resolving at Windsor to expect the Conspirators new Resolutions. He also sent express Messengers to the Lord High-Constable the Earl of Northumberland, and to the Lord Marshal the Earl of Westmorland, and likewise to all his other Friends, that they might all hasten to the Court, with what Forces they could immediately raise.

The Discovery of it.

In the mean Time the Conspirators, being got to Oxford, soon concluded from the Absence of the Earl of Rutland, and the Non-appearance of the King, that all their Plot was discover'd. They had now no Hopes of Mercy, as having been formerly condemn'd and pardon'd, therefore in this desperate Juncture they endeavour'd to effect that by open Force which they could not do by Treachery; and for their own Safeties they cloath'd Magdalen with Royal Robes, who much resembling King Richard, easily deceiv'd the Multitude. To render the Thing plausible, they reported, that being assisted by his Keepers, he had escap'd out of Prison; by which means they soon gather'd together forty thousand Men, the least Part of whom came out of good Will, the most inconsiderable out of Hopes, and most unuseful out of Fear; consequently all of them variable and unconstant. However they resolv'd to seize upon the King at Windsor; but he hearing of their coming, had with some few Horse withdrawn himself to London, to which City they intended to pursue him, and take him unprovided, which probably was their best Course; but Fear put a Period to their Design, when Wisdom was more dangerous than rash Attempts.

The Conspirators raise an Army.

The King prepares against them.

The King upon his Arrival at London fortify'd himself, the City furnish'd him with Soldiers, and he provided himself a sufficient Guard; and hearing of the others Coming, he march'd out to meet them with twenty thousand Men, not diffident of his own small Numbers, nor terrify'd with his Enemies Multitudes. They, on the other side, apprehending the King's Valour and their Mens Instability, shunn'd the Encounter, and retir'd towards Reading, where King Richard's Queen lay; causing her to believe that her Husband was at Pontfract with a hundred thousand fighting Men, and that Henry Duke of Lancaster, with his Children and Friends, had shut himself up in the Tower, not daring to come out; and the better to colour this Report, they threw down King Henry's Arms, and took his Badges from such of the Queen's Servants as wore them, as if Richard had been still in his Throne. They made no further use of Magdalen's Pageant, but chang'd their Reports of Richard's Deliverance and Power as often as they chang'd their Stations; as it is usual for such as are just sinking, to lay hold of any false Rumour.

They are defeated.

The chief of them punish'd.

The Conspirators leaving Reading, march'd towards Cicester; where the Earls of Kent and Salisbury took up their Lodgings in a small Village, and the Earls of Huntington and Glocester theirs in another, leaving their Army in the Field. The Townsmen thereabouts, being inform'd that Affairs were quite otherwise than they had reported them, about Midnight surrounded the House where the two former were lodg'd, who withstood their Fury for many Hours. Huntington, who was advis'd of this Misfortune, could not possibly succour them, for all his Men out of a sudden Fear had fled; for a certain Priest, to divert the Assault, had set Fire to some Houses in the Village, which occasion'd these Men to fly, as fearing that King Henry was come in Person, and had fir'd the Village. The Townsmen on the contrary, being by this doubly inrag'd, resolv'd to extinguish the Flames with nothing but the Blood of their Opposers, and fought with greater Fury than ever. So that unfortunate Kent and Salisbury, abandon'd by their Friends, and taken by their Enemies, after many desperate Wounds, had their Heads stricken off, and sent to London: Twenty nine of their Company, Barons as well as Gentlemen, were taken Prisoners, and sent to Oxford, where King Henry resided, and there had publick Justice pass'd upon them. The Earl of Glocester thinking to escape, was taken Prisoner in Wales, and beheaded at Bristol; and Magdalen, flying into Scotland, was taken and sent to London, where he dy'd the Death of a common Traytor. The Earl of Huntington often endeavour'd to get into France, but was always driven back by contrary Winds; and wandering unknown, he was taken by chance, and brought to the late Duke of Glocester's House, where his Head was stricken off; the Divine Vengeance meeting him in the Territories of a Person of whose former Murder he had been too much guilty. The Abbot of Westminster, now finding the miserable Effects of his Counsel, fled from his Monastery; but being seiz'd by an Apoplexy, escap'd common Execution: The like happen'd to the Bishop of Carlisle, who suddenly dy'd of a violent Fever; tho' some say he was first condemn'd, and had his Punishment generously remitted by the King. Infinite was the Number of others that dy'd; the High-Ways were fill'd with the Heads and Quarters of miserable Wretches; among whom many Innocent Persons suffer'd, who under Pretence of Rebellion, or out of former Resentments, were put to Death. Insomuch that King Henry, tho' of a moderate and generous Disposition, was look'd upon in this Matter as too merciless and revengeful; for so much Blood, both of the Nobility and others, at one Time, and for one Offence, was never shed in any preceding Reign since the Conquest. And it is further observable, that the principal of those who now so dishonourably lost their own Lives, were nearly concern'd in that of the Duke of Glocester's.

The unfortunate King Richard was still a Stranger to all these Transactions, and was reserv'd for the last Scene of this dismal Tragedy. His approaching Death had now all the Appearances of Necessity, for which Reason he was remov'd from the Tower of London to a Castle in Kent, and from thence to Pontfract in Yorkshire, that the Cause of his Death might be unknown. That his Death was unnatural and unjust, is more than probable; but the Manner of it is very uncertain, and differently related. Some write that when he understood the Deaths and Deaths of his chief Friends, he became so disconsolate, that he pin'd away and starv'd himself; others, that for fifteen Days he was kept from Sustenance, and with the Addition of Cold starv'd to Death; and others say he had Feasts set before him, but deny'd to touch any Thing, as if design'd to imitate the Fable of Tantalus, and aggravate his Torments. The Account that Hollinshed gives from a Writer, who seems to have had great Knowledge of King Richard's Actions, appears more probable, tho' it is too uncertain to be absolutely rely'd on. He relates that some uneasie Words falling from King Henry, gave a Hint to one Sir Pierce Exton, to undertake the Death of King Richard; who with eight other Assassins hasten'd to Pontfract, as if he fear'd to be depriv'd of the Honour of the Action. Upon his Arrival, the Preface to the intended Cruelty was the Omission of the Ceremony of Tasting that was usually paid Richard at his Table; who upon demanding the Reason, was answer'd, That Sir Pierce Exton had brought such Orders from King Henry: At which Richard was so transported, as to strike the Taster, and to curse the King by the Name of Harry of Lancaster. Immediately after, Sir Pierce with his bloody Followers enter'd, and shut close the Door; which being perceiv'd by the unfortunate King, he guess'd at their fatal Intentions, and with a Resolution becoming his Heroick Father, snatch'd a Halbert from the foremost, and bravely slew four of the Assailants: And with no less Courage fought with the rest, 'till Exton got upon a Chair behind him, and with a Pole-Axe struck him down; where the poor miserable King ended all his Calamities, upon the fourteenth Day of February, near five Months after he had lost his Crown. This was the fatal End of King Richard II. which afterwards open'd a larger Fountain of Blood than ever was known in the Nation. His Body was embalm'd and cover'd with Lead all but the Face, and brought to St. Paul's Church, where out of Policy it was for three Days expos'd to publick View, and then obscurely interr'd at Langley in Hertfordshire, tho' afterwards it had a more publick Funeral in Westminster Abby. It is observable that in the three greatest Exigencies of this Prince's Life, he appear'd above himself; the first in the Rebellion of Wat Tyler, the second in the Relinquation of his Crown, and the last in the Loss of his Life: The first he perform'd with a skilful Ardour beyond his Age, the second with a steady Calmness above the ordinary Temper of Man, and the last with an Heroick Courage equal to the Bravest.

II. King Henry, tho' now more safe in his Throne than before, thought it convenient to divert the Eyes and Humours of the People from the Remembrance of the late Tragedy; and this he did by an Expedition into Scotland, occasion'd by the unreasonable Demands of the King of that Country, who would have no Peace, unless King Henry deliver'd up the Lord Dunbar Earl of Marche, contrary to his Royal Promise and Protection. The valiant Henry, chusing rather to make Scotland the Seat of the War, than to expect King Robert's Arrival in England, march'd with a well order'd Army into the Bowels of the Country, where he burnt Towns, Villages and Castles, sparing nothing but Religious Houses and Churches. Then advancing to the City of Edinburgh, he burnt a great Part of that and the Town of Leith, and belieg'd the strong Castle of Edinburgh, which was defended by Prince David the Governor, with the Earl of Douglas's, and many other brave Men. During the Siege, the Duke of Albany, Governor of the Realm, sent a Herald to King Henry, assuring him upon his Honour, That if he would tarry his Coming, within within six Days he would give him Battel, and raise the Siege, or else would lose his Life. The King of England was so pleas'd with the Message, that he generously rewarded the Herald with a Chain of Gold and other Gifts, promising him upon the Word of a King, Not to depart thence during the appointed Time of the Governor. But after many six Days, without any Appearance of the Governor, upon the Account of Colds and Rains, as well as Sickness and Want of Provisions, King Henry broke up the Siege, and left Scotland without any Battel or Skirmish offer'd. During his Stay in Scotland, he shew'd a more than ordinary Respect to the Religious Houses, and treated the People of such Places with great Courtesie and Humility, being gratefully mindful of the obliging and generous Entertainment the Duke of Lancaster his Father had found among the Monasteries, when he fled into Scotland for Refuge, in the Time of the Rebellion in England.

While the Affairs of England seem'd in a calm and peaceable Condition, Providence thrust a Thorn in King Henry's Side at a Time and Place he little expected; for the Welsh, who had paid Obedience to so many Kings of England, contrary to all Mens Expectations, broke out into open Acts of Hostility, under the Conduct of a certain Gentleman of that Nation nam'd Owen Glendour, Lord of Glendour in Merionethshire. This Man was descended from the youngest Son of Baron Bromfield, and his Inclinations were not common; while he was young he repair'd to London, with Intention to study the Law; but soon weary of that, he betook himself to the Service of King Richard, and was one of his Household Servants. Being as soon tir'd with that sort of Life as the former, he retir'd to some Possessions of his own in Wales; which bordering upon the Lands of Reynald Gray Lord Ruthin, after a violent Dispute, Burning of Villages and Houses, and Killing of Servants, he met with that Lord, and in a Fight took him Prisoner. Glendour daily encreasing in Power, the Welsh, who were displeas'd at King Richard's Deprivation, and inrag'd at his Death, soon took up Arms, and chose him for their Commander, who immediately committed Devastations in several Parts. Upon Intelligence of this, King Henry march'd with an Army into Wales, wasting, destroying, and taking such Revenge as Time and Opportunity would permit. In the mean Time Glendour, whom Pride and Indiscretion had arm'd for the further Ruin of his Country, retir'd into the unaccessable Fastnesses of Snowdon, where for this Campaign he secur'd himself from the Storm; and shortly after the King return'd with such Spoils as the Country afforded. The last Action of this Year was peaceable and pompous; for Manuel Emperor of Constantinople came in Person into England to beg Assistance against the growing Power of the Turks; and upon St. Thomas's Day he was met at Black-Heath by King Henry, magnificently feasted at London, richly presented, and treated according to the height of his Quality.

King Richard's Queen sent into France.

In a Parliament held the next Year, by reason of the increasing Numbers of those called Lollards, the Punishment enacted for them was Burning. And in the same Year, the Articles of Peace being first agreed between the two Nations the English and French, notwithstanding the latter deny'd a Match with the young Prince of Wales, the Lady Isabel who had been crown'd Queen of England, as Spouse of the late King, was now sent back into France after a royal and solemn manner; but being now but twelve Years of Age, and the Marriage not consummated, no Dowry was allow'd her in England. When she was restor'd to her Friends, the Lord Henry Percy, before the Ambassadors of both Nations, who met between Calais and Bouloign, openly declar'd, That the King of England his Master had sent her to be deliver'd to her Father, free from all Bonds of Marriage, or other Obligations; and that he would take it upon his Soul that she was sound and untouch'd, as she was when deliver'd to King Richard, and if any said to the contrary, he was ready to prove it by single Combat. But the Earl of St. Paul declaring, That he believ'd liev'd it to be true, the Lord Piercy took her by the Hand, and deliver'd her to the Earl; and then the Commissioners of France gave certain Letters of Release and Acquittance. She was afterwards marry'd to Charles Duke of Orleans. In the mean Time King Henry was much in Danger of his Life, even in his Bed-Chamber; for a desperate Engine was discover'd in his Bed, with three long and sharp Iron Pikes, all with their Points upwards; but the King very happily perceiv'd it before he laid himself down, and so escap'd the Mischief and Danger, tho' he could never discover the Actor.

King Henry in Danger.

All this Time Owen Glendour, swell'd with his Success against the Lord Rutben, became more and more insolent, and after some Time enter'd with his Forces into Herefordshire. In this County Edmund Mortimer Earl of Marche liv'd in a private Condition; so that by keeping at Distance from the Court, without Splendor, he might avoid those Dangers which in the present Conjunction threaten'd him, as next lawful Heir to King Richard. Glendour practising his accustom'd Cruelties, awaken'd the County, which under the Conduct of the Earl of Marche endeavour'd to bridle his Insults. So that in a short Time a sharp Battel was fought; in which Glendour had two Advantages, the Number of his Men, and his own Conduct; by which means he became Victor, Obedience and good Order having won him the Laurel. On the other Side the Herefordshire Men, fewer in Number, led on by Necessity, distracted and uncertain, kept the Field 'till Night, rather by an obstinate Resolution than any Reason or Order. At length they yielded, but fled not, there being none to pursue them; for Glendour satisfy'd with the Advantage, finding himself in an Enemy's Country, the Night dark, and many of his Men slain, forbore all Pursuit of his Foes. Two thousand Herefordshire Men were left dead in the Field, and the Earl himself was taken Prisoner, and without Respect to his Person, kept in the Bottom of a Tower; nor did King Henry, tho' much importun'd, endeavour for his Liberty, for he concluded his Imprisonment to be one of the most fortunate Events that could happen to him.

Glendour and the Welsh disturb Herefordshire.

The Earl of Marche taken Prisoner by them.

But still King Henry could enjoy no true Peace nor Satisfaction, for about this Time several Conspiracies were discover'd in Embryo, all which were supported by Calumnies and Forgery; for by the first Henry's Actions were traduc'd in Libels, and by the second Richard was reported to be still alive, to raise a new Head of Separation. Henry, thus wounded in his Honour, and endanger'd in his Person, resolv'd to spare none upon whom the Crime or Concomitment was found. The first that felt the Hand of his Justice was a Priest of Ware, with whom was found a List of Names which he collected, supposing them such as out of Gratitude and Conscience would hazard all for King Richard; which Vanity of his created great Trouble to many, 'till it appear'd that he wrong'd them, and that they were Persons utterly ignorant of the Man or the Matter; upon which he was drawn and hang'd. Walter Baldock Prior of Laund met with the like Fate, who confess'd he had conceal'd the Treason of others, tho' he had not acted himself. A Friar Minor also being taken, with some others of his Order, was ask'd What he would do if King Richard was alive and present; he confidently reply'd, He would fight for him to the last Minute of his Life against all Opposers; for which he was drawn and hang'd in his Friar's Weeds. Nor did this hard Fortune fall only upon the Clergy, for Sir Roger Clarendon, natural Son to the famous Black Prince, together with an Esquire and Servant of his, finish'd their Affections to King Richard by suffering a shameful Death. Not long after eight Friar Minorites were taken, convicted, hang'd and beheaded for the same Cause; and this occasion'd the King to be a severe Master towards their whole Order. It was vulgarly reported, that a little before this Discovery, the Devil appear'd in the Habit of a Minorite at Danbury Church, to the incredible Astonishment of the Parishioners; all which was succeeded by a prodigious Tempest of Thunder and Lightning, which had wonderful Effects upon the Fabrick of the Church.

But however the Branches were lopp'd off, the Roots of all these Practices lay deeper and out of Sight; for the Piercys, the Earls of Northumberland and Worcester, and Henry Hotspur, because they thought perhaps that they had done unjustly in setting up King Henry, began now to form those bloody Designs, which were afterwards prosecuted. But King Henry not yet knowing their Intentions, in September led an Army into Wales, to take Revenge upon his rebellious Subjects, where he was in danger of perishing by the sudden Storms and Rains, which were more terrible than ever had been remember'd; so that after he made some Devastations in the Country, he return'd. The common Fame was that Glendour by his infernal Arts had rais'd these hideous Tempests; which Opinion added no small Strength to the Welsh Faction.

A great Victory obtain'd against the Scots.

The King's Fortune was much happier in the North, where his Lieutenant had two noted Victories against the Scots, the one at Nisbet, and the other at Halidown-Hill, near a Village call'd Woller: And tho' the first was but small, yet the other deserves the Name of a compleat Victory. The Scots marching with ten thousand Men under the Conduct of the brave Earl of Douglass, had made great Ravages as far as Newcastle, but in their Return were courageously encounter'd by the Earl of Northumberland and his valiant Son Hotspur with the Earl of Dunbar, and entirely defeated. This Victory is in a great Measure attributed to the Gallantry and Valour of Hotspur's strong Archers; against whose piercing Arrows neither the Scottish Shields, nor their best Armour could protect them. Earl Douglass the General, after much Bravery, and sealing his Valour with five Wounds and the Loss of an Eye, was taken Prisoner, with Murdock Stuart Earl of Fife, George Earl of Angus, the Earls of Murrey and Orkney, the Lords Montgomery, Erskin and Grahme, and about fourscore Knights, besides Esquires and Gentlemen. The Lords Gourdon and Swynnton, with several other Men of Honour and Note fell upon the Place; and above five hundred in their Flight were drown'd in the River Tweed. This Victory was obtain'd upon Holy-Rood Day in the Time of Harvest. In the same Year Edmund of Langley, Duke of York, and fifth Son of King Edward III. departed this Life, and was bury'd at Langley with his Brothers; leaving an untainted Honour, and unblemish'd Reputation behind him. Not long after, in the following Year, King Henry marry'd a Second Wife, Jane of Navarre, Widow of John de Mountfort Duke of Bretaign, by whom she had both Sons and Daughters, but not any by the King. He met, and marry'd her at Winchester, and then crown'd her Queen at Westminster; but he was not trusted with the Custody of any of her three Sons, John, Richard and Arthur, who remain'd in France.

The Family of
displeas'd.

III. King Henry now daily increas'd in Power and Grandeur; yet in a short Time, he and the Nation were involv'd in greater Troubles and Calamities than had been felt before. For the great Earl of Northumberland, with his uneasie Brother the Earl of Worcester, and his gallant Son Hotspur, who had been formerly great Friends and Assistants to King Henry, now began to envy his Wealth and Felicity; but were particularly pleas'd at the King's demanding of them such Scottish Prisoners as had been taken at Nesbit and Halidown: For of all the Prisoners taken at those Places, only the Earl of Fife had been delivered to the King, tho' he had several Times with Threatnings requir'd the Remainder. The Piercys, accounting them as their own proper Prisoners, were highly offended, and by the Advice of the Earl of Worcester, whose Design was to imbroil the publick Affairs, they repair'd to the King at Windsor, purposely to sound him. Here they boldly requir'd of him, That either by Ransom or other Means he would set at Liberty their Cousin Edmund Mortimer Earl of Marche, whom Owen Glendour had kept in a loathsome Prison, only because he had been true and faithful to him. The King, after Consideration, made Answer, That the Earl of Marche was not made Prisoner ner for his Cause or Service, but willingly suffer'd himself to be taken, because he would not oppose the Attempts of Glendour and his Accomplices, therefore he would neither ransom nor relieve him. This Answer so kindled the fiery Spirit of Hotspur, that he cry'd out The Heir of the Realm was robb'd of his Right, and the Robber would not allow him part of his own for his Redemption; and in a Fury the Piercys departed the King's Presence, resolving to set up the Earl of Marche, whose Deliverance they not only procur'd, but also enter'd into a Confederacy with Owen Glendour. Here some Writers have made a strange Observation upon the Earl of Marche, that on the Night he was born, all the Horses in his Father's Stable were found up to the Belly in Blood: A dreadful Prodigy, which afterwards seem'd verify'd by more dreadful Events, when upon the Contest of Mortimer's Title, by which the House of York claim'd the Crown, the War-Horses might be said rather to swim than to stand in Blood. Here also Walsingham tells us of strange Apparitions that were seen this Year between Bedford and Biggleswade, where several Monsters of divers Colours in the Shapes of armed Men were often seen to issue out of the Woods, and to encounter each other after a terrible and unheard of Manner.

They confederate with Glendour against the King.

The first who appear'd in Arms was the valiant Hotspur, who under Pretence of the Scotch War, made head about Chester and the Marches of Wales. To him repair'd the Earl of Worcester, leaving the young Prince of Wales, and that Prince's Household, over both which the King had plac'd him. And now the Torch of War was lighted up, and began to blaze; for tho' the chief Mover the Earl of Northumberland had not join'd them, as he design'd, yet their Numbers increas'd exceedingly, with which they propos'd to enter Shrewsbury, and to make that Place the Seat of the War. Here they issu'd out Letters and Manifesto's declaring their Reasons for thus appearing in the Field, as First, 'That the publick Mony had not been employ'd in the real Defence of the Nation, but unduly wasted. Secondly, That by Reason of malicious Informations to the King, they could not with Safety approach him, to declare their Innocence, unless the Prelates and Peers of the Realm first interceded for 'em. Thirdly, They took up Arms only to secure their own Persons, and see the Kingdom better govern'd. These were their outward Pretensions, but their real Designs and Resolutions were not only to depose King Henry, and advance the Title of the Earl of Marche, but likewise to share the whole Kingdom between three Persons, the Earl of Marche, the Earl of Northumberland, and Owen Glendour. Concerning which Partition an Indenture Tripartite was sign'd and seal'd by them, by virtue of which all South-England was to remain to Mortimer, North-England beyond Trent to Piercy, and Wales beyond Severne to Glendour. Besides this, the Earl of Douglas their Prisoner, as a Person highly serviceable, by common Consent for his Share was allow'd to be free from Ransom, and to have the Town of Berwick assign'd him. Some Writers tell us that this was done out of a foolish Credulity given to a vain Prophecy of Merlin's, by which many thought That King Henry was the Mouldwarp curs'd by God's own Mouth, and that Mortimer, Piercy and Glendour, were the Dragon, the Lion and the Wolf, that should divide the Realm between them. Then to strengthen their Power, it was again reported, That King Richard was alive, and in the Castle of Chester.

Their Reasons alleg'd.

Their Design.

On the other Side King Henry, attack'd with such unexpected Dangers, defended his Cause by Letters, and threw all the Guilt upon his Accusers, declaring That he was extremely surpris'd, since the Earl of Northumberland and his Son had the greatest Part of the publick Mony deliver'd to them, for the Defence of the Borders against Scotland, why they should make that the Ground of their pretended Grievances. And to remove all Pretence of Fear from the Conspirators, he sent to the three Piercys a safe Conduct under his Royal Seal, by which they might come and return without Molestation; but, as our

The King's Vindication.

Author words it, unbridled Rashness despising the Royal Clemency, push'd them on to the Height of Rebellion. In the mean Time the King arm'd with the utmost Expedition against his Enemies, and being attended by the Earl of Dunbar and the young Prince of Wales, advanc'd with a considerable Force within Sight of Shrewsbury, when the furious Hotspur stood ready to attack the Town; who no sooner discover'd the Royal Standard, but he abandon'd that Enterprize to draw up his Army in Battalia, which consisted of fourteen thousand strong and hardy Men, eager to try their Fortunes against a well-temper'd and experienced Adversary. Peace had notwithstanding ensu'd, by the exceeding Tenderneſs of the King; but the malignant Earl of Worcester, by misrepresenting and falsifying the King's Proffers, did precipitate his Nephew into a sudden Engagement. Never was Battel fought on both Sides with more martial Rage and Bravery; in which the two mighty Champions, Hotspur and Douglafs, instead of spending their Strength upon the Multitude, resolv'd to encounter the King in Person, as in whose Death they knew ten thousand would fall. Accordingly they rush'd forwards with a Fury scarce to be equal'd; but the prudent Earl of Dunbar discovering their Design, drew the King from the Ground he had chosen, and probably sav'd his Life; for the Royal Standard was overthrown, the Earl of Stafford, Sir Water Blount, and ten new Knights were destroy'd by the Force of these sudden Thunder-bolts. Douglafs kill'd three several Persons in the King's Coat-Armour; so that many of his Soldiers believing they had lost their General, quitted the Field. But the King, whose Valour was equal to his Danger, by his undaunted Courage restor'd the Battel, and with his devouring Sword perform'd Wonders, killing no less than six and thirty with his own Hand. The noble Prince of Wales, then but fifteen Years of Age, and first enter'd into the School of War, now gave signal Instances of his present Courage, and no less happy Omens of his future Glory; and being so wounded in the Face that several Noblemen offer'd to carry him out of the Battel and Danger, he disdain'd to retire, and fought bravely to the last. After three Hours dreadful Conflict, the Fall of the great Hotspur put an End to this Tragick Scene, who riding in Defiance of Death and all Difficulties, was slain by an unknown Hand, drawing a Ruin after him suitable to his Spirit and Bravery: For there fell with him most of the Esquires and Gentlemen of Cheshire, in Number two Hundred, and above five thousand common Soldiers. The rest fled; but the King generously declining to make further Execution of his misguided Subjects, suffer'd them to thist for themselves without Pursuit. This Victory was gain'd with the Loss of sixteen hundred Men upon the twenty first Day of July, in Memory of which the King founded a College on the Place, and call'd it Battelfield. The valiant Douglafs, together with the Earl of Worcester, the Baron of Kinderton, and Sir Richard Vernon were taken Prisoners; the first, who once unhors'd the King, and no Subject to him, was for his Courage set at Liberty without Ransom; but the other three were all beheaded two Days after the Battel. The Body of Hotspur, tho' once permitted to be bury'd, was afterwards quarter'd, and sent to several Parts of the Kingdom; and this was the Fate of one of the bravest Warriors of the Age, who till this Time had ever been fortunate, victorious and triumphant.

Shortly after, the Earl of Northumberland, pretending to come with Forces to the King's Assistance, was diverted by the Earl of Westmorland, and Sir Robert Waterton, who had rais'd a considerable Power. Northumberland judging neither of them his Friends, suddenly turn'd about to his Castle of Warkworth; since nothing could secure him from the victorious Army of a martial King. On this he was sensible, manifestly feeling the irrecoverable Maims of his House in the Loss of his Brother and beloved Son, and therefore form'd his Methods accordingly. The King therefore, as prudent as fortunate, having settled Affairs in the Marches about Shrewsbury, advanc'd to the City of York, there to provide against future Exigencies. Here he commanded the Earl of Northumberland berland to repair thither in Person, which he accordingly obey'd on the Eleventh of August, arriving with a small Train in the Nature of a humble Petitioner. He could not in Reason hope for the usual familiar Favour of the King, nor did he obtain it, for it was judg'd sufficient to have his Life pardon'd, tho' his Estate and Liberty was abridg'd, the King only allowing him necessary Maintenance. Having settled the Northern Counties, the King resolv'd to return towards North Wales, to chastise the Presumptions of some of the Inhabitants; but wanting Mony at present, the Arch-Bishop and Clergy afterwards consented to supply him with a Tenth. Towards the Relief of these his Necessities, the valiant Exploits of William de Wilford an Esquire, who was then cruising upon the narrow Seas, brought some Assistance; for he took forty lawful Prizes, loaden with Iron, Oil, Soap and Rochelle Wines, to the Quantity of a thousand Tun, upon the Coasts of Bretaign, and in his Return set forty Sail on Fire. And to make the Bretaigns know that he was not only formidable at Sea, he landed at Penarch, burnt Towns and Houses for several Miles into the Country; and afterwards did the same to the Town of St. Matthew's, which he laid in Ashes, and wasted all the neighbouring Country. The French not to seem slow in the like Ravages, landed at the Isle of Wight, but were compell'd with Loss to retire to their Ships, with far less Success than the Bretaigns under the Command of the Lord of Castell had not long before, who landing at Plimouth, took and burnt that Place.

ford's Acts.

The King having humbled the great Earl of Northumberland, now thought it Policy to take him into Favour, and restore him to his Estate, but not without secret Respect to his own Security. This Restitution was made to the Earl in a Parliament held at London about the middle of January, where the King obtain'd an unusual Tax or Subsidy, of which no Record or Writing was suffer'd to remain, that it might not be drawn into Precedent. The King had soon Occasion to bestow some of this Mony; for a Troop of plain West-Country Men presented themselves to him, with three French Lords, and twenty Knights of Note, whom they had taken Prisoners at Dartmouth, for which they receiv'd a munificent Reward. By these the King understood, That the Lord of Castell of Bretaign, who had formerly burnt Plimouth, expecting to do the like at Dartmouth, landed with his Forces, where these and the like People fiercely engag'd him; and the Women, like Amazons, by hurling of Stones, and the like Artillery, did much facilitate their Husbands and Relations Victory. The Lord of Castell himself, and many others were slain; and more might have been sav'd, but the Ignorance of Language equally confounded the Cries of Indignation and Pity. The French also made a Descent upon the Isle of Wight, and the Duke of Orleans sent a particular Challenge to King Henry; but neither of them to any great Effect. All this Summer Owen Glendour, and the Welsh burnt and ravag'd the Marches, kill'd and took many Prisoners, and partly by Force and partly by Fraud, gain'd several Castles, demolishing some, and fortifying others. To add to these Troubles, the Flemmings and Bretaigns took certain English Merchant Ships, and either slew or hung up the Sailors.

In this Year dy'd the famous William of Wickham Bishop of Winchester, who left behind him many noble Monuments of his Zeal to Religion, and Love to the Church; particularly he founded New-College in Oxford, and another at Winchester. We are told by Trussell that this Prelate was intrusted with a strange and important Secret in relation to John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, Father to this King Henry; particularly that his Mother Philippa should in Confession upon her Death-Bed acknowledge to him, That John was a supposititious Child, and that he ought to use all Methods to prevent him or his Progeny from ascending the Throne of England: And that upon the Bishop's discovering this Secret to him, he ever after bore him a Mortal Hatred. This is a Matter of Fact of no great Authority, the Truth of which would be worth a Historian's Knowledge.

William of Wickham's
Death.

IV. King Henry's Reign was all this Time like a craggy Mountain, from ^{which} there is no Descent but by a thousand crooked Ways, full of rocky Stones and jetting Cliffs. The first Difficulties escap'd, others are met withal of more Danger and Anxiety; in such Paths he walk'd all the Time of his Reign, one Danger was a Step to another, and the Event always doubtful; for his Subjects former Desire being almost extinguish'd, his Friends failing, and his Enemies encreasing, he had no other Support in so painful a Descent but his own Vigilance and Conduct; Helps, which tho' they might cause him to keep on his Way, yet they were not sufficient to preserve him from great Weariness. King Richard had been several Times said to be alive after his Death; more particularly this Year, by means of the Letters of Serlo, who had been one of the Gentlemen of his Chamber. This Man, after his Master's Fall, withdrew himself into France, where being assur'd that Richard was still alive in Scotland, he went into that Country to know the Truth. After he had spoken with the Impostor, whom he knew to be such, he however embrac'd the Occasion, and out of Hatred to King Henry, he caus'd a Seal to be made like that of King Richard's, and wrote several Letters to his Friends in England, sign'd with the same; insomuch that he distracted the Minds of many, who really concluded Richard to be still alive. The old Countess of Oxford, Mother to the Duke of Ireland, did not only publish the Certainty of it, but likewise caus'd many Stags made of Gold and Silver, the former Badges of Richard, to be given to her Dependants, that they might wear them on their Cloaths, as soon as Richard enter'd England. But her indiscreet Management in this Affair, and her open sending her Secretary to the Inhabitants of Essex, was the Cause of the Discovery; for which she ended her Days in a close Prison, with the Confiscation of her Goods, and the Secretary suffer'd upon a Gallows. Serlo finding his Plots abortive, and being unable to return to France for want of Mony, came to Barwick, hoping that Sir William Clifford, a Friend of King Richard's, would have furnish'd him. But Sir William having incur'd the King's highest Displeasure, by detaining Barwick against his Will, found means to purchase his Pardon by delivering up Serlo to the King at Pontefract. Shortly after Serlo was executed at London, who likewise confess'd, that he was one of the Persons that murder'd the Duke of Glocester at Calais; and tho' he dy'd very penitent, yet he dy'd unpity'd by all who esteem'd the Memory of that popular Duke. Into this Smoak did all this Design vanish; as likewise did another not long after, which was promoted in a Parliament held at Coventry, call'd the Lack-Learning Parliament, either from the Ignorance of the Members, or their Hatred to Learned Men: In which, to supply the King's Wants, a Bill was exhibited against the Temporalities of the Clergy; but by the Courage of the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, who declar'd, That it was the enriching of themselves, not of the King, that they respected in their sacrilegious Attempts, and by the particular Care of the King, who vow'd To leave the Church in no worse State than he found it, the Motion ended in nothing but the infamous Memory of the Projectors.

A. D. 1405. Reg. 6. 7. The Coals of the former Northern Rebellion were not so fully extinguish'd, but by removing the Ashes that cover'd them, new Sparks began to appear; for Envy and some Accidents had so infected the Eyes of some of the Nobility, that they could not bear the Sight of King Henry's Grandeur. Among whom Thomas Mowbray, Earl-Marshal was principal, who drew Richard Scrope Arch-Bishop of York into a Conspiracy, as likewise the old Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Bardolf, the Citizens of York, with great Numbers of common People to assist in their Cause, which was gloss'd with the specious Pretence of redressing publick Abuses, arising from the King's Mismanagement. The Earl of Westmorland hearing of this Attempt, in which the Earl-Marshal and the Arch-Bishop were Leaders of a numerous Multitude, gather'd a considerable derable Force to encounter them; but perceiving himself too feeble, he betook himself to Fraud and Stratagem, and by pretending to approve of their Quarrel, found means to get them both into his Possession, and made a very acceptable Present of them to the King at York; where both the Arch-Bishop and Earl-Marshal were publickly beheaded, notwithstanding the Earl of Westmorland had before promis'd them their Lives. The Pope afterwards excommunicated all such as were concern'd in the Arch-Bishop's Death. These were dangerous Times for the King, who not satisfy'd with the Blood of these two great Men, vigorously pursu'd the Earl of Northumberland and the Lord Bardolf with an invincible Army of thirty seven thousand Men; but they unable to resist so mighty a Power, took Barwick for their Refuge. The King with his usual Expedition march'd to that Place, but before his Arrival, they in great Fear fled into Scotland, where they were entertain'd by the Lord Flemming. The Town of Barwick, in hopes of Succours from Scotland, stood out; upon which the King planted a Battering Piece against a Tower in the Wall, which as it soon threw down the Tower, so it destroy'd all the Defendants Courages, who immediately yielded upon hard and desperate Terms; for they were partly hang'd, and partly imprison'd. Barwick being thus recover'd, the King took Alnwick, and all other Castles belonging to the Earl; and expecting the like good Fortune in Wales, he cross'd over thither, where it prov'd otherwise, not by the Manhood of the Welsh, but by the sudden Floods of Waters, which destroy'd his Carriages, and above fifty Wains loaden with Treasure: Therefore he return'd to Worcester. Owen Glendour, the chief of the Welsh, fearing a Revenge for former Actions, had before confederated with the French, who in a hundred and forty Ships arriv'd at Milford Haven to his Assistance, but with the Loss of most of their Horses in the Passage, for want of Water. The Lord Barkley, and Henry de Par burnt fifteen of their Ships in the Harbour, and soon after they laid Siege to the Town of Carmarthen, which, upon Permission of marching out with Bag and Baggage, was surrender'd.

His Actions

The King being again in Want of Mony, after much Reluctancy and Delay, the Parliament furnish'd him, overcome more with Weariness and Importunity, than any good Inclination. Some of this Mony was employ'd in secret Practices with the Scots, that the Earl of Northumberland and the Lord Bardolf might be delivered into his Hands, in Exchange for some Prisoners of that Nation. Upon notice of which, they two fled into Wales; and the Scots missing their Purpose, slew the Lord Flemming for discovering their Intentions to their distressed Guests, as by the Laws of Honour and Hospitality he was oblig'd; which fill'd Scotland with new Civil Discords. To avoid the Dangers of which, and for the Improvement of his Education, Robert King of Scotland sent his Son and Heir by Sea into France, who being at Sea, with the Bishop of Orkney, some Mariners of Norfolk surpriz'd him, and presented him to King Henry, who detain'd him Prisoner in the Tower of London. But afterwards he gave him such a noble Education, as to all Princely Qualifications, that the Scots and the young Prince had reason to conclude, that King Henry's Care turn'd all to the Advantage of them and their King. In the mean Time the French prosecuting their Affairs in Wales, sent thither thirty eight Ships full of Soldiers, of which Number the English took eight, and not long after fifteen Sail loaden with Wax and Wine. This Fortune, tho' good, was far inferior to the great Service which Henry Pay, with certain Ships of the Cinque-Ports, and about fifteen others, perform'd against a numerous Fleet of a hundred and twenty Sail, loaden with Iron, Salt, Oil, and Rochelle Wines. About the same Time a Felon was executed for setting up Bills in several Parts of London, containing News of King Richard's being still alive. In the same Year a dreadful Pestilence destroy'd Multitudes of People throughout the Kingdom, especially in London, where within a short Space there dy'd no less than thirty thousand. But the most memorable Death was that of the old renowned Captain Sir Robert Knolls;

Knolls; a Man born of mean Parents, but by his Valour and Abilities rais'd to the Height of Glory under King Edward III. after which he became highly celebrated for many Works of Charity and Magnificence; among which the famous Stone Bridge at Rocheſter in Kent was one.

A. D. 1408. Reg. 10. In the mean Space, the Wars of Wales were manag'd by young Prince Henry, who took the Castle of Aberistwith; but Owen Glendour shortly after retook it by Policy, and put into it a Garrison of his own. Thus Glendour prosper'd for a short Time; but the unfortunate Earl of Northumberland and the Lord Bardolf, leaving Wales, and raising new Forces in the North to assert their Rights, were encounter'd by the Sheriff of Yorkshire, who after a sharp Conflict slew the Earl in the Field, and so wounded the Lord Bardolf that he dy'd shortly after. This Success did not hinder the King from pursuing his Journey that Way; but arriving at York, he there fined many, and put others to Death, answerable to the Nature of their Crimes. The Bishop of Bangor and Abbot of Ailes, who were taken Prisoners, met with different Fates according to the Diversity of their Habits; the Abbot being taken in Armour was hang'd, the Bishop being taken in his own Cloathes was pardon'd. The Heads of the two Peers were cut off, fix'd upon Spears, and erected on London Bridge: And this was the miserable End of Father, Son and Brother, and almost the Period of one of the most valiant and illustrious Families in the Kingdom; all which was owing to a meer Caprice of Honour, which engaged 'em in a Quarrel with a mighty Monarch, from whom they thought their extraordinary Merit ought to have met with no Repulse: A Presumption that has and will deceive many. For Princes will not acknowledge their Being from another, nor that their Subjects are their Benefactors; the very Thought of which is not easily pardon'd. Here all King Henry's adverse Fortune had a Period; and in this Calm he likewise quieted all Domestick Suspicions and Jealousies, having in the rest of his short Reign only some small foreign Armies, not so much to weary him, as to keep him in Breath and Exercise.

A. D. 1409. Reg. 10. V. The Peace of Christendom having been long violently disturb'd by a famous Schism, rais'd by the Ambition of two opposite Popes, of whom one was chosen at Rome, the other at Avignon, by contrary Factions of the Cardinals; a general Council was summon'd to be held at Pisa in Italy, to which Place King Henry sent his Ambassadors, and the Clergy elected Robert Alun Chancellor of Oxford and Bishop of Salisbury, to signify, That unless both Popes would decline the Pontificate, neither of them for the future should be acknowledg'd as Pope. The King in his Letter to Pope Gregory charg'd him with Perjury, and That this Papal Emulation had been the Cause of the Deaths of more than two hundred and thirty Thousand Christians slain in Wars. There assembled a great Number of Cardinals, Arch-Bishops, Bishops and other mitred Prelates, who elected a new Pope, Alexander V. a Man train'd up in Oxford; where he took his Degree in Theology; rejecting the other two, who had long and violently contended for the Place. In the mean Time, Owen Glendour, after infinite Mischiefs committed, ended his miserable Life, in the tenth Year of this Reign; who being abandon'd, and driven to all Extremities, finish'd his Days with Hunger and Famine; at whose Exit all the Welsh Broils were at an End. After this King Henry call'd a Parliament to find out Means for more Mony; to the Charge and Management of which he ordain'd Sir Henry Scrope, creating him Lord Treasurer, and Thomas Beaufort the King's Half-Brother Lord Chancellor. In this Parliament was reviv'd the former Sacrilegious Attempt of alienating the Temporals of the Clergy, in which it was altals more than were already founded. But the King upon mature Consideration, detesting their distemper'd Zeal, deny'd their Petitions, and in Person commanded them, upon Pain of his Indignation, not to presume to concern themselves with Affairs of that Nature. In this Year, the Duke of Burgundy's uncommon Provisions he had made to reduce the Town of Calais to the French Dominions, and stor'd up at St. Omers, were consum'd to Ashes by a casual Fire, which gave great Ease to the Calisians.

About these Times the great and dangerous Factions between the Dukes of Burgundy and Orleans in France broke out; and the Cause was for a Murder committed upon Lewis, Brother to the French King, and Father to the Duke of Orleans, as he came late from the Queen's Lodgings, who was then in Child-Bed. The Duke of Burgundy justify'd the Fact, alledging that Lewis had us'd means with the Pope to depose the present King, upon Pretence that he was unfit to govern as the last King Childerick, against whom Pope Zachary had pronounc'd Sentence. This prepar'd the Way for that terrible Scourge with which Heav'n thought fit to chastise the Pride and Sins of the Kingdom of France. Each Party endeavour'd to strengthen themselves by Foreign as well as Domestick Friends: The Duke of Burgundy had the King and Dauphine on his Side; and the other had the Kings of Navarre and Arragon, the Dukes of Berry and Bretaign, with many of the chief Nobility. The Duke of Burgundy, who with the King and Government kept in Paris, fearing the Power of his Adversaries, offer'd to the King of England a Daughter of France in Marriage with his Son, and many Advantages, if he would join in the Defence of the King, and send over competent Forces. To which King Henry is said to have answer'd, Our Advice is, that you should by no Means hazard a Battel with one who seems to prosecute a just Revenge for the Death of his Father, but by all reasonable Means endeavour to assuage the Fury of the exasperated young Man. If that be unsuccessful, stand upon your Guard, and retire to the best Place of Safety, with such Forces as may best serve for your Defence. After all this Precaution, if he will not be appeas'd, you may engage him with the safer Conscience, and in such a Case, we will not fail to assist you, according to your Request. For the present he sent over the Earls of Arundel and Kyme, and many Men at Arms, with a numerous Body of English Archers, who arriv'd safe at Paris, where they every Way answer'd the ancient Glory of their Nation.

The Duke of Orleans, and those of his Faction, on the other Side endeavour'd to draw the King of England from their Enemy, and thereupon sent over one Falconet with others, with solemn Letters of Credence, whom they made their irrevocable Procurator to treat with the most excellent King of England, &c. for the Restitution of the Dukedom of Gascony, and all its Appurtenances, which were the Inheritance of the most excellent Lord the King of England, &c. The Ambassadors having shew'd their Credentials, exhibited the Points of their Negotiation in these Articles, which shew how far the Spirit of Revenge will transport the Minds even of the Greatest. First, 'They offer their Bodies to be employ'd against all Men for the Service of the King of England, saving their Allegiance to their own Sovereign, as knowing the King of England would not otherwise desire them. Secondly, 'Their Sons, Daughters, Nephews and Neices to bestow in Marriage at the King of England's Pleasure. Thirdly, 'Their Castles, Towns, Treasure, and all their Goods to be at the Service of the said King. Fourthly, 'Their Friends, the Gentlemen of France, the Clergy, and rich Burgers; who were all on their Side, as by Proof should well appear. Finally, 'They offer to him the Dukedom of Gascony entire, and in as full a Manner as ever his Predecessors enjoy'd it; so as they themselves will hold and acknowledge to hold their Lands in those Parts directly of the said King, and deliver all they can into his Possession, and do their utmost to conquer the rest for him. All this that upon Condition on the other Side, First, 'That

‘ That he should help to settle the Quiet of the Realm, &c. These Offers being balanc’d with the Articles upon which the Duke of Burgundy had obtain’d Succours, outweigh’d them so far, that about the Middle of August, before all those that had been sent with the Earl of Arundel to the contrary Part were return’d into England, Forces were order’d for the Duke of Orleans, to the Wonder of all Men, who understood not the Secret; so that Thomas Duke of Clarence, Edward Duke of York, the Earl of Dorset, with many other great Men, and a competent Army, were sent over to assist the Duke of Orleans, while the Earl of Angouleme continu’d a Hostage in England for the Payment of a hundred ninety thousand Crowns, and Performance of Articles. The English landed in Normandy; but whether the Confederates mov’d with the Dangers to which their Nation would be precipitated, or for some other Causes, the Duke of Orleans, contrary to Agreement, declin’d coming at the appointed Time and Place; which gave Occasion to the English to burn, pillage and take much Riches in many Parts of the Country, to satistie themselves ’till the Duke of Orleans should see them paid. Yet at length the Dukes of Clarence and Orleans came to a Treaty; after which the English march’d into Gascony to take up their Winter-Quarters, and the Duke of Orleans return’d into his own Country. During these Transactions, the Lord of Heyle Marshal of France, with many other Lords, and an Army of eighty Thousand Men, laid Siege to a certain strong Place in Gascony; which the valiant Sir John Blount, with three hundred Men, not only defended, but also drove the Enemy from the Siege, took twelve of the chief Men Prisoners, and a hundred and twenty other Gentlemen.

The Education of Henry Prince of Wales.

He affronts a Judge.

King Henry liv’d not to see the Course and Fortune of these Wars; but began now to turn his Thoughts to Matters of a contrary Nature: For having reduc’d his Kingdom to a calm Condition, and having no more Occasion to be bloody or detested, his Actions were grown to that Degree of Temperance, as there remain’d nothing more to be desir’d in him. Justice was administer’d without Distinction, he shew’d himself affable, liberal and pious, so that his Subjects now as much lov’d him as they formerly fear’d him; and having set his Thoughts chiefly upon God, he resolv’d to spend the Remainder of his Life wholly in his Service. His greatest secular Concern was that for his eldest Son Henry, now about twenty four Years of Age, whose Behaviour and Carriage had rais’d both the Hopes and Fears of the whole Kingdom. This wondrous Prince had formerly been a Student in Queen’s College in Oxford, under the Tuition of his Uncle Henry Beaufort, Chancellor of that University; from whence he was remov’d to Court, and committed to the Government of the Earl of Worcester. But coming afterwards to his own Disposal, whether being by Nature courageous, and yet not well temper’d by Time and Experience; or whether incited by dangerous Companions, or embolden’d by his own Greatness, he ran into many Courses unworthy of a Prince, so that it was much doubted how he would prove when he came to the Throne. It is reported that he lay in wait for the Receivers of his Father’s Revenue, and in the Person of a Robber set upon them and rill’d them. Afterwards, when one of his Afforates was arraign’d for Felony before the Lord Chief Justice, he went boldly to the King’s Bench bar and offer’d to free the Prisoner by Force; but being withstood by the Judge, he stepp’d up to him, and struck him over the Face. At which the Judge without Hesitation told him, That this Affront was not to himself, but to the King his Father, in whose Place he sat; wherefore to make him sensible of his Crime, he immediately commanded him to Prison. It was surprizing to see how calm the Prince was in his own Cause, who had been so violent for his Companion; for he quietly obey'd the Judge's Sentence, and suffer'd himself to be led to Prison. This Passage was not a little pleasing to the King, to find he had a Judge of such Courage, and a Son of such Submission; but yet for these and other such Actions he remov'd him from being President of the Council, and plac'd in his Room his second Brother Thomas Duke of Clarence. This made the Prince so sensible of his Father's Displeasure, that he us'd all Means to recover his Opinion, and by Ways as strange as those by which he lost it: For attiring himself in a Habit peculiar and uncommon to the highest Degree, he came to the Court at Westminster; where the King in the Presence of three or four Privy-Counsellors demanded of him the Cause of his strange Dress and Appearance. He answer'd, That being not only his Subject, but his Son, and a Son so tenderly lov'd by him, he deserv'd a thousand Deaths, if he should act, or but imagine the least Offence against his Sacred Majesty; and therefore he had prepar'd himself to be made a Sacrifice: And therewithal reaching his Dagger to his Father, he added, That I desire to live no longer than I may be thought to be what I am, and ever shall be, your faithful and obedient Vassal. With this and the like Answer the King was so mov'd, that he fell upon his Son's Neck, and imbracing him with a Flood of Tears confess'd That his Ears had been too open to receive Reports of him, and solemnly promis'd, That nothing for the future should cause any Disaffection towards him.

He is reconcil'd
to his Father.

The King liv'd not long to enjoy the happy Fruits of this Reconciliation; for in Christmass he began to feel his last Sickness at Eltham; but recovering a little, he repair'd to London about Candlemass, there to hold a Parliament, the End of which he never saw. Here he took upon him the Crusado, and began to make Provision for his Journey to Jerusalem; but being at his Prayers before St. Edward's Shrine, he was suddenly taken with an Apoplexy, and thereupon remov'd to the Abbot of Westminster's House; where recovering his Senses, and finding himself in a strange Place, he demanded where he was? Being told that he was in the Abbot's House, in a Chamber call'd Jerusalem, he cry'd out, Lord have Mercy upon me, for this is the Jerusalem where a Soothsayer told me I must die. Here the vulgar Chronicles tell us a very peculiar Story;
That the King, while he lay dangerously sick, order'd his Crown to be set on a Pillow at his Bed's Head; and when suddenly his Pains seiz'd him so vehement-ly that all concluded him dead, the Prince coming in, took away the Crown.
The Father unexpectedly reviving soon miss'd his Crown; and calling for his Son, demanded What he meant to deprive him of that, to which he had yet no Right? The Prince boldly reply'd, Since I and all others believ'd you to be dead, I took it as my own Right, but now return it with Joy. To which the King with a deep Sigh made Answer, What Right I had to it God only knows.
Be it as it will, reply'd the Prince, you gain'd it by the Sword, and by the Sword I will maintain it. The King hearing his Resolution, enter'd into Discourse concerning some Discord he fear'd might arise between him and his Brother the Duke of Clarence: To which the Prince thus declar'd, If my Brothers will be true Subjects, I will honour them as Brothers; but if otherwise, I will do Justice upon them as soon as the Meanest in my Kingdom. The King rejoicing at this unexpected Answer, both prudently and piously charg'd him before God To administer the Law indifferently, to ease the Oppressed, to beware of Flatterers, not to defer Justice, nor yet to be sparing of Mercy; to punish the Oppressors of the People, by which he should obtain the Favour of God, and Love of his Subjects, who while they had Wealth would continue obedient, but if made Poor by Oppressions, would become rebellious. With these and the like Admonitions he expired upon the Twentieth Day of March, in the Forty Seventh Year of his Age, after an active, politick and victorious Reign of thirteen Years, five Months, and twenty one Days. His Body with all funeral Pomp was convey'd to Canterbury, and there solemnly interr'd, in the Presence of his Son, and many of the Nobility.

His Character. This was the End of Henry the Fourth, who had all the Qualifications of a great and mighty Prince, and one who by his Vigour and Management surmounted infinite Difficulties; all arising from the Want of a just Title to the Crown, which drove him to wade through Seas of Blood, and to bring vast Mischiefs upon the English Subjects. As to his Person, he was of a moderate Stature, well proportion'd and compacted, of a great Strength and Agility of Body, skilful in Arms, and of a quick Dispatch; equally shewing himself both earnest and advis'd in all his Actions. He was very ready in Imagination, forwards in Attempt, courageous in Execution, and generally fortunate in the Event. There was no great Place of Imployment or Charge which he would rather affect for Glory, than refuse for Peril or Pains; and in Service he usually prov'd himself not only a skilful Commander by giving Directions, but also an admirable Soldier in using his Weapon, sometimes venturing his Person further than Policy would allow. His Expences were liberal and honourable, yet not exceeding the Measure of his Receipts; he was very courteous and familiar towards all Men, by which he procur'd more Love among the Meaner than the Greater. In all the Changes of his State, he was almost one and the same Man; in Adversity never dejected, in Prosperity never secure; still retaining his Majesty in one, and his Mildness in the other: Nor did the Continuance of his Reign bring him to any proud Behaviour; but in his latter Years he appear'd so mild and gentle, that it almost wore out all Hatred born him for the Death of King Richard. He would not easily be drawn into any Cause, but was firm and constant in a good one; yet was more easie to be either corrupted or abus'd by flattering Speeches, than terrify'd by any Threats. His great Error was his mighty Thirst after human Glory, which made him too little examine the just and religious Means of attaining it; for which the Vengeance of Heav'n seems to have met his Posterity in the third Generation.

Sir Richard Whittington's Acts.

There were several Acts of Piety and Charity done in this Reign, besides those by the famous William of Wickam before-mention'd; in naming of which, we ought not to pass by the excellent Sir Richard Whittington Mayor of London, who erected a College in that City, with Lodgings and weekly Allowances for divers poor People. He erected that Gate of London call'd Newgate, which before was a loathsom Prison; and built more than half of St. Bartholomew's Hospital in Smithfield, and the beautiful Library in the Gray-Friars now call'd Christ's Hospital. He also built a great Part of the East End of Guild-Hall, and a Chappel adjoining to it, with a Library of Stone, for the Custody of the Records of the City; and in his last Will he shew'd the highest Marks of Compassion and Christianity. Among the noted Men in this Reign, we must not forget the two famous Poets Geoffry Chaucer and John Gower, the two great Reformers of our English Tongue; of whom the first dy'd in the fourth of this Reign, and was bury'd in Westminster Abby, and the other in the ninth, and was bury'd in St. Mary Overys in Southwark.

The Reign of King H E N R Y the Fifth.Containing 9 Years, 4 Months, and 11 Days.

I. HENRY the Fourth, surnam'd Bullingbrook, was immediately succeeded by his eldest Son Henry of Monmouth, in the twenty sixth Year of his Age, and Prime of his Youth. Tho' some of his former Actions had rais'd the Fears of many, yet now the high Esteem which the Nation had of his Person, produc'd such an intire Confidence in him, that both Lords and Commons upon the twenty fourth of March, offer'd to swear Allegiance to him before he was crown'd, or had taken the customary Oath to govern according to Law. He generously thank'd them for their good Affections, and exhorted them in their several Stations to use all their Power for the Good of the Publick; declaring That he began his Reign with the Pardon of all that had offended him, and with such a real Design of promoting his Peoples Happiness, that he would be crown'd on no other Condition than to employ his Authority for that End; praying to God, That if he foresaw he would not prove a just and good Governor, he would please to take him immediately out of the World, rather than seat him on the Throne for a publick Calamity to his Country. On the Ninth Day of April the Solemnities of his Coronation were perform'd by Thomas Arundel Arch-bishop of Canterbury; which proving a Day of extraordinary Storms, rais'd divers superstitious Observations. He nobly began his Reign with a Command of himself, and renounc'd with Disdain the Companions of his former Riots, who had flatter'd themselves with the Hopes of the highest Places of Honour and Preferment: He forbid them under severe Penalties to approach his Person, or within ten Miles of his Court; and all the Favour they receiv'd was only to be dismiss'd with some liberal Gifts from his Royal Bounty. He next proceeded to make an Alteration among the Judges, and other Officers of the Crown, removing those who were known or suspected to be guilty of corrupt Practices, and advancing others, whose Integrity and Abilities render'd them fit for the highest Employments. And that the People might have free and impartial Justice, after the Example of his Father, it was his Custom every Day, for an Hour or more after Dinner to lean on a Cushion and receive Petitions from his Subjects; where he patiently heard their Complaints, and redress'd them. He also by Proclamation endeavour'd to provide against Corruption of Manners, and Abuses in Government; in which he commanded the Clergy to be faithful in their sacred Charge, and by their Lives as well as Sermons to afford Lessons of Piety to the People: And likewise he enjoin'd the Laity to serve God and obey their Sovereign, forbidding upon his highest Displeasure all Acts of Adultery, wilful Perjuries, and prophane Swearing. And for a further Testimony of his generous and compassionate Disposition, he remov'd the Body of King Richard, too meanly interr'd at Langley, in great State to Westminster Abby, and there laid him enshrin'd by Queen Anne his first Wife, as he himself had desir'd and appointed, founding a weekly Memorial, and an annual Distribution of Money to the Poor. And so nearly did his Death affect this innocent King, that he sent to his Holiness at Rome to be absolv'd from the Guilt of his Father's Act; and willingly perform'd what Penance was enjoin'd him. After which, he in Person attended the Obsequies of his Father, which were celebrated with great Solemnity at the City of Canterbury.

Reg. 1.

Henry V. succeeds his Father.

He is crown'd King.

His noble Beginnings.

He removes King Richard's Body to Westminster Abby.

After the Detection of a Conspiracy made by one Whitlock and some others, ^{Walsingham} a Parliament met in May, in which, the Commons petitioning the King for ^{Pat.} the redressing of Grievances, or for the Establishment of good Orders, many wise Laws were enacted to make the Nation rich, flourishing and prosperous. And thus King Henry was easie and secure in the Beginning of his Reign, only two intervening Disasters diminish'd the publick Joy and Satisfaction; a great Plague which destroy'd Numbers of the People, and a violent Fire in Norwich, which laid in Ashes most of that large City. Yet among the Calamities of these Times we might reckon the Sufferings of Sir John Oldcastle Lord Cobham, since it was a strange Example of Injustice and Cruelty, that a Nobleman, endear'd to the King by his excellent Qualities, should by the Hatred of the Clergy be implacably pursu'd to Ruin. This Knight, call'd Lord Cobham, was in a publick Synod accus'd by the Clergy of Heresie, in maintaining severall of Wickliff's Opinions, and propagating them in the Dioceses of London, Rocheſter and Hereford; against whom also some select Inquisitors at Oxford presented his Name, with a great Number of Conclusions, which they had collected as Heretical. The King incens'd by the Arch-Bishop's Suggestions against the Reformers call'd Lollards, was further made to believe that they had set up Bills in divers Places, threatening, That a hundred thousand Persons were ready for Arms against all that oppos'd their Reformation, and among these the Lord Cobham his Knight was reputed the Chief. The King heard the Arch-Bishop's Complaint, and being at Kennington, promis'd to confer with the Lord Cobham himself, which accordingly he did, urging him to submit to the Censure of the Church, and be obedient to the Arch-Bishop. But Cobham humbly told his Majesty, That he ow'd his Subjection only to himself, whom God had plac'd as his sole Vice-gerent to govern his People of England: But as to the Pope of Rome, he ow'd him no Service, nor would he pay him any; since he was convinc'd in his Conscience, that he was the great Anti-Christ, the Son of Perdition, and the open Adversary of God. This Answer receiv'd, was so deliver'd to the Arch-Bishop, with Power to cite, examine and punish, as their own Canons in such Cases had decreed.

Proceedings against Sir John Oldcastle.

He is Excommunicated.

and condemn'd for Heresie.

The Arch-Bishop having so far obtain'd his Design, by the Advice of several ^{De.} issu'd out a Citation to him to appear at his Court at a certain Time, which was delivered to him by one John Butler, a Gentleman of the Privy Chamber, because the Summoner durst not do it himself; and the Arch-Bishop, that nothing might be wanting, caus'd his Citation to be set upon the Gates of the Cathedral Church of Rocheſter, which were immediately pull'd down, as others again likewise, to the great Displeasure of the Clergy, and the greater, because the Actors could not be known. The Lord Cobham, knowing his Enemies Malice and his own Danger, refus'd to appear; whereupon he was excommunicated for Contumacy, and further Proccesses were issu'd out against him. In the mean Time he wrote a Form of his Faith, and presented it himself to the King, who being prepossess'd, refus'd to receive it, but suffer'd him to be cited even in his own Presence; when Cobham for his Purgation offer'd a hundred Knights and Esquires, which would not be accepted; after which, according to his Degree and Law of Arms, he requir'd a single Combat with either Christian or Pagan as to the Truth of his Faith, the King and Council only excepted. This likewise was not permitted, so that he was oblig'd to appear before the Arch-Bishop and his Suffragans; where after divers Examinations, he answer'd with such Vivacity of Spirit and Courage, that the whole Convocation was amaz'd, and at a loss how to reply. Notwithstanding which he was solemnly condemn'd for a Heretick, and committed to the Tower of London; and in the same Synod the Arch-Bishop enacted that Heretical Decree, 'That the Holy Scriptures should not be translated into the English Tongue. And it is remarkable that not long after, the same Arch-Bishop was seiz'd with a strange Dislemper in his Tongue, which so excessively swell'd it, that it quite depriv'd

depriv'd him of his Speech, and shortly after put an end to his Life. As to Cobham himself, he soon made an Escape from the Tower into Wales, which gave an Occasion to his Enemies to raise new Jealousies; and they confidently assur'd the King that he and his Adherents had a Design upon his Life, and that in St. Giles's Fields near Holbourn twenty thousand were to meet in Order to destroy the Monasteries of Westminster, St. Albans, all the Religious Houses of London, and the Cathedral of St. Paul's. The King therefore in Person, after Midnight enter'd these Fields with a great Army, where, as their Enemies relate, he apprehended eighty of that Faction, who declar'd They came to seek the Lord Cobham. But their Friends alledge, That in those Days of Persecution, such Assemblies had been often made to hear the Gospel preach'd to them, which otherwise they could not enjoy: So that in this Place, then overgrown with Bushes, and unfit for Armies, those few were assembled to hear John Beverly, a pious Divine, without any Thoughts of Treason, having for their Commanders no greater Men than Sir Roger Aston, Beverly, and Morly, a Knight, a Minister, and a Maltman. But we leave these Apologies to others; only the Lord Cobham could not be found, tho' the King had promis'd a thousand Marks to any Man that should take him, and also great Privileges to any Town or City in England where he was discover'd: By which it may be guess'd, says Walsingham, that near the whole Kingdom then embrac'd his Opinions; thirty seven of that Assembly were condemn'd, of whom seven were consum'd with Fire; Adon, Beverly and Morly were likewise executed as Traitors.

He flies into Wales.

Upon Arch-Bishop Arundel's Death, Henry Chicheley, a great Champion against the Lollards, was by the King's Consent and the Monks of Canterbury elected their Arch-Bishop, which the politick Elect neither accepted nor refus'd, but left it to the Will and Pleasure of the Pope; who at first was displeas'd that they had proceeded so far without his Directions, yet was soon pacify'd by Chicheley's Submission, and some particular Gratifications. This Man, tho' not so conspicuous for his Birth as Arundel, yet was as strong for the Clergy, and more in favour with his King, as the Sequel prov'd. His first Essays or both were sufficiently shown in a Parliament held at Leicester, where the former Design against the Church-Lands was reviv'd, and a Bill exhibited accordingly; in which it was demonstrated, That the Temporalties upon which the Religious and other Spiritual Persons liv'd so luxuriously and wastefully, amounted to three hundred and twenty two thousand Marks yearly; and that besides the said Sum, these Religious Houses possess'd as many Temporalties as would maintain fifteen thousand Priests and Clerks, allowing to each Man seven Marks a Year. This Bill, says Hall, caus'd the fat Abbots to sweat, the proud Priors to frown, the poor Friars to curse, the foolish Nuns to weep, and all her Merchants to fear that Babel would sink: And here indeed the excessive Power began to diminish, when by the Authority of this Parliament, a hundred and ten Priories Alian were suppress'd, and all their Possessions given to the King and his Heirs for ever. Therefore to avert the impending Storm it was politickly concluded by Chicheley and others, That the most effectual Course was to find the young King some other Employment for the Vigour of his Courage, which might otherwise prove dangerous to them. Accordingly they judg'd it necessary to turn his Thoughts to War and Glory, and to solicit his Ambition, by reminding him of the Title he had to the Crown of France, descended to him by the mighty Edward the Third. Therefore in a formal premeditated Speech before the King in Parliament the politick Arch-Bishop with all his Rhetorick set forth his Majesty's unquestionable Title to the Realm of France from the most valiant of all his Predecessors Edward the Third, who bravely attempted to conquer by Arms, what he could not obtain by a just Treaty. That his Majesty had the same Title to demand that Crown, and the same Reasons to denounce War upon a Refusal. He added, That as he was sensible that the French would oppose their imaginary Salick Law against that Claim, so he knew that they would contradict themselves in assigning the Original of that Law; and if it were granted that such a Law was in Being, yet France was not concern'd in it. For it was in vain for them to pretend that it was made by Pharamond the Founder of their Monarchy, when no mention was made of it 'till above four hundred Years after his Death: And this was when Charles the Great returning from the Conquest of Saxony, part of his Army pass'd the Sala, and settled between that River and the Elle, and from the Name of the former were call'd Salick-Gauls: Which new Colony detesting the vicious Manners of the German Women, by a Law prohibited that Sex from inheriting Lands in their small Dominions. But what was this to the French Nation? How could they prove that by this Law their Crown could not descend to any Daughter of their Kings, unless they could prove their Country to be situated between those two German Rivers. And if all were true which they report of their boasted Law, how could they use it as an Argument against the Right of the English Kings, when they never made it any Bar in the Succession of their own. For it manifestly appear'd, That the Title of the great Pepin, the Claim of Hugh Capet, the Possession of Lewis the Saint, and of all the French Kings to that Day, were deriv'd from Female Heirs; so that the Name of the Salick-Law was but a shifting Illusion to debar the English Kings from their Claim to the French Crown. But granting that such a Law had always been observ'd, yet it was contrary to the Laws of God, and the Customs of all Nations; so that the French alone violated the Statutes of Heav'n, and slighted the Laws of Mankind, that they might devolve their Crown on whom they pleas'd. But if his Majesty would extend his righteous Arms into the Bowels of France, no true Englishman but was ready to devote his Life and Fortune to the glorious Service of so great a King. And in full Persuasion of the Justice and Success of the War, the Clergy, besides their extraordinary Prayers to Heav'n, had given such Sums of Money to maintain it, as had never been granted to any of his Predecessors.

The King and Nobility join with the Motion.

This Speech, which elevated the Thoughts of the whole Assembly, was strenuously debated and examin'd by the Earl of Westmorland, Governor of the Marches of Scotland, and the Duke of Exeter Uncle to King Henry. The former thought it most safe, first to check the Scots, as the nearest and most certain Enemies; but the latter judg'd it better Policy to begin with France, the Root and Support of the other, especially since it was now distracted by the grand Factions of Burgundy and Orleans. The Arguments of the latter soon prevail'd with the King and his Brothers, who being young, and fir'd with the Prospect of new Glories, became impatient to signalize their Courage against the old Enemies of their Country: And the same gallant Spirit being diffus'd through the Minds of the rest of the Nobility, they all declar'd for a War against France; which being thus resolv'd, the Parliament was prorog'd to Westminster. There the King's Generosity was shewn to Henry Percy, Son to the famous and valiant Hotspur, who was now restor'd to the Earldom of Northumberland, and to all the Lands and Dignities which his Grand-father and Father had forfeited to the Crown.

An Embassy sent to France.

The War against France being determin'd, an honourable Embassy was dispatch'd to that Kingdom, which first demanded the Crown of France to be resign'd to King Henry; but soon after descended only to require those Provinces which his Predecessors had possess'd in that Kingdom, together with the French King's Daughter, the Princess Catharine, to be marry'd to King Henry, with a Portion of two Millions of Crowns, two of which were to equal an English Noble. These Demands were thought too high and extravagant, and were rejected, and others offer'd by the French, but to no Effect. Whereupon a second Embassy was sent over in the Beginning of the following Year, which insisting upon the same Demands, was at last dishonourably treated. Particularly the Dauphine of France, as Cuxton assures us, in Derision sent King Henry

Henry a Tun of Tennis-Balls, intimating that his Youth and Practices had been more agreeable to those, than the rough Exercise of Arms. But the brave Hero, fir'd with the Resentment of this open Affront, declar'd, That he would return his Present in such dreadful Balls, as the Gates and Walls of Paris should not be strong enough to rebound.

The King's Answer to the Dauphine.

II. How dangerous it is for Princes to Jest upon each other soon appear'd in the great Preparations King Henry made to invade France; who finding that the French Court only amus'd him with little Artifices, vain Offers and Promises, resolv'd to vindicate his Cause by an open War. He had then about eight hundred thousand Crowns in his Treasury: He furnish'd out a strong Fleet, and besides his own Ships, he hir'd of the Holandars and Zealanders many Transport Vessels. He rais'd Troops, provided Engines of Battery of vast Bulk and Force, and appointed the Rendezvous of his Fleet and Army to be at Southampton upon the twenty fourth Day of June following. The People chearfully contributed the necessary Aids of Men and Mony, and the Nobility according to Custom brought their Proportion of Soldiers into the Field; and all Mens Mouths and Hearts were fill'd with the Discourse of Conquering France. The French dreading these Preparations, solicited the Scots to make inroads into England; but Sir Robert Umfrevil, a valiant Knight of the Garter, with only four hundred Men, ingag'd the Scots Army consisting of near two thousand, and defeated them: Then with three hundred and sixty Prisoners and great Spoil he return'd triumphantly to Rokesborough Castle, of which he was Governor.

Great Preparations against France.

The Scots defeated.

The French King finding his Designs ineffectual, resolv'd upon an Embassie into England to endeavour for an Accommodation. The chief of the Ambassadors was the Arch-Bishop of Bourges, who with the rest was solemnly introduced to King Henry at Winchester, who in great State was sitting in his Chamber in Robes of Cloth of Gold, and negligently leaning on a Cushion. His three Brothers, the Dukes of Clarence, Bedford and Glocester, his Uncle the Duke of York, with many other Noblemen, stood on his right Hand; and several Bishops on his Left. The Ambassadors paid their Respects to him on the knee, and made an Offer of several Territories in France, together with the French King's Daughter the Princess Katharine, and a Dowry of eight hundred thousand Crowns in Gold, if King Henry would immediately disband his Army, and conclude a Peace. These Proposals occasion'd several Conferences, but the King and his Friends insist'd upon higher Demands; which being refused, War was immediately denounc'd to prosecute the King's just Rights to the Crown of France. When the Ambassadors heard this, they forgot the Respect due to crown'd Heads, and in Contempt broke out into an indecent Laughing; and the Arch-Bishop of Bourges with the highest Indignation told the King, That he was so far from having a Right to the Crown of France, that he had none to that of England, which belong'd to King Richard's Heirs. Therefore what could move him to show that Contempt to the most Christian King, the most noble, excellent and potent of all Monarchs? Could he imagine that he offer'd his beautiful Daughter, with so large a Part of his Dominions, out of Fear of his Arms? No, he condescended to these Terms out of his great Love to Peace, and Pity of the Calamities which the People of both Nations must suffer in a lasting War. After this they demanded a safe Conduct out of his Dominions, and that he would send his Answer by Writing under his Hand and Seal. The just and moderate King bore all this Storm of Words with great Temper; and tho' a provoking Indignity was offer'd him, he would not violate the Laws of Nations by injuring the Persons of Ambassadors. He granted them all that they last demanded, and satisfy'd himself with letting them know That they might go when they pleas'd, and that he would soon follow them into France, not as into their Country, but his own rightful Inheritance.

An Embassie from France.

The Ambassadors reflect on King Henry.

His Answer to them.

ritance, which he would recover by the Assistance of Heav'n, and the Power of his Sword.

King Henry having dismiss'd the French Ambassadors, proceeded in his Journey to Southampton, where he design'd to embark his Army; but before his Arrival, by the Advice of his Council, he caus'd Copies to be drawn of the Treaties which had been made between his Father Henry IV. and the Court of France, concerning the Restitution of Gascony to the Crown of England; which Treaties were now by the French openly violated and neglected. These Copies being first seal'd by a publick Notary, were sent to a General Council then sitting at Constance, under the Emperor Sigismund and other Princes of Europe, that all Christendom might know what Injury was done to him by the faithless Dealings of the French, and that contrary to his Inclinations he was constrain'd to take up Arms in Vindication of his just Rights. Being arriv'd at Southampton, he sent Antelope his Pursivant at Arms with another Letter to the French King, written in Latin, with renew'd Protestations That it was not Avarice or Ambition that mov'd him to War, but a just Design to recover his Rights; therefore he once more requir'd him to restore those Provinces which had been so often demanded by his Ambassadors. That it was only the Fear of God, and Love of Peace, that made him so moderate in his Demands; for which Reason he was now ready to relinquish fifty thousand of the Crowns offer'd in Marriage with the Princess, if with her he would deliver up what his Predecessors had anciently possess'd in France. That his Desire was to enjoy a peaceful Life with that excellent Princess, in whom he should be happy, but he could not do any Thing to the Prejudice of his Rights and Honour.

His new Demands to the French King.

The French King's Answer. The French King in his Answer declar'd That the Demands of the King of England were unjust, and that it was strangely preposterous for one to make Love to a Princess when cover'd with the Blood of her Father's Subjects. But since he was resolv'd to be his Enemy, and in a Hostile Manner to enter his Dominions, he should find him prepar'd to make such Opposition as should easily repel him.

A great Conspiracy against King Henry.

King Henry being ready to embark on the last Day of July, a Discovery was made of a dangerous Conspiracy form'd against him in the Army, which might have put an inglorious End to all his Designs: For the French embracing this Opportunity of working upon the dissatisfy'd Spirits of some of the English Nobility, manag'd a private Intrigue with Richard Earl of Cambridge Brother to the Duke of York, Henry Scroop Lord Treasurer, and Sir Thomas Grey a Privy-Counsellor, animating them to conspire against the Crown and Life of their Prince. To carry on which Design, a vast Sum, no less than a Million of Gold, was remitted to them; which made the French Ambassadors so content, that when they return'd, they freely declar'd That the King of England would either alter his Purpose of invading France, or rather lose his Life in the Conspiracy. The Design of these Men was to raise an Army, and carrying Edmund Earl of Marche with them into Wales, to persuade him to assume the Government, as true Heir to the Crown, in Defiance of Henry of Lancaster as an Usurper. Yet still they were to make use of King Richard's Name, and Sir Thomas Grey was to procure One out of Scotland, who nearly resembled him, in order to induce young Piercy to join them with a competent Force.

This grand Design being discover'd by the Conspirators to the Earl of Marche, with the greatest Threats and strictest Obligations, the Earl foreseeing the dismal Consequences to the Nation, generously reveal'd it to the King himself, who was extremely startled at the Ingratitude of those Men he had so highly favour'd. Having soon secur'd their Persons, he in a publick Assembly of his Nobility and Officers, with the just Resentments due from injur'd Majesty, told them, That since they had conspir'd to murder him, the Head and Father of the People, it was not to be doubted, but that they also had marked out all those brave Men for Slaughter, to their Country's Ruin, and their own own perpetual Infamy: Therefore since they had been guilty of such an execrable Crime, they should without Mercy receive the just Demerits of their Villany.

Whereupon the Criminals were led out to Execution, which was perform'd in the Sight of the whole Army. The Earl of Cambridge had writ a submissive and pathetic Letter to the King to obtain his Pardon, but could gain no greater Favour than to be beheaded with Sir Thomas Grey, while the Lord Scroop was put to the most infamous Punishment of Hanging, Drawing and Quartering. After the Execution the King again express'd his Resentments before his Nobility and Officers, and further declar'd, That if they would be faithful to him in this just War, he would not only be a Partner with them in all Hazards, but also foremost in the Danger. All were mov'd with his generous Declaration, and express'd their Loyalty in joyful Acclamations and Vows for his Safety and Success, protesting, That while they were able to draw a Sword, they would defend him against the secret Plots, or open Force of his Enemies. The King rejoic'd to hear the Expressions of such a general Affection, and hop'd that all Discontents were extinguish'd in the Blood of the executed Traitors: But as the Scenes of Futurity are beyond the Prospect of all Human Wisdom, he did not see that this Conspiracy was but a Spark of that Flame which afterwards broke forth to consume his House and Family.

The Conspirators all suffer.

The King being attended by his two Brothers the Dukes of Clarence and Glocester, his Uncles the Duke of York and Earl of Dorset, with the Earls of Kent, Cornwall and Huntington, and a great Body of Nobility and Gentry, set Sail upon Wednesday the seventh of August, with a Fleet of fifteen hundred Vessels, and an Army consisting of six thousand Men at Arms, and twenty four thousand Archers, besides Gunners, Engineers, Artificers and Pioneers. On the fifteenth of the same Month the King arriv'd at the Mouth of the River Seyne in France within three Miles of Harfleur, where he landed his Men; and falling devoutly upon his Knees, desir'd God's Assistance to recover his Right, making Proclamation upon Pain of Death, that Churches should be spar'd from all Violence, that Church-Men, Women and Children should not be hurt, abus'd or injur'd. Then conferring the Honour of Knighthood upon many of his Followers, he assign'd his Standards to Men of greatest Strength and Courage; which done he ascended the Hill near adjoining, and from thence took a View of the Town of Harfleur, resolving to make that the first Essay of his Fortunes in France. The Town being strong and commodiously seated between two Hills, the King took Possession of that next the Sea, at the Foot of which he caus'd a deep Ditch to be made, and fill'd it with Water; and raising the Rampier to a great Thickness, he erected many Sconces of Earth upon it like little Castles, set thick together, between which were narrow Spaces for the Soldiers to sally out as Occasion requir'd. The Intrenchment thus finish'd from the Rock to the Sea, and the Horses, Ammunition and Provisions all brought on Shore, the King with the greatest Part of his Army march'd up the Hill; his Brother Clarence was sent with some Regiments to lodge upon the other Hill, which by reason of the Nature of the Ground and Way prov'd to be a nine Miles March. This being gain'd, the King commanded his Ships to cast Anchor as near the Town as with Safety they could, by which the Place became besieg'd both by Sea and Land; then he mounted his Artillery, began his Mines, brought his Works close to the Ditch, prepar'd Fascines to fill it, and soon won the Lower Town.

The King and his Army set sail for France.

He lands in Normandy.

He besieges the strong Town of Harfleur.

Within the Town Monsieur Gracourt was Governor, who accompany'd with some Noblemen, and a hundred Knights and Esquires, and a considerable Force, sallied out of the Castle upon that Quarter where the Earls of Huntington and Cornwall lay, by whom, with Loss on either Side, they were repuls'd, the Gates fir'd, some Breaches made, and Fire-Works shot into the Streets, to the great Annoyance of the Besieged. But nothing discourag'd them more than the

M m m

Mines

Mines made under the Walls; against which, tho' they often counter-min'd, and bravely fought Hand to Hand with the Besiegers, yet they soon found that it would be of little Advantage to them, the Walls being likely to fall, and such Breaches made in them, that they perceiv'd King Henry was resolv'd to carry the Town by Storm. Whereupon Gracourt the Governor, foreseeing the imminent Danger, desir'd a Parley, and promis'd to surrender the Town, if not reliev'd by a certain fix'd Day. While the King lay before the Town, he sent a Letter of Defiance to the Dauphine of France, in which he challeng'd him to a single Combat, that the Lives of so many Men might be spar'd, and their Contest honourably decided by themselves; on Condition that if the Dauphine fell in the Encounter, the Crown of France and its Dependencies should be deliver'd to King Henry after the present French King's Death. In the mean Time the Besieg'd being reduc'd to great Necessities, solicited their King for Relief, which was often promis'd, but to so little Effect, that at length upon the twenty second Day of September, Gracourt the Governor resolv'd to submit; and accordingly with twenty four select Captains and Burgers he came out of the Town to King Henry, who then sat in his Pavilion under a Cloath of State, his brave Nobles about him, and the Earl of Kime upon his right Hand, bearing his Casket with an Imperial Crown upon it, beset with Jewels of inestimable Price. The Governor and the rest prostrating themselves at the King's Feet, deliver'd to him the Keys of the Town, according to the Covenants made between them, which was a Cessation of Arms for five Days, and then if no Relief came, to surrender the Town to him, and to deliver into his Hand thirty of their chief Men to stand for Life or Death at his own Pleasure; the rest were to depart without Armour, Weapons, or any of their Goods: And thus was this important Town surrender'd, after five Weeks Siege.

After five Weeks Siege the Town surrenders.

On the following Day one of the King's Brothers made his Entrance in great Pomp, and tender'd to the Inhabitants an Oath of Fidelity to King Henry, and sent such as refus'd into England. He gave Liberty to all the Ecclesiastics, and to the Ladies to go out in their best Habits, strictly forbidding all immodest and licentious Behaviour to them; after which they were by the English furnish'd with Bread and Wine for their Journey to Roan. The Garrison and Officers were made Prisoners of War, and the Town was abandon'd to be plunder'd by the Soldiers, who enrich'd themselves with the Spoils of a Place grown opulent by Piracy; but in exact Observance of the King's Command, they forbore offering the least Violence to the Chastity of Women. King Henry's Entrance into the Town was not with Triumphal Ornaments like Cæsar's into Rome, but in the most humble Manner walking barefoot through the Streets to the Church of St. Martin, where he solemnly gave Thanks to the Giver of all Victory for the Prosperity of his Arms. The Officers and Gentlemen, and all of any Quality, were receiv'd by him with great Civility, and entertain'd suitably to their Rank. Designing to fortifie and garrison the Place, he clear'd it of Women and Children, of aged poor and diseas'd People, whom he suffer'd not only to carry with them what they could, but gave to every one five Sols for a present Substinance. He took care likewise to people the Place with new Inhabitants in room of those remov'd, and to that end issu'd out a Proclamation throughout England, that all Persons who would come over and settle in Harsleur, should have Houses secur'd to them and their Heirs: Upon which Invitation great Numbers of English Men transplanted themselves and Families thither. At last he constituted his Uncle Beaufort Earl of Dorset Governor of the Town, with whom he join'd Sir John Falstolf; and having repair'd the Fortifications, he plac'd a Garrison in it of about two thousand select Men. And now the Season being far advanc'd, and the Army extremely diminish'd by Slaughter and Distempers, it was resolv'd to send the Remainder into Winter-Quarters at Calais and the neighbouring Villages. But for the Glory of the English Name, and that there might be no Appearance to reproach a victorious King, it was likewise resolv'd not to go by Sea, but to march directly thro' the Enemy's Country.

The French Court, notwithstanding it swarm'd with Factions, while under a weak and distemper'd King, the great Men sought to make themselves greater, and the common Enemy endangering all, King Charles, the Dauphine, his Brother of Ponthieu, the King of Sicily, the Dukes of Berry and Bretaign, with the whole Power of France assembled at Roan, and in Council concluded that the English should be engag'd before they got to Calais, and resolv'd immediately to incommode King Henry as much as possible. This was attempted soon after his Removal from Harfleur; for besides their continual Skirmishes upon his marching Army, they broke down the Bridges, cut down Trees, stopp'd the High-ways, stuck sharp Stakes in the Fords and other Places, laid Ambuscades, and convey'd all Victuals and Subsistence out of the Countries through which the English should pass. By which Methods they reasonably concluded, that as a Deer caught in a Toil, King Henry and his whole Army would be ensnar'd, who now was arriv'd at Virron, with a Design to pass the River Somme at Blanchetaque: But that being so well fortify'd against him, he chang'd his Purpose, march'd by Wormes, and incamp'd at Bailletw, intending to have pass'd the River at Port de Remy; but that being also secur'd, he pass'd along the River Hargest, while the French Army march'd upon the other Bank, under the Conduct of Charles de Albert Constable of France. King Henry still endeavouring to pass the River Somme, resolv'd to try it even at the Mouth, and passing by Amiens, Bowes and Corbie, he incamp'd in a Valley adjoining, where he commanded his Archers to provide Stakes sharpen'd at both Ends, which afterwards prov'd of singular Use to him. Then hearing by his Spies that the River was fordable at Bethencourt, by the negligent Guard of them of St. Quintins, he pass'd the Water, but not without the help of Bridges. The Soldiers both weary and faint, many of them sick, and their Provisions consum'd twelve Days before, with invincible Patience now fed upon Nuts, Roots and Berries, and any thing that the Woods afforded them. They spent the Days in great Toil and long Marches, the Nights were cold and wet, and no good Lodgings to be found, and the French were always hovering about them, without Intermision. According to the French Writers, these Circumstances mov'd King Henry to offer the Restitution of Harfleur, and other Advantages, provided he might be allow'd a free Passage to Calais. But however he gain'd great Relief by the Justice and Piety he us'd in those Parts: for tho' he was in the midst of Enemies, and his Soldiers pinch'd with greatest Wants, he commanded upon Pain of Death that none of his Army should rob any Church; in which when one of his Men had offended, he first caus'd Restitution to be made, and then punish'd the Offender with Death. The Fame of this Act induc'd the common People, contrary to the strict Commands of the French King, frequently to supply the fainting English with their own Provisions. In this manner King Henry march'd through infinite Difficulties in several Places, till about the End of October he arriv'd in View of the French Army near Agincourt in the County of St. Paul; upon Notice of which, he commanded all his Horsemen to alight, and the whole Army kneeling down, with Eyes and Hands lifted up to Heaven, implor'd the Divine Assistance to make them victorious.

The French Army now lying between King Henry and the Town of Calais, the General D'Albert, in Conjunction with the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon sent three Heralds to the King of England with a Challenge to give him Battle, leaving it to him to assign the Time and Place. The King honourably entertained the Heralds, and sent them back with rich Marks of his Liberality; but he employ'd two of his own to signify to the French Generals, That they well knew that of late he had continu'd a constant March, and they might have fought him when they pleas'd; therefore if they desir'd a general Battle, there was no need of appointing Time and Place, since they should always find find him in the open Field: That his great Care was not to do any Thing unworthy of himself, and as he would not be the first Aggressor, so when once attack'd he would not decline fighting: That he was resolv'd to continue his March to Calais, and whoever sought to stop him should find Danger in the Attempt; therefore he advis'd them not to oppose his Passage, that those Fields might not be stain'd with Christian Blood. On the twentieth Day of October, the French Generals sent again to King Henry, to signify That they would give him Battel on the Saturday following. He gave the Herald two hundred Crowns, and a rich Robe; and now being sure of Battel, he rode every Day in Armour, and us'd all the most ingaging Methods to rouse the Courages of his brave Soldiers, who were all resolv'd to stand their Ground, notwithstanding the vast Disproportion of the Armies. And David Gam, who attended the King with a Party of valiant Welshmen, having been sent to review the Strength of the Enemy, made this gallant Report to his Royal Master, May it please you, my Liege, there are enow to be kill'd, enow to be taken Prisoners, and enow to run away. Indeed the odds as to Numbers were exceeding great; for the English Army consisted of no more than nine or ten thousand Men, whereas the French, according to their own Writers, amounted to a hundred and forty, and as some say a hundred and fifty thousand Men; and also with this remarkable Difference, that the French were fresh and vigorous, and well supply'd with Provision, and the English weary'd with long Marches, and half starv'd for want of Necessaries. These mighty Advantages made the French so presuming and confident of Victory, that they thought of nothing less than the Ruin of the whole English Army, and so to repair the Dishonour their Nation had suffer'd at Cressy and Poitiers. They now resolv'd, since they had inclos'd them, that none should escape the Sword, but the King and his chief Commanders, who should be reserved for the Ornaments of a Triumph. They divided the imaginary Spoil among themselves, dispos'd of the Prisoners, and propos'd to lead the Captive King into Paris; commanding all the neighbouring Cities and Towns to make publick Rejoicings as for a certain Victory, and in Scorn they sent one to King Henry with this insolent Demand, What he would give for his Ransom? His Answer was, That he hop'd within a few Hours to reduce the French to such a Condition, that they should have the sole Care of providing Ransoms. As the French were stuff'd with the Assurance of Victory, it was no wonder that they scornfully rejected the Herald whom the prudent King Henry had sent with Offers to restore Harcourt, and to compensate all the Damages of the War, with other Concessions, if they would open to him a free and undisturb'd Passage to England. Yet still some of the wisest of the French Commanders were again coming to a Battel, and particularly the old Duke of Berry, who had himself been an Eye Witness of the English Valour at the famous Battel of Poitiers.

King Henry finding his fair Offers refus'd, with invincible Bravery resolv'd to commit his Cause to God, and the Valour of his Soldiers; and having that Night before the Battel call'd a Council of his Officers, he declar'd, That since the implacable Enemy would be satisfy'd with nothing but their Blood, there were now no Hopes of Safety but in the Protection of Heaven, and their own Courages: That if they could rely upon those two, they had no Reason to fear an Army so far exceeding them in Strength and Number: Therefore confessing their Sins, and making Peace with the Almighty, they should prepare for the glorious Battel, not doubting but he would be their Deliverer. The important Night was cheerfully spent by the French in Feasting, Triumphing, and all the Follies of merrill Comedians; but by the English in Watching, and fast Resolves, and a manly Remembrance to their present Circumstances; and their Spirits all the Time enliven'd by the cheerful Sounds of warlike Instruments. The important Morn. approaching, the French took the Field, pushing forwards who should come too late to a most cruel and certain Victory, having their greatest Strength in Horses. Against the powerful Force of which King

Henry with great Art plac'd his Archers on each side his main Body nicely defended by sharp Piles or Stakes, six or seven Foot long, and removeable at Pleasure. But particularly he order'd two hundred Bow-Men of extraordinary Strength and Agility to lodge themselves in a low Meadow, where a deep Ditch full of Water might secure them from the Horse, and the Bushes cover them from Sight. The Flanks of the Army were guarded by Woods on both sides, in one of which the King ambush'd a strong Body of Horse, with Orders to attack the Enemy in the Rear when the Battel was join'd, which they successfully perform'd. The Van was commanded by the Duke of York, which Station, as a Place of most Danger and Honour, he had desir'd; and with him were join'd the Lords Beaumont, Willoughby and Stanhope. In the main Battell in compleat shining Armour rode the King himself, his Shield quarter'd with the Royal Arms of England and France; on his Helmet for a Crest he had a bright Crown of Gold, fram'd after the Imperial Fashion; his Horse, of a fierce Courage, had his Furniture and Caparisons richly embroider'd with the victorious Ensigns of the English Monarchy; and before his Majesty in Gold and splendid Colours the Royal Standard was born, and many other Banners in warlike Order wav'd with the Wind. On the other side the French drew up in three Lines, the first led by the Constable of France, the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, and several other of the Nobility, who all strove to come in for the Honour of the first Charge. The second Line was commanded by the Duke of Berry, the Earls of Alençon, Nevers, and many others. The third was commanded by the Duke of Brabant, the Earls of Marle, Fauquenberge, and Monsieur de Lorny. The Right Wing was led by Arthur Earl of Rubemont, and the Left by Lewis de Bourbon. In short most of the French, and among them those of the highest Quality in the Nation were in this Army, except the King and the Dauphine.

His Management of his Forces.

His noble Appearance.

The two Armies stood thus drawn up in Order 'till between nine and ten in the Morning, when the Heroick King Henry, riding along the Front of his Battalions, with the most enlivening Looks, Gestures and Words animated the Courage of his Soldiers. He told them, That they were now entering into the most glorious Field of Honour, which by their Valours might prove more renowned than those of Cressy and Poictiers. That as for his own Part, England should never be charg'd with his Ransom, nor any Frenchman triumph over him, but Death or Victory should be his certain Fate, as he expected it would be theirs. He was sensible from the noble Fury sparkling in their Eyes, that future Ages would stand amaz'd to find what the Lance, the Pike, the Sword and the Bow could perform in the Hands of such valiant Soldiers. Yet tho' these were the brave Instruments to reap Honour, he rely'd upon Omnipotence for the Victory; and it was a remarkable Effect of Divine Providence that their Enemies offer'd them Battel on the very Day appointed in Heaven for the People to implore a Blessing on their Arms; so that at the time that they are fighting, the whole Body of the English Nation are lifting up their Eyes and Hands to Heaven for their Success and Safety. If they are victorious now, they would not only enrich themselves with the Wealth of so many Nations gather'd together, but a Kingdom to which he had an undoubted Right would be conquer'd, and England from that Time would give Laws to France. The Soldiers inspir'd with new Valour at the gallant behaviour of their King, who appear'd to them like a Deity, answer'd him with triumphant Acclamations, and cry'd out to be led on immediately to Battel. The Dukes of York, Clarence and Glocester advis'd his Majesty not to suffer this their first Ardor to cool; but he weighing the mighty Consequence of the Battel, would not precipitate any Thing, but proceeded with a most admirable Conduct, as well as the noblest Courage. He was unwilling to quit the Advantage of his Ground, and stood expecting to give the French the first Charge; but when he found them not to move, and that the eager Impatience of his his Men was no longer to be restrain'd, he cry'd aloud, Since our Enemies have intercepted our Way to Calais, let us break through their Army, in the Name of the most glorious Trinity, and in the most propitious Hour of the whole Year. Then alighting from his Horse, with a Resolution to put himself in the same Danger with the meanest of his Army, he commanded his Standards to move forwards, and the Archers on the Right and Left to advance upon the Enemy.

Battel of A-GINCOURT.*

The Ranging of the Battel was committed to Sir Thomas Erpingham, an old experienc'd Knight; who with a Truncheon in his Hand led the Way, and gave the Signal by throwing it into the Air, at which the whole Army gave a Shout that seem'd to rend the Skies. But when they saw the French did not come out to meet 'em, they made a little Halt to take Breath, and with a second Shout the Archers in the Van began the Battel, who being lightly clad, used their Bows with such Strength and Agility, that their Yard-long Arrows, drawn up to the Head, pierc'd with irresistible Force where-e'er they fell. At the same Time the two hundred brave Bow-men in Ambush perform'd Wonders, every Arrow of theirs being wing'd with inevitable Destruction. A thousand select French Horse bravely advanc'd against the Archers in the Van, and with great Fury endeavour'd to break 'em, but were so terribly gall'd by them, that they madly ran on without Order, the hindmost Ranks pressing those before, and the Files being closely straiten'd, they became a confus'd Heap of Men rather than orderly Troops; and the Horses sinking into the miry Ground, tormented likewise with Arrows, were grown furious, and would not be govern'd by their Riders. But the Archers perceiving the French advance with that Fierceness, retir'd within their sharp pointed Piles, which cover'd them in the Front and both the Flanks. The Enemy in their Heat and Fury spur'd their Horses on these Piles set allope, with which being gall'd on their Breasts, Sides and Shoulders, they flounc'd and plung'd, and either tumbled on the Spikes, or throwing their Riders, cruelly impal'd them. It was a dreadful Spectacle to see the Numbers of Men and Horses thus gor'd, some struck through their Bodies, some hanging by an Arm or a Thigh, groaning in Torture, and unable to help themselves or Companions. The clattering of the Armour of such Numbers tumbling on Heaps, the Clang of so many thousand Arrows falling upon Steel Helmets and Breast-Plates, and the Cries of wounded and dying Men, made a hideous Noise equal to the Horror of the Sight. The English continu'd to overwhelm the disorder'd Enemy with a black Tempest of Arrows; and the French Troops being thus terribly shatter'd, fell back with such Precipitation upon their main Body, that they broke all their Order. The Archers seeing their Ranks open'd, with great Bravery throw away their Bows, and with Sword and Battel-Ax rush'd into a close Fight, or rather to a bloody Execution: For tho' the Frenchmen at Arms at first fought valiantly, and repuls'd them, yet being disorder'd and broken, they could not sustain a second Charge, but were intirely routed, and the greatest Part of 'em kill'd.

*The great Valour of King
Henry.*

In the mean Time the mighty Henry at the Head of his main Battel advanc'd to charge the second Line of the French, which yet stood firm; in which he acted not only the Part of a General, but also of a common Soldier, and his Excess of Courage made him hazard a Life on which alone depended the Safety of his whole Army. He fought bravely in the Front of all his Men, where his Person was expos'd to so much Danger, that eighteen French Gentlemen having combin'd to kill him, charg'd up so close to him, that one of them with a Battel-Ax struck him on the Crest of his Helmet. But this bold Action was fatal to them, for they were all slain upon the Spot; and here the valiant David Gam, formerly mention'd, signaliz'd himself in defending his Prince with the Loss of much Blood, and at last with the Life of himself and two of his Relations; of which Service the King was so sensible, that as they lay languishing in the Field, he gave them the Honour of Knighthood, as the only Acknowledgement ledgement he could make for their Bravery. Still the Fight continu'd with great Fury, in which the Duke of Glocester being struck down with Battel-Axes, the King gallantly stood over his Brother's Body, defended him, and sav'd his Life; where he receiv'd so great a Blow on his Head, that he fell on one Knee, while two Gentlemen, whose Armour was like the King's, were kill'd. The English, still encourag'd by their glorious King, at length broke into the French Battalions, and disorder'd them; for their Horse which had been gall'd with Arrows were now ungovernable: And the English Horse plac'd in Ambuscade within the Wood, rush'd forth with a mighty Shout, and furiously attack'd their Rere. The valiant Duke of Alençon seeing the Battel lost, and disdaining to survive the fatal Day, press'd into the thickest of the Fight, and attack'd King Henry in Person, crying out that he was the Duke of Alençon, and with a furious Blow of his Sword cleav'd off a great Part of the Crown, which was the Crest of his Helmet. This so rous'd the English Lion, that with redoubled Force, he not only struck Alençon to the Ground, but with his own Hand slew two of his Followers. Those who were about his Majesty's Person soon surrounded the Duke, and with many Wounds dispatch'd him, while the generous King in vain call'd out to them to save so gallant a Man: For the faithful English enrag'd with the Sight of their Prince's Danger, could not be persuaded to spare a Life that had put his to the least Hazard.

The French
Forces broken.

The French Troops in the Rere were yet in good Order, and if they had not wanted Courage might have renew'd the Fight; but when they saw the two first Lines of their Army entirely routed, they were disheartned; and observing that the English Horse wheel'd off to charge them in the Rere, they fled without Resistance. The English Soldiers had now nothing to do but to kill and take Prisoners; and the French were so dispirited, as tamely to offer their Throats to be cut, or their Hands to be chain'd. Some flying Troops of the Enemy had rally'd, and made a Stand at some Distance; which the King observing, and considering the Numbers of those that fled were more than all his Army, he sent a Command to them by a Herald to leave the Field, threatening That if they presum'd to withstand his victorious Arms, he would show them no Mercy; which so daunted their Minds, that they immediately obey'd and withdrew; only six hundred Men at Arms making a shew of Resistance were immediately cut in Pieces by the Fury of the English Soldiers. The victorious King thought he had clear'd the Field of all Enemies, when suddenly he was allarm'd with a Noise that the French had enter'd his Camp and plunder'd it: For some Troops of the French, who had fled first, understanding that the King's Camp was weakly guarded, soon broke into it, either aiming to retrieve the Dishonour of their Defeat, or covetous of Booty; and having easily kill'd those few that defended it, they robbed the Tents and Carriages, and carry'd off the King's Crown, glorying in the noble Spoil as if they had been victorious. It was now the Close of the Evening, and the King was apprehensive that the numerous Enemy, tho' broken and dispers'd, might gather into a Body and surround him in the Dark. He knew that the Number of Prisoners exceeded that of his own Men, and that it was impossible at the same Time to fight and secure them from killing his Soldiers; which rational Apprehension, and the Noise of new Troops arriving forc'd him upon an Action so contrary to his merciful and generous Temper, that he could not resolve upon it without the highest Regret: He commanded all the Prisoners to be kill'd, except a few of the greatest Note; which Orders, tho' in Appearance bloody and barbarous, were render'd necessary by the Extremity of his Affairs. He then order'd his Soldiers to prepare for another Battel, who tho' weary'd with fighting three Hours, and many of them wounded, readily obey'd; and with their former chearful Resolution, march'd to beat them out of their Camp: But they having hastily plunder'd it, had soon left it, and got out of the Reach of Pursuit. the Slaughter of the French Prisoners, was so generously resent'd by the Duke of Burgundy, that he imprison'd the chief Actors, and design'd to have put them to Death, had not his Son mediated for them, to whom they presented King Henry's Sword, the Guards of which were of Gold, beset with Jewels of great Value.

Thus by the mighty Valour of King Henry and the English a glorious and wonderful Victory was obtain'd; yet this great Prince was justly sensible of a superior Cause, and that Evening at the Head of his Army he solemnly prais'd the Sovereign of the Universe for his Success, directing the 115th Psalm to be sung; and at that Verse, Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy Name be the Glory, he commanded all his Army to prostrate themselves to the Ground as a Token of their Humility. After that in the Presence of his Nobility and Officers, and five French Heralds, who were sent for Leave to bury their Dead, he declar'd, That it was not his own, but an Almighty Hand which had gain'd so great a Victory; and that the dismal Sight they had before their Eyes, was order'd by the Divine Justice to punish the Sins of France. Then he put the Question in Form both to the French and English Heralds, Whether he or the King of France was to be acknowledg'd Victors? And having the Honour adjudg'd to him, he ask'd the Name of the next Castle, to which Answer was made Agincourt. Then reply'd he, let this to all Posterity be call'd THE BATTLE OF AGINCOURT. After which, the Night growing late, he march'd with his weary'd Soldiers out of the Field to Masconcelles, where they had lodg'd the Night before. In this memorable Battel were kill'd on the French Side the General himself the Constable of France, the Admiral of France, the Dukes of Brabant, Bar and Alençon, the Earls of Nevers, Marle, Vaudemont, Blammont, Roussy and Fauquemberge, and many other Noblemen, of which we have a long Catalogue upon Record. In all were kill'd about ten thousand Men, of whom seven or eight thousand were Noble, and above a hundred of them Princes, who had Banners carry'd before them in the Field. The Account given by Elmham is this, That there were kill'd one Arch-Bishop, three Dukes, six Earls, ninety two Barons, fifteen hundred Knights, and seven thousand Esquires and Gentlemen. Of the Prisoners sixteen hundred were Men of Quality, among whom were the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the Marshal Bouciquault, and the Earls of Eu, Vendosme and Richemont. All this was effected with a very inconsiderable Loss on the English Side: For Walsingham only reckons the Duke of York Uncle to King Henry, the young Earl of Suffolk, four Knights, one Esquire, and twenty eight common Soldiers; tho' others account the Number of the slain to be about four or five hundred.

Upon the Day after the Battel, the twenty sixth of October, King Henry took his March towards Calais, and passing the bloody Field, he order'd Search for all the English, whom he caus'd to be interr'd according to their Quality; but he took the Bodies of his Uncle the Duke of York, and the Earl of Suffolk along with him, in order for a more honourable Interment in England. Then viewing his Army, in a Speech made to his Men, he applauded their Valour, of which he had seen such admirable Effects in the stupendous Victory: Yet he admonish'd them To ascribe all to the Favour of the Almighty, who had wrought a Miracle, in making a Handful of Men victorious over such a numerous Army, to abate their Vanity and Presumption. He further added, That he could not but adore the Divine Providence for its Care of the Lives of his Subjects, that so few had fallen in Battel. Yet he could not behold such Streams of Blood, and Heaps of Carcasses, tho' of Enemies, without Horror; but the Sight of his own Fellow-Soldiers affected him with the tenderest Compassion; therefore he had perform'd the last Rites due to such magnanimous Souls in burying their Bodies, that they might not be expos'd to Wolves and Vultures. In his March to Calais this generous Prince shew'd the most obliging Behaviour to his Noble Prisoners, the Dukes of Orleans, Bourbon and the rest; and entertaining them at Dinner, he with the greatest Modesty condol'd their Condition, and applauded their Valour, attributing nothing to himself, but to the Hand of Heav'n, which had design'd to punish the crying Sins of France; and after Dinner he presented to every one of them a Robe of rich Damask; further testifying the same Inclinations to Peace now, as before he began the War. Afterwards, when the Duke of Orleans appear'd very melancholy and declin'd Eating, the King with the most ingaging Air said, Courage, good Cousin, I have not conquer'd you, because I am superior in Merit, but because God would punish the French People for their Sins; and if he is justly angry with them, it is not decent for you to be angry with Him, or to repine at his Proceedings. Shortly after the Duke of Burgundy, inrag'd at the Loss of his two Brothers the Duke of Brabant and Count de Nevers, sent a Herald with a Gauntlet of Defiance, threatening him with the utmost Revenge. The King calmly return'd the Gauntlet with this wise Answer, Go tell your Master, that he has no Reason to be my Enemy; that I am sorry for the Death of his Brothers, which is not to be charg'd upon me or my Soldiers; and if he please to come to Boulogn, he shall be satisfy'd from the Prisoners I have, that the French alone are guilty of their Blood, and of them he is to require it. As this Battel was highly afflicting to all France, so it affected the Dauphine to such a degree, that he dy'd shortly after.

His Answer to the Duke of Burgundy.

On the sixteenth Day of November the triumphant King left Calais, and embark'd for England; and after a violent Storm arriv'd safely at Dover, where he was receiv'd with loudest Acclamations of rejoycing People, that cover'd all the Shore. Arriving near Canterbury, the Arch-Bishop, Abbot and Monks met him in their richest Habits; and as he approach'd London, the Mayor and Aldermen, and four hundred of the principal Citizens in their Gowns, attended his Coming on Black-Heath; and at St. Thomas of Watering the Clergy of the City waited on him in a solemn Procession, with the Relicks of seventy Saints. As he pass'd through the Streets, he saw both Sides of the Way hung with the richest Tapestry, wherein were represented the glorious Actions of the English Kings in War; he heard Psalms and Hymns sung in Joy for his Victory. Yet still giving all the Glory to God, he declin'd his own Praises; and in all this Triumph would not permit his dinted Helmet, and bruis'd Armour to be carry'd before him as the Trophies of his daring Valour, but expressly forbad it, as too vain an Affectation of Glory. At St. Paul's Cathedral he alighted from his Horse, and made his Offerings with the utmost Devotion; and then proceeded to Westminster, where his Palace was prepar'd for his Reception, and for the Lodging of the chief of the French Prisoners. In the Morning, the Mayor and Aldermen, with two hundred of the Citizens, attended his Majesty with a Present of a Thousand Pounds in Gold, in two Golden Basons worth five hundred Pounds more, which were receiv'd with the most obliging Marks of Gratitude. Then that all his Subjects might join with him in Praising God for the Success of his Arms, he appointed Days of Thanksgiving to be observ'd thro' all his Dominions: And that he might perform the last Rites to the Memory of the Duke of York and the Earl of Suffolk, he summon'd a great Number of Bishops and Abbots to celebrate their Obsequies; the former being bury'd at Fotheringay in Northamptonshire, and the latter at Ewelme in Oxfordshire. And this in the main concluded that great and memorable Year for England's Glory 1415.

with eight hundred Horse, where he earnestly solicited King Charles to an Accommodation; and finding in outward Appearance that he was ready to embrace the Motion, he took with him the Arch-Bishop of Rheims as Ambassador from the French King, and travell'd in the same State to Calais. Here the Governor of the Town, the Earl of Warwick, with the Garrison in Arms entertain'd him at King Henry's Charge, with so much Honour and Gallantry, that his Imperial Majesty was charm'd with the Reception, and afterwards told the King, That no Christian Prince had a Knight equal to him for Wisdom, good Breeding and Courage; and that if all Courtesie were lost, it might be found again in the Earl of Warwick. After two Days Continuance, thirty of King Henry's Ships arriv'd, in which the Emperor embark'd with a noble Retinue consisting of a thousand Persons, among whom were the Count Palatine of the Rhine, the Duke of Milan, and many Sovereign Princes both of Germany and Italy.

On the twenty ninth Day of April he landed at Dover, where he found the Duke of Glocester, Constable of the Castle, with many English Nobility on the Shore; who boldly stepp'd into the Water with their drawn Swords, as the Emperor was ready to set his Foot on Land, declaring, That if he came as a Mediator for Peace, they would receive him with the Honours due to the Imperial Dignity; but if as Emperor to claim any Authority in England, which was a free Kingdom, they were ready to oppose his Landing. The Emperor alluring them, That his Thoughts were free from any such Design, and that he came to establish Peace between England and France, the English Nobility receiv'd and conducted him very honourably. At Canterbury he was met by the Arch-Bishop, at Rochester by the Duke of Bedford, at Dartford by the Duke of Clarence, and at Black-Heath by the King himself, not only with that Respect which his Dignity and Merits challeng'd, but with an Affection due to a Person related to him by the Marriage of Barbara Daughter of the Earl of Zutic, the King's Cousin-German. His Entertainment was magnificent, and his Charges all born by King Henry, who the more to honour him install'd him Knight of the Garter at Windsor, after the most solemn and pompous Manner; and the Emperor so esteem'd this Honour, that he always wore the Collar when he sat in any Assembly.

*He is magni-cently receiv'd
by King Henry.*

Shortly after the Emperor insist'd upon the Business for which he came, and press'd for a Peace with France, in which he was calmly heard by the English King; but upon new Displeasures for some Loss of Men in the Territories of Roan, the Motion at that Time was quash'd, and could not succeed, Let the French should suppose him discourag'd at a small Loss. Yet the Emperor, continuing his Intercession for Peace, had probably effected it by his powerful Persuasions, had not the English about that Time besieged Hazeburgh both by Sea and Land. For not long before the Earl of Dorset, Governor of that Place, having made an Inroad into the County of Caux, was attack'd by the Earl of Armagnac, now Constable of France, and so distress'd that he was forc'd to retire into an Orchard or Wood, with the Loss of three hundred of his Men. After which, in his March towards Hazeburgh, he was intercepted by the same Earl, with such Numbers, and such Advantages by the Sea-side, that the Constable was so sure of Victory that he sent a Herald to the Earl of Dorset to summon him to surrender himself and all his Men Prisoners. To which Dorset heroically reply'd, That it was not the Custom of the English to yield without Fighting, nor was he so cowardly as to surrender to an Enemy whom God might deliver into his Power. Upon which Armagnac march'd directly down the Hill to seize his Prey, but was so vigorously ply'd by the Archers with a perpetual Shower of Arrows, that his Troops were extremely thatter'd before they could come to charge the Enemy. After which a close Fight was long maintain'd at the Sword's Point, till the English by their incomparable Valour and Bravery prevail'd against the Inequality of Numbers, and defeated the Constable with the Loss of twelve hundred of his Men, and the great Hezard of his own Person: Which Victory was the more considerable, since the Number of the English, according to Walsingham, was no more than fifteen hundred, and that of the French fifteen thousand. To repair this Disgrace, the Constable first hang'd up many of his Men, and after a Reinforcement he besieg'd the Town of Harfleur by Land, while the Viscount Narbon Vice-Admiral of France, with a Fleet of different sort of Ships, enter'd the Mouth of the Sein, and did the same by Water. Harfleur besieged by the French.

King Henry hearing of this News, immediately recall'd his Ambassadors, the Bishop of Norwich and Sir Thomas Erpingham, then in Commission for an Accommodation with France; and the Emperor well perceiving that the French took all Advantages, and that King Henry would not bear such Usage, saw it in vain to make any further Endeavours, therefore he resolv'd to leave them to the sad Effects of War, and enter into a League with the King of England, which was soon concluded to this Effect: 'That since his Imperial Majesty, desiring to establish a general Peace in Christendom both as to Church and State, had endeavour'd to compose all Differences between France and England; and since the French King had industriously declin'd all Offers that might contribute to the Happiness of either: Therefore the King of England, and the Emperor Sigismund had enter'd into a strict Alliance, mutually to support and defend each other against all Persons, the Church and Pope of Rome only excepted. That neither of them should pursue any Designs injurious to the other's Advantage; but contribute all they could to the Advancement of each other's Honour and Benefit. That, without any Acts of Hostility, the Subjects of both Princes should have free Liberty of Trading in all their Dominions, paying the usual Tolls and Customs. That neither of the two Princes should allow Sanctuary to any Rebel or Exile of the other's Subjects; nor should engage in any War, without the Knowledge and Consent of the other. That both the Princes might prosecute the War against France for the Recovery of their Rights; and that they should mutually assist each other for the obtaining of that End. And, if a Peace should be concluded with France, and the demanded Territories restor'd, they should mutually maintain each other in the Possession of them. This League was concluded and sign'd August the fifteenth, and not long after confirm'd in Parliament. A League between the Emperor and King
Henry.

In the mean Time the French, that had felt the heavy Hand of the English, and seen that King Henry had recall'd his Plenipotentiaries for Peace, resolv'd to try out their greatest Naval Power, both to block up Harfleur, and annoy the English Nation. But because the French King could not suddenly provide such a Number of Ships as the Occasion requir'd, he hired of the Republick of Genoa eight large Carracks, and other Vessels from Spain and Flanders, which with his own Ships made up a Fleet of five hundred Sail. These cruising about the English Seas with many Insults, King Henry design'd to have gone in Person against them, but the Emperor dissuading him from the Attempt, the Charge of that Enterprize was committed to his Brother John Duke of Bedford, accompany'd with the Earls of Marche, Oxford, Huntington, Warwick, Arundel, Salisbury and Devonshire, who having three or four hundred Ships, and twenty thousand Men on Board, resolv'd to fight the French Fleet. Shortly after a fierce and long Engagement happen'd; in which the Valour of the Duke of Bedford and his brave Adventurers so far prevail'd that the French Ships were most of them batter'd, sunk and taken; and, according to Harding, their Loss amounted to twenty thousand Men. Immediately after, the Duke supply'd Harfleur with Ammunition, Victuals and other Necessaries, which the Garrison extremely wanted; which so discourag'd the Constable D'Armagnac, that he broke up the Siege, and return'd to Paris. This extraordinary Service was so admir'd by the Emperor, that he openly declar'd, That England was happy in having such a King, but the King more happy in having such Subjects; and ever after shew'd a particular Esteem for the Duke of Bedford. The French defeated at Sea.

The King accompanies the Emperor to Calais.

The Emperor's Affairs being finish'd, and all Royal Entertainments gratefully acknowledg'd, he prepar'd for his Return towards Germany, and King Henry, to do him more Honour, accompany'd him to the Town of Calais; where, after their Arrival, the Duke of Burgundy repair'd to pay his Homage to the Emperor; which Duke, some Months before, had concluded a Truce with the Earl of Warwick, in Behalf of King Henry, for the Countries of Flanders and Artois. Henry therefore in hopes of a further Amity with a Man of his Interest, sent his Brother the Duke of Glocester, and the Earl of Marche to lye as Hostages at St. Omers for Burgundy's safe Passage and Conduct, with whom he sent the Earl of Warwick to conduct him to Calais. His Reception was very honourable both from the Emperor and the King of England; with the former he perform'd his Homage, and with the latter renew'd the Truce for two Years longer; both which was so displeasing to the French, that the Emperor was condemn'd by 'em for augmenting those Miseries in France which he pretended he came to relieve, by animating Burgundy against Orleans, and encouraging King Henry's Vanity in the Thoughts he had entertain'd of prevailing against a weak King. This is certain from the Archives of this Kingdom, that secret Articles were sign'd at Calais by the Duke of Burgundy in Vindication of King Henry's Title, in which he acknowledg'd him to be rightful King of France, and accordingly would declare himself for him in due Time. Yet in a few Months Time, as tho' he had forgot all, he consented and swore to a League with the King and Dauphine of France against the Power of England, and acted accordingly.

The Duke of Burgundy's unfair Dealings.

The Emperor and King take leave.

After the Duke of Burgundy's Departure, the King prepar'd for his Return into England, and the Emperor made ready to go by Sea to Dort in his Way to Germany. He despair'd of obtaining a Peace between England and France, and was extremely dissatisfy'd that he had wasted so much Time in an unsuccessful Mediation; he detested the Insincerity and mean Shifts of the French, and highly applauded the Plain-Dealing of the English. There had been so free and open a Correspondence between him and the King of England, that one did not keep any Thing secret from the other; and the like mutual Affection and Confidence was scarce ever known between two Princes. After the most amicable Parting, the Emperor set Sail for Dort, to which Place he was attended by the Duke of Glocester, Sir John Tiptoft, and many other English Knights and Gentlemen, to whom he presented a thousand Crowns in Coins and likewise sent many rare and valuable Presents to King Henry, as Pledges of his Love and Gratitude. From Dort his Imperial Majesty pursuing his Journey, at length repair'd to the famous Council of Constance, which had now continu'd near three Years, and of which we ought to say something, because the English had so great a Concern in it.

The Council of Constance.

The Churches throughout Christendom had been disturb'd for the Space of twenty nine Years, and now insufferably afflicted thro' the Schismatical Ambitions maintain'd by three Papal Monarchs, mounted into St. Peter's Chair, each of them so violently grasping the Seat, that the Joints of it were torn asunder, and the Triple Crown so batter'd by their fulminant Execrations, that it was render'd unfit for any of their Heads. The three Contenders were Benedict XII. elected by the Spaniards; Gregory XII. set up by the French, and John XXIII. prefer'd by the Italians. To prevent the Mischiefs arising from this furious Struggle, the Princes of Christendom appointed a general Council to be held at Constance in Germany, which began in February 1414, and continu'd above the Space of three Years; to which were assembled the Emperor, the Pope, the Palgrave of the Rhine, four Patriarchs, twenty seven Cardinals, forty seven Arch-bishops, a hundred and sixty Bishops, Princes, Barons and Gentlemen, with their Attendants, above thirty thousand. To this Council King Henry sent the Bishops of London, Salisbury, Litchfield and Coventry, Bath and Wells, Norwich, Hereford and St. David's, with the Abbot of Westminster and Prior of Worcester, accompany'd also with the Earl of Warwick, to make the nobler Appearance; themselves and Attendants amounting to eight hundred Horse: So that it was doubtful whether their honourable Presence more grac'd the Assembly, or their Learning and Judgment improv'd the whole Body of the Council. For two of these Bishops were made Cardinals, and of the thirty selected to assist the Cardinals in their Election of a new Pope, the Bishops of London, Litchfield, Bath and Wells were chosen, and the Bishop of London was first nominated for Pope; but he himself nominated the Man that succeeded, which was Otho Colonna by the Name of Martin V. whose Coronation was with mighty Magnificence solemniz'd by the five Nations assembled, with this Honour given to the English, That the Prior of St. John's was the Supporter of the Triple Crown. Touching the Decrees of this Council, it is sufficient to observe that Wickliff's Books were condemn'd as Heretical, that John Hus and Hierom of Prague, were both burnt, the Holy Maid Bridget canoniz'd for a Saint, and that England was made a Nation in Rank before Spain. The Appearance of the English there.

Before this Council was dissolv'd, King Henry had call'd a Parliament in London, in Order to prosecute his Title to the French Crown, where the Lord Chancellor, Bishop of Winchester and Cardinal, in the King's Behalf made an eloquent Oration declaring the earnest Desire his Master had to make a Peace with the French, which their King continually oppos'd, and against the Law of Arms deny'd upon Ransom to deliver the Prisoners taken at Agincourt, so that the Peace to be expected must be purchas'd by the Sword alone. To which the whole Body consented, and granted the King a Subsidy and a Tenth, which was graciously accepted; but it was too short for the mighty Charge of the design'd Expedition, therefore the King was oblig'd to pawn his Crown to his Uncle the Bishop of Winchester for a large Sum of Money, as he did certain Jewels to the Lord Mayor of London for ten thousand Marks. Yet in this Parliament, after he had created the valiant Earl of Dorset, Duke of Exeter, he order'd him a thousand Pounds per Annum out of the Exchequer, and forty Pounds out of the Customs at Exeter; which liberal Example was so well approv'd by the Lords, that they rather thought it too little, and not proportionable to the Merits and Services of that noble Person. A Parliament in England.

IV. The Emperor's Mediation between England and France being frustrated by the Elusions of the French, King Henry disdain'd to relinquish his right so often demanded, therefore reassuming his Claim, he began this Year with great Preparations for War. And having got all Things in a Readiness, with a puissant Army, he resolv'd upon a second Expedition into France, taking Advantage of the two present Factions in that Kingdom, that of Burgundy, and that of Orleans; in which the King of France join'd with the former, and the Dauphine with the latter. King Henry's Fleet consisted of fifteen hundred Sail, having on Board many Lords and Men at Arms, with twenty five thousand five hundred and twenty seven Soldiers, besides a thousand Carpenters, Artificers and Labourers. But before his Departure, he appointed his Brother John Duke of Bedford to be Protector of England, during his Absence; which done, upon the twenty eighth Day of July he took shipping, the Sails of his own Vessel being of Purple Silk most richly embroider'd with Gold. On the first of August he landed in Normandy with such Terror to the Inhabitants, that they fled from the Shores, and left the Country without Men or Cattle; insomuch that twenty five thousand of them retir'd to Bretaign, so formidable was the Approach of the English. No sooner had King Henry set his Foot on Land, but he honour'd forty eight of his brave Followers with Knighthood; and then gave strict Orders, upon Pain of Death, that the Persons of Ecclesiasticks, and of Women should be inviolable, and likewise all others that submitted themselves to his Government. Reg. 4.
King Henry's second Expedition into France.
He lands in Normandy.

King Henry began with taking of a View of Harfleur, after which he laid ^{W. of} Siege to Conquest, one of the strongest Castles in Normandy, which he took ^{Holm.} on the Sixteenth of August, and gave both it and the whole Demesns belonging to it to his Brother the Duke of Clarence: And to the Earl of Salisbury, the Commander of his second Line he gave the Castle of Damvilliers, which at the same Time he won by his Arms; as also that of Lovers to the Earl-Marshal; and these were the first that were invested with any Revenue in France. Next he march'd against Caen, one of the Capital Cities of the Province, which Place was strongly fortify'd, well mann'd and victuall'd, so that nothing was wanting for a vigorous Defence. Yet the King sat down before it, and his Batteries not working the design'd Effects, he attempted it by Mines, and ruin'd a great Part of the Wall; yet still the Besieg'd made a manful Defence, and bravely drove the English back from the Breach. Nevertheless Henry, seeing that they could not long subsist, unwilling to carry it by Storm, which must be to the Destruction of the Inhabitants, whom he sought to make his loving Subjects, summon'd them by a Herald, and promis'd them Mercy; which they in hopes of Relief utterly despis'd. Upon which he proceeded to a Storm, which was succeeded by a great Slaughter, 'till the King staid the Soldiers Fury, and caus'd the Citizens to disarm themselves, setting a strong Guard, as well to keep his Men from pillaging, as the Inhabitants from Hostile Attempts: And they that disobey'd, were either put to Death or Ransom, which was freely distributed among his Captains and Soldiers; by which regular Action King Henry here gain'd the Estimation of a great Commander, and an upright Prince. The Report of his Clemency and Generosity to those he had conquer'd, spreading through the Country, the Governors of the neighbouring Towns sent to him the Keys of their Gates. The King, to invite and encourage the People, made Proclamation, that they who voluntarily submitted themselves should enjoy all Safety and Privileges under the Protection of his Government. King Henry proceeding in his Conquests, upon the first of December sat down before the strong Town and Castle of Falaise, and tho' it was the Depth of Winter, with invincible Patience he continu'd the Siege 'till the twentieth of December, when the Garrison of the Town, being no longer able to hold out, desir'd a Parly, and surrender'd upon Articles, too many to relate in this Place.

While this valiant Prince had by a swift Conquest in four Months recover'd a great Part of those Dominions which anciently belong'd to the English Kings ^{W. of} in France, the Scots thinking his own Kingdom unprovided, and hoping to ^{Holm.} make Advantage of a discontented Party in the Nation, invaded England with a great Army, and wasted the Country with Fire and Sword. These still pretending that King Richard was alive, under the Conduct of the Duke of Albany and the Earl of Douglafs, brought along with them a counterfeit King, and laid Siege both to Roxborough and Berwick, where all imaginable Methods were us'd for the taking of those two Places. But before they could succeed in their extraordinary Attempts, the Protector John Duke of Bedford, and the new Duke of Exeter, had made sufficient Provision against them, and with an Army march'd into the North, where joining with the Earls of Northumberland and Westmorland, their Forces amounted to a hundred thousand Men, a great Part of them well form'd and regular: So that the Duke of Exeter said he could draw out of them forty thousand equal in Courage and Military Skill to any the King had. A remarkable Instance of the Strength of the Nation, which besides the Forces employ'd in France, could on a sudden raise such an Army. To these join'd Henry Benet Arch-Bishop of York, who was so decrepid with Age, that he was born in his Chair about the Field; and the Fame of his Arrival, and the Dread of the great English Generals so discourag'd the Scots, that they broke up their Sieges in great Disorder, and left all their Tents, Ladders and Engines. This was succeeded for a considerable Time after with great Devastations made by the English in many Parts of Scotland. ^{The}

The King's Affairs thus establish'd in the North, the Clergy were much eas'd by the Securing of the Lord Cobham, their great Disturber in the South; who had lately made new Steps towards the Exposing of their Errors, and opposing their exorbitant Power. But one main Complaint against him was, That he had defac'd the Pictures of the Saints in many Mass Books; some of which were shown to the People at St. Paul's Cross, where the Preacher insinuated that the Offence was done to the Triumphant Saints in Heaven. A Parliament being then assembled by the Protector's Authority, for a Supply of Money against France, it was there thought a Matter of that Importance, that a great Reward was offer'd for any that could take him. Not long after the Lord Powells took him in Wales, after a noble Resistance and many Wounds; and brought him to Westminster, where he appear'd before the Parliament. Having been before out-law'd upon Treason in the King's Bench, and excommunicated by the Arch-Bishop for Heresie, it was adjudg'd upon the Record and Process, that he should be carry'd to the Tower, and thence drawn thro' the City to the new Gallows in St. Giles's Fields, and there to be hang'd about the Middle, and burnt hanging in a Chain. All which was perform'd with the highest Execrations of the Priests, who adjur'd the People not to pray for a Man who was certainly going to Hell, because he dy'd in obstinate Rebellion against the Pope. Thus dy'd the great Lord Cobham; and as this was the first Noble Blood that was shed in England on the Account of Religion by Popish Malignity, so perhaps never any suffer'd a more cruel Martyrdom.

New Proceedings against Sir John Oldcastle.

He is burnt alive.

In the mean Time the unhappy Kingdom of France was more and more fill'd with the Noise and Miseries of War, which King Henry prosecuted with such unweary'd Vigour, that he besieg'd and took Towns in the Depth of Winter, nor could all the Rigours of the Season stop the Progress of his Conquests. To make the swifter Advances in subduing Normandy by besieging many Towns and Castles at the same Time, he divided his Army into several Bodies. The valiant Duke of Clarence at the Head of one of them besieg'd Chambroise, and the Castle of Beche-Lovyn; the Surrender of the first being concluded on March the ninth, and that of the latter on the fourth of May following. The Duke of Glocester led another Body of the Army into the County of Constantine, a large Neck of Land reaching into the Sea, over against Portland on the English Shore. The Town and Castle of Vire were agreed to be surrender'd February the twenty first; and the like Agreement was made about St. Lo, March the twelfth. On the sixteenth of the same Month the Town and Castle of Carenton capituled; on the seventeenth Montdown was deliver'd to him, and eight Days after St. Saviour le Viconte. The strong Town of Cherburgh, which stood in the Sea, made a longer Defence than any of the rest, but at length was forc'd to capitulate in the latter End of August. While these and several other Places were taken by the English, King Henry, after some new Offers of Accommodation, resolv'd to besiege Roan, the great and capital City of Normandy; a City strongly fortify'd with extraordinary Walls, Towers, and a vast Ditch, and containing a very numerous Garrison. The Citizens also presuming upon the Strength of the Garrison, and in their own Numbers, which were near three hundred thousand, resolv'd to defend the Place with the greatest Vigour, and to endure all Extremities, rather than surrender, since to that one Place the Inhabitants of Normandy had brought all their Treasure, accounting it their last Refuge and Retreat, and by a prudent Foresight had been diligent to fortifie it in the Beginning of the War.

A. D. 1418. Reg. 5. 6.

Great Conquests in Normandy.

The Strength and Greatness of Roan.

The King, after he had taken Pont de l'Arche, eight Miles distant from Roan, and accounted the Key of the River Seine, laid close Siege to this important Place: But understanding the obstinate Resolution of the Belieged, he would not lavish the Lives of his Soldiers in continual Attacks, but determin'd to cut off all Provisions and Relief, and reduce it by Famine. To this End his Army surrounded it by Land, and a Squadron of good Ships which he had from the King

Roan besieged by King Henry.

King of Portugal, block'd up the Mouth of the Sein. Then to secure his Camp from all Assaults, he encompass'd it with a large Intrenchment pitch'd with sharp Stakes, and defended by a high Rampart, Bulwarks and Turnpikes. Sir Robert Bapthorp was appointed to oversee this Work, which he perform'd with great Skill and Diligence, as he had before the Trenches between the Camp and the Town. The King himself lodg'd on the East of the City, the Duke of Clarence on the West, and the Duke of Exeter on the North; between whom was quarter'd the Marshal, join'd with the Earl of Ormond, and the Lords Harington and Talbot. Before the Port of St. Hillary, the Lords Ross, Willoughby, Fitz-Hugh and Sir William Porter encamp'd their Forces. The Earls of Mortaign and Salisbury lodg'd near the Abby of St. Catharines; Sir John Gray about the Chappel Mount St. Michael's, and Sir Philip Leech upon a Hill adjoining. The River Sein was block'd up with three Iron Chains, one of them laid two Foot above the Water, another level to it, and the third two Foot below it, to hinder all Relief into the City by Boats; the Charge of which was committed to Thomas Baron of Carew, who very exactly perform'd it. On the other Side the River were encamp'd the Earls of Warren and Huntington, the Lords Nevill and Ferrers, and Sir Gilbert Umfreville, directly before the great Port de Pont; and for a general Communication of one Part of the Army with the other, a Bridge was made over the River Sein, sufficient for Carriages as Occasion should require.

The Besieg'd suffer all the Miseries of Famine.

Fifty thousand of them perish.

A Treaty made

but in vain.

During this memorable Siege, many martial Exploits happen'd, but no general Assaults; and thus it continu'd from the Beginning of July till December, when the Besieg'd began to be in great Distress for want of Provisions; and to disburthen themselves, they thrust out twenty thousand Men, Women and Children who were unserviceable for the Defence of the City, and expos'd them to the Mercy of the English. When King Henry saw this miserable Multitude shut out of the Gates, tho' he resolv'd to force them back to increase the Misery of Famine, yet being unwilling to attack a Company of Wretches unarm'd and helpless, he gave Orders to power upon them a Shower of Arrows, shot from Bows slightly drawn, to affright rather than wound them. Fear drove the poor starv'd Creatures to shelter themselves in the Ditches of the Town; and while they remain'd there three Days in great Misery, many of the Women were deliver'd: At last, the Cries and Groans of so many thousands prevail'd upon the King's Compassion to send 'em Food, 'till the Pity of the Garrison was mov'd to receive many of them again within the Walls. The Famine and Mortality soon grew to that Height, that fifty thousand of both Sexes perish'd; and in one Burying Place above two and thirty thousand were thrown into the Ground. Persons of the better Quality eat their own Horses, and the poorer People fed on Dogs, Cats, Rats and Mice; so obstinate were they in holding out to the last Extremity. Little Infants hung on the Breasts of their starv'd Mothers as they lay dead in the Streets; and the Rage of Famine forc'd the distracted Multitude to a thousand Violences, and they wounded and kill'd one another to take away the vilest Nourishment of Life. And so Tyrannical was the Force of Hunger over the most powerful Considerations, that young Virgins abandon'd their Modesty, and prostituted themselves for a Piece of Bread. In this deplorable Condition, Relief was often promis'd, but instead of Supplies the Bishop of Beauvois, accompany'd with the Cardinal of Ursus, sent from the Pope, were dispatch'd to King Henry to beg a Peace; and the better to effect it they brought the Princess Catharine's Picture, which gave King Henry great Satisfaction, insomuch that some say he fell in Love with her at the Sight of it. But he demanding a Million of Crowns, with the Dukedoms of Normandy, Gascony, Anjou, and other Territories for her Portion, nothing material was concluded.

At length, the enraged Roannois, helpless of Succour, and despairing of Peace, resolv'd to make a brave Sally upon the King's Quarters; to perform which which ten thousand select Men, with their Commanders, issu'd out of the Town. The Vant-Guard, consisting of two thousand, being past and engag'd with the Besiegers, by Misfortune the Draw-bridge broke down with the over-weight of Men, and drown'd, kill'd and hurt many. This ruin'd the Passage, that they cou'd not come to the Relief of their Companions engag'd, but by another Gate at a considerable Distance; and before they came into their Assistance, their whole Body was broken for want of Support, and most of them kill'd and taken Prisoners. Upon which strange Disaster the Soldiers within mutiny'd against De Boutellier their General, boldly complaining that he had contrived the breaking of the Bridge. In these Calamities, after several Remonstrances on both Sides, King Charles returning towards Paris, sent a Message to the Besieged, That they must take care of themselves; which surprizing Answer struck a fatal Damp upon their Hearts, and rais'd the Rage of the Multitude to that Degree, that they willingly agreed to a Treaty with King Henry: Which being propos'd to the King, three magnificent Tents were erected at Port St. Hilarie for the Reception of the Commissioners, which were four Ecclesiasticks, four Knights and four Burgers of the Town: Those for the King were the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury and the Earl of Warwick. The Demands of the Roannois were many and high, but the Answers receiv'd were short and peremptory, That no Conditions wou'd be allow'd, but barely yielding to the King's Mercy. Which Answer being return'd in a publick Assembly, Rage and Despair prompted them to all Extravagancies that cou'd proceed from Fire, Sword and the Demolishment of the whole City. But the generous King pitying a wretched People so obstinately bent on their own Ruin, resolv'd to save them in spite of themselves, and to have that noble City deliver'd to him, untouch'd by Fire. Remitting therefore the Rigour of his first Demands, he again sent for the Commissioner by the Arch-Bishop to treat upon milder Conditions, which was at last concluded in twenty three Articles. Of which one was That

The Agreement was concluded on the nineteenth Day of January, when the half-famish'd Citizens in great Multitudes repair'd to the English Camp to buy Victual, which so abounded with Provisions, that a fat Sheep was sold for Six Sols. On the following Day King Henry made a Triumphant Entrance into the City, accompany'd with four Dukes, ten Earls, eight Bishops, sixteen Barons, and a great Number of Knights, Esquires and Men at Arms. At his Entering the Gates all the Bells of the City were rung, and the Abbots and Priests met him in a solemn Procession, in which were carry'd forty two Crosses, with the Relicks of the Saints. They march'd before him to Notre-dame the great Cathedral, where at the Porch he alighted, being receiv'd with the utmost Solemnity by the Bishops and Canons; then entering the Church, he offer'd up his Thanksgivings at the High Altar, and order'd his Chaplains to sing a Psalm of Praise. He lodg'd in the Castle that Night, and continu'd in it the next Day, receiving Homage from the Citizens. In the Morning he gave Orders that Alain Blanchart, an Incendiary excepted in the Articles, shou'd be beheaded, but pardon'd the rest that were left to his Mercy, imposing only a Fine upon them. Then to settle his new Conquests, he establish'd in this City his Exchequer, Coinage, and Chamber of Accounts of the Revenues of Normandy, and built a Tower behind the Castle, as an additional Strength to keep the City in Subjection. He fortify'd the Bridge, and began to build a Palace on the Sein; and publish'd new Orders to regulate the Business of Trade, reducing the Measures to a certain Standard. He kept his Court at Roan for some space, and wore the Ducal Robes as Duke of Normandy. On February the fifteenth he order'd Proclamation to be made, that all who wou'd come in and swear Allegiance to him shou'd be receiv'd into his Favour and Protection: And March the twelfth he gave Orders, that an exact Account shou'd be taken of the Names of all the Inhabitants, Men, Women and Children, within the Bailywicks of Roan, Constantin and Alençon.

King Henry had now not only the Dukedom of Normandy subjected to him, but Picardy and the Isle of France lay open to his Arms; infomuch that tho' the French King and the Duke of Burgundy had strongly garrison'd the Frontiers to stop the Incursions of the English Troops, yet they pierc'd as far as Ponthoise, Cleremont, Beauvais, Montdidier, Bretevil, Amiens, Abbeville and St. Valeric; and waisting all Places, enrich'd themselves with great Booty. This mighty Progress first brought the Duke of Bretaign to an Alliance with King Henry, who finding France unable to protect him, agreed to a mutual Amity, and that no Acts of Hostility shou'd be committed by either of their Subjects, without a Declaration of War six Months before. In the mean Time the Dauphine, who in Opposition to the Duke of Burgundy had taken upon him the Administration of the Government in France, invited the King of England to a Treaty; but when the Ambassadors shou'd have met to appoint the Place and Manner, the French not only fail'd in coming at the fix'd Time, but shew'd such Collusion when they came, that all prov'd ineffectual. However the Duke of Burgundy became so apprehensive of the Dauphine's growing Interest, that he once more desir'd a Treaty with King Henry, that by the help of such a potent Ally he might secure himself against the Designs which that Prince had to ruin him. It was therefore determin'd in the Council of the King of France, That it was expedient for the Safety of the Nation to settle an Alliance with the King of England, by giving him in Marriage the Princess, with some Provinces of the Kingdom. After an Embassy and a short Truce, it was concluded that the two Kings should have a solemn Interview at Melun, where the Queen and Princess shou'd be present. For that purpose a spacious Field was well entrenched and ramparted with strong Gates, and two stately Pavilions erected in it, the one for the two Kings to converse and repose, and the other for their Agents to consult in.

The Duke of Burgundy endeavours for a Treaty with King Henry.

The Treaty of Melun.

King Charles, Queen Isabel, the Princess Catharine, the Duke of Burgundy, and the Count St. Paul, first arriv'd, with a Train and Guard of a thousand Horse. On the other side King Henry with his Brothers the Dukes of Clarence, and Glocester, attended with a thousand Horse, observ'd the appointed Time and Place: And now the illustrious Company met with the utmost Pomp and Ceremony; King Henry saluted the Queen and Princess, and receiv'd Burgundy into his Arms; and the two Nations tho' mortal Enemies, demean'd themselves with so much Civility, that no cause of Quarrel was offer'd on either side. Many Points were debated, and many Offers were made to King Henry, particularly, That all the Territories and Towns contain'd in the Treaty of Peace made at Bretaign with Edward III. and the whole Dukedom of Normandy, and all other Places now in his Possession, shou'd be confirm'd to him and his Heirs. Many Days were spent without coming to a Conclusion, and many Conferences were held, from which the Princess had absented herself. The Queen had brought her to the first Interview, in hopes that the Charms of her Beauty, which were very extraordinary, might prevail more on a young Conqueror than all the subtle Arts of Statesmen in a Treaty. Nor was she wholly mistaken; for his Heart, tho' arm'd with fierce Bravery and undaunted Courage, was not impenetrable to the softer Passions; and that Soul which never knew Fear, at the first Sight of so engaging a Lady was sensible of Love. The discerning Queen soon observ'd that her Daughter's Eyes were more powerful than all the Arms of France, and resolv'd to make all possible Advantage of this violent Affection; flattering her self that the King would comply comply to any Conditions, provided his Marriage with the Princess were one of them. She thought therefore to practise upon him the usual Arts of her Sex, and to inflame his Passion by the Absence of his Mistress; but her Design had a different Success than she expected, for he soon observing the Artifice, the Sense of the Affront made him inflexible to any Condescension, so that he insisted more firmly on his first Propositions. And knowing that the chief Affairs of France were committed to the Duke of Burgundy, the Thought that it was he who obstructed the Conclusion of the Peace and Marriage, fir'd him with the greatest Indignation against him. When therefore the Duke remonstrated the Excess of his Demands, the King in a great Passion said, I'll not only have your Princess, but your King himself in my Power; and I will have what I demanded in Marriage with her, or force him from his Throne, and you out of his Kingdom. To whom the Duke more calmly reply'd, Before you can dethrone my King, and expel me the Kingdom, you may find cause to repent the Enterprize; and I doubt not, but we shall make you weary of the War.

King Henry
incens'd.

This Convention at Melun ended June the thirtieth, at which Time it was agreed to meet again on the third of July following; and King Henry came, but the French disappointed him. And in reality it was manifest by all their Proceedings, that they never design'd to conclude a Peace, but only aim'd to amuse the English with vain Offers and Promises. They had promis'd that King Henry shou'd possess all his Conquests, and hold them without Dependence; and that all shou'd be confirm'd to him, which had been granted in the grand Treaty between Edward III. of England, and John King of France: But when the Articles came to be drawn into Form, and ingross'd, the French perplex'd all Things by starting new Difficulties and Questions. The Duke of Burgundy, whose Heart was truly French, all the Time of the Convention had frequent Meetings with the Dauphine near Paris, and it was now strenuously endeavour'd to reconcile the grand Parties of Burgundy and Armagnac; and accordingly Proclamation was made at Paris, that none shou'd raise any Contest on the account of such Names of Distinction. King Henry therefore, perceiving the Artifices of the French, resolv'd to break off the Treaty; and according to the first Agreement, he gave publick Notice of its Dissolution; complaining of the unfair Proceedings of his Enemies, who had continually deceiv'd him, and only design'd under Colour of a Treaty to work Delays and hinder his Conquests. Shortly after he understood that the Dauphine and the Duke were reconcil'd, and enter'd into a firm Alliance, which much rais'd the Indignation of the Hero; and tho' in Apperance all the Forces of France were united against him, this was so far from discouraging him, that it rous'd his martial Ardor to oppose the growing Danger. And having taken care to regulate and reform the Corruption of Manner and Discipline in the Churches of England and Normandy, he resolv'd to proceed with the utmost Vigour and Vigilance.

King Henry.

Ponthois was the next fortify'd Town which lay in the Course of King Henry's Conquests, the Possession of which wou'd open his Way to Paris. To attempt which on the last Day of July he sent three Thousand Foot, which before Day Light, and undiscover'd by the Centinels, set their scaling Ladders to the Walls, mounted up, and crying out St. George! some enter'd the Town, to the great Amazement of Monfieur de L'Isle Adam, Marshal of France and Governor of the Place, who immediately fled out at another Gate next Paris, and was immediately follow'd by above ten thousand of the Inhabitants. So that the English easily became Masters of the Town, which was so considerable for its Riches, and such an advantageous Post, that the King in a Letter said, he accounted it the most important Place he had taken since the War. Yet his great Soul was so little elevated by this Success, that he sent this Message to the King of France, That tho' he had taken so considerable a Place, which open'd a Way to the Conquest of his Capital City, yet he now offer'd him Peace upon the same Terms he had propos'd at the Treaty of Melun. All Paris was in a great Consternation upon the Loss of this Place, and the Terror was so general thro' all the adjacent Country, call'd the Ile of France, that the Villages were universally deserted. The King of France with his Queen and Daughter, the Duke of Burgundy, and many Noblemen, retired to Troyes in Champaign, leaving Paris under the Government of the Count St. Paul and De Laître Chancellor of France, while the Duke of Clarence march'd to the Walls of that vast City, and lay before it two Days, his Troops ravaging all the adjacent Country. After which the Castle of Gisors, which held out three Weeks, was taken by Composition; the Earl of Huntington sack'd Preaux, burnt Bretueil, Clermont and the Castle of Vendueil; and King Henry himself besieg'd the Castles of Galliart and Rochguien, two of the strongest Places in Normandy, which surrender'd upon Articles. Then returning to Mante, the King divided his Army into three Bodies, with one of which he order'd the Duke of Glocester, who had taken Ivry, to storm the Castle of St. Germain en Lay, which was soon surrender'd to him; the other he sent to attack the Castle of Montjoy, which the English by fierce Assaults forc'd to yield. At the Head of the Third, the King himself march'd to besiege Meaulan, in the Ile of France, situated on the Sein, not far distant from Paris, a Place naturally strong, and surrounded by that great River. Yet by the new invented floating Towers, the Resolutions of King Henry, and the invincible Patience of his Soldiers, the Town capitulated November the thirtieth. In the mean Time the Earls Marshal and Huntington, Sir John Green, Cornwall, and Sir Phillip Leach were order'd into the Country of Main, where they bravely encounter'd a strong Body of French sent by the Dauphine, and defeated them with the Slaughter of five thousand upon the Spot, and the Captivity of six hundred Prisoners, with the Marshal de Rous, other Noblemen, and many Standards.

The Dauphine Murders the Duke of Burgundy.

Thus the Glory of the English Arms, and the Miseries of the Kingdom of France daily increas'd, which now had her Bowels torn in Pieces by Foreign Power and Domestick Factions. For tho' the latter seem'd to have been allay'd, yet still there was a secret and irreconcilable Hatred between the Dauphine and the Duke of Burgundy; and the former was so much prevail'd upon by the Councils of those about him, that he believ'd the Miseries of France cou'd not be ended but by the Duke's Death. In order to effect this treacherous Design, the Dauphine being at Montereau a Town in Brie, sent for the Duke from Troyes under Pretence of concerting Measures with him about their further Alliance, and employing their united Powers against the common Enemy the English. The Duke at first made several Excuses, having innumerable Suspicions revolving in his Mind; but hurry'd on by his own Fate and former Guilt, he repair'd to Montereau with some Noblemen, five hundred Horse, and two hundred Archers; at the Entrance of which Place the Dauphine had fix'd three several Barricadoes, and himself stood in Arms beyond the third to receive the Duke, with only ten Followers. The Duke approaching his Presence, kneel'd down upon one knee, and saluted him with all the Respect due to his Quality; but the other neglecting all Ceremonies, immediately charg'd him with Breach of Fidelity, and Nonperformance of many Promises, and after a few Words proceeded so far as to call him Traitor, and to give him the Lie. The Duke putting his Hand behind him to adjust his Sword that had been alter'd by his kneeling, Robert de Loire designedly cry'd out What are you drawing upon your Prince? At which, an old Servant of the murder'd Duke of Orleans, struck him on the Face with a Battel-Ax, and cut off his Chin; and others with many Wounds put an end to his Life, before he cou'd draw his Sword in his own Defence. Thus fell the great Duke of Burgundy, who as he had twelve Years before caus'd the Duke of Orleans to be assassinated in the Streets of Paris, so by the Requital of the Divine Justice, his own Life was abandon'd to vile Treachery. And it is highly remarkable, that as he was exorbitant in his Lusts, both as to Ambition and Women, so one of his Mistresses

Madam

Madam Giac, was the principal Person that betray'd him to his Ruin. However this manifest Murder was justly resented by a great Part of the Kingdom of France; but so far by Queen Isabel, Mother to the Dauphine, that she did not only excite Philip, now the new Duke of Burgundy, to revenge his Father's Death, but also tormented her weak Husband's Spirits in urging him to disinherit the Dauphine, and give his Daughter Catharine in Marriage to King Henry, now in the Bowels of France.

Revenge threaten'd.

As these express'd such passionate Resentments of the Duke's Death, so his Son Philip with as much Heat and more Efficacy pursu'd the Vengeance of his Father's Blood, and swore He would never lay down his Arms, nor make Peace nor Truce, 'till he had extirpated all his Murderers. In order to effect his Purpose, he sent the Bishop of Arras with other Ambassadors to King Henry at Roan to mediate a Peace; and again sent the same Bishop with such Proposals to the king, that he thought fit to send the Bishop of Rochester, the Earls of Warwick and Gascony to Arras, who were very acceptable to the young Duke: So that between Roan and Arras Emissaries continually pass'd 'till a Truce was concluded; which, notwithstanding all the Offers and Obstructions of the Dauphine, was proclaim'd to continue from about the Feast of Epi- phany 'till Mid-March ensuing between King Henry, King Charles, and Philip Duke of Burgundy. Affairs thus far succeeding with King Henry, King Henry wrote to the new Pope, soliciting his Holiness's Consent to admit him his most Christian Son of France, and to give his Benediction, for the Confirmation of the Marriage and Amity, design'd between these two famous Princes. King Henry's Right to the Crown of France was alledg'd, and the Miseries of that Kingdom display'd; but the Dauphine's Interest was so great with the Pope, that he refus'd to confirm any thing to the Prejudice of his Title.

A Treaty propos'd to King Henry.
